AMONG the occupants of the Philharmonic Society's box were Mrs. Camden C. Dike, Mrs. Murray Boocock and Miss Cora Mallory. In the Dreier box were the Misses Dorothea and Mary Dreier and the Misses Bartlett; with Mr. and Mrs. George Du Pont Pratt in their box were Miss Jessie Sherman and Mr. and Mrs. Frank Day Tuttle and the occupants of the Lowell M. Palmer box included Mr. and Mrs. Palmer and Mrs. Arthur W. Foote. In other parts of the house were noticed: Mr. and Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mr. Guy Du Val, Mr. and Mrs. Davis H. Lanman, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred T. White, Miss Katharine White, Miss Jean White, Mr. and Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin, Mr. and Mrs. N. Townsend Thayer, Mr. John Praeger, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert W. Cowing, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Allin, Miss Kate Duryea Allin, Miss Fowler, Mr. and Mrs. R. Huntington Woodman, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Boughton, Mr. and Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Nichols, Jr., Mr. Frank J. Price, Mr. and Mrs. Edward H. Jewell, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Hinman, Miss Hinman, Mr. Matthew Hinman, Mr. John Jay Pierrepont, Miss Pierrepont, Miss Benson, Rev. Dr. and Mrs. C. F. J. Wrigley, Dr. and Mrs. William B. Dudley, Mr. Percy Dudley, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin L. Snedeker, Mr. and Mrs. Henry E. Ide, Miss Isabel Ide, Mr. and Mrs. Simon F. Rothschild, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Stevens, Mrs. Reese F. Alsop, Mrs. Jonathan Bulkeley, Mrs. John E. Leech, Miss Charlotte Leech, Miss Cornelia Henshaw, Mr. Rudolph Goepel, Miss Muriel Goepel, Miss Rosalie Kelsey, Miss Bussing, Mr. Carll H. De Silver, Miss Esther Gieser, the Misses Rose, Dr. John G. Underhill and Mr. Frank H. Chandler.

Daily Eagle
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 20 1909

PADEREWSKI'S SYMPHONY.

His New Work Enthusiastically Greeted at the Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

After being tried out in Boston, Manhattan and other cities, Ignace Paderewski's symphony in B minor, opus 24, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra as interpreter, was played under Institute auspices last evening at the fourth concert of the season by that visiting organization, in the opera house of the Brooklyn Academy of Music, before a very large audience. One of the chief conclusions recorded in Boston was that the symphony lacked tonal suppleness as well as passion, especially in the third, or battle-piece movement, while in Manhattan it was more than suggested that, while Paderewski is one of the wonderful, if not the most wonderful, interpreter in the piano music world, he has in this symphony not risen to a height as a composer that he has reached as a performer. There is a measure of truth in each judgment; but it is also true that contemporaries of great musicians do not always appreciate their works at first hearing, and further judgment should be awaited. In the great length of the composition lies one obstacle to the enjoyment of the piece. One long number is usually sufficient on a concert programme, but in this it is as though three such numbers were massed, and human nature demands extraordinary changes in order to maintain interest. One becomes tired wishing that some of the themes were not so often reiterated. And yet, the piece is a well-knit composition, erudite and yet forceful. Were it not known that Paderewski was the composer, it might be accounted greater than some will now allow.

The composition should be measured as a whole and in accordance with the intention of the composer, who is an ardent Polish patriot, and who wrote this, at intervals in the four years past, as a tribute to his mother country as well as a delineation of the Polish national life and a description of its memerable defeat in the revolution of 1863-4. No wonder that the work grew to its present proportions under Paderewski's loving hand!

In this piece he has followed throughout all of the essentias of symphonic writing, both according to the classical and the modern schools of the sonata form. The heroic past of Poland is celebrated in the first of the three movements. Here the themes are songful and of the Polish kind of song, although they are inventions of the composer, highly rhythmic and full of the spirit of Polish folk-lore, as was much of Grieg's music full of the spirit of Norwegian folk-lore; although those, too, were imagined. In this movement there is a feeling as of a solemn processional chant, while there is continually a feeling as of wave motion—a looking forward; and, if the memory of the listener continues to be active, there will be found passages in the subsequent movements in which themes in the first are used. More than anything else in this first movement, with its long introduction in sombre mood, is felt the lamentation over glories past, followed by a revival of national valor and chivalry. All through the movement there is melody, and the intellectual grasp and the manipulative skill of the composer are felt acutely in the harmonic treatment.

In the second movement the development logically grows out of the first, just as a great national movement is preceded by reflection and realization of its past before it enters upon a career of action. In this second part there is a poetical meditation. It depicts the nature of the Polish nation—their manner of thought. It is lyric and is freely developed in the manner of an improvisation. Essentially it is romantic. And at the same time it is somber, dignified, brooding, thoughtful.

The third movement is programme music, depicting in the opening in the shivering strings the restlessness of youth, eager for battle and, afterward the counter-restlessness of the older Poles, advising peace. But this is quickly, in a second theme, overcome by the chivalry of youth and with trumpet calls they go forth to battle. The strings again incite and in long passages they work through reeds and woodwind, up to the horns, where, with the sarrusophones, a new kind of double horn and the tonitruone, a percussion instrument invented by M. Paderewski, the heavy, dark coloring of battle is simulated and the overpowering force of the enemy is indicated. It is not the continued brass of Wagnerian effects, but is cumulative and never overweighted with sound. Here is heard the Polish national anthem, first faintly, then more strongly and soon dying away in the defeat of the Poles. A funeral dirge with a funeral march of surpassing beauty follow, with lamentations for the fatherland. Then the mood brightens, sorrow giving way to hope for the future for Poland's ultimate freedom. The chivalry theme returns and also the historic theme from the first movement, while a third theme was developed, which, it is said, M. Paderewski is to use for a fourth movement, a scherzo, yet to be written. The ending is fiery and inspiring, so much so that the audience was enthusiastic in applause. The composer had been called in by applause at the end of each of the previous movements, but at the final close the outburst was even more spontaneous than before, M. Paderewski shaking hands vigorously with Max Fiedler for his admirable skill in conducting.

Professor Hooper took a place standing in the audience near the footlights and said that while in Boston, according to accounts in Boston newspapers, the symphony had been received coolly, but far different had been its reception in Brooklyn, so that the president of the Institute had wished it made known that as a mark of respect and appreciation to M. Paderewski, the audience should rise, when the pianist should enter to play the other number on the programme, Beethoven's concerto for piano, No. 5, in E flat, major opus 73. The audience did so and applause was doubly renewed.

Paderewski was in good form and in high spirits and his playing of the Beethoven number was something to be remembered with joy. His sparkling runs, his thunderous passages, when he occasionally with his orchestral effects fairly subdued the symphony players and put them in the background, his mellow shading and his masterly interpretation created so great an impression that the pianist was called once more to the stage and the audience would not let him go. So with a smile he returned to the piano and played a nocturne by Chopin, tenderly and with searching tone.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
JOURNAL
Lewiston, Me. 1909
FEB 27 1909

An unusual compliment to an American pianist and composer is the engagement of Ernest Schelling for four appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to play his own "Fantastic Suite." The composition is one that received cordial approbation when played last season with several important orchestras, and the impression that it made is now evidenced by the most prized of all engagements—an appearance with Boston's famous orchestra under the baton of Max Fielder. The Schelling dates are: Philadelphia, March 15; Washington, March 16; Baltimore, March 17 and New York, March 20.

As a composition Mr. Schelling's suite is one that pleases by its striking themes and their skilful treatment. The orchestration is said to be unusually brilliant. Its unique feature is the use for its closing movement of themes suggested by "Dixie" and "Old Folks at Home." Referring to this achievement, Mr. Larence Gilman wrote in Harper's Weekly:

"Mr. Ernest Schelling did a courageous and praiseworthy thing. It was courageous, because it was the kind of precedure that musicians and music-lovers of a certain type are apt to sneer at; it was admirable because the tunes themselves are in themselves salient and valuable. They are exploited with an ingenuity, a restraint, a delicacy of fancy, and a mastery of orchestral idioms that are delightful and inspiriting. The suite is a noteworthy additon to the none to evident body of orchestral writing by Americans."

Ernest Schelling has made a splendid name for himself both as pianist and composer. In Europe his work is even better known than in his native land, for much of his life has been spent abroad. Schelling is a pupil and protege of Paderewski's—one of the very few young artists in whom the great Polish pianist has taken a deep personal interest. His prestige in Europe has been due in large measure to his appointment as court musician to the Duke and Duchess of Mecklenburg-Swerin.

EVENING SUN,
ss New York City.
MAR 2 1909

There is going to be trouble in Boston—sure's you're born. The ladies who attend the Symphony concerts persist in refusing to remove their hats, in defiance of the requests, urgings, threats, pleadings, cajolery and indignation of the management, headed by Dr. FIEDLER. At present an appeal to the police is only held in absyance in hope that the ladies will not be obdurate. What fatuity! Women are moving forward, not backward, at present. In the midst of their triumphal progress are they to take off their hats at a concert because the men wish to see the musicians? Don't the ladies need to see each other's hats? Men are becoming altogether too insolent in their demands upon women, and we expect to see the shocking spectacle of brute force invoked in this latest outrage upon the upholstered sex.

EVENING SUN,
s New York City.
FEB 19 1909

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The officers of the Waterbury Music league announced yesterday that the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Max Fiedler will take place at The Buckingham on Tuesday evening, March 23, the entire personnel of the orchestra taking part in the concert which will be the foremost musical event of the season. The soloist for the concert will be 'cellist. The program which the league has arranged includes Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" symphony, DeBussy's "Afternoon of the Faun" and compositions by Strauss, Wagner and other composers. The program is exceptionally long and one of great variety and interest. The Boston Symphony orchestra is this year enjoying the most successful season of its history under the direction of Max Fiedler, a conductor whose finish and genuine artistic worth preceded him before he came to this country to replace Dr. Carl Muck of Berlin, who was the director of the orchestra on its last appearance here.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

MR. PADEREWSKI'S SYMPHONY OF SOULS AND SHADOWS.

Of Arms He Sings and a Polish Nation's Heroic Past in Rhapsodic Rhythms with the Ceaseless Returning Surge of "Fingal's Cave" or "Valkyrie"—The Pomp of Chivalry and the B-Minor Lamentation of the Wind Over Its Grave—Why America Takes Its Hat Off to Boston and Fiedler—The Mysterious Travels of Tony—And a Postlude of Black Keys.

As all Poland was parted in three divisions, Russian, Austrian and Prussian, so Ignace Paderewski's hero symphony, first heard in Carnegie Hall last night, was in three movements, the last darkly echoing the first as a lamentation returning upon itself in passionate remorse and reiteration. It was the unexpected that happened. Not the boast of chivalry, but the ghostly processional of the wind over its grave, most attracted and gripped the hearer's imagination. You saw the boy Paderewski, whose first consuming idea in childhood was his country's lost cause, a vain revolt in the years when our Lincoln drew another war to other termination. The Poles have conquered the artistic earth since "Thaddeus of Warsaw" wept and Europe with him. The soul of Chopin died singing again in America's typical postlude of three piano encores, the last most appropriately the "Study of the Black Keys."

Will the new symphony in B-minor be played in the living composer's native land? Will Polish politics not be censored in the conservatoire? When Paderewski goes for his brief annual residence in musical Warsaw, doubtless, we shall see. But in four years' preparation the man heeded none of these things. He remains a dweller in republics, Alpine or American; a citizen of the world, who chose to bring his latest work all unheard to the land of freedom that has eight times welcomed him. And that is why all America must take its hat off to Boston to-day. And especially it is why the friends of Max Fiedler may rejoice that the career of a veteran conductor, much harassed in his first American season, had this occasion unique in local annals for a popular recognition and rehabilitation before he also leaves. He led, as the premier band played, with master hand.

The symphony is a symphony, be sure of that. Had Paderewski chosen to do the obvious thing, he could already have cut and trimmed and produced a work four-square and minutely symmetrical. His longest third movement will lend itself to separate performance almost as certainly as the "Funeral March" of Chopin's piano sonata in B-minor. But as that should never be played without the weird sequel of "The Grave," so also this orchestral tone poem needs the more formal preludes of the character of the Polish race as Paderewski first sought to express them in classical form.

From ar adagio maestoso of sighing chromatics that yet avoid the suggestion of tragic Tschaikowsky, the first movement grows into an allegro fuoco of resistless, urgent power, equally free of the cacophonies of Strauss. The sharp, repeated surge is that of "Fingal's Cave's" clear tide. The stress and impulse in deep monotone rise to shrill neighing obligato of "Valkyrie" riders upon an element eolic, ethereal. After what was called the "last phase of Paderewski the pianist," of the unquiet sonata last year, the clarity and variety of his orchestra writing was another surprise. It was the mood of "Moonlight [illegible]

Briefest of all, the tender second movement ought to gain from rehearing to-night and to-morrow. There is a repression in that quarter-hour that seems not to let the lyric nature of the people sing itself out. Now, had the missing scherzo been supplied, it would have taken something from the effect of what followed. Indeed, the third part "tone poem" is itself both scherzo and finale. You hear the disputing elders, you see the youths ride singing away, and when the Polish anthem comes back, it is borne on spirit voices alone.

The battle could even be eliminated, so far as the heart and soul of the symphony are concerned. The shadows lie across a dreamland of romance; the ascending spirits of the dead pass from cloudland into sun. With the last joyful contemplation of the chivalrous and heroic past, there remains, however, the more prevailing memory of gloom. No, here is not politics, but heartfelt poetry.

To the "dark colorings" of musical conflict, Paderewski devoted a virtuoso hearing for subtle qualities of tone. He has not listened to fractional variance of mere piano strings all his life. He himself brought overseas for his symphony three "brass woodwind" sarrusophones and the fabled thunder of the tonitruone.

The "travels of Tony" will be historic. This three-foot square of clanging sheet metal hung in rigid frame has been handed about from Boston to Washington and back by baggagemen accustomed to everything from bass viol to piccolo. It was they who learned to call the newcomer "Tony" for short. But it remained for a joker last night to christen the other instruments as "the fighting Sarrus O'Phones."

The big audience that called Paderewski out to bow at each pause in his own new music became more turbulent later when the pianist himself played. His choice, the Saint Saens concerto No. 4, gives place to the Beethoven concerto at the other appearances in two boroughs.

When unheard-of encores were added it was frankly Paderewski recital and no longer Boston symphony. Three times

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

PADEREWSKI, and the first performance in Brooklyn of his new and patriotic symphony, made the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last week Friday evening, more of a gala occasion than any preceding concert of the current series. The great Polish painist is said to entertain peculiarly cordial sentiments toward Brooklyn and the reception accorded, not only him but his symphony, testified emphatically that these sentiments are mutual. This seems, however, like putting the cart before the horse, unless one can credit him with affections so disinterested as to be uninfluenced by the attitude toward him of those upon whom they are bestowed. That would indeed betoken him even greater as a man than as a musician and a very phenomenon among artists. It was a Paderewski evening; for his symphony played by the orchestra and Beethoven's piano concerto No. 5 in E-flat major, played by himself with the orchestra, constituted the program. The audience, which taxed the seating capacity of the opera house to the limit, gave the pianist a spontaneous ovation; but more strikingly significant of its personal regard was the tribute of applause that it paid to the composer, for external testimony as well as the character of the composition itself, made it apparent that the demonstration which ensued upon the conclusion of each movement was inspired more by the author than by enthusiasm for his work, which, in spite of its merits as a lofty and serious composition containing many moving and effective passages, is uncommonly long and rather monotonous. With no license to trespass upon the preserve of the critics, I nevertheless dare to say that I enjoyed the first movement; was rather bored by the second and only occasionally startled into taking notice during the third and for the present, last movement, a fourth being in contemplation. The composer was called before the footlights after each movement; acknowledged the applause with characteristic grace and with equally characteristic courtesy insisted upon recognition for Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra which was as cordially given as it was deserved. When Paderewski appeared for the concerto number the audience rose as one man or perhaps I should say one woman and one man. At all events the oneness of the thing must have been too apparent to be convincing to the recipient of the honor even assuming he failed to overhear the voice of Professor Hooper giving the quiet (?) tip. The artificialty of this demonstration was, however, atoned for by the genuineness of the applause and insistent encores at the close of an incomparable interpretation of an ineffably beautiful work. Paderewski responded by playing a short composition of his own.

* * *

AMONG the occupants of the Philharmonic Society's box were Mrs. Camden C. Dike, Mrs. Murray Boocock and Miss Cora Mallory. In the Dreier box were the Misses Dorothea and Mary Dreier and the Misses Bartlett; with Mr. and Mrs. George Du Pont Pratt in their box were Miss Jessie Sherman and Mr. and Mrs. Frank Day Tuttle and the occupants of the Lowell M. Palmer box included Mr. and Mrs. Palmer and Mrs. Arthur W. Foote. In other parts of the house were noticed: Mr. and Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mr. Guy Du Val, Mr. and Mrs. Davis H. Lanman, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred T. White, Miss Katharine White, Miss Jean White, Mr. and Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin, Mr. and Mrs. N. Townsend Thayer, Mr. John Praeger, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert W. Cowing, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Allin, Miss Kate Duryea Allin, Miss Fowler, Mr. and Mrs. R. Huntington Woodman, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Boughton, Mr. and Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Nichols, Jr., Mr. Frank J. Price, Mr. and Mrs. Edward H. Jewell, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Hinman, Miss Hinman, Mr. Matthew Hinman, Mr. John Jay Pierrepont, Miss Pierrepont, Miss Benson, Rev. Dr. and Mrs. C. F. J. Wrigley, Dr. and Mrs. William B. Dudley, Mr. Percy Dudley, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin L. Snedeker, Mr. and Mrs. Henry E. Ide, Miss Isabel Ide, Mr. and Mrs. Simon F. Rothschild, Mr. and Mrs. William H. Stevens, Mrs. Reese F. Alsop, Mrs. Jonathan Bulkeley, Mrs. John E. Leech, Miss Charlotte Leech, Miss Cornelia Henshaw, Mr. Rudolph Goepel, Miss Muriel Goepel, Miss Rosalie Kelsey, Miss Bussing, Mr. Carll H. De Silver, Miss Esther Gieser, the Misses Rose, Dr. John G. Underhill and Mr. Frank H. Chandler.

EVENING SUN,

s ..... New York City.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

.....
.....

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The officers of the Waterbury Music league announced yesterday that the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Max Fiedler will take place at The Buckingham on Tuesday evening, March 23, the entire personnel of the orchestra taking part in the concert which will be the foremost musical event of the season. The soloist for the concert will be 'cellist. The program which the league has arranged includes Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" symphony, DeBussy's "Afternoon of the Faun" and compositions by Strauss, Wagner and other composers. The program is exceptionally long and one of great variety and interest. The Boston Symphony orchestra is this year enjoying the most successful season of its history under the direction of Max Fiedler, a conductor whose finish and genuine artistic worth preceded him before he came to this country to replace Dr. Carl Muck of Berlin, who was the director of the orchestra on its last appearance here.

om .....
dress .....
te ..... FEB

PADEREWSKI'S SYMPHONY.

His New Work Enthusiastically Greeted at the Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

After being tried out in Boston, Manhattan and other cities, Ignace Paderewski's symphony in B minor, opus 24, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra as interpreter, was played under Institute auspices last evening at the fourth concert of the season by that visiting organization, in the opera house of the Brooklyn Academy of Music, before a very large audience. One of the chief conclusions recorded in Boston was that the symphony lacked tonal suppleness as well as passion, especially in the third, or battle-piece movement, while in Manhattan it was more than suggested that, while Paderewski is one of the wonderful, if not the most wonderful, interpreter in the piano music world, he has in this symphony not risen to a height as a composer that he has reached as a performer. There is a measure of truth in each judgment; but it is also true that contemporaries of great musicians do not always appreciate their works at first hearing, and further judgment should be awaited. In the great length of the composition lies one obstacle to the enjoyment of the piece. One long number is usually sufficient on a concert programme, but in this it is as though three such numbers were massed, and human nature demands extraordinary changes in order to maintain interest. One becomes tired wishing that some of the themes were not so often reiterated. And yet, the piece is a well-knit composition, erudite and yet forceful. Were it not known that Paderewski was the composer, it might be accounted greater than some will now allow.

The composition should be measured as a whole and in accordance with the intention of the composer, who is an ardent Polish patriot, and who wrote this, at intervals in the four years past, as a tribute to his mother country as well as a delineation of the Polish national life and a description of its memorable defeat in the revolution of 1863-4. No wonder that the work grew to its present proportions under Paderewski's loving hand!

In this piece he has followed throughout all of the essentias of symphonic writing, both according to the classical and the modern schools of the sonata form. The heroic past of Poland is celebrated in the first of the three movements. Here the themes are songful and of the Polish kind of song, although they are inventions of the composer, highly rhythmic and full of the spirit of Polish folk-lore, as was much of Grieg's music full of the spirit of Norwegian folk-lore; although those, too, were imagined. In this movement there is a feeling as of a solemn processional chant, while there is continually a feeling as of wave motion—a looking forward; and, if the memory of the listener continues to be active, there will be found passages in the subsequent movements in which themes in the first are used. More than anything else in this first movement, with its long introduction in sombre mood, is felt the lamentation over glories past, followed by a revival of national valor and chivalry. All through the movement there is melody, and the intellectual grasp and the manipulative skill of the composer are felt acutely in the harmonic treatment.

In the second movement the development logically grows out of the first, just as a great national movement is preceded by reflection and realization of its past before it enters upon a career of action. In this second part there is a poetical meditation. It depicts the nature of the Polish nation—their manner of thought. It is lyric and is freely developed in the manner of an improvisation. Essentially it is romantic. And at the same time it is somber, dignified, brooding, thoughtful.

The third movement is programme music, depicting in the opening in the shivering strings the restlessness of youth, eager for battle and afterward the counter-restlessness of the older Poles, advising peace. But this is quickly, in a second theme, overcome by the chivalry of youth and with trumpet calls they go forth to battle. The strings again incite and in long passages they work, through reeds and woodwind, up to the horns, where, with the sarrusophones, a new kind of double horn and the tonitruone, a percussion instrument invented by M. Paderewski, the heavy, dark coloring of battle is simulated and the overpowering force of the enemy is indicated. It is not the continued brass of Wagnerian effects, but is cumulative and never overweighted with sound. Here is heard the Polish national anthem, first faintly, then more strongly and soon dying away in the defeat of the Poles. A funeral dirge with a funeral march of surpassing beauty follow, with lamentations for the fatherland. Then the mood brightens, sorrow giving way to hope for the future for Poland's ultimate freedom. The chivalry theme returns and also the historic theme from the first movement, while a third theme was developed, which, it is said, M. Paderewski is to use for a fourth movement, a scherzo, yet to be written. The ending is fiery and inspiring, so much so that the audience was enthusiastic in applause. The composer had been called in by applause at the end of each of the previous movements, but at the final close the outburst was even more spontaneous than before, M. Paderewski shaking hands vigorously with Max Fiedler for his admirable skill in conducting.

Professor Hooper took a place standing in the audience near the footlights and said that while in Boston, according to accounts in Boston newspapers, the symphony had been received coolly, but far different had been its reception in Brooklyn, so that the president of the Institute had wished it made known that as a mark of respect and appreciation to M. Paderewski, the audience should rise, when the pianist should enter to play the other number on the programme, Beethoven's concerto for piano, No. 5, in E flat, major opus 73. The audience did so and applause was doubly renewed.

Paderewski was in good form and in high spirits and his playing of the Beethoven number was something to be remembered with joy. His sparkling runs, his thunderous passages, when he occasionally with his orchestral effects fairly subdued the symphony players and put them in the background, his mellow shading and his masterly interpretation created so great an impression that the pianist was called once more to the stage and the audience would not let him go. So with a smile he returned to the piano and played a nocturne by Chopin, tenderly and with searching tone.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

JOURNAL
n .....
ress .....
N. Y., MAR 1909.
FEB 27 1909

An unusual compliment to an American pianist and composer is the engagement of Ernest Schelling for four appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to play his own "Fantastic Suite." The composition is one that received cordial approbation when played last season with several important orchestras, and the impression that it made is now evidenced by the most prized of all engagements—an appearance with Boston's famous orchestra under the baton of Max Fiedler. The Schelling dates are: Philadelphia, March 15; Washington, March 16; Baltimore, March 17 and New York, March 20.

As a composition Mr. Schelling's suite is one that pleases by its striking themes and their skilful treatment. The orchestration is said to be unusually brilliant. Its unique feature is the use for its closing movement of themes suggested by "Dixie" and "Old Folks at Home." Referring to this achievement, Mr. Larence Gilman wrote in Harper's Weekly:

"Mr. Ernest Schelling did a courageous and praiseworthy thing. It was courageous, because it was the kind of precedure that musicians and music-lovers of a certain type are apt to sneer at; it was admirable because the tunes themselves are in themselves salient and valuable. They are exploited with an ingenuity, a restraint, a delicacy of fancy, and a mastery of orchestral idioms that are delightful and inspiriting. The suite is a noteworthy additon to the none to evident body of orchestral writing by Americans."

Ernest Schelling has made a splendid name for himself both as pianist and composer. In Europe his work is even better known than in his native land, for much of his life has been spent abroad. Schelling is a pupil and protege of Paderewski's—one of the very few young artists in whom the great Polish pianist has taken a deep personal interest. His prestige in Europe has been due in large measure to his appointment as court musician to the Duke and Duchess of Mecklenburg-Swerin.

EVENING SUN,

ss ..... New York City.

MAR 2 1909

There is going to be trouble in Boston—sure's you're born. The ladies who attend the Symphony concerts persist in refusing to remove their hats, in defiance of the requests, urgings, threats, pleadings, cajolery and indignation of the management, headed by Dr. FIEDLER. At present an appeal to the police is only held in abeyance in hope that the ladies will not be obdurate. What fatuity! Women are moving forward, not backward, at present. In the midst of their triumphal progress are they to take off their hats at a concert because the men wish to see the musicians? Don't the ladies need to see each other's hats? Men are becoming altogether too insolent in their demands upon women, and we expect to see the shocking spectacle of brute force invoked in this latest outrage upon the upholstered sex.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

MR. PADEREWSKI'S SYMPHONY OF SOULS AND SHADOWS.

Of Arms He Sings and a Polish Nation's Heroic Past in Rhapsodic Rhythms with the Ceaseless Returning Surge of "Fingal's Cave" or "Valkyrie"—The Pomp of Chivalry and the B-Minor Lamentation of the Wind Over Its Grave—Why America Takes Its Hat Off to Boston and Fiedler—The Mysterious Travels of Tony—And a Postlude of Black Keys.

As all Poland was parted in three divisions, Russian, Austrian and Prussian, so Ignace Paderewski's hero symphony, first heard in Carnegie Hall last night, was in three movements, the last darkly echoing the first as a lamentation returning upon itself in passionate remorse and reiteration. It was the unexpected that happened. Not the boast of chivalry, but the ghostly processional of the wind over its grave, most attracted and gripped the hearer's imagination. You saw the boy Paderewski, whose first consuming idea in childhood was his country's lost cause, a vain revolt in the years when our Lincoln drew another war to other termination. The Poles have conquered the artistic earth since "Thaddeus of Warsaw" wept and Europe with him. The soul of Chopin died singing again in America's typical postlude of three piano encores, the last most appropriately the "Study of the Black Keys."

Will the new symphony in B-minor be played in the living composer's native land? Will Polish politics not be censored in the conservatoire? When Paderewski goes for his brief annual residence in musical Warsaw, doubtless, we shall see. But in four years' preparation the man heeded none of these things. He remains a dweller in republics, Alpine or American; a citizen of the world, who chose to bring his latest work all unheard to the land of freedom that has eight times welcomed him. And that is why all America must take its hat off to Boston to-day. And especially it is why the friends of Max Fiedler may rejoice that the career of a veteran conductor, much harassed in his first American season, had this occasion unique in local annals for a popular recognition and rehabilitation before he also leaves. He led, as the premier band played, with master hand.

The symphony is a symphony, be sure of that. Had Paderewski chosen to do the obvious thing, he could already have cut and trimmed and produced a work four-square and minutely symmetrical. His longest third movement will lend itself to separate performance almost as certainly as the "Funeral March" of Chopin's piano sonata in B-minor. But as that should never be played without the weird sequel of "The Grave," so also this orchestral tone poem needs the more formal preludes of the character of the Polish race as Paderewski first sought to express them in classical form.

From ar adagio maestoso of sighing chromatics that yet avoid the suggestion of tragic Tschaikowsky, the first movement grows into an allegro fuoco of resistless, urgent power, equally free of the cacophonies of Strauss. The sharp, repeated surge is that of "Fingal's Cave's" clear tide. The stress and impulse in deep monotone rise to shrill neighing obligato of "Valkyrie" riders upon an element aeolic, ethereal. After what was called the "last phase of Paderewski the pianist," of the unquiet sonata last year, the clarity and variety of his orchestra writing was another surprise. It was the mood of "Manru" in the inter-

Briefest of all, the tender second movement ought to gain from rehearing to-night and to-morrow. There is a repression in that quarter-hour that seems not to let the lyric nature of the people sing itself out. Now, had the missing scherzo been supplied, it would have taken something from the effect of what followed. Indeed, the third part "tone poem" is itself both scherzo and finale. You hear the disputing elders, you see the youths ride singing away, and when the Polish anthem comes back, it is borne on spirit voices alone.

The battle could even be eliminated, so far as the heart and soul of the symphony are concerned. The shadows lie across a dreamland of romance; the ascending spirits of the dead pass from cloudland into sun. With the last joyful contemplation of the chivalrous and heroic past, there remains, however, the more prevailing memory of gloom. No, here is not politics, but heartfelt poetry.

To the "dark colorings" of musical conflict, Paderewski devoted a virtuoso hearing for subtle qualities of tone. He has not listened to fractional variance of mere piano strings all his life. He himself brought oversea for his symphony three "brass woodwind" sarrusophones and tne fabled thunder of the tonitruone.

The "travels of Tony" will be historic. This three-foot square of clanging sheet metal hung in rigid frame has been handed about from Boston to Washington and back by baggagemen accustomed to everything from bass viol to piccolo. It was they who learned to call the newcomer "Tony" for short. But it remained for a joker last night to christen the other instruments as "the fighting Sarrus O'Phones."

The big audience that called Paderewski out to bow at each pause in his own new music became more turbulent later when the pianist himself played. His choice, the Saint Saens concerto No. 4, gives place to the Beethoven concerto at the other appearances in two boroughs.

When unheard-of encores were added, it was frankly Paderewski recital and no longer Boston Symphony. Three times the soloist played again. When it came

Sun
FEB 10 1909

PADEREWSKI AS COMPOSER

HIS NEW SYMPHONY PRODUCED AT LAST.

Occupies More Than Half the Concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra—Composer Called Out After Each Movement—Study in Orchestral Delineation

The important incident of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night was the first performance in this city of Ignace Jan Paderewski's symphony in B minor, opus 24, this composer's first essay in the symphonic field. The work was played for the first time anywhere at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's home concert of February 12. Mr. Paderewski has therefore paid the United States the compliment of submitting to its first critism his most ambitious composition. It is not likely that this sin will be forgotten beyond the seas.

The composer himself has furnished the general plan of the work, printed in the Boston programme book. There are three movements, an opening and a final allegro, and between them an andante. The work is a patriotic tribute to Poland, occasioned by the fortieth anniversary of the revolution of 1863-64.

The first movement, according to the composer, is free, but classic in form, and aims to commemorate Poland's historical past. The themes are racial in character, but are not popular melodies. The second movement, thematically similar in nature, endeavors to embody the lyric traits of the Polish spirit.

The third movement is a sort of symphonic poem in itself. The antithetic elements necessary to musical structure are found in the eagerness of youthful hotheads on the one hand and the despondency of old hearts on the other. The latter is expressed in a melancholy and dirgelike treatment of the national anthem.

The youth heed not. Martial ardor breaks forth in a new chivalric theme, heralded by distant trumpets. The youth march out to battle. Dark instrumental colors depict the woe of the time. The Polish anthem struggles vainly upward only to be submerged under the gloom of defeat.

A funeral dirge laments the heroes who are gone. The themes of unrest heard in the first movement reappear, but divested of their power. They rise into a song of sorrow for the fatherland. Suddenly there is a change of mood. Hope returns, and now there is a thematic recapitulation and climax, in which the chivalric theme of the third movement is prominent, together with the theme of the heroic past from the first movement and a new theme upon which Mr. Paderewski contemplates building a fourth movement. This movement is still unwritten.

The impression made by a single hearing of this new composition last night was not altogether definite. One thing, however, stood forth quite clearly, and that was that the so-called symphony was not to be accepted as a symphony in the old sense of that term. A work is not necessarily a symphony in the classic significance because it has three or more movements of different mood, keys and rhythmic character, nor because it has themes, developments and instrumental and harmonic climaxes. These materials are the common property of all composition in larger designs.

What Mr. Paderewski has written is an orchestral delineation in three sections. It is a tone poem in cantos. Its themes are melodically vague, for the plain reason that they are bare outlines of melodic forms planned to admit of the broadest freedom of color within their liberal limits. The composer has aimed at the evolution of his ideas through the media of the contemporaneous orchestral pallette, by means of the classic processes of thematic development.

He asks much of his hearer. The auditor who sets out to grasp the scheme of this work must be ready to seize upon a few elusive melodic fragments which are woven into an iridescent web of instrumentation. Shape is indicated rather by color contrast than by line and curve. It is all intensely modern and sometimes exasperatingly intangible.

Yet if one will but study as he studies an impressionistic picture he will get at the general effect. You must half close your eyes and look at it aslant. Then the clash of colors and the daring infidelity of line spring into intelligibility and you recognize the artist in tone tints.

The harmonies in the work are skilfully employed. The first movement, for example, is thronged with acidulous chords which would lie sweet upon the ears of Vincent d'Indy or Debussy. But in the second movement the tonalities more familiar to older music dominate and the contrast has a brilliant scenic value. Much of this music, indeed, is scenic and not a little of it seems to clamor for the theatre as its fitting home rather than the concert platform.

In fact we should be inclined to feel that the external descriptive power of music is utilized rather than its emotional expressiveness to create the desired mood in the listener. Once acquainted with the programme of the work we can sit back and watch its incidents pass before us in a wonderful procession.

But we are spectators rather than participators in the thought and feeling of the action. The sketch is easily followed. We can see the old shaking their doubtful heads. We can see the young waving their athletic arms. We can hear the mournful Poles singing their melancholy songs, and we wonder that they do not in sheer despair break into the mad dance of their oppressors which we have so often heard in the symphonies of Tschaikowsky. Perhaps this will come in the yet unwritten fourth movement.

The story of the long third movement is read without doubt. But it is lineative and descriptive. It is picturesque, brilliant, intellectual, magnificent instrumental technic and dazzling in its color effects. But nevertheless the hearer after this first performance wonders if less parade of combinations, less complexity of style, a simpler and more direct melodic idiom and a more compact design would not have accomplished something more in the direction of bringing the heart into throbbing sympathy with downtrodden Poland.

Perhaps further study of this ambitious composition will leave us with more definite impressions. This first hearing satisfies us that Mr. Paderewski has composed with the fulness of a penetrative mind and with the resources of a rich musicianship. Furthermore, he has not been blind to the doings of contemporaneous composers. He has followed the lead of Richard Strauss in boldness of instrumental combinations. Some of his chords for low brass and sarrusophones, with muted tuba, accompanied by rolls on the tonitruon, a thunder imitator invented by Mr. Paderewski himself, were indeed the bottomless depth of gloom.

The audience was very cordial and called Mr. Paderewski out after each movement of the symphony. There were only two numbers on the programme, as the symphony occupies about an hour and a quarter. The second number was Saint-Saëns's piano concerto in C minor, in which Mr. Paderewski was the soloist. Let the record be completed with the note that the symphony was superbly performed and was conducted with splendid authority by Mr. Fiedler.

THE BOSTON HERALD, FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1909.

MRS. HESS DIES ABROAD.

Wife of Prof. Hess Made Many Friends During Stay Here.

A cable message was received here today announcing the death of Mrs. Willy Hess, wife of the well known musician, at Weisbaden, where she was spending the winter with her son. Mrs. Hess came to Boston in 1905 with her husband, who became concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra. She remained here until 1907, when she returned to Germany. Prof. Hess is now in Boston. He will sail for Germany next Tuesday, which is the earliest date he can get away. Mrs. Hess during her residence here found a large number of friends in musical circles and elsewhere.

Mrs. Hess died of cerebral paralysis Thursday morning. This morning Prof. Hess received a leter from his wife written some 10 days ago, in which she spoke of future plans, and seemed in fairly good health.

She leaves three daughters and a son. She was 48 years old, and had been married 23 years. She was the daughter of Councillor Traut of the council of Weisbaden. She early showed an aptitude for music, and went to the Cologne conservatory, where she studied voice under the best teachers in Europe. She was the favorite pupil of Prof. Schneider. She filled a number of professional engagements before she met Mr. Hess. When they were married she gave up singing in public, though her future in that direction was bright.

Prof. Hess cancelled all his engagements on receipt of the news. He will not play with the Symphony orchestra today nor tomorrow, and the Hess-Schroeder quartet is cancelling engagements.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

DR. WUELLNER'S EXPERIMENT IN DECLAMATION

Wildenbruch's Narrative Poem, "The Witch's Song," That He Will Recite with the Symphony Orchestra on Sunday—The Obscure Future of "Chantecler" and Rostand's Effort to Have His Way with It—The Death of Mrs. Willy Hess and His Return to Germany—The Metropolitan and the Boston Opera—More Concerts by Mr. Czerwonky—A Composer Who Sings His Own Songs—George Grossmith, the Entertainer, Retires—Other News of the Day

At the concert for the increase of the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, Dr. Wüllner will declaim "The Witch's Song," a long narrative poem by Ernest von Wildenbruch, the German poet and playwright who died last month, to the orchestral accompaniment that Max Schillings has written in the manner of "melodrame" (as the French call such a mingling of speech and music) to establish its moods and to amplify and enhance its episodes. Dr. Wüllner has often declaimed the piece, and other singers, like Mr. Bispham, have been ambitious to undertake it; but here in Boston no one hitherto has attempted it. The poem begins abruptly with the summons of the confessor of Hersfeld priory to hear the sins of the dying brother Medardus, who for fifty years has dwelt in the brotherhood, "the holiest of them all." The confessor goes to Medardus's cell; hour follows hour; the monks fall to prayer for the soul of their dying brother. Suddenly the sound of a strange song interrupts and alarms them—no hymn, no litany, but a song of the passions and the joys of the world. And Medardus's voice is singing it. The monks speed to his side:

The cell was open—pale, haggard, half dead,
Lay brother Medardus on narrow bed:
His hands were folded in prayerful fashion,
His staring eyes glowed with longing passion;
To his stammering lips the words would throng,
Endless and restless in savage song.
That song it told of hopes forlorn,
Of languishing love, derision and scorn,
Mid odors as wafted from Eden Bowers,
Teeming with breath from the soul of flowers.
A song it was such as never was heard,
And the heart to its very depths it stirred,
As it told of sorrow, of wildest delight,
In a strain that seized on the soul with might.
The monks swayed their censers to and fro:
"Flee, Satan, the soul of this man of woe!"
But the more their censers they swayed and swung,
The louder and wilder Medardus sung;
And deeper and deeper his weird words sunk
Into the soul of each listening monk.
Oh whence did that song its magic borrow,
Calling life's cherished hopes and sorrow!
It brought back thoughts of a happier lot,
Of the days of youth long since forgot.
And the monks ceased singing one by one,
To harken the song of the dying man.
The holy Prior, terror-bound,
With pallid cheek, he gazed around,
Then on Medardus he turned his look,
And his voice with righteous anger shook:
"Wouldst seduce the brothers with magic spell?
Then curse on thee, wizard, then fare thee to hell!"
Medardus then slow from his bed 'gan rise,
And a wondrous light shone forth in his eyes;
His far-off gaze seemed fondly captured
By a vision that held his soul enraptured.
A'sudden, the tears down his pale cheek ran,
To the brothers then turning, Medardus began,

The monk sets to his tale of the days when he was a fair young priest, all ardor for his holy calling and of the days when "a band of Satan" writhed up and down the land. One night came the summons to go to the prison and to stir to repentance a young witch condemned the morrow to the stake. By his torch he descries the woman crouching in her dungeon, fair, anguished, piteous. The sight touches, shakes him, but resolutely he begins his exhortation. The girl clings to him, breaks in upon his words:

"Why must I suffer—say, what have I done?
Nor father, nor mother I never have known,
Grandmother and I lived i' th' forest alone.
She gathered the herbs on hill and heath,
Saved many poor sufferers from pain and death.
Grandmother they burnt; their words were fell:
They said she was a witch from hell.
A song she sang I was wont to repeat,
It sounded so weird, so sad and so sweet.
She told me it came from distant lands,
Where love's deep magic the heart commands.
I sang it nor it's meaning did ken,
And they seized and imprisoned me, heartless men;
They cast me into this dungeon cell;
They say I sing by the powers of hell,
That my song the heart to sin can inspire;
And tomorrow I'm doomed to die by fire!"

She goads him with the sweetness and the joy of life, she warms him with her beauty; she shakes him with her wild piteousness. She bids him flee with her deep in the forest where there is treasure, where there is solitude, where there are life and love. The doors of the cell open as by magic. The monk half yields, half turns to flee. A voice out of the darkness warns him; a hand out of the darkness stays him. "Know sin's reward; the grace of the Lord has departed from you." The monk flings the girl back upon the stones:

Onward I hastened, nor rested, nor slept,
On bended knee I prayed and I wept,
'Til the terror began, 'til the night was gone;
And the terrror began with the blush of dawn;
The heavens one flaming pyre resembled,
The eager crowd in swarms assembled,
In a far-off field rose a mighty pyre,
Sombre and dark, awaiting the fire,
The gazers e'en seemed to hold their breath
And there she stood waiting her awful death.
Like storm-bound petrels tossed on the wind,
Her dark eyes roamed, but no rest could find;
Then I raised the crucifix on high,
And her searching gaze met my tear-red eye;
And gently, lest those around should see,
She bowed her head, she nodded to me.

And a smile lit up her features wan,
Like the fading light of the setting sun.
The hangsman lifted his torch on high,
Her languishing eye drank into mine eye;
The flames leapt up with a hissing blaze,
She held me spell-bound with her gaze;
The sparks flew up as from burning sheaves;
Her lips they trembled like falling leaves,
A-sudden, a-sudden, like bells set ringing,
Mid the roaring pyre the maid 'gan singing!
Like night, pervaded by spring's soft shower,
My soul was seized by that song's sweet power;
As mid odors wafted from Eden bowers,
Teeming with breath from the soul of flowers,
It seemed like a voice in vain endeavor
To tell me of joys I had lost forever.
The flames lapped her feet, her eyelids fell,
She bowed her head in a last farewell,
The thick, black smoke around did close,
Yet her pleading song through the smoke arose,
Roaring the flames darted up to heaven;
Like trembling bells, I still heard that steven Though covered mine eyes, I found no release:
"That singing, that singing, when will it cease?"
I turned me shuddering, I fled from the spot,
That voice fled with me, it left me not,
Where'er I wandered or sought to hide,
That voice was ever at my side.
And tho' I slumbered or knelt in prayer,
Those tones would haunt me everywhere;
And since that day, for fifty years,
That self-same song rings in mine ears!
Medardus rose up, wild fear in his eye;
"I hear her again, she draweth nigh!
Up the steps, at the door, oh do ye not hear?
She stops on the threshold, she 's here, she 's here!
Oh maiden pure, the world was the liar,
That called thee witch and branded with fire.
Ye rosebud lips, soft eyes full of pity,
Ye playing limbs, blossoming forth in beauty;
Sweet spirit of love, which 't was mine once to cherish,
How could I forsake thee and leave thee to perish?
The path I had strayed from once more I behold,
As the Gates of Heaven at thy coming unfold,
After fifty years' penance, my suffering is o'er;
I come to be with thee ever more!"

The Prior of Hersfeld speaks the epilogue to the awe-stricken monks in the wan dawn above the dead Medardus:

"'T is He hath said: 'Judgment is mine,'
Then judge not, brothers, go, pray at His shrine!"

Surely here is room, in the poem and in the music that would summon the haunting enchantment of the witch's song, for many of Dr. Wüllner's best and most moving powers. He can make his pictures; he can recreate his characters; he can bring creeping atmosphere; he can make emotion penetrate and grip.

wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Women Refuse to Take Off Their Hats

Defy Symphony Management in Boston.—Threat to Invoke

Boston, March, 1.—The women attending the symphony concerts here persist in their refusal to meet the request of the management to remove their hats.

Male patrons are angry because they connot see the musicians, and have deluged the office with complaints. A printed card was recently distributed among the patrons at one of the concerts, asking the women to have some regard for those seated in the rear and remove their hats. A few responded, but most of the women ignored the card.

Unless the management is able to abate the nuisance, an appeal, it is said, will be made to Police Commissioner O'Meara.

TRANSCRIPT, FEBRUARY 26, 1909

Here in Boston

The wide circle of friends and acquaintances here that like Mr. Hess as a man and admire him as a violinist will be sorry to learn of the death of his wife, which befell yesterday at Wiesbaden. When Mr. Hess came first to Boston she spent two years here, but when he returned again from Germany last autumn, her health constrained her to remain behind. Mrs. Hess was the daughter of a family in the magistracy, and she had begun a career as a singer when she married the violinist some thirty years ago. Thereupon she abandoned the stage, devoting her life to him and to the three daughters and the son that were born to them. Her children were with her in Wiesbaden when she died, and this morning Mr. Hess decided to return at once to them, and he sails from New York next Tuesday, leaving all plans for the future for later decision. As he now expects, he may return in a few weeks to his place in the orchestra. In the interval, beginning this afternoon Mr. Noack will take his desk as concert-master. Thus, too, the concerts of the Hess-Schroeder quartet—and one was announced next week for both Boston and New York—are postponed indefinitely. Mr. Hess's departure will be as sincerely regretted as the intimate loss that has occasioned it.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1909

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Miss Morena and Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" for the Symphony Concerts—A Novel Programme, with Dr. Wuellner for the Pension Fund—Mrs. Hunt's and Mrs. Hall's Concerts

Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" will be revived at the Symphony Concerts of next week, and Miss Morena of the Metropolitan Opera House will come to them for the last assisting singer of the current season. Mr. Gericke put the symphony on one of his programmes four years ago. A year later Mr. Weingartner and the New York Symphony Orchestra performed it, in a chance concert, very eloquently and excitingly. When Dr. Muck chose from Berlioz he preferred the less familiar symphony, "Harold in Italy." Thus, the "Fantastic Symphony" will come to comparatively fresh hearing, and it will be interesting to hear Mr. Fiedler's reading of it. Such largely imagined and romantically conceived music that incessantly seeks its effect plainly suits some of his most telling talents. The symphony itself becomes more and more a curiosity—a huge musical survival of the romanticism of 1830 with its mingled power and extravagance, its tempestuous passion and its sounding rhetoric. Who now, unless it were Richard Strauss or some of his disciples, would conceive this "episode in the life of an artist," with its passing scenes of the ball, the solitary revery in the fields, the march to the scaffold, the descent to pandemonium, the dreams, the passions, the "fixed idea" and all the rest of Berlioz's romantic paraphernalia. It is the custom to trace Strauss's musical descent through Liszt and Wagner, but farther back Berlioz may be his truer musical progenitor. Anyhow, they have a common liking for huge musical and imaginative fabrics and for tonal coloring as their readiest and most efficient resource. Miss Morena is one of the younger German singers of the Metropolitan Opera House, who came thither last year from Germany. In Boston last spring she appeared as Sieglinde in "Die Walküre," and the expressive quality of her singing, her sensitive temperament and the beauty and the dignity of her aspect commended her. Next week she will sing the familiar air, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's "Oberon," and songs by Wagner—"Träume" and "Schmerzen"—and by Strauss. The lesser orchestral numbers to complete the programme remain to be announced.

Tomorrow evening, at eight, in Symphony Hall, the orchestra will give the second of its two annual concerts for the profit of the Pension Fund, which is now beginning to serve its purpose in the providing of a comfortable income for those of the men who have retired after long service. The members of the orchestra assess themselves regularly for the fund; occasional gifts increase it; but the chief means for the maintaining of it are the receipts of the two annual concerts. They give indeed the only opportunities of the year for the public of the Symphony Concerts to testify—and best by its works—to the regard in which it holds the men who make the orchestra. Usually it has been quick and generous with such tokens and the more readily for the pleasure of the Pension Fund concerts in themselves. They give, besides, one of the rare occasions when those who would hear the Symphony Orchestra and discover Mr. Fiedler may do so outside the regular series of concerts. They will hear him and the band at their best in Strauss's tone-poem, "A Hero's Life," that begins the programme on Sunday, and that has been one of the remarkable performances of the current season. Then Dr. Wüllner, appearing for the first time here in the evening, will sing three of Schubert's songs—"Der Wanderer," "Der Doppelgänger" and Erlkönig," and, for a final number of the list, recite to the orchestral accompaniment composed by Max Schillings, Ernest von Wildenbruch's romantic narrative poem, "The Witch's Song," some account of which was printed yesterday in this place. Still more than Schubert's songs, it will give room for Dr. Wüllner's powers as a narrator in the exalted speech of music or rather as the re-creator of scene and character, of atmosphere and emotion until they absorb and stir his hearers. The beginning of the concert is set for eight o'clock, and "A Hero's Life" continues without pause for thirty-five minutes. A word to the careless ought to be sufficient.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1909

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Elgar's Symphony for Its First Performance in Boston—A Contrast or Two with Mr. Paderewski's Symphony—Mr. Fiedler's Luminous and Stirring Performance—First Impressions of the Music—Its Dominant Masculinity

Two new symphonies by living composers within two weeks must be nearly "a record" at the Symphony Concerts. A fortnight ago Mr. Fiedler and his men played Mr. Paderewski's symphony for a first hearing anywhere. Yesterday afternoon they undertook Sir Edward Elgar's, for a first hearing in Boston. Neither symphony came unheralded, but announcement and summary were so brief as to Mr. Paderewski's that its first audience listened to it as a wholly new thing coming moment by moment into existence before its ears. Elgar's is only two months old, but since the first performances in Manchester and in London, last December, and in New York and Chicago last January, report has been diligent with it. The Britons, with their devout fidelity to the one distinguished English composer in two hundred years of sterility, have duly admonished us to expect a remarkable and impressive piece. New York and Chicago have been more doubtful on both scores. Prying analysts have exercised themselves plentifully upon Elgar's symphony and the humblest student or the laziest amateur may know what to expect of the music and where to expect it. The reviewers have been as energetic, and their impressions and opinions have filled many columns of the newspapers and the musical journals. As the event proved, the way had been too thoroughly made ready. There was no excitement in the air as there had been a fortnigt ago, no buzz of eager comment in the intermission. Elgar, after all, was only a name on the programme with a reputation behind it. Mr. Paderewski had listened with his own ears alike to his music and to the applause of those that heard it. Thus Elgar's symphony was no more than a new and warmly discussed piece that was to be played for the first time in Boston. There was curiosity and interest, but no more than is becoming to such an occasion. The applause was hardly such, and the elect ladies of Friday afternoon received the new symphony of yesterday much more tepidly than they had that of a fortnight before. The Britons have their excitement of Elgar. The remote Bostonians take him as all in the musical business of the day.

The symphony and the performance as well deserved a more eager and a heartier reward. It is music of large outline filled with suggestive or only intricate detail. It needs the clearest of exposition and adjustment; and it asks, equally, sustained largeness and vigor of utterance and on occasion an ample and exalted eloquence. Often it is music of thought, even of calculation. At its best the calculation disappears; the thought warms into emotion; and idea and emotion translate themselves into music that engrosses and stirs those that hear. Mr. Fiedler so understood the symphony, and so, with his men, brought to hearing. He kept its largeness of design; he made clear the musical thought and the development even when the one was most concentrated and the other most intricate; he set details in their place. Thus he read the symphony luminously, with proportioning mind and hand. He read it no less with imaginative understanding and emotional response. He gave the scherzo its resonant vigor, its abrupt energy. He carried higher and higher the austerely passionate song of the slow movement. He was eloquent in the large measures with which the symphony begins to the proclaiming of the melody of strength and aspiration that runs through the music and binds it together. He was no less eloquent in the exaltation of masculine fortitude and victory with which the symphony ends. Throughout he seemed to give the music its true, vital, revealing voice. Plainly it stirred him, and when Mr. Fiedler is himself stirred, the better, in spite of Coquelin's maxim to the contrary, is his performance.

Elgar is lengthy, as the way of composers is nowadays; his symphony runs a full fifty minutes; but it seemed yesterday by no means so exhausting to the hearer's attention as did Mr. Paderewski's. The introduction, with its proclamation of the theme of fortitude and aspiration, is relatively short. It disclosed only the pervading and the ultimately triumphant idea of the music. A first movement, that is not short, ensues, music of conflict on its imaginative side, music of reflection, often, in its structural aspect. In the fashion of the day, Elgar is fain to exhaust his themes; to leave nothing unsaid, to ply the resources of instrumental coloring that the modern orchestra affords. There is plentiful music of thought and reflection in this first movement; there is calculated music-making as well; but often feeling vitalizes the thought and the music has imaginative cast and emotional appeal. Melodies do battle as men battle for their ideals. The following scherzo runs with robust but continent vigor and with abrupt energy. Throughout it is fully masculine music of the joy seemingly of the joy of strength and of its ordered play. Then comes the technical feat with which Elgar has seemingly delighted the slow-uttered Britons. The theme of the scherzo and the theme of the adagro are identical note for note. The scherzo dies; the adagro uses from it, but the change of key, rythm, mood and handling has altogether altered the aspect of the music. This slow movement again is singularly and gratefully masculine music alike in its reticence and in its intensity. Plainly it is the voice of a man contemplating in the secret places of mind and heart the ideal that he seeks and cherishes. The song rises in aspiration and devotion to a serene close. There is pause, and the finale allegro returns to the mood in which the symphony began. Again, there is contest, but now to victory; the theme of the introduction—the theme as it seems of fortitude and strung more and more asserts itself. The music passes from energy to eloquence; eloquence to exaltation; and the final measures are as puissant as those with which the symphony began. So much for first impressions, and such masculine music, such music that at its best stirs the emotions and yet makes no direct sensual appeal, is rare in our time. One of the London wits, who heard the symphony, came back to his club to say that the world of Elgar's imagination is plainly a world in which there are no women, but only a man's life and a man's ideals. It is, if his symphony speaks for him. H. T. P.

THE BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1909.

MRS. WILLY HESS.

Wife of Former Symphony Leader Dies at Weisbaden.

A cable message was received here yesterday announcing the death from cerebral paralysis of Mrs. Willy Hess, wife of the musician, at Weisbaden, where she was spending the winter with her son. Mrs. Hess came to Boston in 1905 with her husband, who became concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra. She remained here until 1907, when she returned to Germany. Prof. Hess is now in Boston. He will sail for Germany next Tuesday, which is the earliest date he can get away.

She leaves three daughters and a son. She was 48 years old, and had been married 23 years. She was the daughter of Councillor Traut of the council of Weisbaden.

Prof. Hess has cancelled all his engagements. He will not play with the Symphony orchestra today, and the Hess-Schroeder quartet is cancelling engagements.

BOSTON POST, FEBRUARY 27, 1909

ELGAR'S NEW SYMPHONY

By Olin Downes

Edward Elgar's symphony, so mightily and lengthily heralded from England and New York, was played for the first time in Boston yesterday afternoon at the 16th public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall.

The work was first given at Manchester, England, on Dec. 3 last. It was played in London on the 7th. In England it was played five times in as many weeks.

Four movements follow freely the accepted canons of symphony making, but after the fashion of the moderns the composer uses significant themes, which predominate throughout. He has emphatically stated that the work lacks a "programme" of any kind, yet the news has gone round—it is borne out by the music—that Sir Elgar speaks in tones of what may be called the battle of life, the conflict of the real and the ideal, the ultimate triumph of the soul.

The analysis quoted in the programme book, the pigeon-holing of the themes, is twice as mixing as any printed programme of the Strauss sort could possibly be. Away with programmes and analysis! Have we great, potential music?

The symphony is very thick and full of workmanship. It would be possible to call it abstruse and didactic and other things, but we remember our first impressions of Brahms' epic in C minor, and we hold our peace for the time being. Great moments that immediately strike one are the rather conscious introduction and the final pages of the opening movement, the first section of scherzo, the last pages of the concluding movement. Obviously, Sir Elgar has worked hard over his symphony.

Volkmann's Serenade for strings in F and Svendsen's brilliant orchestral episode, "The Carnival at Paris," filled out the programme. Of the serenade the humorous "molto vivace," with its poignant effects, is the most entertaining. Svendsen's work was given an electric performance.

BOSTON JOURNAL —SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 27

For the sixteenth Symphony rehearsal there was a full house to enjoy Elgar's symphony, given here for the first time. Willy Hess, the concert-master, was missing owing to sudden family bereavement.

Seen in the throng were Mrs. Elmer J. Bliss, Mrs. Arthur Astor Carey, Mrs. Edwin Upton Curtis, Mary Vaughan, Henrietta Sowle, Mrs. John L. Gardner, Mrs. Winthrop Sargent, wearing a dark gray gown and black hat trimmed with green; Mrs. John Bigelow, Jr., in brown broadcloth and fetching furs; Mrs. T. P. Gooding, Arthur Foote and daughter Katherine, Mr. and Mrs. Wallace Goodrich, George W. Chadwick, Mrs. Neal Rantoul and daughter, Mrs. George Shattuck, Mrs. George Cushing, Alice Stackpole, Julia Coolidge, Mrs. John L. Thorndike, Ethel Fay, Leslie Appleton Knowles, Mrs. Roger Wolcott, Mr. and Mrs. John D. Long, Mrs. S. Reed Anthony, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mrs. William Lindsey, Mrs. Francis H. Appleton and daughter, Mrs. Mason Hamlin, Mrs. William P. Fay, Mrs. J. Reed Whipple, Mrs. George Mumford, Mrs. Weeks, Miss Helen B. MacNichol, Mrs. Edgar Champlin, Mrs. Martha Dana Shepard, Mrs. B. F. Bates, Alice Bradford, Mrs. Stanley P. McCormick, in wine-colored broadcloth, Mrs. J. M. Stevens, Mrs. George Bradford and many more.

BOSTON JOURNAL-FEBRUARY 27, 1909.

SECOND PENSION FUND CONCERT

Tomorrow night brings the second of the benefit concerts which the Symphony Orchestra gives each season in aid of its pension fund. The program which has been arranged, while of rather serious nature, is one which should be of utmost interest to all lovers of music, especially as it presents one of the most important novelties of the season—Max Schillings' musical setting of Ernst von Wildenbruch's "Hexenlied," with Dr. Ludwig Wuellner as the reciter of the poem.

Much may be expected of Dr. Wuellner's reading of the poem for he is no less noted as a reader than as a singer of songs, and before he made music his specialty he was one of the leading actors of Germany. He will also sing with piano three Schubert songs—"Der Wanderer," "Der Doppelgaenger," and "Erlkoenig."

In response to many requests from patrons of the orchestra Mr. Fiedler has placed on the program Richard Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben," which was played at the seventh concert and was one of the most brilliant achievements of the season.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

S

OSSIP GABRILOWITSCH.

The Boston Transcript of Jan. 7 gives the following graphic description of the playing of Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the great Russian pianist, who will be heard in a brilliant program at the Athenaeum on Monday, March 15:

"Mr. Gabrilowitsch chose at his recital yesterday afternoon in Jordan Hall to be the pianist of clear, tranquil, meditative beauty. A few weeks ago at the Symphony Concerts, with a concerto by Tschaikowsky, he was a pianist of power. Tuesday evening at the concert of the Kneisel Quartette he was a pianist of exquisite and flowing song, and of lightly traced and delicately winding arabesque. Yesterday he was a pianist who muses over his instrument and his music, and who would draw from both a contemplative and melancholy, a subdued and tender beauty. It is easy to surmise the temptation into which the Tarantella and much similar music of Liszt ma ylure a pianist of Mr. Gabrilowitsch's sensitive and idealizing spirit. He has heard it, doubtless, as we all have, played as so much flowery rodomontade—a lush garden, as it were, of the blooms of showy virtuosity, and the more the pianist plucks the better. Mr. Gabrilowitsch, again like most of us, sees that the music contains pictorial ideas, rainbow flashes of instrumental song, endless glints of rhythm that indeed its excess of ornament really the jewel-like sparkle that Liszt would give the piece. He seeks accordngly to let these graces pierce through the encrusting envelope of virtuoso feats and to impart the poetic idea. Mr. Gabrilowitsch's method and mood brought many of the other pieces to a just, penetrating and fascinating beauty. To all he gave a very soft and sensuous loveliness of tone—a tone of perfect limpidity that never lost its rhythmic undulation, that flowed with every curve and ripple of the music, that was as a mirror to every shading that the pianist would give. No wit had the haunting charm of subdued song; again it warmed into a soft brightness; again it was all reflections of the mood of the music and of Mr. Gabrilowitsch."

From EVENING SUN,

Address New York City.

Date

West and still westward on their travels go the Elgar and Paderewski symphonies first produced this season by the New York and the Boston symphony bands respectively.

Elgar's work, having reached Boston last Friday, will be new to-morrow for Emil Paur's resident orchestra at Pittsburg.

Paderewski introduces his own symphony next week further West with Frederic Stock and the Thomas organization in Chicago.

[192]

ELGAR'S NEW SYMPHONY PERFORMED IN BOSTON

AN OVER-LONG WORK, WITH FLASHES OF GREAT POWER

Constant Changes Rung Upon a Single Thought — Instrumentation Disappointing.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Elgar—Symphony in A flat.
Volkmann—Serenade for Strings.
Svendsen—"The Carnival at Paris." Orchestral Episode.

England has not been utterly without symphonies of merit in modern days. Cowen's "Scandinavian" and Stanford's "Irish" symphony are examples of shapely, attractive works in this form. Sir Edward Elgar imagines that he has something more important to say and therefore becomes much more abstruse and more prolix, as well as less melodic, than these.

Following Mahler's lead, our composer disdains a "programme." His symphony does not tell a definite story. But Mahler gave dramatic music, simply refusing to tell its meaning, while Elgar presents a work that more legitimately belongs in the field of "absolute music." He has before this shown his orchestral mastery, for we have spoken of his "Enigma Variations" as the best orchestral work that had come out of England. This symphony is infinitely more ambitious, but not as equal. It is the most ambitious symphony that England has yet achieved.

We are not of those who constantly demand agreeable music. We dislike the too frequent "agreeability" of Mendelssohn. But, on the other hand, we are also averse to the laborious skill which works out a musical puzzle from a single figure; which augments and diminishes, and inverts and reverses, until the suburban auditors lose their trains, and the city ones their patience. Debussy and D'Indy have introduced this vein into modern classicism, and now Elgar enters into the same arena. The entire symphony rings constant changes upon a single thought.

Transference of themes from movement to movement is here much used, but there is nothing nearly so effective attained as when Brahms in his first symphony makes his finale a summing up of the thoughts of the preceding movements. There are points of great beauty and originality in the work, but they are never well sustained, they sometimes even trail off into the commonplace.

The instrumentation is a distinct disappointment; the full modern orchestra is used, but its effects are sometimes harsh and sometimes muddy. There are sometimes reminiscences of Tschaikowsky, both in subject and in scoring, but these only emphasize the fact that Elgar is not yet abreast of the Russian composer.

The Introduction begins with a roll of drums that is big with Fate. Then follows a lofty melody which is treated with simple counterpoint and reminds somewhat of the introduction to Schumann's second symphony (C major). The auditor will hear quite enough of this melody before he gets through with it, for it is spun into the warp and woof of the entire work. The whole movement becomes one of those "slow allegros" that sometimes appear in very earnest modern music. The treatment of the figures is very ingenious, the subordinate theme is strong and original, but even before the end of the first movement one feels like crying out with Tannhauser, "Zu Viel! zu Viel!" For one gets far too much of transformations of scanty thematic material. One seems frequently approaching an end, but each time a deceptive cadence leads further on. It is as if "Goodbye" were rung with a score of changes—"Addio!" "Fahrwohl!" "Farvel!" "Adieu!" "Farewell!" "Vale!" etc., etc., etc.

The Scherzo comes second and its rushing figure of 16th-notes has a certain resolute strength. It develops into a sort of barbaric force that reminds of the third movement of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic Symphony," but has not by any means the exciting character of that work. Possibly the reminder is here as much in the scoring as in the material, for all the battery is used, and drums and cymbals clash in the subordinate theme, very much as they do in the March theme of the Russian work.

Up to this point we have only followed an expert composer with respect, and noted inferiorities to the geniuses who have been creative in the same school; but now we find something like genius in the present symphony. The demon of "thematic transference" has Sir Edward in thrall, and he spins his Adagio out of the chief theme of his Allegro Molto, and he joins the two movements together, possibly to make the device the more effective.

When anybody less than a Brahms juggles this way with themes we generally (as for example, with D'Indy or Debussy) wish that the composer had used up less of the gray matter of his brain in demonstrating his ingenuity, and applied more of it to the invention of some good new melody. But in this case the melody is better in the second case than in its original state. The Adagio is, to us, on a first hearing, the very best part of the work. There is infinite beauty and tenderness in its measures and it was shaded in a manner that brought out all its charm.

The finale again plunged into thematic juggleries, with rhythmic devices and combinations such as give the modern conductor gray hairs. Portions of preceding movements are twisted in, glittering fragments are tediously displayed, and rather crude orchestration is apparent. A musical Arabesque may be ingenious, but it ought not to be too long. There is a discernible surety of treatment which shows that the composer has a good mastery of his tools, at least as regards his development.

The symphony, however, is neither as Flesh, now let him renounce the Development also, or his next orchestral work will run the risk of being called the "Apathetic Symphony." Nevertheless, the chorale-like work at the end of the Finale was noble and we should much like to hear the Adagio again. The symphony is a work with great moments, but is not a masterpiece. Such, at least, is our first impression.

Volkmann's pretty Serenade, coming after the earnest and somewhat ascetic work, seemed almost flippant. It was the right thing in the wrong place. Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup may be good at times, but not after heavy English Port. It was well played and the Waltz was given with especial naivette and charm.

Svendsen's "Paris Carnival" was a brilliant piece of orchestration and contained some very good contrasts. Its merry-making seemed more conventional than its tender episode; in the latter the oboe had some dainty work to do, which was given with especial excellence. But of course the most earnest attention of the auditor had been given to the Elgar symphony and everything else was diminished in importance by that fact.

SUNDAY POST, FEBRUARY 28, 1909

CONCERTS

Tonight begins the second of the benefit concerts which the Symphony Orchestra gives each season in aid of its pension fund. The programme which has been arranged, while of rather serious nature, yet is one which should be of utmost interest to all lovers of music, especially as it presents one of the most important novelties of the season—Max Schillings' musical setting of Ernst Wildenbruch's "Hexenlied," with Dr. Ludwig Wullner as the reciter of the poem.

Schillings' work as a composer is not unknown here, for his music has appeared quite often on Symphony programmes. He is one of the most brilliant of the younger school of German composers and is now conductor of the opera in Stuttgart, where he succeeded Karl Polig, the present conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra. He has undertaken to treat Wildenbruch's poem for orchestra much after the same fashion as Richard Strauss treated Tennyson's "Enoch Arden" for piano. In other words, he seeks with music to establish the mood of the poem and interpret the emotions displayed therein. The poem with its music has been given in this country several times by Dr. Wullner with great success.

Ernst von Wildenbruch, the author of the poem, died about three weeks ago. He was regarded as perhaps the greatest of contemporary German poets, and at one time, at least, in the Emperor's opinion, he was held to be the greatest of modern German dramatists. He was an offspring of the house of Hohenzollern. His great-grandfather was Prince Louis Ferdinand of Prussia, who was killed in the battle of Sallfeld in 1806. He left two children, whose mother was the daughter of a shopkeeper. These children were afterwards adopted by Prince Louis's sister and later enobled by King Frederick William the third. One of them became known as General Louis von Wildenbruch, and he was the grandfather of the poet.

The poem is a highly colored dramatic work, very romantic in character. It relates the dying confession of an aged monk, who tells how, when a youth, he had been sent to confess a young witch condemned to death by fire; how he refused her plea of mercy and rescue. Since that time he had spent his whole life in repentance, and in devotion to the memory of the girl whom be believed to be innocent. Ever present with him had been the song that she had sung to him—"The Witch's Song"—which gives the title to the poem.

Dr. Wullner will also sing with piano three Schubert songs, "Der Wanderer," "Der Doppelganger" and "Erlkonig."

In response to many requests from patrons of the Symphony Orchestra Mr. Fiedler has placed on the programme Richard Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben," which was played at the seventh concert, and was one of the most brilliant achievements of the season. The concert will begin promptly at 8 o'clock.

Berta Morena of the Metropolitan Opera House will be the soloist at the next Symphony concerts on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mme. Morena is agreeably remembered here as a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company during its engagement in Boston last spring. She recently returned to America and immediately took her place as the principal singer of the larger dramatic roles in German opera. Her presence here will add much to the interest of the concert. She will sing the aria, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's "Oberon," and three songs with piano—Wagner's "Traume" and "Schmerzen," and Richard Strauss's "Heimliche Aufforderung."

Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony will be the chief orchestral feature of the programme. It has not been played in Boston since Mr. Weingartner conducted it with the New York Symphony Orchestra three years ago. Two other compositions will be announced later.

Miss Laura Hawkins, pianist, of this city, will be the soloist at the sixth Symphony concert in Cambridge, which will be given in Sander's Theatre, Harvard University, next Thursday evening. She will play Saint-Saens' concerto in F Major, No. 5. This work, curiously enough, has only been played with orchestra in Boston once, then at a Symphony concert by Ferruccio Busohi in the spring of 1904. The orchestral numbers will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," and the overture to "A Flying Dutchman."

SYMPHONY'S 16TH CONCERT OF SEASON

First Performance in Boston of Elgar's Symphony in A Flat Major.

By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, gave its 16th concert last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony in A flat major.....Elgar
Serenade in F major, No. 2, for strings....Volkmann
Carnival at Paris.....Svendsen

Elgar's symphony was performed here for the first time. Produced at Manchester, Eng., Dec. 3 last, it has been played several times in London. The majority of the professional critics in that city are inclined to a belief in its immortality. Audiences applaud this music wildly. It looks as though, as far as Great Britain is concerned, Elgar's work will be among symphonies what "The Bohemian Girl" is among operas: the people's choice and favorite.

Early in January, Walter Damrosch produced the symphony in New York and prefaced the performance with an improving lecture, in which he endeavored to explain Sir Edward's "meaning," and he came to the conclusion that if Sir Edward did not have this or that purpose in his mind when he girded up his loins to compose the symphony he should have had the intentions Mr. Damrosch attributed to him. The New York newspapers, however, discussed the symphony as absolute music—that is to say, music without any program, without any inspiring ideas other than purely musical ones—and the critics praised Sir Edward as a serious person.

In England there were some that insisted on a program. There was a story that Elgar intended to portray in tones the career of "Chinese" Gordon. Some preferred to find in the music the story of man's struggle with his environment. The music critic of the Referee swore that Sir Edward told him the symphony showed a composer's view of life. As a man lives, so shall he write symphonies.

No argument, no interlinear translation would be of benefit to this music, which, as it stands, is absolute.

The English look upon Elgar as a great composer. They are impressed by his oratorio "The Dream of Gerontius" and by his march "Pomp and Circumstance." It would be hard to say which they admire the more. The latter is the more satisfactory work; it is honest, it reveals the composer as he really is, and it is much shorter.

Elgar suddenly became the fashion. There was an Elgar festival. There were Elgarian managers and press agents. The baptism of this symphony was loudly heralded. There is still an Elgar boom.

Yet this symphony is a disappointment to those who rubbed their eyes in wonderment, reading the dithyrambic articles published in London journals. It is not a disappointment to those who have suspected that Elgar, the composer of "Gerontius," "The Apostles" and "The Kingdom" was mortal. The symphony confirms their suspicions.

Elgar is certainly a man of parts. He has indisputable technical skill, and he can clothe a commonplace in a handsome orchestral dress. He can disguise a platitude so that it may at first be taken for sonorous eloquence. Occasionally he has a fine thought. Overjoyed by thought, he harms it by wearying development and elaboration.

The symphony begins with an introduction in which a theme, inherently suave, is finally made heroic, both in the introduction and later in the symphony. This theme in its sentiment is characteristically Elgarian: it has a certain sweetness, it is pleasingly melodic, but it has no marked distinction, and its beauty might be described as pinchbeck. The main body of the movement is of a restless nature, and it is supposed to [illegible] life's struggle. The themes have little character. Their profile is faint, whether this one be strenuous, or that one of "sinister import."

The thematic development is crowded with detail, much of it uninteresting as far as any emotional, dramatic contents are concerned. Nor is there any true continuous development that takes the hearer with it to the conclusion of the matter. There is no irresistible flow. There are episodes galore; parentheses in parentheses. The repeated use of certain chords with harmonic progressions reminds the hearer of like passages in Puccini's "Tosca."

The Scherzo has a barbaric fury that makes an impression and the trio has measures of genuine beauty. The Scherzo and the Adagio are connected. Much has been made of the fact that the actual notes of the Scherzo theme are the same as those of the melody that opens the Adagio; but this in itself does not make a movement great. The Adagio has been described as "sublimely mystical." It is sublimely middle class. Its sentiment is of the sort that appeals at once to all that find delight in works of art like "The Railway Station" or the representation of Derby Day; to all that are filled with sacred emotion when they hear Mme. Clara Butt sing with the energy and conviction of her six feet and more the popular setting of music to "Abide with Me" with the accompaniment of pianoforte and cabinet organ. The workmanship displayed in this adagio is excellent; there are fine effects of euphony; but the musical thoughts themselves are for the most part conventional in sentiment; they are "middle class."

The finale with its apotheosis, which contains a glorification of the theme heard in the introduction, will inevitably excite applause. Yet there is a disturbing reminiscence of a familiar theme in "Aida" which enters before the apotheosis and is freely used. Not that Sir Edward should be accused for a moment of plagiarism. Say rather that it is a case of the unconscious cerebration to which many composers high above Elgar have been subject. There is also a fine Parsifalian flavor in certain pages of the symphony.

Mr. Fiedler had evidently studied the symphony carefully and he undoubtedly brought out all that therein is. The orchestra gave a brilliant performance and the applause that followed was unusually hearty and long continued.

How grateful was the little serenade by Volkmann that follows: It was comparatively unfamiliar, for it had not been played here at a Symphony concert for nearly 17 years. An unpretentious work, but it has charm and distinction. It is spontaneous. The waltz is delightful in its naivete, in its suggestion of open air dancing in the village.

Svendsen's "Carnival" is better known, and it might be described as the adventure of a bewildered and simple-minded Norwegian in Paris.

Pension Fund Concert.

Tonight brings the second of the benefit concerts which the Symphony orchestra gives each season in aid of its pension fund. The program should be of much interest to all lovers of music, for it presents Max Schillings' musical setting of Ernst Wildenbruch's "Hexenlied." Dr. Ludwig Wuellner will recite the poem.

Schillings' work as a composer is not unknown here, for his music has appeared often on Symphony programs. He is one of the most brilliant of the younger school of German composers and is now conductor of the opera in Stuttgart, where he succeeded Karl Pohlig, the present conductor of the Philadelphia orchestra. He has undertaken to treat Wildenbruch's poem for orchestra much after the same fashion as Richard Strauss treated Tennyson's "Enoch Arden" for piano. In other words, he seeks with music to establish the moods of the poem and interpret the emotions displayed therein. The poem, with its music, has been given in this country several times by Dr. Wuellner with great success.

Ernst von Wildenbruch, the author of the poem, died at the age of 63 last January at Berlin. He was regarded as one of the chief contemporary German poets, and at one time, in the Emperor's opinion, he was held to be the greatest of modern German dramatists. Wildenbruch was an offspring of the house of Hohenzollern. His great-grandfather was Prince Louis Ferdinand of Prussia, who was killed in the battle of Sallfeld in 1806. He left two children whose mother was the daughter of a shopkeeper. These children were afterwards adopted by Prince Louis' sister and later enobled by King Frederick William III. One of them became known as Gen. Louis von Wildenbruch, and he was the grandfather of the poet.

The poem is a highly colored dramatic work, romantic in character. It relates the dying confession of an aged monk, who tells how when a youth he had been sent to confess a young witch condemned to death by fire and how he refused her plea of mercy and rescue. Since that time he had spent his whole life in repentance and in devotion to the memory of the girl whom he believed to be innocent. Ever present with him had been the song that she had sung to him—"The Witch's Song"—which gives the title to the poem.

Much may be expected of Dr. Wuellner's reading of the poem, for he is no less noted as a reader than he is as a singer of songs, and before he made music his specialty he was one of the leading actors of Germany. He will also sing with piano three Schubert songs, "Der Wanderer," "Der Doppelgaenger" and "Erlkoenig."

In response to many requests from patrons of the Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler has placed on the program Richard Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben," which was played at the seventh concert and was one of the most brilliant achievements of the season. The "Heldenleben" will be the first on the program, then will come the songs, and finally the "Hexenlied." The concert will begin promptly at 8 o'clock.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Maquarre and Mrs Lenom in Court.

A round trip to the Pacific coast in which Daniel Maquarre, flute soloist of the Boston symphony orchestra, and Mrs Mathilde Lenom, wife of another symphony player, participated, ended yesterday in the superior court at Boston, where both pleaded not guilty to a statutory offense and, failing to furnish $3000 bail, were sent to jail to await trial. The pair disappeared simultaneously in November. They were located recently by Mr Lenom in San Francisco, where Mrs Lenom had opened a millinery store, and where Maquarre was giving music lessons, and they were arrested at the request of the Boston authorities. Neither of the accused was represented in the court proceedings yesterday and neither made an effort to obtain bail.

THE BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—FEBRUARY 28.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Elgar Symphony First Time Here.

Tonight's Concert for Benefit of the Pension Fund.

Miss Hunt's Recital—Other Events of Interest.

Edward Elgar's new symphony, which was first produced in Manchester, Eng, in December, and has been played in New York and Chicago, was given its first performance here at the Symphony rehearsal last Friday afternoon and repeated last night. No work of recent years has been more generally commended by English critics, although there has been the usual divergence in opinion in some quarters, and in this country approval has not been quite so widespread as it was among the composer's fellow countrymen. It is Sir Edward's first composition in symphonic form, and it runs about 50 minutes.

The performance was one of the notable events of the musical season and, following so closely upon the "first time" of Paderewski's new symphony the week previous, one had an excellent chance to compare the works of the Englishman and the Polish composer. Mr Fiedler certainly is providing plenty of novelties on his programs and affording opportunities for discussion and criticism of works of importance and interest.

And the best of it is that he is not circumscribed in his tastes, but is disposed to know no particular man or country if the composition possesses merit sufficiently worthy a trial.

Elgar has refuted several rumors as to the meaning of his tone pictures, saying the symphony is to be considered as absolute music. He has supplied no program and so the symbolic significance is left to conjecture. The plan and development suggest the life of a hero, the musical ideas being promulgated in such forms as to introduce a martial element throughout the four movements. There is a decided inclination to overelaboration in several parts of the score, this proclivity giving a clouded effect to the orchestration.

The work opens with an andante, noble and simple, and retains its truly melodic form until the principal theme has been repeated at some length in a full orchestration. Then comes the modern chromatic deviations with a frequent return to the first theme variously announced by accentuations and diminuendos in heavy strings and soft brasses. A sonorous climax of this subject follows leading up to some wierd arpeggios and finally dying away in a quiet pianissimo. The movement, though turbulent, does not show the influence of ultra-modern composers in its orchestration, Elgar's style being pretty well defined in his scoring.

In this supposed "allegory of life" he has knit the four parts together by utilizing melodic phrases in different ways and transferring them through the whole scheme. The second and third movements are practically one, and the rush of the scherzo and tender melody of the following adagio through to the majestic finale there is ever recurring hints of some theme heard in different form earlier in the work.

The mastery of orchestra effects shows the composer to be almost austere in his style, yet cognizant of the resources of the present-day orchestra and able to express them forcefully in his own way. It is a big work; a composition for those who judge music seriously and reverently and are not inclined to flippant and ephemeral scores. The lack of well defined harmonies will prevent the symphony from being classed as popular, but its fine qualities are too apparent to be weighed and criticised justly on brief acquaintance. The interpretation was all that could be desired.

Volkmann's serenade for string orchestra, the second program number, consists of four movements typified as minuet, rondo, waltz and march, although the latter might be a galop according to the syncopation. They are clever little dance episodes, which gave the orchestra chances to display its ability in depicting the joyous moods of the composer in delicate and characteristic dance rhythm. The program closed with Svendsen's musical tumult, "The Carnival at Paris." Here was another piece strongly in contrast with the preceding ones and which received due consideration in the matter of fortissimo passages, with the lighter episodes as carefully and skilfully set forth.

Berta Morena of the Metropolitan opera house will be the soloist this week. She will sing the aria, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's "Oberon," and three songs with piano, Wagner's "Traume" and "Schmerzen," and Richard Strauss' "Heimliche Aufforderung." The symphony will be Berlioz' "Fantastic," which has not been heard at the Symphony concerts for several years and has not been played in Boston since Mr Weingartner conducted it with the New York Symphony orchestra three years ago. Mr Fiedler will add two other orchestral numbers, which will be announced later.

Pension Fund Concert Tonight.

Tonight brings the second of the benefit concerts which the Symphony orchestra gives each season in aid of its pension fund. The program presents one of the most important novelties of the season—Max Schillings' musical setting of Ernst Wildenbruch's "Hexenlied," with Dr Ludwig Wullner as the reciter of the poem.

Schillings' work as a composer is not unknown here, for his music has appeared quite often on Symphony programs. He has undertaken to treat Wildenbruch's poem for orchestra much after the same fashion as Richard Strauss treated Tennyson's "Enoch Arden" for piano. He seeks with music to establish the moods of the poem and interpret the emotions displayed therein. Ernst von Wildenbruch, the author of the poem, died about three weeks ago. He was regarded as perhaps the greatest of contemporary German poets.

Dr Wullner will also sing with piano three Schubert songs—"Der Wanderer," "Der Doppelganger" and "Erlkonig." Mr Fiedler has also placed on the program Richard Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben," which was played at the seventh concert. The "Heldenleben" will be the first on the program, then will come the songs and finally the "Hexenlied." The concert will begin promptly at 8 o'clock.

CABLE ADDRESS, "ROMEIKE" NEW YORK

NEW YORK

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om .....

ddress .....

te .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, which is to give its only concert of the year in The Buckingham on Tuesday evening, March 23, is built on the basis of sixteen first violins, altho local conditions make it necessary to have on its regular payroll a greater number of musicians than this basis calls for. The full enlisted strength of the orchestra is ninety-seven musicians and the conductor and librarian, a total of ninety-nine, but this entire strength is very seldom used as few works call for so many men. There are sixteen first violins, fourteen second violins, ten violas, ten 'celli and eight double basses, these making the string choir. The wood wind-choir comprizes four flutes, three oboes, one English horn, three clarinets, one bass clarinet, three bassoons and one contra-bassoon. In the brass choir are eight horns (two quartets), four trumpets, three trombones and bass tuba. There is one harp and the remainder of the musicians are in the percussion department. The advance sale of seats for the concert will commence at The [illegible]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER, MARCH 1, 1909

SCHILLINGS' "HEXENLIED" PENSION CONCERT FEATURE

Thrilling Delivery by Dr. Wuellner and Symphony Orchestra—Closing Programme of Artistic Worth.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

"Heldenleben" .....Strauss

Songs by Dr. Wuellner

"Witches Song," Melodrama.....Schillings

The Pension Fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has become a vivid reality to many musicians, for this year it has begun its disbursements and many of the older musicians have been agreeably surprised by a regular addition to their income. As the players of the orchestra cannot belong to the Musicians' Protective union, it is doubly necessary for the organization to provide for its veterans, and the public also ought to respond liberally to any demand which is to assist those who have given them such an exalted and continuous pleasure.

It was pleasant to see, therefore, that a great audience was in attendance and that the concert of last night was a pronounced artistic success also. It was also excellent to have an opportunity to listen again to Strauss's ideas of the way in which a hero lives. We studied the work with faithful attention and again found Strauss to be the king of musical colorists. No composer alive can swing the orchestra with the power that is attained in "Heldenleben." In spite of the many new effects there is never anything that is ineffective. The composer does not, like Berlioz, make experiments which sometimes succeed and sometimes fail; he seems sure of his every point.

But when it comes to examining his thematic material he is found to lag a long way behind Wagner. Seldom are the themes very graphic, except when, as in the cacklings and gruntings of the hero's enemies, they are photographic. Mere realistic imitations, however, cannot constitute musical greatness. The performance was again one which proved our orchestra without a peer, and which demonstrated Mr. Fiedler to be one of the leading Strauss conductors of the world.

Dr. Wuellner was the soloist of the occasion. His extremely dramatic style is now known to all of our readers, and nothing more can be said about it.

He was in his best voice and his singing of Schubert's "Wanderer" was more vocal than histrionic. In the "Doppelgaenger" and the "Erl-King" he was again the actor and elocutionist first and the vocalist afterwards. He certainly excited the audience and was rapturously encored. He was supported, as usual, by that king of accompanists—Mr. Coenrad V. Bos.

In Schillings' "Hexenlied," however, the o chestra supported the reader. In this work the words are recited, not sung, and it becomes what Schumann called "Melodrama," and modern Englishmen call "Cantillation."

It has always been a disputed point as to whether Elocution and instrumental music can work together. Some hold that they are like Oil and Water and cannot coalesce. But after hearing Dr. Wuellner one would be very apt to change this opinion, for nothing could be more thrilling than the delivery of this highly colored work, and the orchestration, too, was entirely in line with the picture presented. It impressed us more deeply than Schillings' "Harvest Festival," recently given at the symphony concerts.

"The Witch's Song" is certainly the longest work of its school, but Schumann's "Manfred" still remains the greatest. There is no touch in Schillings' work so graphic as Schumann's English horn solo against the reader's voice in the Alpine scene with the chamois hunter; no number so beautiful as the "Incantation to the Witch of the Alps." But Dr. Wuellner was glorious in his elocution and carried the work to success. What he could do with the superior "Manfred" can only be imagined. With any lesser artist, however, the union of spoken words and orchestral tones would only be a "mesalliance."

BOSTON JOURNAL—MONDAY, MARCH 1, 1909.

NOACK'S DEBUT AS SOLOIST AT SECOND PENSION FUND CONCERT

Dr. Ludwig Wuellner, the dramatic baryton who sings with extraordinary effect in spite of vocal shortcomings, fairly shared with the Symphony Orchestra the honors of last night's pension fund concert.

It was decidedly a German night. The program began with Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben"—"A Hero Life"—which was heard at the last November concert in the regular Symphony course; then Dr. Wuellner sang three Schubert songs, "Der Wanderer," "Der Doppelgaenger" and "Erlkoenig," along with an encore; and for the final number came "Das Hexenlied"—"The Witch's Song"—words by Ernst von Wildenbruch and music by Max Schillings, with Dr. Wuellner and the orchestra taking part.

Owing largely to the singer's remarkable popularity here, the program proved more attractive than the one offered earlier in the season and consequently there was a larger crowd. The hall was almost filled. The Strauss number may have been caviar to some who attended simply to hear the best orchestra in the country, but the performance aroused great applause. There was an extra pleasure in store even for inveterate Symphony patrons in the solo playing of Mr. Noack, who took the place of Professor Hess as concert-master and first violin. It was virtually Mr. Noack's debut as a soloist, and he made an excellent impression. Mr. Fiedler's congratulations had the hearty approval of the audience.

In the Schubert songs Dr. Wuellner was accompanied on the piano by Coenrad V. Bos, who has done so much to restore accompanying to its proper place among the master arts. Each song was interpreted with masterly expression of its full dramatic content, both verbal and musical, but, of course, the most popular of all was the "Erl King," which was given with thrilling effect. "The Witch's Song" is a long dramatic poem describing the death scene of a priest who in his youth had gone to confess a condemned witch, who sacrificed love on account of fear and who, after a life of penance, was overjoyed to think he would be with his loved one evermore. The poem was recited with rare power and art, and for this once the orchestra played second fiddle.

these Boston audiences are extremely discriminating.

The symphony itself is at times disappointing, at times very impressive. Clear expression alternates with indistinct musing. The first and principal theme recurs so often that the whole piece might be described as a line upon which the composer has hung some emotional odds and ends, for there are many detached themes that seemingly have little or nothing to do with the main idea. Nor is there any marked originality of expression. Lovers of Wagner and Strauss both found much to enjoy in the work. In fact, the symphony is strongly tinctured with reminiscences. Yet the thoughts, such as they are, have been presented with masterly skill. There is much in the work to make it popular. Mr. Fiedler conducted with almost affectionate care and enthusiasm.

Robert Volkmann's serenade for strings, in F major, was played by the orchestra for the first time in nearly seventeen years. It had, therefore, all the attractiveness of a novelty. The performance of it was delightful. The last number on the program was Svendsen's "Carnival at Paris" overture.

Elgar's Symphony Pleases Boston Audience

Another new symphony was on the Symphony program Saturday night, this time a work by Sir Edward Elgar, which was first performed in Manchester, England, three months ago. There was extraordinary excitement in London over this symphony. It had five performances in as many weeks. Saturday night it was warmly, if not rapturously, received by a Boston audience; and, as usual, the manner of the performance was partly the reason for the prolonged applause after the final movement. The applause lasted until the orchestra made its acknowledgments. It was the same when the new Paderewski symphony had its performance two weeks before. As Paderewski said, these Boston musicians are extremely fine performers, and [illegible] dured at the last co[illegible] the composer had still further abbreviated. As a devout Catholic Sir Edward Elgar [illegible] blished the World and the

EVENING SUN,

m .....

lress ..... New York City.

e .....

When next the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to this town on a visit, its last before next fall, the concert of Thursday evening, March 18, will be that orchestra's 2,700th public appearance on a stage.

Can 2,700 concerts in unbroken series by one organization be surpassed among the records of great orchestras abroad? Certainly not in America, where New York's veteran Philharmonic, with its eight pairs a year for nearly seventy years, will reach less than half that total.

At the last pair of Boston concerts, the feature for Thursday subscribers will be the first performance here of Bruckner's Eighth Symphony in C-minor, following its "first times in America" at Boston next week. Recent performances in Germany are said to have been "a sensation." The matinée star piece is Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite," played by himself.

Conductor Fiedler's champions may recall that Karl Muck also once toyed with the anti-Brahmsian destinies of Wagnerian Bruckner.

THE BOSTON HERALD, MONDAY, MARCH 1, 1909.

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR PENSION FUND

Dr. Wuellner Recites Wildenbruch's Poem, "The Witch's Song."

By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, gave a concert in aid of its pension fund, last night, in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Strauss' tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben"; Schubert, "Der Wanderer," "Der Doppelgaenger," "Erlkoenig," sung by Dr. Wuellner, with piano accompaniment played by Coenrad V. Bos; a recitation by Dr. Wuellner of Wildenbruch's poem, "Das Hexenlied" ("The Witch's Song"), with the accompaniment of Max Schillings' music for orchestra. There was a large and deeply interested audience.

Strauss' tone poem, "A Hero's Life," was played recently in a Symphony concert, and it is unnecessary to discuss again at length the character of the work. As before, however, the first section, the love music, and the finale seemed the most beautiful and the most impressive portions of the tone poem. The section in which the hero is mocked by his foes is amusing, but the battle scene, in spite of the din, last night seemed inherently tame, and the weakest part. The performance was loudly applauded.

Dr. Wuellner again interpreted the songs of Schubert in his intensely dramatic manner, and was obliged to add Strauss' "Caecilie" in response to the enthusiastic applause.

"The Witch's Song," by the late Ernst von Wildenbruch, was recited for the first time in Boston with Schilling's music. Recitation with music, whether the latter be for piano or orchestra, whether the declamation be in conventional form or the cantillation that for a time engrossed Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies, is an inferior species of dramatic entertainment. If the music is dramatic and accompanying, then the attention is easily diverted from the reciter. If the music is less in evidence, it is practically unheard in the endeavor to listen to the human voice. In either case the reciter or the composer suffers, as long as the music is heard with the recitation. Yet music may serve in supplying a prelude, to put the hearer in a sympathetic mood; in furnishing interludes, which may emphasize that which has just been spoken, or prepare the hearer for a change in poetic sentiment; in adding a postlude that may continue the poetically dramatic or contemplative thought after the speaker is through.

Schillings has been discreet in his treatment of the orchestra and has respected the reciter. Richard Strauss in his piano music for "Enoch Arden" also has regard for the elocutionist, but his musical illustration and italicization have more character. There are a few impressive pages in Schillings' music, as in the prelude and in the orchestral burst of lamentation after the monk, fearing the young woman's kisses, refuses to confess her; but as a whole the poem, which is itself melodramatic, does not gain in effect by the musical commentary.

In reciting to music, the elocutionist must consider to a certain degree the tonality and the harmonic construction or there may easily be a disturbing variance between the spoken tones and the music. Dr. Wuellner, an actor in song, avoided pitfalls, and by his marked individuality put the music in the background so effectually that it seemed of little moment. His performance was interesting, but he is more effective when he is dramatic in song after his own and striking manner. The hearer could not refrain from wishing that either he would sing this witch's song, "so weird, so sad and so sweet," or that Schillings had been more successful in imagining the song for the orchestra. The song haunted the monk for 50 years. Schillings' melody was forgotten as soon as it was heard.

[194]

BOSTON POST, MARCH 1, 1909

PENSION FUND CONCERT

By Olin Downes

The Symphony pension fund concert of last night, when Dr. Ludwig Wullner, assisting artist, sang songs by Schubert and Strauss, and recited Max Schilling's setting of Wildenbruch's "Hexenlied" with orchestral accompaniment, was an event to be long remembered by those who were present. There was a large and very enthusiastic audience, but there should not have been available standing room.

The conducting of Strauss' "Heldenleben" effected what was certainly one of the most representative performances of a work by that composer that have been given in this city. Mr. Fiedler gained an instantaneous triumph with the tone-poem at one of the regular concerts earlier in the season, but, as is usual on such occasions, the men played yesterday evening with an enthusiasm and conviction that could hardly have been surpassed and that resulted in a transcendental reading.

How splendidly symphonic is this tone-poem! What basic construction! What glorious music! Certainly it proved itself yesterday evening. While the majority of the audience doubtless knew the work and its philosophy the minority, those who were uninformed of the hero, his enemies, his helpmate, his battle, his works of peace, his death and apotheosis, listened, apparently, with as eager attention and applauded as heartily as did the others. The superb composition moved resistlessly on. The performance exposed every theme in that vast and complicated web of sound; it glowed, white-hot; it fairly quivered with the astounding, overwhelming vitality of the music.

Dr. Wullner sang these songs by Schubert: "The Wanderer," "Der Doppelganger," "Erlkonig." He added, in response to heartiest applause, Strauss' "Caecilie." These songs need not detain us. The doctor has sung them better on other occasions. A haunting remembrance of this season will be the first recitation in Boston of Schilling's "Hexenlied."

Wildenbruch's tale was told in these columns yesterday. It need not be repeated. Schilling's music is fortunate in this: that there is little of it. It leaves the narrator unchallenged sway. It is reticent. It comes in at moments when almost any musical sound would enhance the poetry in the excited imagination of the hearer.

But what an artist was Dr. Wullner then! A sensitive musician, his voice, so wonderfully modulated, was never out of key with the orchestral commentary. A born actor, he bore on his face and his person the impress of his gripping narrative. Who will forget that impassioned figure, those flashing eyes? Dr. Wullner should have given a recital of great poetry with such accompaniment long since in this city. He is the ideal artist for such a task. He leaves us now, and unless he returns it will be long before we encounter such another impressive personality in the concert room.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om .....

ldress .....

ite .....

TELEGRAPH SPARKS

Boston, March 3.—A round-trip to the Pacific coast in which Daniel Maquarre, flute soloist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Mrs. Mathilde Lenom, wife of another Symphony player, participated, ended today in the superior court here, where both pleaded not guilty to a statutory offense, and failing to furnish $3,000 bail, were sent to jail to await trial.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

.....

s .....

.....

MUSICIAN FINDS HIS WIFE WITH FLUTIST

BOSTON, March 3.—A round trip to the Pacific coast in which Daniel Maquarre, flute soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Mathilde Lenom, wife of another symphony player, participated, ended today in the Superior Court here, where both pleaded not guilty to a serious offense, and, failing to furnish $3000 bail, were sent to jail to await trial.

The pair disappeared in November. They were found recently by Mr. Lenom in San Francisco, where Mrs. Lenom had opened a millinery store and Maquarre was giving music lessons.

BOSTON POST, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 3, 1909

ELOPERS BROUGHT TO HUB

Mrs. Lenom and Maquarre to Appear in Court Today

Mrs. Mathilde Lenom, 38, and Daniel Maquarre, 28, whose flight from Boston a few weeks ago was the sensation of musical circles in Boston, were brought to police headquarters last night after a long trip from San Francisco in custody of Inspectors Armstrong and Angell.

Clement Lenom, husband of the woman under arrest, a member of the Symphony Orchestra, as is Maquarre, did not meet the accused couple at the train, nor did he appear at the Charles street jail, where they were taken. Mrs. Lenom inquired anxiously whether he would come to the jail, and upon learning that he had expressed no intention of doing so broke down.

IN COURT TODAY

Mrs. Lenom and Maquarre will be arraigned in court this morning, and from statements made by Maquarre in San Francisco it is believed that he will attempt to place full responsibility for their flight upon the woman.

Maquarre, a Belgian, and Lenom, a Frenchman, were both talented members of Boston's great orchestra, and both were very prominent in musical circles here. They were friends, apparently, and the sudden flight of Mrs. Lenom with Maquarre came as startling news to friends of the parties.

For weeks Lenom sought to learn their whereabouts but in vain. Finally, through a letter sent by Mrs. Lenom to a friend in Roxbury, it was learned that the missing couple had fled across the continent to San Francisco, where Maquarre had previously played.

Maquarre lived while here at 2049 Columbus avenue, and the Lenoms at 6 Atherton street, both in Roxbury.

Built Up Good Business

When the couple reached the coast Mrs. Lenom proved the business head, as she started a French millinery store and had built up a flourishing trade through her skill, while Maquarre was seeking musical engagements.

Maquarre said in San Francisco that Mrs. Lenom had been forced to leave her husband because of his cruelty, and he placed the blame for their flight upon her.

It is thought that the courtroom this morning will be thronged with prominent musical people, particularly from the foreign musical circles in which both Mr. and Mrs. Lenom and Maquarre were among the most prominent members.

Neither Mrs. Lenom nor Maquarre appeared greatly unnerved by their arrest when they reached headquarters at 6 o'clock last night. It was not until Mrs. Lenom learned that her husband was not expected to appear at the jail that she broke down, while Maquarre retained his self-possession throughout the proceeding of booking.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

.....

.....

.....

MAR 4 - 1909

SYMPHONY IN DISCORD

Orchestra Soloist and Wife of Another Player Held for Trial.

Boston, March 3.—A round trip to the Pacific Coast, in which Daniel Maquarre, flute soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Mathilde Lenom, wife of another symphony player, participated, ended to-day in the Superior Court here, where both pleaded not guilty to a statutory offense and, failing to furnish $3000 bail, were sent to jail to await trial.

The pair disappeared simultaneously in November. They were located recently in San Francisco, where Mrs. Lenom had opened a millinery store and Maquarre was giving music lessons, and they were arrested.

BOSTON JOURNAL—WEDNESDAY, MARCH 3, 1909

"TIS EVER THUS" SAYS RUNAWAY

Husband of Mrs. Lenom Not at South Station to Meet Her.

RETURNS UNDER POLICE ESCORT

Daniel Maquarre, Symphony Orchestra Player, Is Also Locked Up.

At 6.30 last night Inspector Armstrong and Detective Sergeant Angell of police headquarters arrived at the South station with Daniel Maquarre and Mrs. Mathilde Lenom. They were arrested in San Francisco three weeks ago on an indictment warrant which charges them with a statutory offense in seven counts on Sept. 20, Nov. 19 and 23, 1907, Nov. 1, 11 and 16, 1908, and one other date, all in this city. Maquarre was flute soloist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Clement Lenom, husband of the woman, is an oboe player in the same orchestra.

Last night the two were locked up in the Charles street jail, Maquarre on the men's side and Mrs. Lenom in the wing occupied by females. When they got off the train at the station both were cheerful and apparently hopeful of vindication.

Husband Not at Station.

Mrs. Lenom appeared to be greatly cast down when she discovered that her husband was not waiting at the gate for her and when no one appeared to greet her and console her at headquarters she pouted, then smiled, and with a deep sigh exclaimed, "Ah, 'tis ever thus."

Several years ago Maquarre, who is 28 years of age, arrived in this country with an older brother to take a position in the Symphony Orchestra. The Lenoms had arrived in this country much earlier and were in the midst of the colony of musicians and artists who make Boston their home. Maquarre is rather good looking, and so he had won a way into the hearts of a number of women, among whom was Mrs. Lenom.

Traced by a Letter.

The attention the couple paid one another soon became the talk of the gathering and no end of comment and gossip was passed around concerning them. Last November Maquarre was billed to play at a Back Bay concert. On the night of the engagement he failed to appear, and it caused no end of surprise. Investigation revealed the fact that Mrs. Lenom was also missing. The matter was placed in the hands of the police.

At first it was thought she had forsaken this country with Maquarre for Paris. This report was downed through the receipt of a letter by a woman neighbor dated from 'Frisco. As a result of the letter the police of the Western city were asked to arrest the couple, who were living under assumed names. They were found in a flat, the front of which was taken up by a millinery store conducted by the woman, while Maquarre gave music lessons in the rear rooms. Maquarre's salary in the Symphony Orchestra was $2400.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

ess ..... New York City.

.....

NOTES.

THE last pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 18, and Saturday afternoon, March 20. The feature of the Thursday evening concert will be the first performance in New York of Bruckner's Eighth Symphony, in C minor. This will be played for the first times in America in Boston on March 12 and 13. Its recent performances in Germany created nothing short of a sensation. On Saturday afternoon one of the features of the programme will be Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite," for piano and orchestra, which has already been played in New York with the composer as soloist.

THE BOSTON HERALD, MARCH 3, 1909.

MAQUARRE BROUGHT BACK.

He and Mrs. Lenom, Arrested in San Francisco, Now in Jail.

Daniel Maquarre, a former member of the Symphony orchestra, and Miss Mathilde Lenom, wife of a member of that company, who disappeared together several months ago, were brought back to Boston from San Francisco last evening by Inspector Armstrong and Sergt. Angell of police headquarters. The couple were taken to the Charles street jail where they spent the night.

They will be arraigned in court this morning on an indictment warrant returned against them sometime ago, on evidence furnished by Clement Lenom, the arrested woman's husband. Mrs. Lenom gave her age as 38 years and said that her home was at 6 Atherton street, Roxbury. Maquarre said that he was 28 years old, a musician, and lived at 2048 Columbus avenue, Roxbury.

Maquarre and Mrs. Lenom left Boston last November and no trace of them was found until in January a neighbor on Atherton street, Roxbury, received a letter from San Francisco written by Mrs. Lenom. Mr. Lenom was notified and he consulted with Chief Watts. Mrs. Lenom was conducting a millinery shop, while Maquarre was working in a theatre.

Friends of Mrs. Lenom and Maquarre were informed of their return, but up to 10 o'clock last night no efforts had been made to bail them nor did they receive any visitors.

.....

.....

.....

SYMPHONY MUSICIAN IN JAIL

Member Of Boston Orchestra And Another Member's Wife Held.

Boston, March 3.—A round trip to the Pacific Coast, in which Daniel Maquarre, flute soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Mathilde Lenom, wife of another symphony player, participated, ended today in the Superior Court here, where both pleaded not guilty to a statutory offense and, failing to furnish $3,000 bail, were sent to jail to await trial.

The pair disappeared simultaneously in November. They were found recently by Mr. Lenom in San Francisco, where Mrs. Lenom had opened a millinery store and Marquarre was giving music lessons, and they were arrested at the request of the Boston authorities. Neither of the accused was represented in the court proceedings today, and neither made an effort to obtain bail.

THE BOSTON JOURNAL, MARCH 8, 1909.

SONG TO CLOSE SYMPHONY NIGHT

Miss Berta Morena Fails to Impress in Appearance on Saturday Night.

Saturday night's Symphony concert closed with a song with piano accompaniment. That was enough to make the concert memorable. Miss Berta Morena, one of the dramatic sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera House, who sang at the Boston Theater last April in "Die Walkuere," was the soloist, and half the orchestra departed before she began the final group of songs. This purely lyric ending of a Symphony concert was rather new to Boston. It certainly was not effective.

However, it was deemed best that Miss Morena should sing with orchestra as early in the evening as possible. The number chosen was Rezia's aria, "Ocean, thou mighty monster," from Weber's "Oberon." Miss Morena sang in German.

It was recalled in the program that the original Rezia, Mrs. Joseph Wood, came to Boston from London back in the 'thirties. Weber had written that she sang "superbly" in "Oberon." Miss Morena, on the contrary, made but a moderate impression Saturday night. The applause was mostly courteous. She sang much better here last year. The songs that ended the program were Wagner's "Dreams" and "Pains" and Richard Strauss' "Secret Invitation."

The principal feature of the concert was the performance of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony." This number, lasting about an hour, was played with the utmost success. Equally impressive was the performance of the tuneful second intermezzo from the music Schubert wrote for the production of "Rosamund, Princess of Cyprus."

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, [illegible]

CONCERTS OF YESTERDAY

MISS MORENA SINGS WITH THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Limitation of Time That Hampered Mr. Fiedler in His Programme—The Changed, and Now Established, Policy with "Soloists," and the Results That Have Justified It—The Personal Charm of Miss Morena—The Qualities of Her Singing—An Air of Weber That Has Aged and Songs by Wagner and Strauss—Mrs. Hall's Concert of Woollett's Music

Symphony Concert

A symphony and a singer virtually divided the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon and gave its programme a peculiar cast. Mr. Fiedler, and rightly, loves not the limit of ninety minutes—less ten for an intermission—that rule and custom impose upon the concerts. The symphony happened to be Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," five movements and fifty minutes long. Ten minutes more fell to the intermission, and thus Mr. Fiedler had only half an hour for the rest of the concert. The singer, Miss Morena of the Metropolitan Opera House, must needs sing twice, and have breathing time between her pieces. Accordingly Mr. Fiedler slipped the longest intermezzo from Schubert's music to "Rosamunde" between the air from "Oberon" and the songs of Wagner and Strauss that Miss Morena sang. Thus the concert ended—or rather stopped—with Strauss's "Heimliche Aufforderung," music that vanishes into the thin air of voluptuous ecstasy. Mr. Fiedler is singularly skilful in the designing of his programmes, and whenever the arbitrary limit of time has not hampered him, they have had scope, contrast, and proportion. He knew, quite as well as any of his listeners, that an overture—"a brilliant overture" as the phrase goes—would have becomingly ended the concert; but to put it on the programme would have kept the audience in its seats for an hour and three-quarters. No one wishes to see the Symphony Concert attain the heavenly lengths that audiences endure cheerfully in English or in German cities. Yet to listen to music for two hours when the programme is duly diversified, and when there is a quarter of an hour, as it often is, of intermission, lays no great strain upon the attention and the finer receptive qualities of an audience. The season through, the public of the concerts has been praising Mr. Fiedler's programmes. Yet that same public accepts the custom that limits him to an hour and a half, or a little more, and constrains him to such an abnormal arrangement as that of yesterday, or such a misshapen list as that for next week when a lengthy symphony and a concerto for violoncello will make the programme. Mr. Fiedler, as his programme-making shows, is a man to improve and not abuse the freedom of an additional quarter hour. Moreover, as some cynics of the clubs say, the limitation to an hour and a half really originated in the desire of one of the earlier conductors to be home early.

Miss Morena, the last of the singers at the concerts this season, once more justified the restriction of "soloists" to artists of rank. Under it there are fewer singers and virtuosi than there used to be, but when they do come, they come to eager curiosity and appreciative interest. When some violinist was momentarily lifted from the ranks of the orchestra to be the "soloist" of the day, when some mediocre pianist made his way through a concerto, when some singer sang as the orchestra would never be permitted to play, they came and went oftenest as so much routine. The audience took them for granted or resigned itself to the tedium of their performances. It was time to raise the standard of the "assisting artists" to that of the orchestra which in theory they were assisting. The Symphony Orchestra is a band of the first rank and its conductor makes its programmes accordingly. Its "soloists" should be chosen by like principle and standards, and the coming of each, from the merit and the individuality of the singer or the virtuoso, should be a little event in its kind. Moreover, the public of the concerts was becoming too sophisticated, too familiar with eminent singers and distinguished pianists and violinists to care for the rank and file. The change of policy with the "soloists" has now continued for nearly three seasons, and it has justified itself at every turn. It has raised the standard of the concerts until no series in the country matches them in the quality of the "assistance" as well as in the quality of the orchestra. The mutterings of the neglected have died away; and the audiences come more eagerly to the soloists because they are at once fewer and more notable. So long as the two opera houses flourish in New York there will be no lack of distinguished singers, and the flocking virtuosi are as regular as the birds of autumn.

Miss Morena, hatless and gloveless, all in black velvet a little relieved by silver and by the gleaming white of her own throat and arms, looked as though she had stepped out of a portrait by Lenbach, from whom indeed she learned much of the artistry of costume and pose that distinguished her when she impersonated Sieglinde in "Die Walküre" at the Boston Theatre. Then she was a figure of beauty that kindled and held the imagination, and yesterday in her own person she was comely and, as the French say, troubling, in a beauty that has the clearness and the firmness of the north and yet something of the warmth and richness of the south. Her voice, too, was warmer and fuller, more capable of sustained tone and of varied and deeper expression than it was a year ago. Then she struggled with depression of body and mind. Now she has regained spirit, strength and elasticity, and this new vitality told in her singing. Perhaps she began with "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's "Oberon" because it is a conventional showpiece of German and many other concert [illegible]. Conventional it certainly is in its alternation of fast and slow, broad and fiery, contemplative and impassioned passages. Its form is hidebound and in these days of "fee lyric declamation" tends to become more and more antiquated. Usually, however, Weber has contrived to fill this form with music that compasses mood, that speaks with genuine and stirring emotional speech and dramatizing accent. His powers were failing when he wrote "Oberon," and this air of the ocean put side by side with Agatha's rhapsody in her chamber in "Der Freischütz"—a piece as conventional of form—is clear and curious proof of this dwindling in imagination and fire. The music from "Oberon" brings no picture of Huon's storm-tossed ship, and bears little to the hearer of the swift and changeful emotions of his gazing and fearful mistress. It begins and it ends as a show-piece and by so much served to disclose Miss Morena's skill in the art of song, her technical surety and the warmth and the beauty of her tones. At their highest, they are perhaps a little shrill, and now and then she reached for a note, but some of the intervals in this air of Ocean are reckless and exacting enough to be modern.

In the three songs that ended the concert—Wagner's "Träume" and "Schmerzen and Richard Strauss's "Heimliche Aufforderung"—Miss Morena discloses finer and more individual qualities of imagination and expression. "Träume" may pass for the "study" for "Tristan" that the commentators and even Wagner himself called it. He cherished it, however, none the less, and now after fifty years and when the music of "Tristan" is much the mome familiar, it remains a truly beautiful expression of intense and rapturous longing. Its very reticence makes the intensity the more interesting. Writing for the stage, he rightly took thought of his audience, would have his music tell. "Träume" he wrote rather for himself and for the woman whose verses suggested it, and thus he made it intimate music. Yet the operatic note in it will not down, and it was the distinction of Miss Morena's singing that expressed the qualities that are thus mingled in it. She lent it the intensity of the dramatizing and the eloquent singer; and underneath quivered the ferfor of an intimate and jossessing desire. The music is all seriousness and of like seriousness were Miss Morena's lover. They can sing in Munich after all.

"Schmerzer" may pass. It is not especially characteristic of Wagner, and Miss Morena's singing of it was not particularly individual. It was the work of an accomplished and understanding singer, but hardly more. Then came Strauss's "Secret Innovation," the strangely arotic and remotic song that makes one of the group with the more familiar "Cäcilie" and the less familiar "Mrgan." The song in its text is Ovidian, and in the music, Strauss keeps no such reticence as that of Wagner in "Traüme." Yet it is no less a song of intimate [illegible] of intimate passion. The picture, with which it begins, of the feast, of the passing goblet, of the lover and his mistress pledging each other with their eyes might have come straight out of Ovid's "Amores." Then the song strikes the more modern, intimate, personal note, of erotic image and rapture. And Strauss has filled the music first with curious echoes of the feast bearing seemingly the passion of the pair and then with imitated longing and excited voluptuous ecstacy. Miss Morena's singing of the song glorified. She stripped it of its muddy vesture of neurolic decay; she lifted it to exalted passion; she transformed it to rhapsodic longing. What Strauss has done with his orchestra at the end of "Salome" and of "Electra," the singer, with the qualities of her tones did for this, his song.

H. T. P.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

MARCH 6, 1909

BERLIOZ' SYMPHONIE FANTASTIQUE PLAYED

MR. FIEDLER'S WONDERFUL READING OF THE FINALE

Mme. Morena of the New York Opera Very Successful in Scena and Songs.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Symphonie Fantastique.....Berlioz
Scena, "Ocean, thou mighty Monster".....Weber
Soloist, Mme. Berta Morena.
Entr' Acte from Rosamunde.....Schubert
Songs with Piano, Mme. Morena.

A strangely arranged programme, the order of which might almost have been reversed, to advantage. It began with the usual pause, during which Mr. Fiedler stood in rapt devotion before his orchestra. How does he occupy those regular moments of impressive silence? Is it a mystic ceremonial, like the "secret prayer" of the celebrant priest at the Mass?

Parts of Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique are growing threadbare. The very love-theme, which forms the core of this work, seems cloying and by no means as inspired a melody as the one which the same composer gave to Childe Harold. The Ballroom scene sounds decidedly tame, and one is only languidly interested in watching Berlioz "cipher with notes" and fit his love melody against the strains of the waltz.

The third movement, "In the Fields," is also fading fast. The Oboe and English Horn gave their conversation with much delicacy. There was, perhaps, an excess of "ritenuto" in their phrases, but the shading was most artistic. The final phrases of the English horn—the Shepherd calling in vain for his Maid, who has been killed in the tempest—are evidently the progenitors of some of the phrases in the third act of "Tristan and Isolde," upon the same instrument. But even this movement is too long and becomes "ennuyante" with its many repetitions and romantic languors.

But if the first three movements are fading, the last two are not. Mr. Fiedler may be proud of the successful way in which he read them. From the very first notes the audience, which seemed a trifle bored, began to sit up and take notice. There was more made of the March to Execution than we have ever heard in Boston before. The movement is, in music, as powerful as "The Ballad of Reading Jail," in literature—and as terrible.

Dickens, in his "Tale of Two Cities," speaks of the footsteps of the crowd; mad and headlong footsteps, footsteps that have been stained and dabbled in blood, dangerous footsteps to come into a man's life,—and these footsteps are heard here on the bassoons as the tumbril goes to the guillotine. The bassoons played particularly well, and the wonderful pizzicato harmony upon the contrabasses must also be mentioned as being of thrilling character. The obvious points, the last thought of the criminal as he awaits the supreme moment, the fall of the axe, the quivering corpse, these were all portrayed with power.

Still more fervid was the reading of the Finale. The temperature in Hades could not be measured by Fahrenheit. It was pictured as a very uncomfortable place, where snarling E-flat clarinette and impudent piccolos may jest at a gentlemanly murderer as much as they please. Superb was the burlesque of the church service, with its clangor of bells, its sarcastic fugal work, its sardonic working-up of the "Dies Irae." Yet there are those who say that irony is impossible in instrumental music!

If Mr. Fiedler did nothing more than the interpretation of the two final movements of this symphony, it would still be enough to make his advent in Boston memorable. It was a steady crescendo of power, even up to the last hard clash of cymbal (struck with a drum-stick) with which the scene ends.

In very vivid contrast with this picture of the immortal Winter resort was the Schubert Entr'acte in B-flat, No. 2. Here all was suavity, gentleness and melody. Violins and clarinettes vied with each other in smoothness of execution, and the audience showed at once that an easily followed tune never goes unappreciated.

Mme. Morena made a success. Her voice was not broad and fiery enough in the Weber Scena. Possibly she was a bit nervous, for in the later numbers her tones rang out gloriously. But even in the first Scena there was an expressive timbre, clear high notes and an unimpeachable intonation. The Scena is most difficult in some of its sharp contrasts and its skips from highest to lowest register would bother many a great artist. Alack and alas! This also seemed faded. Is the modern music spoiling the older and more primitive effects for us?

In the final songs with piano Mme. Morena was excellent. But it was odd to find a symphony concert ending thus. Yet the reason was apparent. If Mme. Morena was to appear twice, one of the appearances was bound to be either at the beginning or the end of the concert, for the programme was too long to add another orchestral number.

The songs were exquisitely accompanied by Mr. Fiedler. His performance of the piano part in Strauss's "Secret Invitation" was equal to Mme. Morena's noble interpretation of the vocal part. Wagner's "Dreams" is a sketch made in anticipation of "Tristan and Isolde," and the words are by Mathilde Wesendonck, who was the direct inspiration of that opera. Naturally it is as intense as any of the operatic numbers of the master. "Schmerzen" belongs to the same set of poems and songs. Both were finely sung.

It shocked us a trifle to find Mme. Wesendonck's "Schmerzen" prosaically translated as "Pains." There was not a word as to where the pains were situated. Why did not some enterprising advertiser take the occasion to announce Sarsaparilla or Little Liver Pills in connection with this? It was a golden opportunity now lost beyond recall. If the brilliant translator had only left off the final "S" and called the song "Pain" it would not have seemed so colicky.

From [illegible]

Address [illegible]

Date [illegible] 1909

Mlle. Germaine Arnaud, a French pianist, who comes to America with prize-honors from the Paris Conservatoire, and who recently played in Boston as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made her début appearance in New York, in Mendelssohn Hall, on Monday afternoon, February twenty-second. While only seventeen years of age, Mlle. Arnaud showed a broad tone, delicacy and finish of technique and much musical feeling. Poetry and a maturer insight of interpretation she has still to acquire. The most ambitious numbers on the program were Schumann's Etudes Symphoniques and a Toccata of Saint-Saens. The audience was of good size. Mischa Elman, the brilliant Russian violin virtuoso, gave a third recital in Carnegie Hall on the afternoon of Washington's birthday. The program was of much interest and scope, including as leading numbers, the Saint-Saëns Concerto-B minor; Chaconne (for violin alone), Bach and Sarasati's Habanera. At its close, Mr. Elman received the ovation usual, when he plays.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From [illegible]

Address [illegible]

Date MAR 6 1909

The two Boston Symphony Concerts of Thursday evening, February eighteenth, and the following Saturday afternoon, could well be termed a Paderewski or Polish celebration, as Paderewski was the soloist at each, and his new symphony, which is a tribute to Poland, formed the first part of each program. The first performance of this great work had taken place under similar conditions in Boston the week before. In New York the Saint-Saëns Concerto, C minor, and Beethoven's Concerto in E flat major—called "The Emperor" because of its splendid construction—completed each program, respectively. The new symphony with which Mr. Paderewski has honored America by its first hearing, is a patriotic tribute to his native land, Poland, and as it now stands is divided into three parts, Poland's heroic history previous to the revolution of 1863-'64 (the fortieth anniversary of which inspired the composition), the lyric nature of the Poles, and the third a picture of the revolution itself.

POST, SATURDAY, MARCH 6, 1909

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By Olin Downes

Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique was conceived and put on paper 80 years ago by a young man in his 27th year, who was to the end of his romantic and checkered existence without the benefit of a sound musical education, and who would have found it difficult to graduate from a course in composition at the New England Conservatory of Music.

Yet this work marked an epoch in the history of music, furnished an endless mine of material from which practically every modern musician has drawn; it was the dominating feature of yesterday's Symphony rehearsal, and no more ultra-modern music has been heard in Symphony Hall this season.

Berlioz was one of the young hotheads of his day. He had read much of Byron, probably, and more of Hugo. He had uncontrollable imagination. The immeasurable potency of his genius, his originality, probably unsurpassed in the records of any art, still floats that absurd exaggerated melodrama through five long movements, which contain much good, convincing thunder.

Yesterday the audience became plainly impatient during the slow moving "Scene in the Fields." To the remainder of the work it listened with absorbed attention. Well it might! Mr. Fiedler gave a superbly vital and sympathetic interpretation of music that clamors for attention, even as Berlioz must have clamored to the actress who gave him his monstrous inspiration.

The most compelling moments of the composition are the first movement, "Dreams, Passions," and the "March to the Scaffold," a truly terrible picture. These sections give us two sides of Berlioz, the romantic and impassioned poet lost in youthful and foolish fancies, and the lover of the sensational and the macabre. The "March to the Scaffold" is a great sensation, only one of the sensations that the madcap composer must roll on his tongue. It is a tremendous and blood-curdling effect. Who that has ever listened can forget the spectral talk of the bassoons, the frightful blasphemies of the brass?

"The Dream of a Sabbat" is emotionalism worn on the sleeve, a bid for the gallery. One laughs at the exaggerated absurdity of the thing—after it has gone by. All young men take themselves seriously, but it is not given to everyone to impose upon a sophisticated audience after 80 years! You cannot laugh off this piece of colossal egotism. It somehow compels respect.

An idea will move the world. The "Symphonie Fantastique" is an idea. In spite of its cumbersome gravity and occasional empty stretches, it is more alive today than ever. It has outlasted many compositions pronounced immortal when it was deride by learned judges.

ss [illegible]

CLIPPER NEW YORK CITY

MAR 6 - 1909

Worcester.—At the Worcester (J. E. Burke, mgr.) "The American Idea" March 3, Henry E. Dixey 4, 5, Billie Burke 6. Last week, "Girls" pleased greatly.

FRANKLIN.—Week of 1: "The Outlaw's Christmas." Last week, "The Millionaire and the Policeman's Wife" drew large houses.

POLI'S (J. C. Criddle, mgr.)—Week of 1: Frank Lalor and company, Grayce Scott and company, Juggling Jordans, Ward and Curran, Boutin and Tillson, Tom Bateman, Cunningham and Marion, and electrograph.

WHITE CITY.—Bostock's Trained Animal Arena.

MECHANICS' HALL.—March 9, Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Alice Robbins Cole, soloist.

[196].

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, MARCH 6, 1909

CONCERTS OF YESTERDAY

MISS MORENA SINGS WITH THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Limitation of Time That Hampered Mr. Fiedler in His Programme—The Changed, and Now Established, Policy with "Soloists," and the Results That Have Justified It—The Personal Charm of Miss Morena—The Qualities of Her Singing—An Air of Weber That Has Aged and Songs by Wagner and Strauss—Mrs. Hall's Concert of Woollett's Music

Symphony Concert

A symphony and a singer virtually divided the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon and gave its programme a peculiar cast. Mr. Fiedler, and rightly, loves not the limit of ninety minutes—less ten for an intermission—that rule and custom impose upon the concerts. The symphony happened to be Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," five movements and fifty minutes long. Ten minutes more fell to the intermission, and thus Mr. Fiedler had only half an hour for the rest of the concert. The singer, Miss Morena of the Metropolitan Opera House, must needs sing twice, and have breathing time between her pieces. Accordingly Mr. Fiedler slipped the longest intermezzo from Schubert's music to "Rosamünde" between the air from "Oberon" and the songs of Wagner and Strauss that Miss Morena sang. Thus the concert ended—or rather stopped—with Strauss's "Heimliche Aufforderung," music that vanishes into the thin air of voluptuous ecstasy. Mr. Fiedler is singularly skilful in the designing of his programmes, and whenever the arbitrary limit of time has not hampered him, they have had scope, contrast, and proportion. He knew, quite as well as any of his listeners, that an overture—"a brilliant overture" as the phrase goes—would have becomingly ended the concert; but to put it on the programme would have kept the audience in its seats for an hour and three-quarters. No one wishes to see the Symphony Concert attain the heavenly lengths that audiences endure cheerfully in English or in German cities. Yet to listen to music for two hours when the programme is duly diversified, and when there is a quarter of an hour, as it often is, of intermission, lays no great strain upon the attention and the finer receptive qualities of an audience. The season through, the public of the concerts has been praising Mr. Fiedler's programmes. Yet that same public accepts the custom that limits him to an hour and a half, or a little more, and constrains him to such an abnormal arrangement as that of yesterday, or such a misshapen list as that for next week when a lengthy symphony and a concerto for violoncello will make the programme. Mr. Fiedler, as his programme-making shows, is a man to improve and not abuse the freedom of an additional quarter hour. Moreover, as some cynics of the clubs say, the limitation to an hour and a half really originated in the desire of one of the earlier conductors to be home early.

Miss Morena, the last of the singers at the concerts this season, once more justified the restriction of "soloists" to artists of rank. Under it there are fewer singers and virtuosi than there used to be, but when they do come, they come to eager curiosity and appreciative interest. When some violinist was momentarily lifted from the ranks of the orchestra to be the "soloist" of the day, when some mediocre pianist made his way through a concerto, when some singer sang as the orchestra would never be permitted to play, they came and went oftenest as so much routine. The audience took them for granted or resigned itself to the tedium of their performances. It was time to raise the standard of the "assisting artists" to that of the orchestra which in theory they were assisting. The Symphony Orchestra is a band of the first rank and its conductor makes its programmes accordingly. Its "soloists" should be chosen by like principle and standards and the coming of each, from the merit and the individuality of the singer or the virtuoso, should be a little event in its kind. Moreover, the public of the concerts was becoming too sophisticated, too familiar with eminent singers and distinguished pianists and violinists to care for the rank and file. The change of policy with the "soloists" has now continued for nearly three seasons, and it has justified itself at every turn. It has raised the standard of the concerts until no series in the country matches them in the quality of the "assistance" as well as in the quality of the orchestra. The mutterings of the neglected have died away; and the audiences come more eagerly to the soloists because they are at once fewer and more notable. So long as the two opera houses flourish in New York there will be no lack of distinguished singers, and the flocking virtuosi are as regular as the birds of autumn.

Miss Morena, hatless and gloveless, all in black velvet a little relieved by silver and by the gleaming white of her own throat and arms, looked as though she had stepped out of a portrait by Lenbach, from whom indeed she learned much of the artistry of costume and pose that distinguished her when she impersonated Sieglinde in "Die Walküre" at the Boston Theatre. Then she was a figure of beauty that kindled and held the imagination, and yesterday in her own person she was comely and, as the French say, troubling, in a beauty that has the clearness and the firmness of the north and yet something of the warmth and richness of the south. Her voice, too, was warmer and fuller, more capable of sustained tone and of varied and deeper expression than it was a year ago. Then she struggled with depression of body and mind. Now she has regained spirit, strength and elasticity, and this new vitality told in her singing. Perhaps she began with "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's "Oberon" because it is a conventional showpiece of German and many other concert rooms. Conventional it certainly is in its alternation of fast and slow, broad and fiery, contemplative and impassioned passages. Its form is hidebound and in these days of "fee lyric declamation" tends to become more and more antiquated. Usually, however, Weber has contrived to fill this form with music that compasses mood, that speaks with genuine and stirring emotional speech and dramatizing accent. His powers were failing when he wrote "Oberon," and this air of the ocean put side by side with Agatha's rhapsody in her chamber in "Der Freischütz"—a piece as conventional of form—is clear and curious proof of this dwindling in imagination and fire. The music from "Oberon" brings no picture of Huon's storm-tossed ship, and bears little to the hearer of the swift and changeful emotions of his gazing and fearful mistres. It begins and it ends as a show-piece and by so much served to disclose Miss Morena's skill in the art of song, her technical surety and the warmth and the beauty of her tones. At their highest, they are perhaps a little shrill, and now and then she reached for a note, but some of the intervals in this air of Ocean are reckless and exacting enough to be modern.

In the three songs that ended the concert—Wagner's "Träume" and "Schmerzen and Richard Strauss's "Heimliche Aufforderung"—Miss Morena discloses finer and more individual qualities of imagination and expression. "Träume" may pass for the "study" for "Tristan" that the commentators and even Wagner himself called it. He cherished it, however, none the less, and now after fifty years and when the music of "Tristan" is much the mome familiar, it remains a truly beautiful expression of intense and rapturous longing. Its very reticence makes the intensity the more interesting. Writing for the stage, he rightly took thought of his audience, would have his music tell. "Träume" he wrote rather for himself and for the woman whose verses suggested it, and thus he made it intimate music. Yet the operatic note in it will not down, and it was the distinction of Miss Morena's singing that expressed the qualities that are thus mingled in it. She lent it the intensity of the dramatizing and the eloquent singer; and underneath quivered the ferfor of an intimate and jossessing desire. The music is all seriousness and of like seriousness were Miss Morena's lover. They can sing in Munich after all.

"Schmerzer" may pass. It is not especially characteristic of Wagner, and Miss Morena's singing of it was not particularly individual. It was the work of an accomplished and understanding singer, but hardly more. Then came Strauss's "Secret Innovation," the strangely arotic and remotic song that makes one of the group with the more familiar "Cäcilie" and the less familiar "Mrgan." The song in its text is Ovidian, and in the music, Strauss keeps no such reticence as that of Wagner in "Traüme." Yet it is no less a song of intimate of intimate passion. The picture, with which it begins, of the feast, of the passing goblet, of the lover and his mistress pledging each other with their eyes might have come straight out of Ovid's "Amores." Then the song strikes the more modern, intimate, personal note, of erotic image and rapture. And Strauss has filled the music first with curious echoes of the feast bearing seemingly the passion of the pair and then with imitated longing and excited voluptuous ecstacy. Miss Morena's singing of the song glorified. She stripped it of its muddy vesture of neurolic decay; she lifted it to exalted passion; she transformed it to rhapsodic longing. What Strauss has done with his orchestra at the end of "Salome" and of "Electra," the singer, with the qualities of her tones did for this, his song.

H. T. P.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
MARCH 6, 1909

BERLIOZ' SYMPHONIE FANTASTIQUE PLAYED

MR. FIEDLER'S WONDERFUL READING OF THE FINALE

Mme. Morena of the New York Opera Very Successful in Scena and Songs.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Symphonie Fantastique.....Berlioz
Scena. "Ocean, thou mighty Monster"....Weber
Soloist, Mme. Berta Morena.
Entr' Acte from Rosamunde.....Schubert
Songs with Piano, Mme. Morena.

A strangely arranged programme, the order of which might almost have been reversed, to advantage. It began with the usual pause, during which Mr. Fiedler stood in rapt devotion before his orchestra. How does he occupy those regular moments of impressive silence? Is it a mystic ceremonial, like the "secret prayer" of the celebrant priest at the Mass?

Parts of Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique are growing threadbare. The very love-theme, which forms the core of this work, seems cloying and by no means as inspired a melody as the one which the same composer gave to Childe Harold. The Ball-room scene sounds decidedly tame, and one is only languidly interested in watching Berlioz "cipher with notes" and fit his love melody against the strains of the waltz.

The third movement, "In the Fields," is also fading fast. The Oboe and English Horn gave their conversation with much delicacy. There was, perhaps, an excess of "ritenuto" in their phrases, but the shading was most artistic. The final phrases of the English horn—the Shepherd calling in vain for his Maid, who has been killed in the tempest—are evidently the progenitors of some of the phrases in the third act of "Tristan and Isolde," upon the same instrument. But even this movement is too long and becomes "ennuyante" with its many repetitions and romantic languors.

But if the first three movements are fading, the last two are not. Mr. Fiedler may be proud of the successful way in which he read them. From the very first notes the audience, which seemed a trifle bored, began to sit up and take notice. There was more made of the March to Execution than we have ever heard in Boston before. The movement is, in music, as powerful as "The Ballad of Reading Jail," in literature—and as terrible.

Dickens, in his "Tale of Two Cities," speaks of the footsteps of the crowd; mad and headlong footsteps, footsteps that have been stained and dabbled in blood, dangerous footsteps to come into a man's life,—and these footsteps are heard here on the bassoons as the tumbril goes to the guillotine. The bassoons played particularly well, and the wonderful pizzicato harmony upon the contrabasses must also be mentioned as being of thrilling character. The obvious points, the last thought of the criminal as he awaits the supreme moment, the fall of the axe, the quivering corpse, these were all portrayed with power.

Still more fervid was the reading of the Finale. The temperature in Hades could not be measured by Fahrenheit. It was pictured as a very uncomfortable place, where snarling E-flat clarinette and impudent piccolos may jest at a gentlemanly murderer as much as they please. Superb was the burlesque of the church service, with its clangor of bells, its sarcastic fugal work, its sardonic working-up of the "Dies Irae." Yet there are those who say that irony is impossible in instrumental music!

If Mr. Fiedler did nothing more than the interpretation of the two final movements of this symphony, it would still be enough to make his advent in Boston memorable. It was a steady crescendo of power, even up to the last hard clash of cymbal (struck with a drum-stick) with which the scene ends.

In very vivid contrast with this picture of the immortal Winter resort was the Schubert Entr'acte in B-flat, No. 2. Here all was suavity, gentleness and melody. Violins and clarinettes vied with each other in smoothness of execution, and the audience showed at once that an easily followed tune never goes unappreciated.

Mme. Morena made a success. Her voice was not broad and fiery enough in the Weber Scena. Possibly she was a bit nervous, for in the later numbers her tones rang out gloriously. But even in the first Scena there was an expressive timbre, clear high notes and an unimpeachable intonation. The Scena is most difficult in some of its sharp contrasts and its skips from highest to lowest register would bother many a great artist. Alack and alas! This also seemed faded. Is the modern music spoiling the older and more primitive effects for us?

In the final songs with piano Mme. Morena was excellent. But it was odd to find a symphony concert ending thus. Yet the reason was apparent. If Mme. Morena was to appear twice, one of the appearances was bound to be either at the beginning or the end of the concert, for the programme was too long to add another orchestral number.

The songs were exquisitely accompanied by Mr. Fiedler. His performance of the piano part in Strauss's "Secret Invitation" was equal to Mme. Morena's noble interpretation of the vocal part. Wagner's "Dreams" is a sketch made in anticipation of "Tristan and Isolde," and the words are by Mathilde Wesendonck, who was the direct inspiration of that opera. Naturally it is as intense as any of the operatic numbers of the master. "Schmerzen" belongs to the same set of poems and songs. Both were finely sung.

It shocked us a trifle to find Mme. Wesendonck's "Schmerzen" prosaically translated as "Pains." There was not a word as to where the pains were situated. Why did not some enterprising advertiser take the occasion to announce Sarsaparilla or Little Liver Pills in connection with this? It was a golden opportunity now lost beyond recall. If the brilliant translator had only left off the final "S" and called the song "Pain" it would not have seemed so colicky.

From .....
Address .....
Date 09

Mlle. Germaine Arnaud, a French pianist, who comes to America with prize-honors from the Paris Conservatoire, and who recently played in Boston as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made her début appearance in New York, in Mendelssohn Hall, on Monday afternoon, February twenty-second. While only seventeen years of age, Mlle. Arnaud showed a broad tone, delicacy and finish of technique and much musical feeling. Poetry and a maturer insight of interpretation she has still to acquire. The most ambitious numbers on the program were Schumann's Etudes Symphoniques and a Toccata of Saint-Saens. The audience was of good size. Mischa Elman, the brilliant Russian violin virtuoso, gave a third recital in Carnegie Hall on the afternoon of Washington's birthday. The program was of much interest and scope, including as leading numbers, the Saint-Saëns Concerto-B minor; Chaconne (for violin alone), Bach and Sarasati's Habanera. At its close, Mr. Elman received the ovation usual, when he plays.

POST, SATURDAY, MARCH 6, 1909

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By Olin Downes

Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique was conceived and put on paper 80 years ago by a young man in his 27th year, who was to the end of his romantic and checkered existence without the benefit of a sound musical education, and who would have found it difficult to graduate from a course in composition at the New England Conservatory of Music.

Yet this work marked an epoch in the history of music, furnished an endless mine of material from which practically every modern musician has drawn; it was the dominating feature of yesterday's Symphony rehearsal, and no more ultra-modern music has been heard in Symphony Hall this season.

Berlioz was one of the young hotheads of his day. He had read much of Byron, probably, and more of Hugo. He had uncontrollable imagination. The immeasurable potency of his genius, his originality, probably unsurpassed in the records of any art, still floats that absurd exaggerated melodrama through five long movements, which contain much good, convincing thunder.

Yesterday the audience became plainly impatient during the slow moving "Scene in the Fields." To the remainder of the work it listened with absorbed attention. Well it might! Mr. Fiedler gave a superbly vital and sympathetic interpretation of music that clamors for attention, even as Berlioz must have clamored to the actress who gave him his monstrous inspiration.

The most compelling moments of the composition are the first movement, "Dreams, Passions," and the "March to the Scaffold," a truly terrible picture. These sections give us two sides of Berlioz, the romantic and impassioned poet lost in youthful and foolish fancies, and the lover of the sensational and the macabre. The "March to the Scaffold" is a great sensation, only one of the sensations that the madcap composer must roll on his tongue. It is a tremendous and blood-curdling effect. Who that has ever listened can forget the spectral talk of the bassoons, the frightful blasphemies of the brass?

"The Dream of a Sabbat" is emotionalism worn on the sleeve, a bid for the gallery. One laughs at the exaggerated absurdity of the thing—after it has gone by. All young men take themselves seriously, but it is not given to everyone to impose upon a sophisticated audience after 80 years! You cannot laugh off this piece of colossal egotism. It somehow compels respect.

An idea will move the world. The "Symphonie Fantastique" is an idea. In spite of its cumbersome gravity and occasional empty stretches, it is more alive today than ever. It has outlasted many compositions pronounced immortal when it was deride by learned judges.

ss .....

Worcester.—At the Worcester (J. F. Burke, mgr.) "The American Idea" March 3; Henry E. Dixey 4, 5, Billie Burke 6. Last week, "Girls" pleased greatly.

FRANKLIN.—Week of 1, "The Outlaw's Christmas." Last week, "The Millionaire and the Policeman's Wife" drew large houses.

POLI'S (J. C. Criddle, mgr.)—Week of 1: Frank Lalor and company, Grayce Scott and company, Juggling Jordans, Ward and Curran, Boutin and Tillson, Tom Bateman, Cunningham and Marion, and electrograph.

WHITE CITY.—Bostock's Trained Animal Arena.

MECHANICS' HALL.—March 9, Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Alice Robbins Cole, soloist.

[196].

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

The two Boston Symphony Concerts of Thursday evening, February eighteenth, and the following Saturday afternoon, could well be termed a Paderewski or Polish celebration, as Paderewski was the soloist at each, and his new symphony, which is a tribute to Poland, formed the first part of each program. The first performance of this great work had taken place under similar conditions in Boston the week before. In New York the Saint-Saëns Concerto, C minor, and Beethoven's Concerto in E flat major—called "The Emperor" because of its splendid construction—completed each program, respectively. The new symphony with which Mr. Paderewski has honored America by its first hearing, is a patriotic tribute to his native land, Poland, and as it now stands is divided into three parts, Poland's heroic history previous to the revolution of 1863-'64 (the fortieth anniversary of which inspired the composition), the lyric nature of the Poles, and the third a picture of the revolution itself.

THE BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—MARCH 7

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Mme Morena Soloist at the Symphony.

Concert by Mme Nordica--Grand Opera by Commonwealth Club.

Various Recitals of the Week—Gossip.

Mme Berta Morena of the Metropolitan opera house in New York was the soloist at this week's Symphony rehearsal and concert, singing with the orchestra the great scena and aria from Weber's opera, "Oberon," "Ocean! thou mighty monster," which was last sung at these concerts Dec 21, 1901, by Pauline Cramer.

Mme Morena sang also, to a piano accompaniment by Herr Max Fiedler, Wagner's two songs, "Dreams" and "Pains," and Richard Strauss' "Secret Invitation." The Wagner lieder have been sung in Boston by Lilli Lehmann, Emma Juch and Marie Brema; the Strauss song by the composer's wife. So none of Mme Morena's numbers were heard for the first time, though all of them were so unusual as to come to most of the audience as practically new.

It cannot be said that the singer tipped her hearers over. Her wonderful voice, wonderful in range and quality, received its meed of acknowledgement; but the lack of shading, the lack of dramatic attack, the singer's apparent mental dryness—which belied the hope held forth by her personal appearance—left her hearers comparatively cold.

The Strauss song was wonderful in a subtle way; the singer appreciated all the passionate beauty of the music and carried to the aching-loneliness of the final line the longing of the poem. It was unfortunate that the exigencies of program-building could not have put the "Oberon" number at the last of her group instead of at the first, for this was the most tremendous of all four of her numbers.

She sang it as well as it can be sung in concert, breaking in without the aid of the dramatic action that should lead to this as a climax. And always Mr Fiedler seemed to be at too slow a tempo for her; the sustained melodies of Weber's aria were justified only at the tremendous phrases of the ending. Mme Morena's was an artistic rather than a popular success.

The orchestra began the concert with the great Berlioz symphony, aptly called the "Fantastic"—so disconnected, unsequential, repetitional, that it hardly needs the program notes to say that it is the description of the opium dreams of a young musician of morbid sensibility and ardent imagination. The "beloved melody," which haunts the whole symphony, turning up in all sorts of improbable relations, the vague dreams of pastoral scenery, with the goatherds piping back and forth their rude strains the weird Walpurgis night's dream with the melody astonishingly contrasted against a mocking chant of brass and a devilish dance of strings, the frightful "march to the scaffold," which nevertheless holds the hearer to absolute belief—one follows another like the changes of a nightmare.

Mr Fiedler's reading was both broad and warm; it was by no means what Mr Gericke gave us, and as far as memory goes, it was more compelling, more moving. The terrible fourth movement, contrasted strongly with the ball scene, which was forcedly light, was but the preparation for the howling, exploding welter of the climax. Altogether, the performance was one of the events that hardly count among one's pleasures, but which nevertheless one was glad to have experienced.

The program for this week's concert will include the first performance here of Bruckne's eighth symphony and Grädener's concerto for violoncello. The soloist will be Mr Heinrich Warnke.

THE SUNDAY HERALD, BOSTON, MARCH 7, 1909.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Orchestra Revives Berlioz's Fantastic "Episode in an Artist's Life."

By PHILIP HALE.

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. Miss Berta Morena of the Munich and Metropolitan Opera houses sang for the first time at a Symphony concert in Boston. The program was as follows:

Fantastic symphony .....Berlioz
"Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster".....Weber
Entr' acte in B flat major from "Rosamunde".....Schubert Songs with piano.....Wagner
"Dreams" and "Pains"; Strauss' "Secret Invitation."

Such an arrangement of program is not customary in this country, but in symphony concerts given in Dresden and Berlin it is not unusual for a singer to end the program with a group of songs, or for a pianist to end with a group of pieces. The symemtry of a program demands an orchestral composition as a closing number.

The "Fantastic" symphony was last played here by the New York Symphony orchestra, led by Mr. Weingartner, three years ago. That performance was one of extraordinary brilliance. The one of last night did not efface it. The "Dream of a Sabbat" last evening lacked dramatic, demoniacal continuity. The opening measures were effective, although Mr. Weingartner's imaginative reading, as though he were summoning witches from the four quarters of the earth to meet foul creatures of the air and fiends from hell, still haunts the memory. So, too, was Mr. Weingartner's conception of the "March to the Scaffold," a marvellous nightmare with its headlong rush, its spectral chattering bassoons, its wild fanfares. Nevertheless, there were many fine points in Mr. Fiedler's reading; there was poetic feeling in the first movement; the "Ball Scene" seemed less hackneyed than on previous occasions, and the "Scene in the Fields" had true pastoral atmosphere.

This music, now nearly 80 years old, is still wonderful in its imaginative force, in its romantic spirit. It is true that certain pages now seen old-fashioned, but the vitality of the main body is unimpaired. The wonder is that Berlioz with his scanty education was able to write the symphony, to express his passionate, tumultuous thought in musical speech, in an orchestral language that impresses and compels admiration even in the days of Strauss, d'Indy, Debussy and Loeffler.

Berlioz wrote the symphony in a high-strung, hotly romantic period. Romanticism was in the air. Much that seems fantastic to us, living in a commercial and material period, was natural then. It was as natural to be extravagant in belief, theories, speech, manner of life, dress, as it was to breathe. They that accuse Berlioz of being a poseur are unacquainted with the art, literature, theatre, mode of life in the early thirties. And there was something superb in the bombast, the fanfaronade, the "panache." Victor Hugo never outlived those years; witness scenes in "The Man Who Laughs" and "93." Berlioz at last become virgilian in expression, witness his "Troyens." Imagine Byron at the end waiting after the manner of Wordsworth, forgetting his Corsair, his Lara and his Don Juan in joyful recognition of the virtues in a pious pedler.

Berlioz is still a heroic figure. His latest biographers may pile fact on fact: They cannot turn the composer of the "Fantastic" symphony, "The Damnation of Faust," and the "Dead March for Hamlet" into a smug buorgeois. The legendary Berlioz will move and thrill generations to come.

Mme. Morena was heard here in "The Valkyrie" as Sieglinde last April. Her voice has lost in quality during the year, and her control of it is not so sure. Singing in concert shows faults in technic and in style that in opera were hidden or passed over. She chose for her aria the once greatly admired "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," with its hiccoughing finale. In it she displayed neihter dramatic breadth nor lyric grace. Mr. Fiedler accompanied the songs.

TRANSCRIPT, MARCH 13, 1909

MR. FIEDLER RE-ENGAGED

The Conductor to Continue at the Head of the Symphony Orchestra for Another Year—His Plans for the Summer and the Autumn

The expected has happened and Mr. Fiedler, who has been the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra during the current musical year, was today engaged for another season. He has obtained an additional leave of absence from his former post in Hamburg, and he will now continue at the head of the Symphony Orchestra until May of 1910. Tomorrow Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra start on their last journey of the season to New York and to the other cities that they regularly visit. Then they return for the six final concerts of the season here, ending on Saturday, May 1. Mr. Fiedler will then go to Germany for the summer, and take up his work in Boston again at the beginning of October.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, MARCH 13, 1909

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

The Symphony Orchestra on Its Last Journey of the Year—Mischa Elman's Recital—The Final Concerts of the Kneisel and the Flonzaley Quartets—A New Pianist

The Symphony Orchestra departs tomorrow night on its final journey for the year to New York and the other cities to the southward that it regularly visits. At one of the two concerts in New York, Mr. Fiedler will undertake Bruckner's symphony in C minor that the orchestra played here yesterday for the first time in America, and at the other Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" from the programmes of last week. There and elsewhere the pieces chosen for performance range widely—overtures from Wagner and Weber, Strauss's tone-poems, "A Hero's Life" and "Death and Transfiguration," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Tschaikowsky's "Nut-Cracker" suite and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherezade." On Monday and Tuesday, March 22 and 23, the orchestra turns homeward, giving concerts along the way at Hartford and Waterbury with Mr. Warnke, the 'cellist, playing Grädener's concerto in either city. In Boston, the next concerts, the nineteenth pair, fall on March 26 and 27, with Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, Brahms's Variations, on a Theme by Haydn, Liszt's concerto for piano in E-flat, and an overture, "Sur les Falaises," by Mr. André Maquarre, the first flutist of the orchestra, to make the programme. Miss Germaine Schnitzer, appearing for the first time at the Symphony Concerts, will be the pianist.

BOSTON JOURNAL—MARCH 15, 1909.

FIEDLER TO STAY WITH SYMPHONY

Max Fiedler is to remain the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for another year. Mr. Fiedler has proven so popular this season that negotiations toward the extension of his contract have been on for some weeks, but it was not learned until a few days ago that his leave of absence from Hamburg next season, could be secured.

om .....

ddress .....

ate .....

The last Boston Symphony concert of the year will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, March 16, at 4:30. An interesting feature of the program will be the performance by the composer of Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite," for pianoforte and orchestra. This work was played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston a year ago by Mr. Schelling with much success, and it will be played not only in Washington, but in Philadelphia, Baltimore, and New York during the March trip of the orchestra. It is in this suite that Mr. Schelling, with unusual boldness, makes use of the tunes of "Dixie" and "Old Folks at Home." Max Fiedler will conduct.

[197]

EVENING TRANSCRIPT, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 10, 19

MUSICAL NEWS

Dr. Muck and Boston—More About Mr. Campanini's Resignation—Tschaikovsky Classed—Other Items of the Hour

A month ago, in Berlin, Dr. Muck told a Bostonian who called upon him there, that, while he was still eager to return to Boston and to the conductorship of the Symphony Orchestra, no release or leave of absence from the Royal Opera was possible for him for next year. His return, therefore, in the autumn seems out of the question, and the signs point more and more to the retention of Mr. Fiedler for another season, if, of course, he is willing and free to remain.

Miss Edith Bullard is ill, and her song

BOSTON POST, MARCH 13, 1909

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By Olin Downes

One of the greatest works which have been brought to a first hearing in some seasons in Boston was given its local premiere yesterday afternoon at the public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra, Bruckner's eighth symphony, played, it is believed, for the first time in America.

It has been my fortune to hear three of Bruckner's vast symphonic conceptions, the fifth, the seventh, and the ninth. All of those enormous creations have a great origin, and immortal moments that float a varying amount of tiresome verbosity and reiteration. With the exception of a moment or two in the mighty finale, the eighth symphony is an inexhaustible succession of tremendous ideas, developed with a herculean fantasy and a noble ideality that achieves the sublime.

The form in the first three parts seems as compact as it could well be when filled with so much rich material. As in all Bruckner's works there are Wagnerianisms, yet such is the compactness and the force of the writing that one feels as if the composer had had Beethoven more in mind. There is no other master whose works furnish a parallel to the vigor of the opening of the first movement, the repose that proceeds from sheer inner strength and faith in God which characterizes the slow movement. The work should be given again very soon.

Mr. Warnke, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, played for the first time in America a concerto by Hermann Gradener of Vienna, which has just been published. This concerto has three divisions, which are connected in modern style. The first movement is pretty and flows along pleasantly. The slow section begins with a fat melody for the 'cello, and two flutes play a syncopated accompaniment. The chief theme of the finale is more than common: it is trivial and meaningless.

Certain passages seemed not over-advantageous for the soloist, but Mr. Warnke's was a masterly performance. He has an accomplished left hand, bravura passages, whatever the tempo, were clean-cut and executed with apparent ease. In sustained phrases the tone was nobly sensuous and full and expressive. Both the soloist and the symphony, in which Mr. Fiedler surpassed any previous achievement of the season, were encored. A brilliant performance of the "Prometheus" overture brought the concert to an end.

POST, MARCH 14, 1909

A NEW SYMPHONY

Yesterday it was impossible to speak at any length of Bruckner's symphony, which Mr. Fiedler presented at the Symphony concerts of this week for the first time in Boston, and probably in America. It seems strange that the work has waited so long for a hearing in this city.

Both Mr. Gericke and Dr. Muck were admirers of Bruckner's works, yet the strongest and the greatest of those with which we are acquainted was passed over until Mr. Fiedler placed us under a debt of gratitude, for after a single hearing we consider this symphony one of the greatest achievements in that form in modern orchestral literature.

Bruckner has given the world many pages of music which have an individual fascination that is not paralleled in the works of any other composer. Unfortunately, there is usually much chaff in the wheat, and one listens, not knowing which the next measure will bring. Yet the thoughts are so tremendous, the conceptions so vast, that they have preserved monstrous and unwieldy creations through one of the most swiftly changing periods in musical history.

We may be warmed and inspired by a composer who stops just outside the gates that he would enter. But Bruckner's fantasy knows no boundaries. He ascends, when he does ascend, on strong wings to cosmic regions. No composer, one is tempted to say, gives in an equal degree the sensation of the vast and illimitable.

And think of the incorrigible originality of the man! He could not write differently if he would. We are accustomed to call Hector Berlioz the most daring and thoroughly individual composer that has lived. Was Bruckner less so, in spite of the idolatry of Wagner and Beethoven? Berlioz dared, with an eye on the public, and thought for the memoirs he was going to write. In spite of his au-the world. He realized the public's normal indifference and lack of imagination. He prodded their brains with a programme. Bruckner, the peasant, the boor, whose day for a number of years consisted of "10 hours a day on the piano and three on the organ," detested contact with the people outside. He was gloriously rude when disturbed in composition. He locked himself in his chamber with God, and with the fearlessness and unconsciouness of a child wrote down what transpired.

The eighth symphony takes the breath away at first, by its enormous energy and concentrated force. The themes have superb length and arch and outline. When they are reiterated, as Buckner is bound to do, the repetition only serves to drive them home. Where is the dodder and the twaddle? "Titanic" will do about as well as any other word to describe the first part. The melodies have tremendous potentiality. In absolute music there are few such intensely dramatic moments as the three successive crashes that hurtle together. The instrumentation splashes gorgeous color. The final muttering of the violins is epic, Homeric lamentation.

The scherzo is Beethovenish in its magnificent vigor and optimism. A poetical horn call precedes the idyllic trio. It is all breezy, open-air music, filled with vitality and humor, and the poetry of nature. There is a change to heavenly contemplation in the adagio. How wonderfully the lower strings establish the mood and prepare for the long, full-breathed song of the violins!

If the finale is a little broken up, it has such kindling triumph, such ecstatic vision, that it remains the worthy culmination of what is surely an enduring master-work. A symphony such as this should be heard more than once in a season. It should be quickly repeated.

THE FRIENDLY FENCE

WITHOUT DISTINCTION OF SEX OR COLOR

FIRST OF THE BOOK AND LAST OF THE LINE

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER, SATURDAY MORNING, MARCH 13, 1909

NEW PROGRAMME AT THE SYMPHONY THIS WEEK

BRUCKNER'S SYMPHONY NO. 8 FIRST TIME HEARD

A Work of Great Power as Well as Length—A Graedener Concerto Another Novelty.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Bruckner—Symphony No. 8.
Graedener—Violoncello Concerto.
Beethoven—"Prometheus" Overture.
Soloist, Mr. Heinrich Warnke.

The list is short, but let no one imagine that the concert was. Two modern works form a genteel sufficiency for a tonal meal, particularly when the first one lasts nearly an hour and a quarter. When a radical like Bruckner gets to his eighth symphony he may be said to have acquired the "symphony habit," which is at present by no means the habit of brevity.

Bruckner, however, is beginning to show up well among the moderns. He is a slave of the demon of figure treatment, and he worries his little motives until he has squeezed out every possible meaning that is concealed in them, and the auditor is between the development and the deep sea, but he is at least logical and comprehensible, and he has a style that is absolutely his own. But the emotional power of Tschaikowsky, the melodic form of Brahms, the glow of tone-color of Strauss, he does not possess, so that his great length sometimes leads to dullness.

The auditor must have had his fill of novelty at this concert, for every note of the two first works of the programme was new to Boston, not a single movement of either work having been heard here before. Mr. Fiedler has had the honor of giving Bruckner's largest work first, in America. It is prolix and difficult work that must have cost conductor and men many hours of tedious labor. Poor Beethoven's Ninth Symphony will soon be cent symphonies given in our concerts have extended beyond the hour. Yet we may hasten to add that Bruckner's symphony towers above its two predecessors, not only in length but in power.

This C minor symphony (we cannot help contrasting it with two other C minor symphonies, to its disadvantage) was once given as an entire concert in Vienna. The excess of figure development is in evidence in the first movement, where a chromatic figure is treated in every possible way that ingenuity, patience and learning can devise. We at once concede the great skill displayed, but life is getting too short for these long tonal treatises and music in this guise is no longer a pleasure but a task.

Of St. Paul it was suggested that too much learning had made him mad; of the modern Regers and Bruckners one must say that their excess of learning prevents them from seeing when it is time to let an innocent little figure rest. There were, however, moments of grandeur and beauty in even the first movement of this symphony.

The Scherzo is less artificial and less long. It has something of that rustic naivete which seems natural to Bruckner and fits him well; it is no longer the academician who is speaking, but the inspired composer who has something to say. Nevertheless there is also some wonderful combination of themes in this Scherzo; parts that are difficult to comprehend at once, passages that may even bore the public, but that will be recognized more fully with better acquaintance. So that it seems that there is always a "Music of the Future!"

The Adagio is of great length. The phrase of "heavenly length" that used to be attached to Schubert may properly be used here, for Bruckner has also something to say in this movement. No man who is thoroughly in earnest, and has any ability at all, can ever become ludicrous in his work. Bruckner has been helped, rather than harmed, by the fierce and partisan attacks of Hanslick, the dislikes of the Herzogenbergs and Brahms. The virulence displayed by his adverse critics must eventually defeat itself.

In each of the movements there are points of beauty and of power, but not a sustained power such as one requires in even a shorter symphony. The Finale has some strong climaxes. There is a note of triumph in the trumpet calls that echo through some of its measures, and the chorale effects also suggest a victory with divine help. That Bruckner had as profound a religious cannot be doubted, and this was a moving impulse in his two last symphonies.

Like Franck, Bruckner cannot attain Wagner's condensed power in creating a figure. The aggressive little four-noted figure of the Scherzo is not in itself attractive, although very prominently thrust forward, and played upwards and downwards innumerable times. In orchestration Bruckner follows, a long way after, Wagner. The violins in high position, in the Adagio, for ecstasy, the use of the brasses in rich harmony in soft passages, at the first part of the same movement, are striking examples. But Bruckner does not get as much out of the modern orchestra as many lesser composers.

There is too much of sequence treatment in every movement of the symphony, and too much of sheer repetition of figures. When Wagner carried a single simple idea (the tonic chord) through measures upon measures, at the beginning of "Rheingold," he was warranted in doing so by the picture he was portraying (the ceaseless flow of the Rhine) but there is no such warrant for such lengthy preparation of climaxes in a symphony. And Wagner himself used such an effect only once, while Bruckner returns to the same device often.

Yet, in spite of the defects and the prolixity, the symphony has dignity and power and the voice is the voice of Bruckner and not often an echo of either Brahms or Wagner. It is the best of the nine symphonies of this master, and it was splendidly performed. Mr. Fiedler has here reached his highest point, thus far, in Boston. It was a work of self-abnegation too, for we believe that the public will be much quicker to see the faults than the merits of this learned and long symphony.

Graedener was much less lengthy. It may have been a logical sequence to go from Bruckner to Graedener, for the latter succeeded the former in the chair of harmony and counterpoint at the Vienna conservatory. He does not seem to have the musical gifts of his father, Carl G. P. Graedener, whose songs deserve to be much better known than they are, particularly his "Werner's Lieder aus Welschland."

But there are so few concertos for violoncello that one welcomes any addition to the scant repertoire, and Mr. Warnke played with such clearness and intelligent phrasing that the work was carried to some success. We could, however, have borne with much more breadth, for the tone seemed very light at times.

The concerto is a brand-new work and does not seem at all inspired. It seemed like "Eau Sucree" after the earnestness of the symphony. Its movements are joined together. Its slow movement is so constantly dreamy that one almost goes to sleep, in sympathy. Its rondo-like finale has a chief theme that is tuneful even to the whistling point, and comes back in a jolly treatment by diminution at the close. Its cadenza has some very long maunderings for the violoncello. It is altogether a rather pleasant, but by no means great, work.

A goodly procession marched out before the "Prometheus" overture. It is by no means the greatest of Beethoven's overtures and was probably chosen on account of its brevity. It was well enough played, but the Bruckner symphony dominated this programme altogether. If Bruckner had only known that brevity is sometimes the soul of music as well as of wit!

---

[198]

BOSTON GLOBE
MARCH 20, 1909.

MRS LENOM PUT ON PROBATION

McQuarre Pays Fine of $100.

Latter Arrested on Husband's Alienation Suit.

Dist. Atty Hill Acts as Court Interpreter,

Mathilde Lenom, wife of Clement Lenom of the Symphony orchestra, and Daniel McQuarre, who were brought here from San Francisco recently on an indictment accusing them of a statutory offence, were before Chief Justice Aiken in the superior criminal court yesterday. They pleaded guilty to the charge. The woman was placed on probation and McQuarre was fined $100, which he paid.

The parties are French, and as there was no interpreter in court Dist Atty Hill acted in that capacity.

It was on Mr Hill's recommendation that the cases were disposed of. He felt there were circumstances of an extenuating nature that warranted the disposition that he recommended to the court.

As McQuarre was leaving the courtroom he was placed under arrest on civil process by Deputy Sheriff Fee in an action for $25,000 damages for the alleged alienation of affections brought by Clement Lenom. The plaintiff claims the defendant alienated the affections of Mrs Lenom. The ground of the arrest is that the defendant intended to leave the state.

McQuarre will appear in the poor debtor court Monday. Meantime he will stay in jail.

m .....
AMERICAN
ress .....
e .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

For the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Buckingham on Tuesday evening, March 23, the Waterbury Music League has introduced a decided innovation in opening the sale next Saturday, March 13, 10 days in advance of the concert. This sale will be held at the Buckingham Pharmacy and will give all desiring seats, including the outside towns, ample opportunity to procure them. The orchestra will be heard in an especially rich program which will include the Symphony "Pathetique" by Tschaikowsky, compositions by Strauss, DeBussy and "Finland," the famous symphonic poem by Sibelius which has never been played here. The program will close with Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger." The program, an especially rich one and varied, will necessitate the presence of every man in the orchestra.

spaper Cutting Bureau in the World

.....
.....
.....

ELOPERS ARE CAUGHT.

Husband Has Pair Brought to Boston From Frisco.

BOSTON, March 3.—A round trip to the Pacific coast, in which Daniel Maquarre, flute soloist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Mrs. Mathilde Lenom, wife of another symphony player, participated, ended today in the superior court here, when both pleaded not guilty of a statuory offense and, failing to furnish $3,000 bail, were sent to jail to await trial.

The pair disappeared simultaneously in November. They were located recently by Mr. Lenom in San Francisco, where Mrs. Lenom had opened a millinery store and Maquarre was giving music lessons and they were arrested at the request of Boston authorities. Neither of the accused was represented in the court proceedings today and neither made an effort to obtain bail.

Post

Copyright, 1909, by Post Publishing Co.

REVENGE ON ELOPERS COST LENOM $2000

But Symphony Artist Executes Spectacular Coup on Mrs. Lenom and Soulmate by Landing Latter in Jail

Mrs. Clement Lenom and Daniel Maquarre, whose troubles were increased yesterday after they thought them ended.

When Daniel Maquarre and Mrs. Clement Lenom were released in the Superior Court yesterday, one after paying a fine of $100 and the other after being put on probation, they smiled jeeringly at the discomfiture they imagined the news would bring to the irate husband, Clement Lenom, member of the Symphony Orchestra.

He had just paid over $2000 to the county of Suffolk for expenses incurred in bringing the pair back from California.

They smiled too soon, however, for Lenom, although out of the city, had prepared one of the most spectacular coups pulled off at the courthouse in years.

Maquarre was arrested just as he stepped from the courtroom to answer a $25,000 suit for the alienation of Mrs. Lenom's affections.

Paper Cutting Bureau in the World

.....
.....
.....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last Boston Symphony concert of the year will be given in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, March 17, at 8:15. A most interesting feature of the program will be the performance by the composer of Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite," for pianoforte and orchestra.

This work was played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston a year ago by Mr. Schelling with such success, and it will be played not only in Baltimore, but in Philadelphia, Washington and New York during the March trip of the orchestra. It is in this suite that Mr. Schelling with unusual boldness makes use of the tunes of "Dixie" and "Old Folks at Home."

WENT BACK TO JAIL

The husband charges that his former friend who had eloped with his wife was an alien and about to leave the State, so Maquarre had to go back to jail. Mrs. Lenom was served almost at the same moment with a divorce libel that had been prepared by her husband.

Although the proceedings in court yesterday were short they were marked by an innovation when District Attorney Hill showed his versatility in explaining the proceedings to Mrs. Lenom in French, as the defendant knows no other language. Both Maquarre and Mrs. Lenom pleaded guilty to the charges preferred against them and left the courtroom hurriedly.

The $25,000 suit brought against Maquarre was evidently entered with no thought of remuneration, as the irate husband knew that Maquarre had no means.

Lenom had obtained a position for Maquarre with the Symphony Orchestra when he first came to Boston and had taken him into his own home because he thought that the young stranger could not afford to maintain one for himself.

When Wife Broke Down

Maquarre had paid his $100 fine and was hastening forth to greet Mrs. Lenom, who had halted in the corridor to speak to him. She smiled as she saw him approaching, but they never exchanged congratulations, for an officer halted the young Belgian musician and served him with the alienation papers, informing him that he must again go to jail.

Mrs. Lenom had shown no concern when the divorce libel was served on her, and had appeared nonchalant in court when she pleaded guilty. She showed emotion for the first time when Maquarre was stopped by the officer and then she broke down. Tears rolled down her cheeks and she sobbed audibly as she left the courthouse.

John F. McDonald, attorney for Maquarre, said last night that he had himself paid the prisoner's fine and that his client had not a cent in the world.

"It was absurd to say that Maquarre had any intention of leaving the State," said Mr. McDonald. "He has no money to go from Boston, and he regards this city as his home. This is where he intends to live, and there has never been the least thought in his mind of going back to Belgium. He will take a poor debtor's oath in the morning, and we can show that he has no intention of leaving the State, so that I expect that he will be released from jail."

The story of the erring wife and the musican with whom she eloped was the greatest shock that Boston musical circles have ever received. Both men were members of the Symphony Orchestra, the most noted musical organization in the country.

Maquarre had been helped by Lenom, who secured him his place with the orchestra. On Nov. 23 Maquarre and Mrs. Lenom fled from Boston and all trace of them was lost.

It was at first thought that they had gone to France, but through the persistency of the husband they were finally located in San Francisco, where Mrs. Lenom had opened a millinery establishment.

People familiar with the case have been astounded at the evident comfort Mrs. Lenom has taken in merely watching Maquarre, for in San Francisco he put the blame for their elopement upon her shoulders.

CABLE ADDRESS, "EIKE" NEW YORK — NEW YORK

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

.....
ess .....
.....

MUSIC NOTES

The last of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will occur at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 15, an interesting feature of the program being the performance by the composer of Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite," for pianoforte and orchestra. This work was played with the Boston Orchestra in Boston a year ago with much success, and it will be given not only in Philadelphia but in Washington, Baltimore and New York during the March trip of the organization. It is in this suite that Mr. Schelling with unusual boldness makes use of the tunes of "Dixie" and "Old Folks at Home."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

.....
ess .....
.....

Mr. Heinrich Gebhard, pianist, of Boston, who has already appeared in Providence as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give a recital before the Listeners' Club on Monday afternoon at 4:30, when he will play the following programme: Rhapsodie, op. 79, No. 2, Brahms; "Waldstein" Sonata, op. 53, Beethoven; Aufschwunz, Des Abends, Schumann; Valse, op. 42, Impromptu, op. 36, Scherzo, No. 2, Chopin; "Reflets dans l'eau," Debussy; Russian Dance, Tschaikowsky; Gavotte, Gebhard; Fantasie on Verdi's Rigoletto, Liszt.

[199]

TRANSCRIPT,
SATURDAY, MARCH 20, 1909

THE MODERN SYMPHONY

WITH FOUR RECENT EXAMPLES FOR A TEXT

A Remarkable Series of Such Pieces at the Symphony Concerts, Beginning with Paderewski, and Continuing Through Elgar and Berlioz to Bruckner—The Rehabilitated Symphonic Form as a Means of Emotional and Poetic Expression After the Long Supremacy of the Tone-Poem—The New Resources for the Modern Symphonist and His Use of Them—The Temptations That Beset Him and Induce the Length of His Pieces—A Sign of the Times in the Contents of These New Symphonies—The Inheritance from Berlioz

Seldom, surely, have four such symphonies been played in succession at the Symphony Concerts as Mr. Fiedler has put on his programmes for the past month. He began with Paderewski's, which was wholly new; next came Elgar's, not quite three months old and played for the first times in Boston; then Berlioz's "Fantastic" for one of its triennial revivals, and finally Bruckner's in C minor for its first performances in America. The conductor and his men played all four in a fashion that disclosed clearly their substance and their form; that summoned and enforced their mood, and that imparted their characteristic poetry and passion. Mr. Fiedler and the band gave, moreover, to each its particular individuality—to Paderewski's its rich and glamorous tone and its voice of melancholy musing; to Elgar's its masculine stride and its nervous intensity; to Berlioz's its melodramatic vividness and largeness, and to Bruckner's its plangent sonority and spiritual exaltation. Two of these symphonies—Paderewski's and Elgar's—are intrinsically and saliently modern, written by contemporary composers, alert and often sympathetic to the musical tendencies and practices of their particular day and in the prime of their individual powers. The third—Berlioz's—though it is nearly eighty years old, is the clear forerunner of many of the symphonic methods and ambitions of our time, and in the accomplishment of its chosen ends matches, and often excels, much of the music that has been patterned more or less directly after it. The fourth—Bruckner's—is the apex of the achievement of a solitary and singular genius (for this eighth symphony of his warrants such a word) who, but for his assimilation of Wagner's instrumental coloring, might have stood anywhere in the musical century between Beethoven's symphony in C major and Strauss's "A Hero's Life." Retrospect, comparisons and contrasts are not the fashion with the Symphony Concerts. There are so many of them; week by week they come—and go, each by and for itself. Yet here, perhaps, is so remarkable a series of symphonies—and all but one quite unfamiliar—that it is worth while, in this week of pause in the concerts, to look back upon them.

At least one common and pervading characteristic of the four symphonies was the effort of the composers, and oftenest the successful effort, to make the music, cast in the symphonic form, express ideas, emotions and sensations, apart from its own ordered beauty and power. Paderewski's, for example, had a palpable programme throughout that became almost explicit in the composer's own annotation of his finale of the Polish Revolution. The first movement was surely like to some imagined ghostly pageant of the ancient heroes of Poland summoned from their tombs, to march again to their wars with heroic chant, to smite with their swords to victory or defeat, to raise their song of thanksgiving, while the beholding composer and the beholding auditor saw and heard, marvelled and lamented over a vanished but glorious past. The second movement, again, was as the singing of mournful and broken songs by many voices in waste and solitary and hidden places.

Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," in turn, follows frankly the visions of a drugged and disordered dream, with each vision duly labelled and more lengthily catalogued on the explanatory fly-leaf. Elgar's symphony has no stated or implied "programme." On paper, it is as "absolute" and self-contained as a symphony of Mozart or of Haydn. But in the hearing, it has no less its clear spiritual "programme." The restless stress of the first movement about the "motto" melody is as the eddying of life about a strong man's ideal; the scherzo is as the joy and the vigor of his strength; the adagio is as his own secret vision of that ideal; the finale sings the victory, at least in his inner life, that loyalty to it brings him. "By this sign; he shall conquer." Bruckner abhorred "programmes," and his was not a mind to shape them or to respond to them. Yet who, hearing his eighth symphony sympathetically, can doubt for a moment that, for once, his music is the clear and transporting speech of a sequence of moods of singularly pure and high exaltation and aspiration. For once again, he has written passionate music—of the passions of the spirit.

In a word, these four composers have been able to cast their music in the symphonic form, and yet make it as emotionally expressive, as vividly delineative, as poetically suggestive, as their imagination could compass and their skill accomplish. True, they have each treated the symphonic form elastically and freely—Paderewski most and Elgar least, of the four. Yet their symphonies remain intrinsically and essentially symphonies, unless we are to regard the symphonic form as a kind of vise, with Brahms, let us say, [illegible] a tune [illegible] the screws.

In fact, as the symphony of Haydn and Mozart expanded to the imperious needs and the imperious hand of Beethoven, so his has expanded to the needs and the resources of the modern and the contemporary symphonists and to those of Berlioz when he foreran them. Therein, and particularly in the symphonies of Paderewski and of Elgar, lies, perhaps a sign of the musical times—and the clearer and the widerspread if d'Indy's memorable second symphony be added to them.

Under the potent influence of Liszt, of Strauss, and less directly of Wagner, ours has hitherto been the musical generation of the "tone-poem." In its freedom of form, in its susceptibility to sensation and suggestion, our striving composers found, or believed they had found, a fuller and more potent medium of expression for whatever tale or poem, picture or place, figure of legend and figure of romance, or even their own minds and hearts, prompted them to express. The symphony cramped, cribbed, confined them. It had become, in their view, only a training ground for the piping and wizened children of Brahms. They forgot how much and how vivid and pulssant, delineative and expressive music Berlioz and even Liszt himself had written within the limits of the symphonic form. They forgot how significant, even within its limitations, is the characteristic device of expressive and delineative music—the emotional and poetic and pictorial transformation of melodies.

Now comes Paderewski with a symphony, and had he written instead a set of tone-poems and called it "Polandia," he would seemingly have accomplished no more of his emotional, poetic and pictorial design. Now comes Elgar, and a symphonic poem, say in the vein of Liszt's "Les Préludes" or "Die Ideale," would have imparted no more—and very probably less—of the emotions he would utter. There, too, was the neglected Bruckner; and what tone-poem could mount, or has mounted, higher into the pure ether of spiritual exaltation and held itself there with surer and steadier wing than his eighth symphony. In the Adagio and the Finale he touches sublimity—and on the pinions of the symphonic form. Thus has the symphony come into its own again as the clear and elastic medium for the potent expression of emotional, poetic, pictorial ideas and visions, for the embodiment of a "programme," if it is only within the power of the composer, as it is with Paderewski and Elgar, as it was with Berlioz and Bruckner, to make it do his will. Fashions spread quickly in this musical world of ours, and for a time it will now make symphonies where it has made tone-poems.

The symphony, however, has come into this new—or restored—estate with new and ampler resources. Recall Paderewski's symphony, and try to trace the source of the emotional and the imaginative impression that it made. Melodies it certainly had, and often substantial and significant melodies; but they touched the imagination and stirred to answering emotion less by what they were than by what they became under the composer's handling. The harmonic treatment to which he subjected them, the instrumental dress in which he clothed them, the atmosphere, so to say, in which he thus encompassed them, gave them oftenest what power of beauty or poignancy they had for each individual hearer. There were the melodies like the bones of a skeleton; there was the development to articulate them, but it was the harmony and the instrumentation that gave them flesh, blood and vitality. Recall Elgar's symphony, in turn, and its force upon the listener, and again it seems to lie primarily, not in his invention and development of themes in the older symphonic sense, but in his significant and individual harmonic and instrumental treatment of them. The tour de force by which he makes his Adagio and his Scherzo out of themes, identical note for note, but how differently handled and transformed for his different purposes, is typical of this new emphasis and new resource of harmony and orchestration. The sense of restless conflict in the first movement and of battling triumph in the finale is born primarily of these means. Out of Elgar's rhythmic handling of his themes comes the fine masculine stride, at its most telling moments, of the symphony.

And what a master of rhythms is the Bruckner of the symphony in C minor! A week has gone since Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra played it, but it is easy still to hear the wonderful rhythm of the drums in the Finale, or the soaring progressions of the Adagio. Did ever music rise on wings of more sustained and pulsing beat than this truly inspired song of spiritual serenity and spiritual exaltation? Moreover, what was the familiar reproach of Bruckner's detractors to his music—that it was a thing of richly colored and clangorous instrumentation, masking dry contrapuntal skill, evasive melodic invention and confused musical architecture. The reproaches were not always just, and least of all to such a unique masterpiece as this eighth symphony. Yet among the chief and most thrilling of its glories are its instrumental richness and plangency, its propelling and engrossing rhythms, its progressions that make the listener's throat clutch with the sheer emotional impact of them. As for Berlioz, the very primers of musical history cite the meagreness of his melodic invention and the scantiness of his thematic development to dwell the more upon the emotional and the delineative force of the harmonic, the rhythmic and the instrumental treatment that he gave them. Thus, the imparting and the commanding power of these modern symphonies lies primarily in the significance, the point, and the richness of the inharmonic and their instrumental dress and in the prick and propulsion of their rhythms.

On the other hand, the very amplitude and elasticity, the potency and the poetry of these new resources have their pitfall. They are endless temptation to the composer—to double and redouble them, to venture here, to experiment there, to exhaust them, so far as he may, and to exhaust himself and his audience. There [illegible] of musical paper for the writing's sake—Strauss's larger tone-poems abound in it; there is also the writing of music as a thing primarily to be heard in the concert-room, and the modern composer, like the Roman racers in the circus, is fain to ride both horses at once. Paderewski's symphony filled seventy minutes; Elgar's required fifty; Berlioz's, which sounds the compactest of the four, consumed fifty; Bruckner's surpassed even Paderewski's in length, though in it, by the force of the rare inspiration that sustains it, the listener least heeded the passing minutes. And these are the days when all of us, by common consent, have most difficulty in the fixing of attention and the holding of it fixed. We must have the exaltation, the remoteness, the superhuman quality of the Bruckner of the symphony in C minor to rivet us. A cause or two of these unholy, instead of heavenly, lengths is not far to seek. Composers, like Paderewski and Elgar, and sometimes Bruckner—often indeed in other of his symphonies—have not so much more to say than had Beethoven or Brahms; but what they would utter, they speak with infinite detail.

Read the score of Elgar's symphony, and a pedantic and diligent analyst could, if he chose, divide it into an almost endless number of sedulously fitted mosaics. Studied in such detail, it becomes like to a tessellated floor. Elgar must draw the ultimate scrap from his themes, exhaust each figure, cut and recut his harmonies, color and recolor his instrumentation. Paderewski is only less persistent to wring out his short motives, to drain his harmonic and instrumental resources, to make play with slightly varied reiterations. Bruckner's foes liked to taunt him with his insistent augmentations, diminutions and inversions. Berlioz could be vividly brief—witness "The March to the Scaffold" in the "Fantastic Symphony"—but how reluctant he is in that same symphony to have done with the "Scene in the Fields." And the temptation to the contemporary composer, like Paderewski or Elgar, with all the resources of the modern orchestra—and sometimes of his own additions to it—ready to his hand and with all the modern ventures into new and bold harmonies to goad him, is twenty-fold that which beset the comparatively innocent Berlioz or even the dream-rapt and secluded Bruckner. The contemporary composer likes too well to worry a motive, a mere figure even, until he has had his last shake at it. He loves too well to squeeze one more tube of instrumental color. The wonder is that he can fuse all his details as Paderewski and Elgar have done, but as Bruckner has accomplished nowhere but in this eighth symphony, into an organic and impressive whole. Yet in the two processes of detailing and of fusing, the minutes, and sometimes the auditors' attention, pass.

In their emotional and poetic content, these symphonies of Paderewski, Elgar, and Bruckner may also be a sign of the times. The all-conquering Wagner preoccupied us long and strenuously with the sensuous, even the sensual, and the romantic elements in expressive and delineative music. One may not, being a Wagner, write a "Tannhäuser" or a "Tristan," the first act of "Die Walküre" or the final scene of "Siegfried" and not leave an impress upon the musical sensations and the musical tendencies of the generation that now knows them so well. Tschaikowsky, in his fashion of the veneered Slav, is more sensual even, and alike of pleasure and of pain, than is Wagner. French music still has its practised and absorbed amorist in Massenet, narrow as his influence may be outside Paris and New York. The Strauss of the tone-poems—to say nothing of "Salome" where he could be naught else—can be at moments as sensual as he is intellectual. There is passionate and fleshly love-music in the "Domestica" and perhaps in "Ein Heldenleben." Elsewhere much of the music of our generation has been engrossed with sensuous and sensual passion and excitement. To put it a little brutally, and from a masculine point of view, there has usually been a woman in it.

There is no woman in these symphonies of Paderewski and Elgar and Bruckner, warm of emotion and touched with poetry as they are. Theirs is not sensual music; and while it is at its best sensuous, as all moving music must be, the sensuousness is fine-fibred, purged of its grosser elements, of a higher imagination and of a purer spirit. Paderewski sees in vision the warrior-heroes and the ancient glories of Poland, and meditates mournfully upon them; he hears, with melancholy ear, the broken and brooding songs of its people; he lives in imagination through its futile rebellion; and of the emotions that these sensations stir in him, his symphony is born. Elgar, in turn, enters deeply into a man's struggle and stress for the ideal which he would cherish; he penetrates far into the secret of a man's heart—for England, after all, is the country of men—and of these things, as a man, for men, he writes his finely masculine symphony. Bruckner, finally, quite leaves the earth, and in a moment of such pure and high inspiration as the gods sometimes vouchsafe to such simple souls, puts into music a spiritual beauty, aspiration and exaltation that knows not time, or place, or body, that has melted every grosser element into lovely and thrilling sound. As truly as St. John in his cell at Patmos, Bruckner heard in the adagio and the finale of his symphony, the many voices of the Apocalypse. And he that stumbled and halted in all the rest of his music, spoke at last through and with them.

H. T. P.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Name .....
Address .....
Date .....

BOSTON GETS WEATHER KIOSK.

Structure for Dissemination of Information to be Erected on Common.

Boston, March 5.—A weather kiosk is to be erected in Boston. It has been authorized by the United States Weather Bureau, and the location for it has been selected by John W. Smith, local Weather Forecaster, and approved by Mayor Hibbard.

The location chosen is a small spot on gramme's close. Czerwonky is not a familiar name to our concertgoers, but undoubtedly it will be better known before long. For here is a player with decided talent, a fine mastery of his instrument and a captivating style. Mr. Czerwonky came to this country with Dr. Muck when the latter took command of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to fill the post of second concert master, soon resigning, however, to devote his time to teaching, to concert and quartet playing. Certainly his ability is such that he should find no trouble in duplicating here the excellent reputation he has already won abroad. His programme last night was as follows:

Ciaccona (for violin alone)	Bach
Fantasia Appassionata	Vieuxtemps
Traumerei	Strauss-Czerwonky
Canzonetta	D'Ambrosio
Serenade
"Moses," fantasie	Rossini-Paganini
Humoreske	Dvorak
Zephyr	Hubay
Souvenir de l'Amerique	Czerwonky

In arranging this programme, the player placed his piece de resistance first. The Bach chaconne is a pretty good test for violinists, and Mr. Czerwonky stood the test exceedingly well. The technical difficulties, by no means small, were well within his grasp, and he gave a convincing display of straightforward and artistic work. The remainder of the selections were distinctly of the popular sort, for the average audience will feed without stint on sugary bits like the Dvorak "Humoresque" and such frothy confections as the Vieuxtemps fantasia and the player's own paraphrase of American nationals airs and popular songs, which ended the programme.

Mr. Czerwonky plays with great delicacy of style and is not lacking when it comes to a brilliant tour-de-force. Fingers and bow arm are well schooled. His double stops and chord playing are very accurate and he juggles with harmonics most successfully. Altogether, he made an excellent impression. The audience, disposed at first to be cordial to a newcomer, soon fell under the player's spell and applauded vehemently. Of the last three numbers, the "Humoresque" and the "Zephyr" were redemanded, and an encore also followed the final selection. Mr Carl Lamson, at the piano, gave tasteful and sympathetic support.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

BERLIOZ' SYMPHONIE FANTASTIQUE PLAYED

MR. FIEDLER'S WONDERFUL READING OF THE FINALE

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Symphonie Fantastique.....Berlioz
Scena. "Ocean, thou mighty Monster"....Weber
Soloist, Mme. Berta Morena.
Entr' Acte from Rosamunde.....Schubert
Songs with Piano, Mme. Morena.

A strangely arranged programme, the order of which might almost have been reversed, to advantage. It began with the usual pause, during which Mr. Fiedler stood in rapt devotion before his orchestra. How does he occupy those regular moments of impressive silence? Is it a mystic ceremonial, like the "secret prayer" of the celebrant priest at the Mass?

Parts of Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique are growing threadbare. The very love-theme, which forms the core of this work, seems cloying and by no means as inspired a melody as the one which the same composer gave to Childe Harold. The Ball-room scene sounds decidedly tame, and one is only languidly interested in watching Berlioz "cipher with notes" and fit his love melody against the strains of the waltz.

The third movement, "In the Fields," is also fading fast. The Oboe and English Horn gave their conversation with much delicacy. There was, perhaps, an excess of "ritenuto" in their phrases, but the shading was most artistic. The final phrases of the English horn—the Shepherd calling in vain for his Maid, who has been killed in the tempest—are evidently the progenitors of some of the phrases in the third act of "Tristan and Isolde," upon the same instrument. But even this movement is too long and becomes "ennuyante" with its many repetitions and romantic languors.

But if the first three movements are fading, the last two are not. Mr. Fiedler may be proud of the successful way in which he read them. From the very first notes the audience, which seemed a trifle bored, began to sit up and take notice. There was more made of the March to Execution than we have ever heard in Boston before. The movement is, in music, as powerful as "The Ballad of Reading Jail," in literature—and as terrible.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
Chronicle
Cambridge = Mass
March 6-09

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

The sixth of the current series of concerts at Sanders theatre, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, was given last Thursday evening. Laura Hawkins, pianist, was the soloist and this was the program:

Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," op. 35 .....Rinsky-Korsakoff
Concerto for piano, No. 5..Saint-Saens
Overture, "Flying Dutchman"..Wagner

Now that Rimsky-Korsakoff has passed away and his creative work is finished, various estimates will be in order as to his rank among contemporary composers and his influence on the musical development of his time. Whatever the verdict as to his ultimate rank among composers, not only of his own country but of the musical world generally, it will be generally accepted that his symphonic suite "Scheherazade" (a musical picture of several Arabian Nights' tales) will take rank as one of the most artistic and imaginative works of its kind in the modern musical literature. Certainly it continues after many hearings to impress one as the finest example from a Russian composer since Tschaikowsky. As a brilliant, forceful and authoritative illustration of what the modern orchestra can do, it has hardly any equal, and what is even more to the point, it possesses melodic charm and imaginative conception that make one listen all the time with evident enjoyment. The piece gave several of the soloists in the orchestra a chance to show their artistry and virtuosity, which was taken full advantage of. In fact, the whole performance of the suite was one long to be remembered. The applause was long continued and the performance well deserved it in every way.

Miss Laura Hawkins' ambitions as a pianist are on the increase, and she played the latest of the several concertos by Saint-Saens, a work not to be compared as to musical worth with the second, or even the first one written years ago. The fifth concerto is seldom heard here. If memory serves, it was played several seasons ago at a Boston Symphony concert by Busoni, and there may have been other performances of a semi-public nature. The composer has arranged the last movement into a piece for piano solo, which has been given once or more in public by Felix Fox in his concerts of recent seasons.

As a whole the work is clever, but only a routine piece of writing. Miss Hawkins played it with general acceptance and if her performance did not stir the pulse to any appreciable extent, it gave pleasure throughout.

The "Flying Dutchman" overture made an admirable closing number.

The seventh concert will be Thursday evening, April 1. H. J. STORER.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From .....
Address .....
Date .....

METROPOLITAN STARS TO SING TWO OPERAS

"Haensel And Gretel" And "Pagliacci" Will Be The Double Bill Monday.

The third performance of grand opera by the company from the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, will be given on Monday night at the Lyric Theater. A double bill is announced. The performance will open with Humperdink's fairy opera, "Haensel and Gretel," which was given in Baltimore about four years ago and is remembered as a beautifully staged opera of the modern German school. Humperdink was in close touch with Wagner in his later years, and has written some very effective music. He is now at work upon a new opera which is promised for next season in America.

The artists to appear in "Haensel and Gretel" are Mattfeld, Van Dyck, Homer, Kaschowska and Goritz. Homer's interpretation of the witch in this opera is one of her very best parts. The part of Haensel will be taken by Madam Mattfeld, and that of Gretel by Madam Van Dyck. Goritz has a splendid opportunity in the part of the father.

The performance will close with the opera, "Pagliacci," in which Caruso will positively appear. The other important parts in this opera will be taken by Madam Destinn, who is one of the greatest sopranos of the organization, and Amato, the baritone. Both operas will be conducted by Alfred Hertz.

The last Boston Symphony concert of the year will be given in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, March 17, at 8.15. A most interesting feature of the programme will be the performance by the composer of Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite" for pianoforte and orchestra. This work was played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston a year ago by Mr. Schelling with much success, and it will be played not only in Baltimore, but in Philadelphia, Washington and New York during the March trip of the Orchestra. It is in this suite that Mr. Schelling with unusual boldness makes use of the tunes of "Dixie" and "Old Folks at Home."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From .....
Address .....
Date .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last Boston Symphony concert of the year will be given in the Lyric Theater, on Wednesday evening, March 17, at 8:15. A most interesting feature of the program will be the performance by the composer of Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite" for pianoforte and orchestra. This work was played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston a year ago by Mr. Schelling with much success, and it will be played not only in Baltimore, but also in Philadelphia, Washington and New York during the March trip of the orchestra. It is in this suite that Mr. Schelling with unusual boldness makes use of the tune of "Dixie" and "Old Folks at Home."

[20]

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By Olin Downes

Berlioz's Symphonic Fantastique was conceived and put on paper 80 years ago by a young man in his 27th year, who was to the end of his romantic and checkered existence without the benefit of a sound musical education, and who would have found it difficult to graduate from a course in composition at the New England Conservatory of Music.

Yet this work marked an epoch in the history of music, furnished an endless mine of material from which practically every modern musician has drawn; it was the dominating feature of yesterday's Symphony rehearsal, and no more ultra-modern music has been heard in Symphony Hall this season.

Berlioz was one of the young hotheads of his day. He had read much of Byron, probably, and more of Hugo. He had uncontrollable imagination. The immeasurable potency of his genius, his originality, probably unsurpassed in the records of any art, still floats that absurd exaggerated melodrama through five long movements, which contain much good, convincing thunder.

Yesterday the audience became plainly impatient during the slow moving "Scene in the Fields." To the remainder of the work it listened with absorbed attention. Well it might! Mr. Fiedler gave a superbly vital and sympathetic interpretation of music that clamors for attention, even as Berlioz must have clamored to the actress who gave him his monstrous inspiration.

The most compelling moments of the composition are the first movement, "Dreams, Passions," and the "March to the Scaffold," a truly terrible picture. These sections give us two sides of Berlioz, the romantic and impassioned poet lost in youthful and foolish fancies, and the lover of the sensational and the macabre. The "March to the Scaffold" is a great sensation, only one of the sensations that the madcap composer must roll on his tongue. It is a tremendous and blood-curdling effect. Who that has ever listened can forget the spectral talk of the bassoons, the frightful blasphemies of the brass?

"The Dream of a Sabbat" is emotionalism worn on the sleeve, a bid for the gallery. One laughs at the exaggerated absurdity of the thing—after it has gone by. All young men take themselves seriously, but it is not given to everyone to impose upon a sophisticated audience after 80 years! You cannot laugh off this piece of colossal egotism. It somehow compels respect.

An idea will move the world. The "Symphonie Fantastique" is an idea. In spite of its cumbersome gravity and occasional empty stretches, it is more alive today than ever. It has outlasted many compositions pronounced immortal when it was derided by learned judges.

New York Authority to Talk on Municipal Progress

The committee in charge of the Sunday evening talks now being conducted at the Parker Memorial, corner of Appleton and Berkeley streets, South End, has secured to speak this evening William H. Allen, secretary of the bureau of municipal research of New York city. Mr. Allen will speak on "Practical Municipal Progress."

Mr. Allen will be introduced by John F. Moors of the Boston Finance Commission. Music, under the direction of Edmund Sawyer, will be rendered by Miss Ruth Martin, soprano; Henry Eichheim of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mrs. Helen Sawyer Jamieson, pianist.

The committee in charge of these talks, which are given each Sunday evening, is composed of the Rev. Paul Revere Frothingham, Robert A. Woods, the Rev. Edward Cummings and Harry Blake Taplin.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From .....
Address .....
Date .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The final Boston Symphony concert of the year will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, March 16, at 4:30. A feature of the program will be the performance by the composer of Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite" for pianoforte and orchestra. This work was played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston a year ago by Mr. Schelling with much success and it will be played not only in Washington, but in Philadelphia, Baltimore and New York during the March trip of the orchestra. It is in this suite that Mr. Schelling, with unusual boldness, makes use of the tunes of "Dixie" and "Old Folks at Home."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From .....
Address .....
Date .....

Musical Art Society's Concert.

Much interest has been aroused in the appearance at the concert of the Musical art society, the 31st, of Lambert Murphy, tenor, who is meeting with much success in and around Boston, appearing often with the Boston festival orchestra. Mr Murphy's reception in Nashua, N. H., where he sang in a concert with Emilio de Gogorza, was most cordial, his work in "King Olaf" being very fine. He has an engagement to sing very soon in Winchendon, where with other Boston soloists he will sing the solo parts in Rossini's "Stabat Mater." Mr Murphy has also done considerable work with Arnold Dolmetsch in Boston. At the Springfield concert he will sing "Lend Me Thine Aid," from "The Queen of Sheba," and a group of songs. The orchestra will play at this concert Mendelssohn's Italian symphony, upon which the members are hard at work. Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," and "Two Northern Melodies for Strings," by Grieg.

The choral part of the program is varied. Two part songs, "Welcome" and "The Brooklet," by Rheinberger, who is said to have influenced modern American music more than any other one European musician through Chadwick, his most celebrated American pupil, are delightful masterpieces of composition. "The Jumblies," the poem by Edward Lear, shows Arthur Foote in merry mood. A "Cherubim Song" by M Glinka, an epoch-maker in music, is a sonorous six-part chorus from the Russian church. In contrast to this is a beautiful "Ave, Maris Stella," by Grieg. "The Ballad of the Weaver," by the English composer, Hatton, is a part song for mixed voices. "The Alps," by Taneyif, is characterized by dignity and "My Love Dwelt in a Northern Land," by Sir Edward Elgar, is a charming number for eight parts. Closing the program is Gericke's "Chorus of Homage" for both chorus and orchestra.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From .....
Address .....
Date .....

To conquer the world at 18 means that the conqueror is a genius, and the word fitly describes Mischa Elman, the wonderful young Russian violinist, who will give a recital in Convention Hall on Monday evening, March 29th.

Elman played here in January as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and no one in the vast audience will ever forget the impression made by the slender young Jewish boy, who played with such masterly technique and such exquisite temperament the Beethoven concerto for violin and piano. In that one half hour Elman won his way in Buffalo and it was in response to overwhelming demand that he has been booked here for an entire recital.

Master of the violin is he, a musician of large understanding, quick feeling and eloquent expression, with an unusual and striking personality. Not since the days of Mozart has any boy created such a furore and the tremendous success which has attended this, his first American tour, can be equaled only by the phenomenal reception accorded Paderewski when he first visited the new world.

"The heartstrings of an overflowing audience throbbed in the Manhattan Opera House as Mischa Elman played on his violin," is the way in which one of the New York newspapers described Elman's first metropolitan recital. "All the unusual qualities found scattered among the other violin virtuosi are combined in the playing of this young master. And the applause bade fair to rival that of the great political conventions last summer in duration."

And the story has been repeated wherever Elman has played, until an Elman night has come to mean a packed house and boundless enthusiasm. There is something almost uncanny in the thought that the boy of eighteen should have so completely mastered the violin as to have within his grasp its innermost secrets. He has for four years been the wonder of Europe. In America he has proved the musical idol of the winter.

Elman's Buffalo recital is under the local management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, No. 26 Irving Place, to whom mail orders for seats may be sent, accompanied by check payable to her. These will be filled in the order received in advance of the public sale. Prices are from 75 cents to $2.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

PADEREWSKI HERE IN RECITAL MONDAY

Emma Eames and de Gogorza Will Appear the Following Day.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS ALSO COMING

Adele Verne, Who Scored Great Success Early in Season, to Return Friday.

Paderewski will give his only recital in Washington tomorrow afternoon at 4:30 o'clock in the New National Theater. This great musician, conceded by the majority of music-lovers to be the foremost pianist of the age, has never been so secure in his art as he is at the present time. His performance here recently with the Boston Symphony Orchestra proved the great artistic heights to which he has risen since he was here before, although even at that time it seemed as if he had reached the pinnacle of fame. His program for tomorrow afternoon will be as follows:

Sonata, op. 53 (Waldstein)....Beethoven.
Etudes Symphonoques.....Schumann
Nocturne, E major, op. 62.....Schumann
Mazurka, A flat, op. 59.....Schumann.
Barcarolle .....Chopin.
Etude, No. 5, op. 10.....Chopin.
Polonaise, op. 53.....Chopin.
Reflets dans l'eau.....Debussy
Rhapsody, No. 12.....Liszt.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From .....
Address .....
Date .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last Boston Symphony concert of the year will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, March 16, at 4:30 o'clock. A most interesting feature of the programme will be the performance by the composer of Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite," for pianoforte and orchestra. This work was played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston a year ago by Mr. Schelling with much success, and it will be played not only in Washington, but in Philadelphia, Baltimore, and New York during the March trip of the orchestra. It is in this suite that Mr. Schelling, with unusual boldness, makes use of the tunes of "Dixie" and "Old Folks at Home."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From .....
Address .....
Date .....

THOSE WITH US.

The final concert of the season will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the National Theater Tuesday afternoon, March 16.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From .....
Address .....
Date .....

There is going to be trouble in Boston—sure's you're born. The ladies who attend the Symphony concerts persist in refusing to remove their hats, in defiance of the requests, urgings, threats, pleadings, cajolery, and indignation of the management, headed by Dr. Fiedler. At present an appeal to the police is only held in abeyance in hope that the ladies will not be obdurate. What fatuity! Women are moving forward, not backward, at present. In the midst of their triumphal progress are they to take off their hats at a concert because the men wish to see the musicians? Don't the ladies need to see each other's hats? Men are becoming altogether too insolent in their demands upon women, and we expect to see the shocking spectacle of brute force invoked in this latest outrage upon the upholstered sex.—New York Evening Sun.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Especially significant to the Waterbury music loving public is the engagement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to play in this city on Tuesday evening, March 23. Very few cities in the East are able to secure this great organization in spite of the many pleas and demands which are made for its presence. The acoustic qualities of the Buckingham and the excellent accommodations to be found here coupled with the enthusiastic reception always given the orchestra on its appearance in any Connecticut city have made it possible for the Waterbury Music League to bring the "hobby of the Hub" to this city for an annual appearance. The orchestra is at present enjoying one of the most successful seasons of its career under the leadership of Max Fiedler upon whom the critics and musicians are continually showering encomiums. Mr Fiedler is a scholarly conductor and a man of great intellectual force. His popularity in this country is assured by his excellent work this season. The recent production for the first time of the new Paderewski "Polish Symphony," by the orchestra was a triumph of the most pronounced character and was the event of the musical season in this country. In choosing the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this event the composer showed the genuine admiration which he has for the orchestra, second to none other in the world.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

The last Boston Symphony concert of the year will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 15. An interesting feature of the program will be the performance by Irnest Schelling of his "Fantastic Suite" for pianoforte and orchestra. This work was played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston a year ago by Schelling with much success and it will be played not only in Philadelphia, but in Washington, Baltimore and New York during the March trip of the orchestra. In this suite Schelling makes use of the tunes "Dixie" and "Old Folks at Home."

e First Established and most Complete
wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Boston Symphony March 17.

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Lyric Theater Wednesday evening, March 17. The principal orchestral number will be Richard Strauss' monumental tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben," which will be played for the first time in Baltimore. Another novelty will be Ernest Schelling's remarkably successful "Fantastic Suite" for pianoforte and orchestra, with Mr. Schelling as soloist. The other three numbers on the program will be Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Richard Wagner's "Waldweben," and the overture to the "Flying Dutchman."

spaper Cutting Bureau in the World

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, March 17, at 8:15 o'clock. The principal orchestral number will be Richard Strauss' monumental tone poem "Ein Heldenleben," which will be played for the first time in Baltimore. Another novelty will be Ernest Schelling's remarkably successful "Fantastic Suite" for pianoforte and orchestra, with Mr. Schelling as soloist. The other three numbers on the program will be Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Richard Wagner's "Waldweben," and the overture to the "Flying Dutchman."

Evening Post
Worcester, Mass
March 10-09

The Boston symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler conductor, gave the fourth concert in the Ellis course last night in Mechanics hall. A brilliant performance was given.

Miss Alice Robbins Cole, a contralto of Boston, who was the soloist, was in excellent voice. The applause which followed each of her numbers was unusually hearty and long continued, and she was recalled several times, her charming manner and interpretation winning the audience in her first selection.

Miss Cole wore a gown of white satin, entrain, with irridescent fringe trimming the decollete bodice and skirt.

The program was composed of six numbers, four orchestral, one an aria, with orchestra, and one a group of songs with piano.

The first orchestra number which opened the program was the "Edgmont," overture, "Pathetic," Tschaikowsky's symphony, popular throughout the world, was a favorite last night and the various characters in the story were depicted sympathetically by the musicians.

The numbers composed the first part of the program and Miss Cole was heard in the opening number of the second part, "Awake Saturnia," from Semele by Handel.

The three dance pieces, from the ballet of Gretry, a composer of the 18th century, entitled, "Cephalus and Procris," were a pleasing contrast to the orchestral music.

The group of songs, Huga Wolf's "Verbongenheit," Brahm's "Staendchen" and "Botschaft," were sung by Miss Cole, accompanied with piano by Mr. Fiedler. The prelude to the "Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Wagner, another favorite, closed the program, which was enjoyed by an audience of music lovers that filled the hall and galleries.

Mr. and Mrs. John A. Thayer, Mrs. Francis H. Dewey, Mrs. Chetwood Smith, Mrs. Charles D. Wheeler, Mr. and Mrs. Irving Swan Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Earle E. Howard, Mrs. Homer D Romig of Rome, N. Y., Miss Harriet E. Clarke, Mr. and Mrs. Frank C. Smith, Dr. and Mrs. Walter C. Seelye, Mrs. Arthur J. Bassett, the Misses Crompton, Miss Mary Trumbull Coggswell, Miss Alice Burlingame, Miss Edith Upham, Mr. and Mrs. J. Vernon Butler, Miss Marion Shattuck, Mrs. Charles T. Tatman, Dr. and Mrs. A. C. Getchell, Mr. and Mrs. Luther M. Lovell, Mrs. Caroline Keil-Staff, Miss Carolyn Everett, Mrs. W. T. Brown and Miss Kate Brown, Miss Persis Mackintire, Miss Helen Green, Mrs James Thompson, Miss Gertrude Stone, Chester E. Porter, Miss Charlotte Campbell, Mr. and Mrs. Burt Le Roy Knowles, Miss Emma Prentice, Mrs. Clara Trulson Swenson, Mrs. R. W. Swan, Miss Margaret Lovell, Mrs. John M. Brand, Miss Rosaline M. Brand, Miss Edith Spaulding, Mrs. Harry C. Rose, Miss Jeanie Lea Southwick, Miss Maud Dodge, Mrs George K. Savage, Miss Gladys Ward, Miss Alma Morrissette, Miss M. Rose Rochette, Mrs. Henry Thayer, Miss Florence L. Cobb and Mrs. W. H. Towne were among those that attended.

The First Established and most Comp
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the W

From .....

Address .....

March 11

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

PROGRAM FOR COMING CONCERT—SALE OF SEATS SATURDAY.

The sale of seats for the concert to be given at The Buckingham on Tuesday evening, March 23, by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the auspices of the Waterbury Music league, will commence at The Buckingham pharmacy next Saturday morning, March 13, at 8 o'clock, continuing until the day of the concert. This early sale has been planned in order to give everyone a chance to obtain seats.

Never before in the history of music in Waterbury has so rich and varied a program been presented as that which Conductor Fiedler has arranged for the Waterbury concert. There will be almost twice as many numbers as the orchestra is accustomed to playing on one appearance including the Tschaikowsky "Pathetic" symphony. Following is the program:

Weber Overture to the Opera "Oberon."

Tschaikowsky .....

Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic" in B minor Op 57.

I Adagio; Allegro non troppo.
II Allegro con grazia
III Allegro molto vivace
IV Finale; Adagio Lamentoso

Gradener Concerto for Violincello (new)

DeBussy .....

Prelude to "The Afternoon of the Faun"

Sibelius .....

"Finland" Symphonic Poem for Orchestra.

(Op. 26, No. 7) First time in Waterbury.

Wagner Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

Solo—Heinrich Warnke, first violincello.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

THE BUCKINGHAM.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, March 23.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, led by its new conductor, Max Fielder, will be heard for the only time this season at The Buckingham, Waterbury, on Tuesday evening, March 23, under the auspices of the Waterbury Music league. This concert will be the greatest musical event of the season in this part of the state and a program of widely varying compositions, rich in novelties, has been prepared for the event by Conductor Fiedler. No musical organization in the world today has the standing or excellence of the Boston Symphony orchestra. For years it has been the acknowledged leader of American orchestras, and in the past few years its position has increased to that of the foremost orchestral organization in the world. Its achievements during the present season have been remarkably worthy and the new leader, Mr. Fiedler, has been acknowledged one of the greatest leaders who has ever visited America. The recent production of the Paderewski "Polish" symphony was a triumph for Mr. Fiedler and his men quite as much as for its eminent composer.

In Waterbury the orchestra will be heard in the great Tschaikowsky "Pathetic" symphony, which Mr. Fiedler is most capable of leading since he stands to-day as the director who has reached nearest to the heart and soul of the compositions of the great Russian. Mr. Fiedler has often conducted the symphony with the greatest success in various parts of Russia.

Perhaps the next interest in the program is in the prelude to DeBussy's "Afternoon of the Faun," which is one of the most impressive of the compositions of the nature composer who has recently risen in the world music as the apostle of all that is true and natural in composition. The program also includes "Finland," the wonderful tonal poem for orchestra by Sibelius, the overture to Weber's opera, "Oberon," the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," and a new concerto for the violincello by Gradener, in which the soloist will be Heinrich Warnke, premier 'cellist of the orchestra.

The sale of seats for the concert will commence at The Buckingham pharmacy, Waterbury, on Saturday, March 13, continuing until the day of the concert. Mail orders will be received and filled in order. The concert will commence precisely at 8:15 o'clock.

From EVENING TELEGRAM,

Address New York City.

Date .....

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 18, and Saturday afternoon, March 20. The feature of the Thursday evening concert will be the first performance in New York of Bruckner's Eeighth Symphony in C minor. This will be played for the first time in America in Boston on March 12 and 13. Its recent performances in Germany created nothing short of a sensation. On Saturday afternoon one of the features of the programme will be Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite," for piano and orchestra, which has already been played in New York with the composer as soloist.

The First Established and most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ess .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The seat sale for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert at the Buckingham on Tuesday evening, March 23, will open promptly at 8 o'clock tomorrow morning at the Buckingham pharmacy. Notices of this sale, which is begun 10 days in advance of the concert, have been forwarded to all parts of the city. The sale will continue until the day of the concert. Tickets are to be sold for $1.50 and $2. Checks should be made payable to the Waterbury Music League.

rom .....

ddress .....

ate .....

Last Boston Symphony Concert.

The third and last concert this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Parsons's Theater Monday evening March 22. Conductor Fiedler has arranged one of his very best programs and Heinrich Warake, solo 'cellist of the orchestra, will play a concerto.

[202]

ed: Lor

BOSTON'S FAMOUS ORGANIZATION

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AND ITS BEAUTIFUL ART.

How It Is Made Up, Developed and Held Together on Its High Plane of Excellence—Waterbury's Opportunity to Hear Dr. Fiedler and His Splendid Musicians.

To musicians throughout the world the Boston Symphony Orchestra which is to play at the Buckingham on the evening of Tuesday, March 23, under the auspices of the Waterbury Music League, is regarded as a unique musical institution. There is nowhere in the world where an organization of musicians has the absolute control of the musical situation of a city whose population runs into the hundred thousands. Nowhere else is there an orchestra so widely known and so generally regarded as the acme of musical perfection and nowhere is there an organization more perfect in the ensemble.

The success of the great Boston Orchestra is due to a number of excellent reasons. In the first place many years of experience have made the management a science. Secondly, the musicians are engaged for the entire season and do not play with any other organization during the year. Again the rehearsals are always complete and lastly, the men engaged to lead the orchestra are chosen from the foremost orchestral experts of the day.

Dr. Carl Muck, who conduct the orchestra when it last played in this city, made a profound impression by his masterly work which was full of the vigor of animation and the dignity and reverence of the scholar. Dr Muck left the orchestra at the end of the last season and his place is now filled by Dr Max Fiedler, a musician of widely catholic tastes whose excellent worth during the present season has created a most profound impression and has won him the respect and admiration of musicians throughout the country.

The orchestra's season extends through a period of at least 30 weeks which provides for 24 public rehearsals and concerts in Boston, five trips of a week each to New York City, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Brooklyn and one trip of a week to the cities of the Middle West.

Many of the men who make up the orchestra are under contract for a longer period than the regular symphony season to provide for the eight or ten weeks of "pop" concerts held in Symphony Hall, Boston, each spring after the close of the regular season. Then the regular summer orchestras at Newport and Bar Harbor in addition to those in numerous other eastern resorts are made up entirely of Boston Symphony men so that the orchestra really provides for its men the year around and is thus able to keep itself at such a high degree of efficiency.

Waterbury is to have an opportunity of hearing the orchestra at its best since the great compositions which compose the program will require the entire strength of the organization. The most important number will be the great Tschaikowsky "Symphony Pathetique." Waterbury has heard this once before when Walter Damrosch conducted its rendition at the music festival of 1906. The performance was hardly adequate, as Mr Damrosch had only half of his orchestra here. Dr Fiedler stands today as one of the foremost interpreters of the works of the great Russian with which he is always in full sympathy. He has received the plaudits of the audiences in St Petersburg when he has led his men through this great symphony, the greatest composition of Tschaikowsky.

Then again, DeBussy is a composer whom the Waterbury audiences have heard very little of and in "The Afternoon of the Faun," which the orchestra will render the audience may expect a true painting of the poetic nature pictures of this tonal artist, who stands for the new and truthful in the world of music today. "Finland," the wonderful symphonic poem of Sibelius which created so profound a sensation on its first rendition, has never been heard here and there are many who are looking forward to hearing this exquisite work. Wagner will be present in the great overture to "Die Meistersinger," a fitting closing number to so great a program. The first selection will be the great overture to Weber's "Oberon." The soloist of the evening will be Heinrich Warnke, premier 'cellist of the orchestra, and an artist of sterling merit. Mr Warnke will play a new concerto for the violoncello by Gradener.

As can be seen the program for the Waterbury concert is a long one and embraces a widely varying number of schools in composition. As a test of the versatility of the director and the ensemble of the orchestra it will prove exceptional. The acoustic qualities of the Buckingham and the enthusiasm with which the advent of the concert has been greeted is the reason by which Waterbury has been allowed to hear the orchestra in a program comprising enough compositions for two in any other city.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ess ..... BALTIMORE,

MAR 13

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Fiedler this season will take place in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, March 17, at 8:15. Mr. Fiedler has arranged a program of extraordinary interest for this final concert. The composers represented are Richard Strauss, Ernest Schelling, Claude Debussy and Richard Wagner and the program contains five numbers.

The first work will be Richard Strauss' monumental tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben," which will be heard in Baltimore for the first time. Mr. Fiedler has had many brilliant successes during the past season, but in nothing has he won such enthusiastic praise as he has in these great tone poems of this astonishing modern German composer. "Ein Heldenleben" he played first last fall at a regular concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston and later repeated it in Philadelphia and New York and in Cambridge, Mass.

Another work new to Baltimore is Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite" for pianoforte and orchestra. Ernest Schelling is well known as one of the best pianists America has produced and one of the few pianists who can really say that Paderewski was their teacher, for some years ago Mr. Paderewski took a great interest in Schelling and had him as his pupil for a considerable length of time. Mr. Schelling also shows extraordinary promise as a composer, judging at least from this suite. The suite was composed in 1905-6 and played for the first time in Amsterdam in 1907. The first performances in America were at the Boston Symphony concerts in Boston on January 24 and 25, 1908.

The third number will be Debussy's ever delightful sketch "The Afternoon of a Faun," in which the wonderful woodwinds of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are displayed to their best advantage. The last two numbers will be by Wagner—the "Waldweben" from the second act of "Siegfried" and the overture to the "Flying Dutchman."

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ess .....

s .....

NOVELTIES AT LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT

Boston Orchestra To Present Works By Strauss And Schelling Wednesday.

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening next, March 17, at 8.15. The principal orchestral number will be Richard Strauss' monumental tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben," which will be played for the first time in Baltimore. Another novelty will be Ernest Schelling's remarkably successful "Fantastic Suite" for pianoforte and orchestra, with Mr. Schelling as soloist.

The other three numbers on the program will be Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Richard Wagner's "Waldweben" and the overture to the "Flying Dutchman."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ess .....

MAR 13

MUSIC NOTES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concert this season at the Academy of Music, next Monday evening. The program is to consist of only three numbers, one of which will be a novelty, the playing by Ernest Schelling of his own "Fantastic Suite," for piano and orchestra. Mr. Schelling, who is an American, being born at Belvidere, N. J., is one of the few pupils of Paderewski. The composition which he will play on Monday evening was composed in 1905-6, had its first performance in Amsterdam, in October, 1907, and was played in Boston, for the first time in America, last year. It introduces such familiar American tunes as "Dixie," "The Suwanee River," and "Yankee Doodle." The other numbers on Monday evening's program will be Berlioz's "Fantastic Suite," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

ess .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The seat sale for the Boston Symphony orchestra's concert at The Buckingham on Tuesday evening, March 23 will open promptly at 8 o'clock tomorrow morning at the Buckingham pharmacy. Notices of this sale, which is begun ten days in advance of the concert have been forwarded to all parts of the city. The sale will continue until the day of the concert. Tickets are to be sold for $1.50 and $2. Checks should be made payable to the Waterbury Music league.

om EVENING SUN,

ldress ..... New York City.

ite .....

Bruckner's "Eighth Symphony," an unknown work by a man who also composed symphonies nine, comes to Carnegie Hall on Thursday night with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, fresh from its first American performances in Boston. Like Paderewski's, it takes an hour to perform. Another novelty is by one Scheinpflug of Bremen, entitled an overture to "A Comedy of Shakespeare," perhaps "The Merry Wives of Windsor." There are also Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude and Debussy's "Afternoon."

Brooklyn on Friday has also no soloist, but a Fiedler farewell programme including Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherezade," Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," Wagner's forest music from "Siegfried" and overture to "Flying Dutchman."

For New York's last Boston matinée-goers are great Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," our Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite," with the composer at the piano, and Weber's overture to "Freischutz."

EVENING POST,

ess ..... New York City.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon next. Two novelties will be found on the Thursday evening programme: Bruckner's Symphony in C minor, No. 8, which had its first performances in America in Boston on Friday and Saturday last and Scheinpflug's overture to "A Comedy by Shakespeare." Mr. Fiedler is as ardent a believer in the genius of Anton Bruckner as are Dr. Muck, Arthur Nikisch, and Felix Weingarten, and he is as thoroughly a believer as they that the time is not far distant when the real magnitude of this strange genius will be recognized by the public at large. The eighth symphony, curiously enough, had never been played in America until Mr. Fiedler performed it in Boston the other day, and he is of the opinion that it is the greatest of the nine. He regards the Adagio as being the most beautiful slow movement in the whole literature of music.

Scheinpflug, who will be represented by an overture to "A Comedy by Shakespeare," is one of the younger German composers, who lives in Bremen. While no direct clue is given to the comedy he has chosen, certain internal evidence has given rise to the theory that he had in mind the "Merry Wives of Windsor." The overture was played with great success in Boston a few weeks ago. The other numbers on the programme will be Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." For Saturday afternoon Mr. Fiedler has chosen Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite," and the overture to "Der Freischütz." Mr. Schelling will be the soloist.

m .....

lress .....

e ..... Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N.

MAR 13 1909

The closing Philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, will be given on Friday evening next in the Opera House of the Academy of Music. No soloist is to appear on this occasion. The programme, a delightful one, contains more than the usual number of compositions, no less than five being scheduled. It includes:

Symphonic Suite, Scheherazade (after the Thousand Nights and a Night), Op 35 ..... Rimsky-Korsakoff
The Sea and Sinbad's Ship.
The story of the Kalendar-Prince.
The Young Prince and the Young Princess.
Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship. The Ship Goes to Pieces against a Rock Surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion.
Tone Poem (Death and Transfiguration), Op. 24 ..... Strauss
Prelude to The Afternoon of a Faun (after the eclogue of Stephane Mallarme).....Debussy
Waldweben (Life and Stir of the Forest), from Siegfried, Act II..... Wagner
Overture to The Flying Dutchman....Wagner

Daily Citizen,

dress ..... Brooklyn, N. Y.

te .....

MAR 13 1909

The last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given at the Academy of Music on next Friday evening, at 8:15 o'clock, and Conductor Fiedler has made a special effort to provide a programme which would appeal strongly to the patrons of these concerts in Brooklyn. The first number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," which the orchestra under Mr. Fiedler has played several times this winter with great success. This suite is one of the most brilliant works in orchestral literature. Rimsky-Korsakoff, if not a genius of the highest order, had none the less a genius for orchestration and a gift for charming melody, the combination of which two qualities has placed him a close second to Tschaikowsky among Russian composers. The second part of the programme will begin with Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," now generally regarded as the finest production of the leading composer of the day. In juxtaposition to this will be one of the most charming works of Strauss' greatest rival, Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun," and these two works will show vividly the different directions in which the French and Germans are working in music. The last two numbers will be Wagner's "Waldweben," from the second act of "Siegfried," and the overture to the "Flying Dutchman."

s .....

Stage Director—M. Colnl.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The final Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music Monday evening at 8.15 o'clock. This will bring to an end the first season of Max Fiedler as conductor of the orchestra, and the general opinion in Philadelphia seems to be that he has filled his difficult post with great success. But three numbers are on the programme, one of which is a novelty. The first number will be Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony." The second part of the programme will open with Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite" for piano and orchestra. Mr. Schelling might almost be called a Philadelphian, having been born in Belvidere, N. J. The Fantastic Suite, which will be heard here for the first time, was composed in 1905-06 and had its first performance in Amsterdam in October, 1907. It was played in Boston for the first time in America on January 24 and 25 of last year. The work is in four movements, brilliant in character and particularly grateful to the piano. The last number on the programme will be the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

ess .....

Boston Symphony Concert.

The third and last concert this season by the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Parsons Theater Monday evening, March 22. In response to a general request for some work of Richard Strauss, Mr. Fiedler has consented to give "Death and Transfiguration," a symphonic tone poem, considered by many the most inspired composition of the greatest living composer. This will be the first performance of any orchestral score by Richard Strauss in this city and doubtless will incite great curiosity to become familiar with the music of the composer of "Salome." These concerts have become so popular that a very large and fashionable audience is assured. The sale of seats opens this morning at John M. Gallup & Co.'s music store. Telephone or mail orders will receive prompt attention.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

ess ..... New York City.

Hall.

A People's Symphony Concert will take place Friday evening, March 19, in Carnegie Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, at its concert Saturday afternoon, March 20, in Carnegie Hall will present Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite" for piano and orchestra, and Weber's "Freischütz" overture. Mr. Schelling will be the soloist.

From ..... Standard Union,

Address ..... Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date ..... MAR 13 1909

Next Friday evening is the date of the last Boston Symphony concert of the season at the Academy of Music, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute. The orchestra will be conducted by Max Fiedler, and a fine programme will be rendered. Thomas W. Surette will give the lecture recital Thursday afternoon, preliminary to the concert.

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

MUSICAL MATTERS.

A Great Orchestra, Its Conductor and Its Policy in Program-Making — A Common Sense Point for the Musician.

On the occasion of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's next visit to New York, March 18, the orchestra will make its 2700th public appearance. The number is of importance in itself as a continued series, but when the artistic standing of the concerts is considered as well, then the fact of 2700 performances of superlatively fine music by same organization in the comparatively short time of existence of the Boston Orchestra is a wonderful achievement. The old Philharmonic Orchestra of New York, which has given eight pairs of concerts each season for almost 70 years, does not reach half the number of the Boston society.

Mr. Fiedler will give at the above concert in New York Bruckner's eighth symphony for the first time in New York, and played yesterday afternoon and tonight in Boston for the first time in America. The compositions of this master have been the subject of more discussion than almost any of the later 19th century symphonists, but they continue to be given and always under the best auspices in the orchestral world, the latter being composed of minds that make acquaintance with all new musical productions simply as a matter of duty.

It would stamp a musician with a very undesirable reputation if in a position as conductor of a prominent orchestra, he, from lack of sympathy, failed to produce the works of e: g. Richard Strauss. Personal like or dislike has to be put aside in such questions, and the conductor must bring to his interpretation all the understanding from a broad musical standpoint of which he is capable. A slovenly performance and a bored audience would reflect directly upon him, all the more if another conductor afterwards aroused great enthusiasm in the same work.

Musicians, of all workers in the world of art, can least afford to be behindhand in knowledge of their contemporaries, because modern composition being of such comparatively recent date, the development of the technique of expression is a matter of yearly progress—is, in fact, going on before one's very eyes could the scenes of activity be perceived. The musician of penetration and genius, as Schumann in the case of Brahms and Chopin, is alive to these signs and influences long before they reach maturity, and though thought will neither add a cubit to his stature nor a touch of genius to his brain, the purposeful worker in music can vastly increase his pleasure and interest in his vocation by treating every new acquaintance with consideration.

Some of Schumann's swans turned out to be geese, and so it will be with persons of less insight, but he would be a faint-hearted and altogether unworthy disciple in this noble school who was so fearful of misadventure that he stayed at home and closed the shutters.

Far rather make a dozen mistakes in attempts than, for lack of trying, pass one genius by. The would-be detractors and scorners of a Wagner, a Berlioz or a Wolf are only remembered to be ridiculed and despised for their ignorance and narrowness, their failure to perceive true genius because it was in different guise from what they already knew.

It seems to us, reading of the mistakes in judgment of the past, such waste of time to have squabbled over the validity of what we know to be indisputable facts. But a modern spoiler of time is a hero who is still with us; he who "knows what he likes." This assertion does not carry with it the proof of superior intelligence that, judging from the emphatic manner in which it is often made, it is intended to; certainly no creature ever seen showed greater conviction as to likes and dislikes than the house cat, either in regard to its place of residence or other individual tastes.

The fact is, as Mr. Apthorp long ago remarked, music is the most talked of and least understood of all the arts. It is much more to the purpose to listen to the band play and keep self-revelations for an autobiography than to risk spoiling your own profit and others' pleasure by remarks that you would like to forget a few months hence. The music which is now classic was once quite new, so ultra modern and unsympathetic compositions will one day be old, familiar and understood. It is vastly more to the honor of a generation that it appreciated its genius than never so gorgeous memorials erected after death. It is all a question of patient listening to the new speech of the stranger and late comer. Such power of listening preserved it is that keeps heart and mind young, far beyond the wear of years and causes the limits of development to retreat of themselves as they are approached.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From PUBLIC

Address

Date

The last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow, Monday, evening at 8:15. This will bring to an end the first season of Max Fiedler as conductor of the orchestra, and the general opinion in Philadelphia seems to be that he has filled his difficult post with great success. But three numbers are on the programme, one of which is a novelty. The first number will be Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," which Mr. Fiedler played in Boston week before last with enormous success, critics there putting his interpretation of this work on the plane with his readings of Richard Strauss. He seemed to be particularly sympathetic to the feeling in the work, and gave a most thrilling performance, especially of the last two movements. This will make the first part of the programme.

The second part of the programme will open with Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite" for piano and orchestra. Mr. Schelling might also be called a Philadelphian, having been born in Belvidere, N. J. As a small boy he studied at the Paris Conservatory, and later worked with Hans Huber, in Basle. He is one of the few who may justly claim to be a pupil of Paderewski. The "Fantastic Suite," which will be heard here for the first time, was composed in 1905-06, and had its first performance in Amsterdam in October, 1907. It was played in Boston for the first time in America on January 24 and 25 of last year. The work is in four movements, brilliant in character and particularly grateful to the piano. At the same time the orchestral part is notable for its fine scoring and skilful treatment. The fourth movement will appeal to the public, in that the composer has been bold enough to make use of popular American tunes with great success. It is entitled "A Virginia Reel," and the first theme is built on "Dixie." The third theme is built on "The Swanee River," and in the Coda, which is a lively reel, "Yankee Doodle" is heard in the wood-wind instruments. Mr. Schelling will be the soloist.

The last number on the programme will be the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

...ew York

...rst Established and most Complete

...aper Cutting Bureau in the World

BOSTON TO KEEP FIEDLER.

Symphony Conductor Re-engaged for Another Year.

Boston, March 13.—Mr. Fiedler, who has been the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra during the current musical year, was to-day engaged for another season. He has obtained an additional leave of absence from his former post in Hamburg, and he will now continue at the head of the Symphony Orchestra until May of 1910.

To-morrow Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra start on their last journey of the season to New York and to the other cities that they regularly visit. Then they return for the six final concerts of the season here, ending on Saturday, May 1.

Mr Fiedler will then go to Germany for the summer and take up his work in Boston again at the beginning of October.

...ess ...

...

...overture.

The last Boston symphony concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening at 8.15. This will bring to an end the first season of Max Fiedler as conductor of the orchestra and the general opinion in Philadelphia seems to be that he has filled his difficult post with great success.

Only three numbers are on the program, one of which is a novelty. The first number will be Berliotz's "Fantastic Symphony."

The second part of the program will open with Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite" for piano and orchestra. Mr. Schelling might almost be called a Philadelphian, having been born in Belvidere, N. J. As a small boy he studied at the Paris Conservatory and later worked with Hans Huber in Basle. He is one of the few who may justly claim to be a pupil of Paderewski. The Fantastic Suite, which will be heard here for the first time, was composed in 1905-06 and had its first performance in Amsterdam in October, 1907.

The last number on the program will be the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

...ess ... New York City.

...

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will present two novelties at its concert Thursday evening, March 18, in Carnegie Hall, Bruckner's eighth symphony and Scheinpflug's overture to "A Comedy by Shakespeare." The other numbers on the programme are Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," and Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude.

Coming Events in the World of Music—Notes and Comments.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening at 8.15 and Saturday afternoon at 2.30, respectively. Two novelties will be found on the Thursday evening programme—Bruckner's Symphony in C minor No. 8, which had its first performance in America in Boston on Friday and Saturday, and Scheinpflug's overture to "A Comedy by Shakespeare."

Mr. Fiedler is as ardent a believer in the genius of Anton Bruckner as are Dr. Muck, Arthur Nikisch and Felix Weingarten, and he is as thoroughly a believer as they that the time is not far distant when the real magnitude of this strange genius will be recognized by the public at large. The eighth symphony curiously enough had never been played in America until Mr. Fiedler performed it in Boston the other day. He is of the opinion that it is the greatest of the nine. He regards the adagio as being the most beautiful slow movement in the whole literature of music. The symphony is long, requiring about an hour for performance.

Scheinpflug, who will be represented by an overture to "A Comedy by Shakespeare," is one of the younger German composers who lives in Bremen. While no direct clue is given to the comedy he has chosen, certain internal evidence has given rise to the theory that he had in mind the "Merry Wives of Windsor." The overture was played with great success in Boston a few weeks ago.

The other numbers on the programme will be Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

For Saturday afternoon Mr. Fiedler has chosen as his leading work Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," the performance of which under his conducting aroused a real sensation in Boston a week ago. The second part of the programme will contain Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite," for pianoforte and orchestra, which has already been heard here, and the overture to "Der Freischutz." Mr. Schelling will be soloist.

The First Established and most Complet
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the Worl

...ess ...

...

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Fiedler this season will take place in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, March 17, at 8:15. Mr. Fiedler has arranged a program of extraordinary interest for this final concert. The composers represented are Richard Strauss, Ernest Schelling, Claude Debussy and Richard Wagner and the program contains five numbers.

The first work will be Richard Strauss' monumental tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben," which will be heard in Baltimore for the first time. Mr. Fiedler has had many brilliant successes during the past season, but in nothing has he won such enthusiastic praise as he has in these great tone poems of this astonishing modern German composer. "Ein Heldenleben" he played first last fall at a regular concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston and later repeated it in Philadelphia and New York and in Cambridge, Mass.

Another work new to Baltimore is Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite" for pianoforte and orchestra. Ernest Schelling is well known as one of the best pianists America has produced and one of the few pianists who can really say that Paderewski was their teacher, for some years ago Mr. Paderewski took a great interest in Schelling and had him as his pupil for a considerable length of time. Mr. Schelling also shows extraordinary promise as a composer, judging at least from this suite. The suite was composed in 1905-6 and played for the first time in Amsterdam in 1907. The first performances in America were at the Boston Symphony concerts in Boston on January 24 and 25, 1908.

The third number will be Debussy's ever delightful sketch "The Afternoon of a Faun," in which the wonderful wood-winds of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are displayed to their best advantage. The last two numbers will be by Wagner—the "Waldweben" from the second act of "Siegfried" and the overture to the "Flying Dutchman."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

...s ...

...

The First Established and most Comple
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the Wo

From ...

Address ...

Date ...

The last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. This will bring to an end the first season of Max Fiedler as conductor of the orchestra and the general opinion in Philadelphia seems to be that he has filled his difficult post with great success. But three numbers are on the program, one of which is a novelty. The first number will be Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," which Mr. Fiedler played in Boston week before last with enormous success, critics there putting his interpretation of this work on the plane with his readings of Richard Strauss. He seemed to be particularly sympathetic to the feeling in the work and gave a most thrilling performance, especially of the last two movements. This will make the first part of the program.

The second part of the program will open with Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite" for piano and orchestra. Mr. Schelling might almost be called a Philadelphian, having been born in Belvidere, N. J. As a small boy he studied at the Paris Conservatory and later worked with Hans Huber in Basle. He is one of the few who may justly claim to be a pupil of Paderewski. The "Fantastic Suite," which will be heard here for the first time, was composed in 1905-06 and had its first performance in Amsterdam in October, 1907. It was played in Boston for the first times in America on January 24 and 25 of last year. The work is in four movements, brilliant in character and particularly grateful to the piano. At the same time the orchestral part is notable for its fine scoring and skillful treatment. The fourth movement will appeal to the public in that the composer has been bold enough to make use of popular American tunes with great success. It is entitled "A Virginia Reel," and the first theme is built on "Dixie." The third theme is built on "The Swanee River" and in the coda, which is a lively reel, "Yankee Doodle" is heard in the wood-wind instruments. Schelling will be the soloist.

The last number on the program will be the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

NEW YORK HERALD,

...om ...

...dress ... New York City.

...te ... MAR 14 1909

THERE will be no soloist at the closing Philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday evening at the Academy of Music. Mr. Fiedler, the conductor, has arranged a decided novelty, which will be heard with interest.

The numbers will be:—

Rimsky-Korsakoff.....Symphonic Suite
"Scheherazade" (after "The Thousand Nights and a Night"), Op. 35.
The Sea and Sindbad's Ship.
The Story of the Kalendar Prince.
The Young Prince and the Young Princess.
Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The ship goes to pieces against a rock surmounted by bronze warrior. Conclusion.
Strauss.....Tone Poem
"Death and Transfiguration," Op. 24.
Debussy...Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"
(After the eclogue of Stéphane Mallarmé.)
Wagner.....
("Life and Stir of the Forest"), from "Waldweben"
"Siegfried," Act II.
Wagner.....Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"

...Boston Symphony Orchestra

The last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow (Monday) evening at 8.15. But three numbers are on the program, one of which is a novelty. The first number will be Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," which Mr. Fiddler played in Boston week before last with enormous success. This will make the first part of the program.

The second part of the program will open with Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite" for piano and orchestra. Mr. Schelling might almost be called a Philadelphian, having been born in Belvidere, N. J. As a small boy he studied at the Paris Conservatory and later worked with Hans Huber in Basle. He is one of the few who may justly claim to be a pupil of Paderewski. The "Fantastic Suite," which will be heard here for the first time, was composed in 1905-06, and had its first performance in Amsterdam in October, 1907. Mr. Schelling will be the soloist.

The last number on the program will be the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

...Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last Baltimore concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Lyric on Wednesday evening. The principal orchestral number will be Richard Strauss' monumental tone poem "Ein Heldenleben," which will be played for the first time in Baltimore. Another novelty will be Ernest Schelling's remarkably successful fantastic suite for pianoforte and orchestra, with Mr. Schelling as soloist.

The other three numbers on the program will be Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Richard Wagner's "Waldweben" and the overture to the "Flying Dutchman."

TIMES.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM FOR LAST CONCERT

Boston Orchestra Will Give Novelties at Tuesday's Performance.

The last concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given next Tuesday afternoon, at 4:30 o'clock, in the National Theater. Ernest Schelling, the well-known pianist and composer, will be the assisting soloist.

Max Fiedler, director of the orchestra, has prepared an unusually interesting program and one in which more novelties will be found than in any other the Boston Symphony has played this season. The appearance of Ernest Schelling as soloist is of more than ordinary interest in view of the fact that he will play a suite of his own composition.

In Four Movements.

The suite is in four movements, the last of which is most unusual as a part of such a composition. It is called "A Virginia Reel," and its main themes are built on "Dixie," "Way Down Upon The Sewanee River," and even "Yankee Doodle." Mr. Schelling's courage in using these popular airs has been great, but the success he has attained is said to have justified the innovation.

The first number of the second part of the program will be Tschaikowsky's delicious "Nut-Cracker Suite." This ballet music was written to illustrate a fairy play which tells the old story of the toys on the Christmas tree which came to life on Christmas Eve and held a ball of their own.

Following this will come two Wagner numbers—the prelude and "Love's Death," from "Tristan and Isolde," and the overture to the "Flying Dutchman."

Miss Grant's Readings.

Miss Amy Grant, of New York, will give a series of readings from Oscar Wilde's play "Salome" Tuesday afternoon, March 23, in the Columbia Theater. Bruno Huhn will furnish the piano program. The English version will be used and the music readings will be furnished for the purpose of familiarizing those in attendance with the score of the opera.

...s ...

...

The last Boston Symphony Concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. This will bring to an end the first season of Max Fiedler as conductor of the orchestra. The program offers but three numbers, one of which is a novelty. The first number will be Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," which Fiedler played in Boston week before last with enormous success. Many persons putting his interpretation of this work on the plane with his readings of Richard Strauss.

The second part of the program will open with Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite" for piano and orchestra. Schelling might almost be called a Philadelphian, having been born in Belvidere, N. J. As a small boy he studied at the Paris Conservatory and later worked with Hans Huber in Basle. He is one of the few who may justly claim to be a pupil of Paderewski. The "Fantastic Suite," which will be heard here for the first time, was composed in 1905-06 and had its first performance in Amsterdam in October, 1907. It was played in Boston for the first time in America on January 24 and 25 of last year. The work is in four movements, brilliant in character and is particularly grateful to the piano. At the same time the orchestral part is notable for its fine scoring and skillful treatment. The fourth movement will appeal to the public in that the composer has been bold enough to make use of popular American tunes with great success. It is entitled "A Virginia Reel," and the first theme is built on "Dixie." The third theme is built on "The Swanee River" and in the coda, which is a lively reel, "Yankee Doodle" is heard in the wood-wind instruments. Schelling will be the soloist.

The last number on the program will be the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

...om ...

...ddress ...

...te ...

This week the Boston symphony orchestra will give its final concerts of the season in New York, Philadelphia and other cities. The announcements sent to the newspapers indicate nothing about the conductor for next year. They do not say that Mr Fiedler will continue; not yet do they announce the concerts as his last appearance. In New York the 18th the orchestra will give its 2709th concert in its 28 years.

[204]

The World of Music

PADEREWSKI'S SYMPHONY

By Lawrence Gilman

THOSE who are attracted to problems in what might be called musical economics have sometimes wondered how Mr. Paderewski the composer would have prospered before the public had it not been for Mr. Paderewski the virtuoso. For Mr. Paderewski in his function of music-maker occupies a singular position on the stage of the world. It is not likely that any one seriously disputes either his transcendent ability or his transcendent eminence as a pianist. When one has said that, in this capacity, he is in a class by himself, one has spoken only the unadorned truth. But Mr. Paderewski has not, as we all know, been content with his unassailable fame as a virtuoso; he has aspired to the guerdons of the composer—he has sought after the more substantial immortality of the creative musician. His opus numbers have by this time mounted up to twenty-four; and in the list of his works are an opera,—Manru,—a piano concerto, a violin sonata, a sonata for piano, a "Polish Fantasia" for piano and orchestra, a fugue and variations for piano, various smaller piano pieces (salon music, for the most part), and some songs. Now the interesting and exceptional fact is that Mr. Paderewski, in these activities, has not had to suffer the uncomfortable experience of being assessed purely on his merits as a music-maker—as a composer per se. A gracious destiny has so contrived it that the halo which he has so long worn in his capacity as virtuoso has been accommodatingly enlarged until it is now capacious enough to crown and glorify not only Mr. Paderewski the virtuoso, but Mr. Paderewski the composer. An impatient and not too heedful commentator upon the fact might choose to state the case more briefly by saying that Mr. Paderewski the composer has been borne into prosperity and repute upon the coat-tails of Mr. Paderewski the virtuoso. For the simple if ungracious truth is that Mr. Paderewski has yet to prove to candid and detached observers that he has any justification for asking the judicious to take him seriously as a composer. "At bottom," wrote Huysmans, "there are writers who have talent and others who have not: let them be Naturalists, Romantics, Decadents, what you will, it is all the same to me: I only want to know if they have talent." That Mr. Paderewski has been fairly industrious as a composer—that he has written in "the larger forms" so gravely esteemed by the upholders of the musical law and the prophets, is to some a matter of indifference. They persist in asking: "Has he talent?"—meaning, of course, creative talent in that finer sense which implies a veritable and individual gift of inspiration. The fact that Mr. Paderewski's most ambitious undertaking, his opera Manru, long since sank into the most innocuous kind of desuetude, and that his lesser works are seldom, if ever, performed save by himself, is not a convincing proof of their unimportance; yet it is nevertheless significant. The extent of the indifference of the musical world to Mr. Paderewski's music after it has become acquainted with it is only equalled by the measure of its curiosity and eagerness in advance of that event.

A case in point, and the occasion of these observations, is furnished by Mr. Paderewski's new symphony, which had its first performance in New York on February 18th, and its first performance anywhere a week earlier in Boston, through the agency of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The interest displayed in this work in advance of its production was remarkable. Its completion and forthcoming performance have been promised at the beginning of several successive seasons, and interested gossip and curiosity concerning it have been rife almost since the time when it was first proclaimed that Mr. Paderewski was at work upon the score. There are three men in the contemporary world of music whose future plans are provocative of wide and genuine interest—Strauss, Puccini, Debussy; and to this company Mr. Paderewski might almost have been said to belong during the days when his symphony was meticulously and portentously nearing completion, so large was the interest manifested in its progress. And now at last it has been displayed and inspected. It will soon have been performed by most of the principal orchestras in the United States; it will go the round of a number of the European concert-rooms; and will it then be shelved and forgotten, as Manru, the piano concerto, and the "Polish Fantasia" have been—leaving, as before, only the little salon pieces drifting upon the surface of the tide of contemporary popularity?

Let us consider the work itself. The symphony has been in the making since the summer of 1904; it was completed last December. It stands in B-minor, and its opus number is 24. There are three movements: (I.) Adagio Maestoso—Allegro con fuoco; (II.) Andante con Moto; (III.) Allegro vivace. The symphony is not yet completed, for Mr Paderewski contemplates a fourth movement—a Scherzo. Yet it is said upon the authority of the composer that the work is complete in its present shape. It would seem, therefore, that any number of the projected movements of a symphony may stand alone as a finished and satisfying whole—whether two, or three, or four; and so there is at last, perhaps, justification for those who have asserted that the symphonic form is not the ideally logical and sacrosanct thing its upholders have claimed it to be: that there is not of necessity any more organic a connection between the various movements of a symphony than there is, to employ the immortal comparison of Mr. Henry T. Finck, in the case of a train of cars. Mr. Paderewski's symphony is put forward as "complete in its present shape"; yet avowedly it is not complete, since it lacks one of its ultimate number of movements. It is a puzzling case, and we may well leave it to the formalists to adjudicate.

As to the nature and contents of the symphony, it will be best, under the circumstances, to let Mr. Paderewski speak for himself. The following exegesis may be regarded as accurate and authoritative, since it is put forward as "based on information furnished by the composer":

The symphony "is written as a patriotic tribute to his native country [Poland], directly inspired by the fortieth anniversary of the revolution of 1863–64. There is no absolute programme for either the first or second movement. The first movement is free, but classical in form, and seeks to celebrate Poland's great heroic past. The themes, although racial in character, are not based on popular melodies. The same is true of the second (slow) movement, in which the composer tries to express the lyric nature of his race.

A recent portrait of Mr. Paderewski

"In the third movement Mr. Paderewski has followed a sharply defined programme. It is in effect a symphonic poem, and is peculiarly a memorial to the revolution of 1863–64. In the opening of the movement one feels the spirit of social and political unrest which fills the country prior to the outbreak of war. It is the unrest of the young hot-heads, the youth of the nation who long for independence. Older heads, conservative age, counselled patience and caution, urged the impossibility of a successful issue. This despondent feeling is expressed in a treatment of the national anthem, from which all buoyancy and joyousness have been taken. It is treated not unlike a dirge, appearing in a subdued and sad mood. The youth refuse to listen. The atmosphere of restlessness subdues the remonstrances of the elders, and the spark of revolution ignites with the appearance of the second theme, a theme of brilliant chivalric character, which has been heralded by faint, distant trumpet calls—the summons to war. Light-hearted, gay, and confident, the youth of Poland depart for battle. The first conflict is characterized by the use of sarrusophones, which, with their dark, heavy coloring, express the weight and overwhelming strength of the oppressing force. Again is heard the Polish anthem, this time strong, vigorous, and battling—yet as the conflict progresses, it is gradually overwhelmed by the gloom of defeat, finally disappearing in an atmosphere of utter despair. Then a funeral dirge celebrates the heroes that are gone. The themes of unrest heard in the first movement reappear, but are divested of their substance. They are shadowy and unsubstantial as the heroes that have passed away. They are bitter memories of defeat. Upward they soar, higher and higher—the laments for the fatherland ascending to heaven. A quick transition of mood follows, from gloom to brightness. Hope returns, and in the recapitulation and climax one hears again the splendid buoyancy of the theme of chivalry from this third movement, the theme of the heroic past from the first movement, and a third theme, on which will be built the fourth movement yet to be written."

Mr. Paderewski's symphony is, then, in its subject-matter, a commemorative tribute to his native and beloved fatherland—a tribute passionate, loving, and, beyond question, deeply felt. Now it is a strange and not easily explicable fact that patriotism, surely one of the most ardent and virtuous of the emotions, has never, as an inspirational force, been productive of music of the highest kind. However differently it may have operated in the other arts—in poetry, for example—it has seemed to fail of producing any very memorable issue in music. It is difficult to think of any symphony, symphonic poem, opera, song, having patriotic emotion as its basic impulse, which has taken rank among the supreme things in music. Mr. Paderewski's symphony certainly fails to supply an exception. No one would think of questioning the genuineness of its feeling: this music is beyond cavil profoundly felt—obviously and indisputably it springs from the depths of the composer's soul. There is here no factitious sentiment, no pumped-up emotion, no bombast, no attitudinizing. For his perfect and touching honesty of feeling in this music let Mr. Paderewski be given unreserved praise. But unfortunately it requires something more than honesty and intensity of feeling to produce memorable music; were it not so, we might all of us, after learning the rules of the game, confront the world, upon occasion, as commandingly eloquent music-makers, and mere inspiration would be an entirely dispensable thing. But alas! as no completely equipped fictionist may, so Mr. Meredith remarks, set sail without pathos, so no maker of music who would achieve a masterpiece may set sail without inspiration. It is no doubt a trite observation; but it is just such trite and elemental homilies which we need to hold before our minds in these days, when uncanonized masterpieces are either sneered at or ridiculed, while mediocrity that is respectful of the traditions is hailed with delight and manifest relief, or applauded with indulgent reservations. Mr. Paderewski has been praised by the admirers of his music because in his symphony he exhibits "profound sincerity" and "aspiration." He has just been praised in this place for precisely those traits; but the appreciators whom I have quoted appear to regard Mr. Paderewski's "sincerity" and "aspiration" as proving the possession by his music of some extraordinary and valuable quality. Sincerity and aspiration, however, are not at all uncommon æsthetic virtues: if they were, we should have to acclaim as masters dozens of respectable and high-thinking English doctors of music (of what has been admirably called "the cathedral school") and hundreds of German Kapellmeisters soberly striving after The Ideal. What has not been recognized, in Mr. Paderewski's case (and in so many other cases that one grows weary of reiterating the same truth), is that sincerity and aspiration count for nothing unless they are transmuted into eloquent and communicative utterance—into heightened and beautiful or forceful, speech. If it were not for just that unpredictable and mysterious heightening, that obscurely sprung and miraculous flame, there would be no vital difference between Mr. Paderewski and such a symphonist as—well, let us say Brahms, who also had both "sincerity" and "aspiration."

The deficiencies of Mr. Paderewski's symphony are, to come to details, these: it lacks melodic and harmonic saliency, it lacks individual profile, and it lacks originality of idea. It is ingeniously devised and smoothly articulated—its workmanship, that is to say, is abundantly skilful. It proves conclusively Mr. Paderewski's ability to handle securely large and intricate designs. Nor is his music wanting in a kind of spurious impressiveness: it knows the trick of being "effective" without true eloquence, of being, in a manner, impressive, where impressiveness can be obtained through a use of deftly prepared sonorities and an ingenious application of tone-color—for the orchestration of the symphony is at times admirable though there is much in the scoring that seems tentative and inexpert. The prime defects of the music are the anæmic quality of its ideas and its utter lack of individuality. There is no moment in it which seizes upon the mind and lives afterward in the memory: its actual substance is flaccid, amorphous, invertebrate. The only passages which stand out from the general banality and flatness are those which are derived from a phrase which has almost a precise analogy in the work of a contemporary whom Mr. Paderewski no doubt heartily despises—Pietro Mascagni, who ten years ago employed in his opera Iris the antecedent of the theme of which Mr. Paderewski makes profitable use in the second movement of his symphony. It is altogether likely that Mr. Paderewski has never heard a note of Iris; but the obstinate and surprising fact remains that the most vivid idea in his symphony had been appropriated in advance by the author of Cavalleria Rusticana. Of individuality, personal savor, character, the symphony, as has been observed, has nothing.

Mr. Paderewski is a superb, a magically gifted, pianist—as an interpretative artist he seems at times, as Villiers de L'Isle-Adam said of Jules Laforgue, "one of those who come into the world with a ray of moonlight in their brains." He is an alert and acute intelligence; he is, all in all, a remarkable personality. As a composer he is negligible and unimportant.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

HERALD

ss .....

.....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the New National Theater on next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock, and for it Mr. Fiedler has arranged a programme of more than ordinary attractiveness. The first number will be the ever-popular overture to "Der Freischutz," by Weber. Then will come a novelty which will appeal strongly to the public—a "Fantastic Suite," for piano and orchestra, by Ernest Schelling. Ernest Schelling is one of the most talented of our American pianist-composers, is a graduate of the Paris Conservatory, and is one of the few who may truly call himself a pupil of Paderewski. This suite, which is in four movements, was written during 1905-06, and performed for the first time in Amsterdam in 1907. It had its first performances in America in Boston in January, 1908, and its success was rather of the sensational order.

The work is in four movements, the first three of which follow to a certain extent the symphonic form, the first being an allegro, the second a scherzando, and the third an adagio. The fourth movement, which will be very popular, is called a "Virginia Reel," and its main themes are built on "Dixie" and "Way Down on the Suwanee River," while at the very end of the coda even "Yankee Doodle" is heard. Mr. Schelling has been very courageous in using popular tunes of this kind for serious music, but his success has more than vindicated his courage.

The first number of the second part of the programme will be Tschaikowsky's delicious "Nut-cracker Suite." This ballet music was written to illustrate a fairy play which tells the old story of the toys on the Christmas tree which came to life on Christmas Eve and held a ball of their own. Mr. Fiedler first put this on the programme of the pension fund concert in Boston, and it was so well received that the next week he put it on the regular symphony programme. Following this will come two Wagner numbers—the prelude and "Love's Death," from "Tristan and Isolde," and the overture to the "Flying Dutchman." Mr. Ernest Schelling will be the soloist in his suite.

TIMES,

n .....

New York City.

ress .....

e .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The last concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 18, and Saturday afternoon, March 20. Two novelties will be found on the Thursday evening programme—Bruckner's Symphony in C minor No. 8, which had its first performances in America in Boston on Friday, March 12, and Saturday, March 13, and Scheinpflug's overture to "A Comedy by Shakespeare."

Mr. Fiedler is as ardent a believer in the genius of Anton Bruckner as are Dr. Muck, Arthur Nikisch, and Felix Weingartner, and he is as thoroughly a believer as they that the time is not far distant when the real magnitude of this strange genius will be recognized by the public at large. The eighth symphony, curiously enough, had never been played in America until Mr. Fiedler performed it in Boston the other day, and he is of the opinion that it is the greatest of the nine. He regards the Adagio as being the most beautiful slow movement in the whole literature of music. The symphony is long, requiring about an hour for performance.

Scheinpflug, who will be represented by an overture to "A Comedy by Shakespeare," is one of the younger German composers who lives in Bremen. While no direct clue is given to the comedy he has chosen, certain internal evidence has given rise to the theory that he had in mind the "Merry Wives of Windsor." The overture was played with great success in Boston a few weeks ago.

The other numbers on the programme will be Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

For Saturday afternoon Mr. Fiedler has chosen as his leading work Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony." The second part of the programme will contain Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite" for pianoforte and orchestra, which has already been heard here, and the overture to "Der Freischütz." Mr. Schelling will be the soloist.

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

ss .....

.....

MAX FIEDLER TO STAY ANOTHER YEAR.

[By Telegraph to The Tribune.]

Boston, March 13.—Max Fiedler, who has conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the current musical year, was to-day engaged for another season.

He has obtained an additional leave of absence from his former post in Hamburg, and will now remain here until May, 1910. To-morrow Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra will start on their last journey of the season to New York and other cities they regularly visit. Mr. Fiedler will go to Germany in May for the summer.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m ..... Brooklyn, N. Y.

Iress .....

e ..... MAR 1 4

The last Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music on next Friday evening at 8:15 o'clock, and Mr. Fiedler has made a special effort to make a programme which would appeal strongly to the patrons of these concerts in Brooklyn. The first number will be Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazado," which, the orchestra, under Mr. Fiedler, has played several times this winter with great success. This suite is one of the most brilliant works in orchestral literature. Rimsky-Korsakoff, if not a genius of the highest order, had, none the less, a genius for orchestration and a gift for charming melody, the combination of which two qualities has placed him a close second to Tschaikowsky, among Russian composers. The second part of the programme will begin with Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," now generally regarded as the finest production of the leading composers of the day. In juxtaposition to this will be one of the most charming works of Strauss' greatest rival, Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun," and these two works will show vividly the different directions in which the French and Germans are working in music. The last two numbers will be Wagner's "Waldweben," from the second act of "Siegfried," and the overture to the "Flying Dutchman."

Thomas Whitney Surette will give the lecture recital preliminary to the Boston Symphony concert of Friday evening. As usual, this is set for Thursday afternoon in Music Hall, Academy of Music, and is under Brooklyn Institute direction.

n STAATS ZEITUNG,

ress New York City.

e ..... MAR 14

Die letzten beiden diesjährigen New Yorker Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonie Orchesters unter Leitung von Herrn Max Fiedler sind in Carnegie Hall für den Abend von Donnerstag, dem 18., und dem Nachmittag von Samstag, dem 20. März, anberaumt. Diese Konzerte werden zwei Novitäten bringen, beide am Donnerstag Abend, und zwar Bruckner's Achte Symphonie in C-Moll, welches Werk seine erste amerikanische Aufführung am Freitag und Samstag letzter Woche in Boston hatte, und Scheinpflug's Ouvertüre „Zu einer Komödie von Shakespeare".

Die Leitung der Bostoner Symphonie-Gesellschaft macht uns folgende Mittheilungen: „Herr Fiedler ist ein glühender Anhänger und Verehrer des Genius' von Anton Bruckner, ebenso wie Dr. Muck, Arthur Nikisch und Felix Weingartner, und er ist gleich den Genannten und Anderen mehr ebenso fest der Meinung, daß die Zeit nicht weit sei, welche die ganze gigantische Größe dieses eigenartigen Genius' voll erkennen werde. Bruckner's „Achte" war bisher in Amerika überhaupt noch nicht aufgeführt worden, obgleich dieses Werk nach Herrn Fiedler's Meinung den Gipfelpunkt des symphonischen Schaffens des großen Wiener Meisters bedeutet. Fiedler erklärt das Adagio dieser Symphonie für den herrlichsten langsamen Satz in der gesammten Musikliteratur. Die Symphonie ist lang, wie alle Werke Bruckner's; ihre Aufführung nimmt ungefähr eine Stunde in Anspruch.

Scheinpflug, dessen erwähnte Ouvertüre bei dieser Gelegenheit aufgeführt werden wird, ist einer der jüngeren deutschen Komponisten und lebt in Bremen. Wenn der Komponist auch keinerlei Mittheilungen über die Shakespeare'sche Komödie gemacht hat, welche ihm vorschwebte, so glaubt man auf Grund gewisser Momente doch, daß er „Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor" im Sinne hatte. Das Werk wurde in Boston vor einigen Wochen mit großem Erfolge aufgeführt."

Das Programm des Donnerstag-Konzertes wird durch Debussy's „Der Nachmittag eines Fauns" und das „Meistersinger"-Vorspiel ergänzt werden.

Für das Samstag-Nachmittags-Konzert hat Herr Fiedler Berlioz' „Phantastische Symphonie" gewählt, sowie Ernest Schelling's „Fantastic Suite" für Pianoforte und Orchestra mit dem Komponisten am Klavier. Den Beginn macht die „Freischütz"-Ouvertüre.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concert of the season at the National Theater next Tuesday afternoon, March 16, at 4:30. The soloist at this concert will be Mr. Ernest Schelling, the eminent pianist. An interesting program has been arranged, which includes the following numbers: Overture to the opera "Der Freischutz," fantastic suite for pianoforte and orchestra, Schelling; suite for full orchestra, taken from the score of the ballet "Nutcracker," op. 71A, Tschaikowski; prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner, and overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner.

MORNING TELEGRAPH NEW YORK CITY MAR 1 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN 3 NEW WORKS

Walter Damrosch on Tuesday Will Play Beethoven's Ninth Symphony Twice.

DRESDEN ORCHESTRA TO COME

Mahler Announces Two Well Constructed Programmes for N. Y. Philharmonic Concerts.

The last concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 18, at 8.15, and Saturday afternoon, March 20, at 2.30 respectively. Two novelties will be found on the Thursday evening programme—Bruckner's Symphony in C Minor, No. 8, which had its first performances in America in Boston on Friday and Saturday last, and Scheinpflug's overture to "A Comedy by Shakespeare."

Mr. Fiedler is as ardent a believer in Anton Bruckner as are Dr. Muck, Arthur Nikisch and Felix Weingärtner, and in his opinion the time is not far distant when the real magnitude of this strange genius will be recognized by the public at large. He regards the Adagio as being the most beautiful slow movement in the whole literature of music. The symphony is long, requiring about an hour for performance.

Scheinpflug, who will be represented by an overture to "A Comedy by Shakespeare," is one of the younger German composers who lives in Bremen. While no direct clue is given to the comedy he has chosen, certain internal evidence has given rise to the theory that he had in mind the "Merry Wives of Windsor."

The other numbers on the programme will be Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

For Saturday afternoon Mr. Fiedler has chosen as his leading work Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony," the performance of which under his conducting aroused a real sensation in Boston a week ago. The second part of the programme will contain Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite" for pianoforte and orchestra, which has already been heard here, and the overture to "Der Freischutz." Mr. Schelling will be the soloist.

NEW YORK PRESS,

ess New York City.

MAR 14 19

The last concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening at 8.15 and on Saturday afternoon at 2.30 o'clock respectively. Two novelties will be found on the Thursday evening programme—

Bruckner's Symphony in C minor, No. 8, which had its first performance in America in Boston on Friday last, and Scheinpflug's overture to "A Comedy by Shakespeare."

Fiedler is as ardent a believer in the genius of Anton Bruckner as are Dr. Muck, Arthur Nikisch and Felix Weingarten, and he is as thoroughly a believer as they that the time is not far distant when the real magnitude of this strange genius will be recognized by the public at large. The eighth symphony curiously enough had never been played in America until Fiedler performed it in Boston the other day, and he is of the opinion that it is the greatest of the nine. He regards the Adagio as being the most beautiful slow movement in the whole literature of music. The symphony is long, requiring about an hour for performance.

Scheinpflug, who will be represented by an overture to "A Comedy by Shakespeare," is one of the younger German composers and lives in Bremen. While no direct clue is given to the comedy he has chosen, certain internal evidence has given rise to the theory that he had in mind the "Merry Wives of Windsor." The overture was played with great success in Boston a few weeks ago.

The other numbers on the programme will be Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

for Saturday afternoon, Fiedler has chosen as his leading work Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," the performance of which under his conducting aroused a real sensation in Boston a week ago. The second part of the programme will contain Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite" for pianoforte and orchestra, which has already been heard here, and the overture to "Der Freischutz." Schelling will be the soloist.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m .....

ss ..... MAR 13 1909

SUCCESS OF THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S LEADER

An important question in the artistic life of Boston has been settled by the engagement of Max Fiedler to conduct the Symphony Orchestra for another season. When Mr. Fiedler came to Boston from Hamburg last October he was a stranger in every sense of the term, but he was warmly welcomed, nevertheless, and the good impression that he made at the beginning of his term has gradually been strengthened. This applies not to Boston alone, but to the other cities visited by the orchestra from time to time. To put it briefly, popularly—Mr. Fiedler has made good.

This fortunate outcome of Mr. Fiedler's engagement means that the Symphony Orchestra has maintained its high position in the musical world. It is today what it has been ever since its foundation, Boston's most valuable musical asset, a source of rare pleasure and intellectual stimulation. Its service in behalf of the general culture is as much a matter of programs as of performances, and in both directions Mr. Fiedler has labored with signal success. His talent and his enthusiasm have earned for him the reputation of being one of the most respected conductors the orchestra has ever had. The players and the people alike have come to hold him in admiration and affection, and no other conductor has done more, if as much, to have the people give the players their due.

Next season will be a particularly important one for the orchestra, but with Mr. Fiedler re-engaged the prospects may safely be regarded as bright.

SUN,

s New York City.

MAR 14 1909

The last concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening at 8:15 and Saturday afternoon at 2:30. Two novelties will be found on the Thursday evening programme—Bruckner's Symphony in G minor, No. 8 which had its first performance in America in Boston on Friday and Saturday, and Scheinpflug's overture to "A Comedy by Shakespeare." The other numbers on the programme will be Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

For Saturday afternoon Mr. Fiedler has chosen as his leading work Berlioz's "Fantasie Symphony," the performance of which under his conducting aroused a real sensation in Boston a week ago. The second part of the programme will contain Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite" for pianoforte and orchestra, which has already been heard here, and the overture to "Der Freischütz." Mr. Schelling will be the soloist.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

.....

s .....

.....

The Boston Symphony orchestra, which most people think has reached its highest point of artistic attainment this season, is to be congratulated upon receiving the services of Max Fiedler for conductor of the orchestra another year. Negotiations to this end have been on for several weeks, but only now has Mr. Fiedler learned definitely that he is able to stay away from Hamburg for another season.

NEW YORK HERALD,

From .....

Address New York City

Date .....

Boston Retains Mr. Fiedler.

[SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE HERALD.]

BOSTON, Mass., Sunday. — The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced that the contract with Mr Max Fiedler as conductor of the orchestra has been renewed for another year. Negotiations to this end have been on for several weeks, but only now has Mr. Fiedler learned definitely that he is able to stay away from Hamburg for another season.

[206]

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

BRUCKNER AND GRAEDENER.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor; program of the 18th concert, Saturday evening, March 13: Bruckner, Symphony No. 8, in C minor: Allegro moderato, scherzo, adagio, finale (first time in America). Graedener, Concerto for violoncello, op. 40 (first time in Boston). Beethoven, Overture to "Die Geschopfe des Prometheus," op. 43. The solo part in the concert was played by Heinrich Warnke, principal 'cellist of the orchestra.

Bruckner's symphony was not the dull thing that it was expected to be, and its performance was no mere labor of love on the part of conductor and orchestra. It sounded well and was interesting throughout; and although it was very long, its length was by no means wearisome. Mr. Fiedler never had the orchestra under better control and his control was not so much that of an urgent leader as that of an adviser. The players have been known to perform familiar symphonies as though the music were new to them; this unfamiliar symphony they played as if they knew it by heart.

The first question a listener to new music asks himself is wherein it is new. When a performance goes off so smoothly as that of Saturday evening the probability is that the music is nothing but old formulas put into new combinations. To begin with, the originality of Bruckner's Eighth Symphony is not in its fundamental musical ideas, and therefore it is not in the greatest sense original at all. Neither is the general method of treating those ideas his own. Bruckner here added nothing to the sum of musical knowledge; everything he said is to be found in the works of other composers. But he developed his material to an extent that nobody else ever equalled. Beethoven's development of a musical phrase often seems to have been carried to extreme lengths; but at the point where Beethoven would have stopped, Bruckner was only fairly started. It has been said that Wagner's style of writing was inappropriate for a symphony; but Bruckner introduced a Wagnerian passage into the final movement of his work and proved that a symphonic treatment of it was entirely practicable. Real power of invention Bruckner lacked, but he could apply musical ideas with unfailing skill. He did not learn the secret of tone, color; if his symphony were as rich in color as it is intricate in structure it would not have waited 17 years for its first American performance. The truly original part of the work, that in which a listener's thoughts are not upon Beethoven or Wagner, is the scherzo. Here the composer laid aside his profound musical scholarship and wrote in simplicity.

Graedener, the composer who furnished the other new piece on the program of last week, is a successful colorist; that is, he has learned how to apply the color formulas which composers before him have discovered. He believes in melody, and knows how to use it in the old-fashioned strict way with fresh effect. His little piece is not, properly speaking, a concerto, but a little orchestra study with solo violoncello.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m .....
ress .....
.....
te .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concert of the season at the National Theater next Tuesday afternoon, March 16, at 4:30. The soloist at this concert will be Mr. Ernest Schelling, the pianist. The program: Overture to the opera "Der Freischutz," fantastic suite for pianoforte and orchestra, Schelling; suite for full orchestra taken from the score of the ballet "Nutcracker," op. 71A, Tschaikowski; prelude and "Love Death," from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner; overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m .....
ress .....
.....

The Boston symphony orchestra management announces that the contract with Max Fiedler as conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra has been renewed for another year.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Program of Quaint and Grotesque Music Closes Season Here.

That which is quaint, that which is grotesque in music, but fortunately not necessarily unpoetic, formed the basis of the program of the fifth and last concert of the season in Philadelphia of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music last night.

Hector Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," describing an episode in the life of an artist and written before its accomplished but eccentric composer was twenty-seven years old, was the central number. The work, antedating as it does the birth of both Brahms and Tschaikowsky, and following close after the death of Beethoven, is remarkable for its tonal qualities.

Seemingly every possible combination of string, reed, wood-wind and percussion instrument known to civilized man is employed in its rendition. The most rasping, biting harmonies follow closely on the heels of beautiful melodic themes. In fact, so inharmonic is it in one part that the composer himself wrote, "There is no misprint here," on the original score, to prevent a misinterpretation of his meaning.

Naturally, such a work is most difficult to express. Max Fiedler's players, however, measured up to the task and completely won the audience by their artistic reading. The fourth movement (Allegretto non troppo) portraying a condemned man's march to execution, proved particularly captivating, if such can be said with propriety considering the theme, and called forth a storm of applause.

Following the symphony, the orchestra gave Ernest Schelling's Fantastic Suite for Pianoforte and Orchestra, with the composer himself at the piano. The suite is typically American, both in melody and harmony. The last movement is founded on the themes of "Dixie" and the "Old Folks at Home." While the work rises to no great heights, yet it never descends to the commonplace. As popular music is familiar music, Schelling's suite is by its own nature popular.

Mr. Schelling, who was born at Belvidere, N. J., and has studied under Paderewski, is a pianist of much ability. His manner at the piano and his touch and tone are strikingly like that of the brilliant Pole, and he bids fair to become a leading virtuoso. He was given three recalls last night, and the audience showed a strong desire for an encore, which, however, was barred by the unwritten law of symphony concerts at the Academy.

As a closing work, the orchestra gave Wagner's strident and stentorian Prelude to the "Maestersingers." The number formed a soul-stirring finale for the more quaint and original theses which had preceded it.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Final Appearance of This Season at the Academy of Music.

ERNEST SCHELLING

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its last appearance of the season at the Academy of Music last night in a programme which was evidently designed to please popular taste, but which was decidedly below the musical standard of any that the organization has given here for many years. The Berlioz Fantastic Symphony is fantastic enough and serves very well to bring out the marvellous mechanical resources of the orchestra, but it is not an inspiring work and could be avided without much loss to the public. Ernest Schelling appeared as both pianist and composer, playing his Fantastic Concerto in which he utilizes several popular popular airs of America, notably, as in the last movement, "Dixie" and "Suwanee River." It was such music as would go very well in a theatre between the acts of in a cafe to the chatter of many voices, but it isn't real music. The programme closed with "The Meistersinger" overture, which was more solid ground and which was a decidedly welcome relief to the trivialities that preceded it.

NEW YORK HERALD,
New York City.
MAR 14 1909

MUSIC NOTES.

THE final concerts of the Boston Orchestra in New York this season will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At the Thursday concert the orchestral feature will be Anton Bruckner's Eighth Symphony, in C minor, which has of late achieved quite a reputation in Germany. At the afternoon concert Mr. Ernest Schelling will play the piano part of his own "Fantastic Suite."

ress .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A recent interview with Paderewski, published in the "Boston Herald," is interesting, inasmuch as he speaks of his new symphony and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The great pianist says: "I have always planned to have my new symphony presented by the best orchestra in the world, and I have long been of the opinion that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is superior to all others. I know very well the other great orchestras in the world. One must not omit to mention those at Berlin and Vienna. But I do not say their players are as fine in every respect as the Boston Orchestra. The European orchestras must not be compared with the remarkable institution you have here in Boston." The three visits of the Boston players to Hartford have become leading events of each musical season. The last of this season will be Monday of next week, when the organization will give a concert at the Parsons Theater. Heinrich Waruke will play a concerto for violoncello and orchestra and Mr. Fiedler will conduct. Seats are on sale at John M. Gallup & Co.'s music store.

From .....
Address .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The sale of seats for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Buckingham next Tuesday evening, under the direction of Max Fiedler and the auspices of the Waterbury Music League, is now in progress at the Buckingham pharmacy. There has been a promising sale which augurs well for this most important musical event of the entire season. On the night previous to its concert in Waterbury the orchestra will give the last of its three annual concerts at Hartford in Parsons's Theater. Large delegations from cities in all parts of the state are expected to be in attendance at the concert and members of prominent musical societies in both New Haven and Hartford have signified their intention of being present. One of the chief numbers of interest on the program to be rendered is the great symphonic poem "Finland" by Sibelius which has never been played in this city. This is considered one of the greatest of modern compositions and musicians look forward to its efficient rendition under Dr Fiedler's baton with great interest. Another number of great interest is the "Afternoon of the Faun" by DeBussy another novelty to Waterbury. These numbers with others and the great Tschaikowsky "Symphony Pathetic" make up the finest orchestral program ever arranged for Waterbury.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om .....
ldress .....
te .....

Boston Symphony Concert.

On Monday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concert of the season at the Parsons Theater. Heinrich Warnke, first 'cellist of the orchestra, will appear as soloist. He will be remembered by those present at a concert by the Boston orchestra at Foot Guard Hall in November, 1905, when he gave a delightful performance of Volkmann's concerto in B minor for violoncello and orchestra. For the coming concert Mr. Warnke has chosen a new composition for his instrument by Gradener, a work he has played with great success in several cities where the orchestra has appeared. Probably no musical instrument approaches so closely the human voice as does the violoncello and in Mr. Warnke's hands it will yield great pleasure to the audience on Monday evening. Reserved seats are on sale at John M. Gallup & Co.'s music store.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

1 .....
ress .....
.....

Fiedler bleibt mit Boston Symphonic.

Boston, 14. März. — Dr. Max Fiedler hat seinen Kontrakt als Kapellmeister der Boston Symphonie-Orchesters auf ein weiteres Jahr erneuert.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Fifth and Final Concert of the Season at the Academy.

PROGRAMME.

Berlioz, Fantastic Symphony, No. 1, in C major.
E. Schelling, Fantastic Suite for pianoforte and orchestra.
Soloist, the composer.
Wagner, Prelude to "The Meistersinger."

Last night's final concert of the season by the Boston Orchestra brought to the Academy an audience which filled the house, with the exception of half a dozen boxes and the topmost gallery. The hearers were enthusiastically demonstrative over the soloist of the evening, and yet the prevailing impression seemed to be that the "fantastic" element of the programme was rather overdone. The symphony, the work of a young man of 26, abounds in tours-de-force and startling effects, and the soloist-composer (aetat 33) in the composition and in the performance of the music alike, lays stress more on the manner than the matter, drawing attention to the brilliant dexterity of invention in the first instance, and of fingering in the second place, rather than to any deeper, hidden meaning in the music itself.

The Berlioz symphony abounds in opportunities such as the Boston Orchestra exults in, for displaying its virtuosity, for showing that there is no combination of notes, no tonal effect, impossible of achievement for these players. The merest whisper of the strings was offset by the detonating thunder of the drums; the plaint of the E flat clarinet was counterbalanced by the imposing majesty of the brasses, and every device of plucked string and bouncing bow, muted horn and drums battered by two players at once, was employed to bring out the full tonal resources of the orchestra. No wonder that Berlioz at a certain point in the manuscript felt impelled to write, by way of a reassuring footnote: "There is no misprint here."

There is a wealth of imagination in Schelling's work; the intermezzo is a lovely lyric episode instinct with romantic feeling, and in the final movement with its very spirited conclusion there is a most ingenious treatment of "Dixie" and "Old Folks at Home." The way the two themes are tossed around and kept literally and figuratively in the air at the same time is wonderfully clever, yet the great charm of these tunes is their simplicity, and the variation and enlargement are sophisticated. "Dixie" is melodically rather better than anything Mr. Schelling has done to it here, and the same thing might be said of the other venerable ditty.

The result of the "fantastic" symphony of Berlioz plus the "fantastic" suite of Schelling was that with the Wagner vorspiel the audience felt the relief of being on solid ground once more. Here, at any rate, was music that no doubt was "advanced" to its first hearers in 1862, but seems simple today. The Berlioz composition, written in 1830, sounded ultra-modern beside it. Its broad, sweeping harmonies, dominated by the recurrent melody of the "Preislied," were gratefully received after the overteasing of the ear by the music of the forepart of the evening.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....
Address .....
Date .....

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Last Concert of the Season—Schelling the Soloist.

Ernest Schelling, whose biographers never seem anxious to identify him with Philadelphia, where his brother, Prof. Felix Schelling, of the University of Pennsylvania, is a tower of strength in the academic world, was the soloist at the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening. Mr. Schelling was identified with Philadelphia in his earlier days before his final connection with Europe and that he is still somewhat of an American, if not a Philadelphian, was shown in his composition read last evening, a "Fantastic Suite for Pianoforte and Orchestra."

The suite of the opening number suggests he is thinking of new world folk, even if it be a la Dvorak, but the special treatment of "Dixie" and "Way Down Upon the Swwanee River" in the finale, is very original and clever and quite an instrumental tour de force.

The whole "fantistic" is true to its name in all its four movements and is most musical and possessed of orchestral beauty as well as pianistic charm. The composer has carefully preserved the balance between orchestra and piano and the temptation to overelaborate the solo instrument, does not seem to have presented itself to him. The mutual interpretation of the soloist and orchestra was most happy and the virtuoso band made its usual impressive effect in tone, quality and expression.

The orchestra made a very profound impression in the "Fantastic Symphony" of Berlioz, which led the program, and was tumultuously successful in the glowing overture to "Die Meistersinger," that closed the evening's work. Fiedler returns next year to the delight of the orchestra and that he has made a splendid place for himself in the long roll of Boston Orchestra leaders, the season's concerts have surely revealed.

[207]

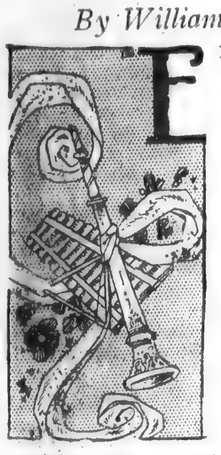
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BOSTON ORCHESTRA IN FINAL CONCERT HERE

Ernest Schelling, at Piano, Plays His Own Fantastic Composition.

IT'S IN FOUR DIVISIONS

By William R. Lester



ERNEST SCHELLING in a fantastic suite for piano and orchestra, Berlioz's wildly fantastic symphony, No. 1, and a somewhat fantastic rendering of the "Meistersinger" overture—with such surplusage of fantasy was the Boston Orchestra's local series of concerts closed at the Academy last evening.

The Berlioz symphony, in its day the climax of sensationalism in program music, has been quite cast into shade by wilder compositions of later musicians writing for instrumentalists whose like were undreamed of in Berlioz's time. It has many passages of brilliant invention and moments of rare and supreme beauty, but it is too uneven in inspiration and too long drawn out to suit concert audiences of the present day.

With the second and third movements excised it would probably rank as one of the favorite concert numbers; for the dream and passion music of the opening, the sensational "March to the Scaffold," allegretto, and the witch's and abbot finale are of strictly modern type, while indicating admirably the peculiar and many-sided phases of Berlioz's genius.

Play With Fine Spirit.

The Boston instrumentalists, directed by Mr. Fiedler—they didn't seem to pay much attention to him—played this music with fine spirit, large artistic temperament and perfect technique in the various choirs. They are at their best in such difficult and thankless interpretations—the "Meistersinger," with its glorious harmonies, was played carelessly and strepitantly, as though the task were distasteful.

Pianist Schelling composed—or devised—the suite for piano and orchestra, and played the piano part himself. Nobody, presumably, could do it better, either orchestrally or as soloist—wherefore score another demonstration of the eternal truth that one might be a very great technical virtuoso, able to interpret grandly the musical thoughts of others, and still be denied the supreme gift of original harmonic utterance.

Suite of Four Divisions.

The Schelling suite is in four divisions, of which the first three—allegro, scherzando and adagio—are on the pattern of this class of orchestral music for lo! these many years.

In the fourth movement—"Virginia reel"—is concentrated the fantasy of the composition, the same consisting largely of ingenious applications to orchestral choirs of "Dixie" and "Suwanee River," with fragments of other American folksongs and patriotic airs.

It was an ingenious mosaic, happily conceived and skilfully put together, but it bore no more essential relation to symphonic music than did the grinding of a street organ nearby.

Yet there are there disclosed large capacities of music invention, and a certain impress of novelty and temperamental fervor. Mr. Schelling should get a new box of music pens and try it again.

From EVENING SUN,

Address New York City.

Date

And now it's farewell to the Boston Orchestra both in Brooklyn to-night and to-morrow in Manhattan borough.

Academy subscribers hear Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherezade," Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Wagner's forest sounds from "Siegfried" and "Flying Dutchman" overture.

At the Carnegie Hall matinée, the symphony is the so-called "Fantastic" of Berlioz, the soloist is Ernest Schelling in his own "Fantastic Suite" on themes of "Dixie" and "Old Folks at Home," and the season ends with Weber's overture to "Freischutz."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Last Concert of the Season Distinguished by Schelling's Piano Work.

Much to the regret of that portion of the community that finds pleasure in listening to the Boston Symphony Orchestra the last concert to be given in Philadelphia by that organization this season occurred in the Academy of Music last night. Conductor Fiedler, who is a master of the art of program arranging, presented three numbers, Berlioz's "Symphony Fantastique," No. 1, in C major; "Fantastic Suite" for piano and orchestra, written by the soloist of the occasion, Ernest Schelling, and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," by Wagner.

The Berlioz symphony is a most remarkable work. It was admirably played by Fiedler's superb band. It is Berlioz's first attempt at program music, and although it is provided with a distinct program from beginning to end, it is not of the compelling sort, but rather suggests to the listener scenes that might occur to a person of ordinary imagination.

Schelling, the soloist of the evening, is an American edition, technically, of Rosenthal. Such stupendous, overwhelming technical facility as his, so artistically used, is, indeed, a rarity. The "Fantastic Suite" is an exceedingly unique work and deserves its name in every particular.

It might be called a study in rhythms. It is full of beauty of theme, brilliancy and originality of conception. The orchestration is remarkably well done. Perhaps only an accomplished pianist would have produced a work which, prominent pianistically, is yet so well blended in the orchestration that it seems one harmonious whole. Schelling has been a pupil of Paderewski, but for brilliancy and bravery Schelling far outstrips his distinguished master.

Schelling's playing displays an absolutely boundless, colossal technique, but it is so beautifully utilized one is lost in admiration of the effects without analyzing the means. The manner in which runs, double thrills, trills, etc., ripple from Schelling's fingers suggests magic. The introduction of "Dixie" and "Old Folks at Home" in the fourth movement completes the impression of a peculiar work, which would undoubtedly grow on repetition, but it is doubtful if any one would have the courage to attempt a performance after realizing the brilliancy of Schelling's interpretation.

The program closed with the Wagner work. There was great enthusiasm shown throughout the concert, and Schelling was the recipient of an ovation which he very gracefully shared with Fiedler and the men of the orchestra.

The concert throughout was a delight that was of the keenest.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

At Symphony Concert.

Mrs. Taft occupied the Presidential box at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon. Her guests were Mr. and Mrs. Gordon Cumming, Mrs. Audenreid, Mrs. Lewis More, and Miss Anderson.

Mrs. Sherman, wife of the Vice President, had in her box the German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff, and the Counselor of the German Embassy and Countess Wedel.

The Second Secretary of the British Embassy and Mrs. Kennard had among their guests in their box Capt. F. G. Sowerby, naval attache of the embassy.

Mrs. C. A. Williams and Miss Mae Williams were among those entertaining box parties, having among their guests Mrs. Lodge.

Mrs. Hunt Slater and a number of her friends occupied a box.

Baron Moncheur, the Belgian minister, entertained a party, as did Mrs. Calderon Carlisle and Miss Mary Carlisle and Mrs. Lisner.

Among those entertaining parties in the audience were Mme. von Livonius, wife of the Naval Attache of the German embassy, who had with her Mrs. Wotherspoon, wife of Major Wotherspoon; the Norwegian Minister and Mme. Gude, Count Ugglas, Mr. and Mrs. Richard Reid Rogers, Mrs. Wilcox, Mrs. Thomas Carter, Mrs. Henry Cleveland Perkins, Mrs. Beekman Winthrop, Mrs. Charles J. Bell, Mrs. George Howard, Miss Eleanor Wayne Parker, Mrs. James R. Garfield, Mrs. Tiffany Dyer, Mrs. Clarence Moore, Mrs. Peyton Russell, Mrs. Robert I. Shepard, Miss Shepard, Mrs. Raymond Patterson, Miss MacFarland, Mrs. James Lowndes, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. Richard Butler, Mrs. Francis Crowninshield, Senator du Pont, Miss Sheridan, Mrs. Norman Williams, Mrs. Edward Mitchell, Mrs. James Harlan, Mrs. Crane and Miss Crane, Mrs. Talbot, Miss Talbot, Mrs. A. C. Barney, Mrs. Nathaniel Simpkins, Mrs. Jennings, Mrs. Emmons, Mrs. Eugene Van Rensselaer, the Misses Stickney, W. Bowie Clarke, Mrs. Edward Lauterbach, Mrs. Roswell Hitchcock, Mrs. Charles Parker Stone, and Mrs. Letterman.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Its Concert at the Academy of Music Last Evening Greatly Enjoyed

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its local series at the Academy of Music last evening in the presence of a large audience with what there will be many to say was the best and most enjoyable concert it has given here this season. There were only three numbers on the program, the "Fantastic Symphony" of Berlioz, the "Meistersinger" overture and a "Fantastic Suite" for pianoforte and orchestra by Ernest Schelling, but these three selections contain so much of substance and cover a range of variety so wide that they provided a full evening of excellent entertainment.

The Berlioz number has been heard here more than once before, and never without a greater or less degree of pleasure, but no performance of it can be recalled quite so impressive and satisfying as that given under Mr. Fiedler's appreciative and inspiring direction last night. He was evidently in close sympathy with the score, and he interpreted it with unfailing skill, knowledge and intelligence. Nothing so thrilling has been heard in a local concert room in a long while as his delivery of the "March to the Scaffold," and the whole reading was distinguished by the sincerity of its emotion, the perfection of its finish, the charm of its sentiment and the persuasive eloquence of its appeal.

And yet the most notable and salient feature of the program was the Schelling Fantasia, which proved to be an uncommonly brilliant, interesting and spontaneous composition, and which, brilliantly played as it was by Mr. Schelling himself, was much admired, greatly enjoyed and enthusiastically applauded. Skillfully written in four well constructed movements, it is full of ingratiating thematic material and the climax to which it is worked up with the introduction of the "Dixie" melody is unusually effective and distinctly original. It entitles its author to recognition not only as one of the great pianists of the world, but also as a composer of much more than ordinary ability. It may be hoped that Mr. Schelling, who has many friends in Philadelphia, will not give his music too long a rest.

The concert closed with a broad, lucid and dignified performance of the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," and the audience must have dispersed with a feeling of regret that the Boston orchestra will not be heard here again until autumn.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

Boston Symphony Concert.

In response to a request for the performance of some one of the orchestral works of Richard Strauss, Conductor Fiedler of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has chosen "Death and Transfiguration" for the program of the concert at the Parsons Theater next Monday evening.

Outside of New York and Boston, where all his great orchestral scores have been frequently performed, Richard Strauss is best known as the composer of "Salome," an opera which has created no end of discussion wherever music is mentioned. Strauss was born at Munich, June 11, 1864, and was a very precocious composer. His first symphony was produced in 1881 and was his twelfth work. In this, as in his earlier works, young Strauss departed in no sense from the traditional mould, but exhibited a technical facility unusual in so young a man. Until 1885, here was a composer who had been brought up on the classics and was without pronounced individuality. At the age of 21, associations influenced him to believe a musician should write poetry in music. The result of his impressions was a symphonic fantasy, "Aus Italien," a modest step toward program music, to be followed suddenly by "Macbeth" and a sucession of the most remarkable "Tone Poems" yet penned by any composer. Of these, "Death and Transfiguration" has been performed most frequently by the Boston Orchestra and is a favorite with Boston audiences. Seats for the concert are on sale at the music store of John M. Gallup & Co.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

ss

* * *

Mrs. Taft occupied a box at The National Theater yesterday afternoon for the Boston Symphony concert. She had with her Mr. and Mrs. Gordon Cumming, Mrs. Audenreid, Mrs. Charles Anderson, and Mrs. Lewis More. Others giving box parties were Mrs. Sherman, wife of the Vice President, who had with her the new German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff, with the Counselor of the German Embassy and Countess Wedel.

* * *

[208]

CLOSING CONCERT BEST OF SEASON

Boston Symphony Orchestra Excels Its Earlier Efforts in Program.

Without spirit of criticism but merely in the attitude of seeking light, it seems opportune to ask why the fancy of the public is taken into consideration by the visiting symphony orchestras only in the final concerts of the season.

This query was made pertinent yesterday afternoon when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its concluding concert of the season. It also arose when the Philadelphia Orchestra concluded its series several weeks ago.

The public is entitled to the very best that is in such orchestras throughout the season and had the two organizations' concerts all been as delightful and inspiring as their final recitals their seasons would have been almost incomparable.

Splendid Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its season here yesterday in a perfect blaze of glory. Rarely has a more beautiful recital been given here. Two compositions alone would have brought this result—the captivating suite of Tschaikowsky and the daring suite for piano and orchestra by Ernest Schelling with the composer at the piano. The audience was simply carried away with both and could scarcely manifest the great degree of approval it felt in hearing these two notable compositions.

Because it is the later and more bold of the two, the Schelling composition probably attracted the most attention. Mr. Schelling is a great pianist and a versatile composer. He was in his double element when he presented his suite to the Washington public. Clear, concise, and wholly individual in his drawing as well as in his interpretation, Mr. Schelling played with a finish that completely enthralled. His delightful command of the piano and his natural insight into the composition he was playing served to give the audience a pleasure rarely felt.

Rich Variety Shown.

The spectacle of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—dignified, almost cold in its reserve—playing "Dixie" and "Way Down on the Sewanee River" was one which will not easily be forgotten. But to the genius of Schelling is due the fact that except for a fleeting reminder of the old-fashioned themes of these and other "tunes" worked into the final movement they were almost lost in the surprising and glittering setting given them.

At the conclusion of this remarkable number Mr. Schelling was compelled to return to the stage half a dozen times to receive the plaudits of the audience.

The Tschaikowsky suite was a gem. Always picturesque and unusual, Tschaikowsky has exposed some of his most fascinating moods in the series of dances which comprise the suite. Each is short and complete in its drawing. As played by the orchestra under the admirable direction of Max Fiedler they were a continual series of delightful surprises and remarkable compositions.

Mr. Fiedler's work throughout was notable. He has never been in better form and has rarely displayed more enthusiasm.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Unless there is a decided advance in the sale of seats for the concert to be given at the Buckingham next Tuesday evening, March 23, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, this event will prove to be one of most deplorable musical failures which has ever taken place in the city. There has been a very small sale in spite of the attractiveness of a program such as has never been heard in Waterbury before and the importance of this musical organization, the foremost and most expensive in the country. The concert is to be given under the auspices of the Waterbury Music League and the members of this body are to be congratulated for their laudable effort in bringing to this city so great an organization. All music lovers remember the concert given at the Buckingham by the orchestra two years ago when an audience representative of the foremost cities in the state crowded the big hall and listened to a notable program played under the baton of Dr Carl Muck. Dr Max Fiedler, the new leader of the orchestra, is a musician of scholarly attainments and one of the best known present-day German musicians. He is especially versed in the life and works of Tschaikowsky with whom he is in full sympathy and whose "Pathetic Symphony" he will conduct next Tuesday evening.

NEWS
BALTIMORE, MD
MAR 18 1909

MUSIC

Fifth And Last Concert Of Boston Symphony Orchestra, With Ernest Schelling As The Soloist.

Mr. Fiedler presented the following program:

Tone poem, "A Hero Life," Op. 40....Richard Strauss
Fantastic suite for pianoforte and orchestra.....Schelling
I. Allegro marziale.
II. Scherzando e molto leggiero; Trio: Andantino.
III. Intermezzo: Adagio.
IV. Virginia Reel: Molto vivace.
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" (after the Eclogue of Stephane Mallarme.....Debussy
"Waldweben" ("Life and Stir of the Forest") from "Siegfried," Act II.....Wagner
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman".....Wagner

Tonal language has its distinctive province and limitations. Its province is to express the composer's moods so that they may appeal to the susceptibilities of those who hear his writings; and its high estate totters when it is brought down to the imitation or imagination of less spiritual and more material ideas or things. Not being articulate, isolated sounds have only such significance as can be imparted to them through dynamic variations and through color modulations. High tones have brighter colors than low ones, and some voices and instruments are organically white, while others grade down to the very somber. The composer must therefore depend largely upon combinations and successions of tones in creating desired moods. A genius, like Richard Strauss, can clearly express joy, rage, love, sorrow, etc., with tonal resources; but the complexity involved in creating even atmospheres of these moods debars him from depicting analyzed detail. He may recognizably differentiate between love and joy, or between pain and sorrow, but attempts to picture the fine shades of difference in the conditions causing emotions, to trace the successive events in a day's experience or to expound philosophic theories must necessarily rob music of its most exalted qualities—unqualified truth and clear individuality.

Strauss' Program Schemes.

In looking about for a sensational field in which to utilize his enormous facility and inventive talent Richard Strauss hit upon the idea of superlative program schemes. He began with moderation, and his first symphonic poems, although startlingly new, were sane and consistently musical, but his ambition has seemed to lead him toward the stupendous rather than toward the pure in art. With this aim he chose "Also sprach Zarathustra," "Till Eulenspiegel's lustige Streiche," Synfonia Domestica" (the last portraying a day of his family life). None of these themes would seem to be fruitful in musical moods, "Zarathustra" is the expression of a philosophic creed. "Till Eulenspiegel" is not emotionally suggestive, but it furnishes a succession of pranks which Strauss has portrayed in a masterful way, displaying a wonderful ingenuity without a throb of musical impulse. Strauss has now outgrown symphonic poems, and is devoting himself to writing unclean operas. With the creation of "Tod und Verklaerung" ("Death and Apotheosis") Strauss attained his greatest musical eloquence, and he has since evinced less and less respect for traditions and for the truth in art. He is always gigantic, but not always convincing nor comforting. "A Hero Life" is one of Strauss' later symphonic poems, but it is a reasonable and suggestive theme, and he has made it a monumental work. Much of it is harrowing to the ear, and it would seem unnecessarily so, for other great composers have pictured stormy scenes with less cacophony, but the whole outline is not only boldly drawn but is graphically expressive. The love episode is beautiful, and the concert-master played the violin solo representing the loved one most beautifully. It cannot be said that Mr. Fiedler secured even a fair performance of this piece.

A Fine Pianist.

Ernest Schelling is an exceedingly fine pianist, and he played his "Fantastic" suite most brilliantly. The work has many fine qualities. The themes of the first movement are strong and characteristic, and the orchestral seting is appropriate and effective. The second movement is in every way charming. The third is melodic and pleasant to the ear, but it is not so distinctively individual as are the first two. The last movement is not a success. Few composers could employ "Dixie" in an earnest composition in such a manner as to avoid a calamity. As Mr. Schelling manipulated it there were no redeeming qualities. It undermined the dignity of the whole suite, which deserves a worthier close.

The Debussy Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" is a true art conception, most subtly expressed. There is in its characteristic atmosphere ample contrapuntal and instrumental novelty, but it all sounds inevitable. Debussy would be a great composer were he always willing to follow natural lines and modes, as he has in this prelude. This work establishes the fact that Debussy's imagination is so individual and his invention so rich that he need not crowd the amiable features of music to the wall in order to be different. The "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," was not satisfactorily played, and the too familiar "Flying Dutchman" overture was not very welcome, coming as it did at the end of a long and exacting program.

O. B. B.

STAR
MAR 18 1909

INTERESTING PROGRAM BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Orchestra Gives Last Concert of the Season Before a Large Audience.

The program for the last of this season's concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented last evening at the Lyric was, whatever else may be said of it, an interesting one.

By far the most beautiful number to be given was the first Richard Strauss' tone poem, "A Hero Life," a composition which represents this modern master in his most attractive style.

During the whole of the performance of this composition which lasted for nearly an hour the deep interest of the audience was most successfully held, the orchestra was at its best under Conductor Fiedler, and the applause at the conclusion was most enthusiastic. The following was the complete program given:

Richard Strauss—
Tone Poem, "A Hero Life," Op. 40.
Schilling—
Fantastic Suite for Pianoforte and Orchestra.
Allegro marziale.
Scherzando e molto leggiero; Trio: Andantino.
Intermezzo: Adagio.
Virginia Reel: Molto vivace.
Debussy—
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" (after the Eclogue of Stephane Mallarme).
Wagner—
"Waldweben" ("Life and Stir of the Forest") from "Siegfried," Act II.
Wagner—
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

While the composition of the pianist, Ernest Schelling, who played his own work, gave no indication of greatness, it was decidedly interesting. He is a disciple of the modern school, and his Fantastic suite gave the impression that, born in New Jersey, his idea was to write music that might be termed distinctly American.

This impression was deepened when the concluding number introduced what, in the words of a so-called popular writer, might be described as "Dixie" with variations, "Old Folks at Home" and the notes of "Yankee Doodle."

It was a matter of some surprise to see a movement on a symphonic program called "Virginia Reel," "Molto Vivace," but the amazement was intensified when the auditors began to hear the familiar notes of "Dixie," followed by those of the "Suwanee River." It was an American artistic triumph by an American composer who has triumphed in American music all over the Old World. Under his scientific writing and skilful playing "Dixie" captivated Berlin and Leipsic, as it had before charmed Robert E. Lee and Abraham Lincoln.

As a whole Mr. Schelling's music last evening indicated that as a writer he will attain rather a wide popularity, if he cannot hope for undying fame.

The Debussy selection, a weird, imaginative thing, was greeted with much applause, and the two concluding works, "The Flying Dutchman" overture and "Waldweben," received the appreciation upon which the German master may always count. The audience was a large one, and Conductor Max Fiedler received a specially enthusiastic welcome.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

IN THE SOCIAL WORLD

Mrs. Taft Attends Concert of Symphony Orchestra.

MRS. SHERMAN GIVES LUNCH

French Ambassador and Mme. Jusserand Entertain at Dinner—Rev. F. D. Power and Mrs. Power to Hold Reception in Vermont Avenue Christian Church—Entertain at Tea.

Mrs. Taft, wife of the President, occupied a box at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Felder, conductor, and Ernest Schelling, pianist. Mrs. Taft had with her her sister, Mrs. Moore; her niece, Miss Anderson; Mrs. Audenreid, and Mr. and Mrs. Gordon Cumming.

MAR 18 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY SCORES TRIUMPH

RENDERED FINEST PROGRAM OF THE SEASON.

"A Hero's Life," a Magnificent Work, Beautifully Rendered—Conductor MacFiedler Given an Ovation—Audience Given a Delightful Surprise in Works of Ernest Schilling—Strains of Dixie Heard.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the last and best concert of its all too brief season at the Lyric last evening in presenting superbly the following excellent modern program:

Richard Strauss—
Tone Poem, "A Hero Life," Op. 40.
Schilling—
Fantastic Suite for Pianoforte and Orchestra.
Allegro marziale.
Scherzando e molto leggiero; Trio: Andantino.
Intermezzo: Adagio.
Virginia Reel: Molto vivace.
Debussy—
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" (after the Eclogue of Stephane Mallarme).
Wagner—
"Waldweben" ("Life and Stir of the Forest") from "Siegfried," Act II.
Wagner—
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

Berlioz gave the greatest boon to musical humanity when he conceived of the modern orchestra and gave up the practice of law to carry his artistic vision into actual reality. He had no piano in his house, but his bosom friends were his pair of tympani. He reformed and regenerated the classic orchestria of Haydn and Mozart into a cosmopolitan musical organization which could include the musical instruments of all nations in a happy family of scientific harmony. Then he showed the kind of music that should be used by such an orchestra. His music was made to mean something special in every bar and was soon called program music. But it remodeled the artistic world. He gave his examples in his overtures, such as Benvenuto Cellini and King Lear. But the climax of his idea was not reached until it was employed by the latest modern composer, Richard Strauss. His works were at first pronounced impossible by many conductors, as were those of Berlioz formerly, but they are now the delight of the cultured musical world.

Was a Fine Triumph.

No finer musical work has been heard than the tone poem, work 40, "A Hero Life," by this same Richard Strauss, and its fine performance by the Boston Orchestra last evening, under its able conductor, Max Fiedler, was the greatest triumph that organization has ever had in this city. It was long, as a hero's life should be, but there was not a bar in it that could be left out without serious musical loss. At its close the conductor was given an ovation, which he magnanimously shared with his splendid orchestra.

Ernest Schelling, the composer, was also the soloist of the evening, playing his own characteristic work, a "fantastic suite for piano and orchestra." Mr. Schelling's name is German, indicating his Teutonic extraction. But he is an American-born citizen, even from New Jersey. It was a matter of some surprise to see a movement on a symphonic program called "Virginia Reel," "Molto Vivace," but the amazement was intensified when the auditors began to hear the familiar notes of "Dixie," followed by those of the "Suwanee River." It was an American artistic triumph by an American composer who has triumphed in American music all over the Old World. Under his scientific writing and skillful playing "Dixie" captivated Berlin and Leipsig, as it had before charmed Robert E. Lee and Abraham Lincoln.

After the reel yesterday afternoon Schelling was recalled time and again. The whole work is scholarly and beautiful and is a demonstration of what America must soon have in greater abundance. The power of the first part of the program last evening was so great as to make the familiar Wagner numbers at the end of the evening be taken rather as a matter of course, as elder children, whose noses are for the time, "out of joint." Of course they are a great and good works as ever they were, but the world moves and calls for what is newer and, in its way, more to present liking.

There was the usual large audience.

WORLD
New York City.
MAR 19 1909

OLD BRUCKNER MUSIC NEW TO GOTHAM EARS.

Boston Orchestra Produces His Eighth Symphony and Other Works Novel Here.

By Reginald de Koven.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been prolific of novelties this season and there were no fewer than two on the programme of its final evening concert in Carnegie Hall last night. There was no soloist; the orchestra, playing superbly, being all sufficient. The principal novelty of the programme was the symphony No. 8, C minor, by Anton Bruckner, which, though produced in 1892, was played for the first time in New York last night.

Why a composition so important and interesting in spite of its length should have been so long in reaching us is difficult to understand. Of the several symphonic novelties heard this season this Bruckner work appeals to me the most as possessing more intrinsic music, a more unified and cohesive structure, more salient melodic thought and more frankly sought beauty than any of the others. It is modern without aural offense, subtle and inward without indefiniteness and mystification.

Though the score bears no motto, an attempt has been made to attach a programme of the Aeschylus "Prometheus" to the work without much plausibility. To the scherzo of the usual four movements the composer gave the title "The German Michel," typifying a boor or yokel, which the rough gayety of the movement justifies in a way, while the noble adagio is known as the longest symphonic adagio movement and among the most beautiful. These two movements impressed me most at the first hearing of a work which, though long, is never dull, and though somewhat theatric in style, is still both noble and dignified in design and treatment, and garbed in vivid and effective orchestral colors. Said to be the best of Bruckner's nine symphonies, it strikes me as being from the hand of a master not yet come into his own.

The other novelty, an "Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare," by Scheinpflug, a young composer of Bremen, proved to be an episodic and rather disjointed work, melodious, with its introduced old English theme, and effective from an inherent buoyant sincerity and vitality rather than from finished workmanship or originality in melody or structure. Which comedy it illustrates the composer has not made known, and the illustration is evidently more in the spirit than in the letter, though perhaps "The Merry Wives of Windsor" is suggested.

A performance of Debussy's "Afternoon," rather lacking in poetry and finesse, and a showy reading of the "Meistersinger" prelude closed a programme, after which both Mr. Tredler and the orchestra received much parting applause. But no matter who the conductor there is only one Boston Symphony.

EVENING SUN,
New York City.
MAR 18 1909

Max Fiedler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to town to-day on their last visit of the season. At start of this final roundup, it was announced that Fiedler had signed for another year and asked his release from Hamburg until May, 1910. He will run over to Germany this summer.

Manager Fred Comee arrived with the news that the touring Boston men had, as usual, been the first in the nation's capital to play to the new President's lady. He looked more serious when asked as to the name of one Bruckner on to-night's local programme.

"Mr. Fiedler is an ardent believer," said the practical man, "in the genius of Anton Bruckner."

"So were our Dr. Muck and Arthur Nikisch and Felix Weingarten before," echoed William Walter, who had come from Boston again to Brother Eugene's play. "But unlike them Fiedler believes that the time has come when this strange genius will be recognized by our public.

"Bruckner's eighth symphony had never been played in America until Mr. Fiedler performed it in Boston the other day. He regards the adagio as being the most beautiful slow movement in the whole history of music."

Everybody but Charley Ellis heard from; but who's that man "Weingarten" our Boston authorities mention?

[209]

NEW YORK, MAR 8 1909

MUSIC

Fifth And Last Concert Of Boston Symphony Orchestra, With Ernest Schelling As The Soloist.

Mr. Fiedler presented the following program:

Tone poem, "A Hero Life," Op. 40....Richard Strauss
Fantastic suite for pianoforte and orchestra .....Schelling
I. Allegro marziale.
II. Scherzando e molto leggiero; Trio: Andantino.
III. Intermezzo: Adagio.
IV. Virginia Reel: Molto vivace.
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" (after the Eclogue of Stephane Mallarme.....Debussy
"Waldweben" ("Life and Stir of the Forest") from "Siegfried," Act II.....Wagner
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman".....Wagner

Tonal language has its distinctive province and limitations. Its province is to express the composer's moods so that they may appeal to the susceptibilities of those who hear his writings; and its high estate totters when it is brought down to the imitation or impersonation of less spiritual and more material ideas or things. Not being articulate, isolated sounds have only such significance as can be imparted to them through dynamic variations and through color modulations. High tones have brighter colors than low ones, and some voices and instruments are organically white, while others grade down to the very somber. The composer must therefore depend largely upon combinations and successions of tones in creating desired moods. A genius, like Richard Strauss, can clearly express joy, rage, love, sorrow, etc., with tonal resources; but the complexity involved in creating even atmospheres of these moods debars him from depicting analyzed detail. He may recognizably differentiate between love and joy, or between pain and sorrow, but attempts to picture the fine shades of difference in the conditions causing emotions, to trace the successive events in a day's experience or to expound philosophic theories must necessarily rob music of its most exalted qualities—unqualified truth and clear individuality.

Strauss' Program Schemes.

In looking about for a sensational field in which to utilize his enormous facility and inventive talent Richard Strauss hit upon the idea of superlative program schemes. He began with moderation, and his first symphonic poems, although startlingly new, were sane and consistently musical, but his ambition has seemed to lead him toward the stupendous rather than toward the pure in art. With this aim he chose "Also sprach Zarathustra," "Till Eulenspiegel's lustige Streiche," Synfonia Domestica" (the last portraying a day of his family life). None of these themes would seem to be fruitful in musical moods. "Zarathustra" is the expression of a philosophic creed. "Till Eulenspiegel" is not emotionally suggestive, but it furnishes a succession of pranks which Strauss has portrayed in a masterful way, displaying a wonderful ingenuity without a throb of musical impulse. Strauss has now outgrown symphonic poems, and is devoting himself to writing unclean operas. With the creation of "Tod und Verklaerung" ("Death and Apotheosis") Strauss attained his greatest musical eloquence, and he has since evinced less and less respect for traditions and for the truth in art. He is always gigantic, but not always convincing nor comforting. "A Hero Life" is one of Strauss' later symphonic poems, but it is a reasonable and suggestive theme, and he has made it a monumental work. Much of it is harrowing to the ear, and it would seem unnecessarily so, for other great composers have pictured stormy scenes with less cacophony, but the whole outline is not only boldly drawn but is graphically expressive. The love episode is beautiful, and the concert-master played the violin solo representing the loved one most beautifully. It cannot be said that Mr. Fiedler secured even a fair performance of this piece.

A Fine Pianist.

Ernest Schelling is an exceedingly fine pianist, and he played his "Fantastic" suite most brilliantly. The work has many fine qualities. The themes of the first movement are strong and characteristic, and the orchestral setting is appropriate and effective. The second movement is in every way charming. The third is melodic and pleasant to the ear, but it is not so distinctively individual as are the first two. The last movement is not a success. Few composers could employ "Dixie" in an earnest composition in such a manner as to avoid a calamity. As Mr. Schelling manipulated it there were no redeeming qualities. It undermined the dignity of the whole suite, which deserves a worthier close.

The Debussy Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" is a true art conception, most subtly expressed. There is in its characteristic atmosphere ample contrapuntal and instrumental novelty, but it all sounds inevitable. Debussy would be a great composer were he always willing to follow natural lines and modes, as he has in this prelude. This work establishes the fact that Debussy's imagination is so individual and his invention so rich that he need not crowd the amiable features of music to the wall in order to be different. The "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," was not satisfactorily played, and the too familiar "Flying Dutchman" overture was not very welcome, coming as it did at the end of a long and exacting program.

O. B. B.

STAR, MAR 18 1909

INTERESTING PROGRAM BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Orchestra Gives Last Concert of the Season Before a Large Audience.

The program for the last of this season's concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented last evening at the Lyric was, whatever else may be said of it, an interesting one.

By far the most beautiful number to be given was the first Richard Strauss' tone poem, "A Hero Life," a composition which represents this modern master in his most attractive style.

During the whole of the performance of this composition which lasted for nearly an hour the deep interest of the audience was most successfully held, the orchestra was at its best under Conductor Fiedler, and the applause at the conclusion was most enthusiastic. The following was the complete program given:

Richard Strauss—
Tone Poem, "A Hero Life," Op. 40.
Schilling—
Fantastic Suite for Pianoforte and Orchestra.
Allegro marziale.
Scherzando e molto leggiero; Trio: Andantino.
Intermezzo: Adagio.
Virginia Reel: Molto vivace.
Debussy—
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" (after the Eclogue of Stephane Mallarme).
Wagner—
"Waldweben" ("Life and Stir of the Forest") from "Siegfried," Act II.
Wagner—
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

While the composition of the pianist, Ernest Schelling, who played his own work, gave no indication of greatness, it was decidedly interesting. He is a disciple of the modern school, and his Fantastic suite gave the impression that, born in New Jersey, his idea was to write music that might be termed distinctly American.

This impression was deepened when the concluding number introduced what, in the words of a so-called popular writer, might be described as "Dixie" with variations, "Old Folks at Home" and the notes of "Yankee Doodle."

It was a matter of some surprise to see a movement on a symphonic program called "Virginia Reel," "Molto Vivace," but the amazement was intensified when the auditors began to hear the familiar notes of "Dixie," followed by those of the "Suwanee River." It was an American artistic triumph by an American composer who has triumphed in American music all over the Old World. Under his scientific writing and skilful playing "Dixie" captivated Berlin and Leipsic, as it had before charmed Robert E. Lee and Abraham Lincoln.

As a whole Mr. Schelling's music last evening indicated that as a writer he will attain rather a wide popularity, if he cannot hope for undying fame.

The Debussy selection, a weird, imaginative thing, was greeted with much applause, and the two concluding works, "The Flying Dutchman" overture and "Waldweben," received the appreciation upon which the German master may always count. The audience was a large one, and Conductor Max Fiedler received a specially enthusiastic welcome.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

IN THE SOCIAL WORLD

Mrs. Taft Attends Concert of Symphony Orchestra.

MRS. SHERMAN GIVES LUNCH

French Ambassador and Mme. Jusserand Entertain at Dinner—Rev. F. D. Power and Mrs. Power to Hold Reception in Vermont Avenue Christian Church—Entertain at Tea.

Mrs. Taft, wife of the President, occupied a box at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Felder, conductor, and Ernest Schelling, pianist. Mrs. Taft had with her her sister, Mrs. Moore; her niece, Miss Anderson; Mrs. Audenreid, and Mr. and Mrs. Gordon Cumming.

BOSTON SYMPHONY SCORES TRIUMPH

RENDERED FINEST PROGRAM OF THE SEASON.

"A Hero's Life," a Magnificent Work, Beautifully Rendered—Conductor MacFiedler Given an Ovation—Audience Given a Delightful Surprise in Works of Ernest Schilling—Strains of Dixie Heard.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the last and best concert of its all too brief season at the Lyric last evening in presenting superbly the following excellent modern program:

Richard Strauss—
Tone Poem, "A Hero Life," Op. 40.
Schilling—
Fantastic Suite for Pianoforte and Orchestra.
Allegro marziale.
Scherzando e molto leggiero; Trio: Andantino.
Intermezzo: Adagio.
Virginia Reel: Molto vivace.
Debussy—
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" (after the Eclogue of Stephane Mallarme).
Wagner—
"Waldweben" ("Life and Stir of the Forest") from "Siegfried," Act II.
Wagner—
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

Berlioz gave the greatest boon to musical humanity when he conceived of the modern orchestra and gave up the practice of law to carry his artistic vision into actual reality. He had no piano in his house, but his bosom friends were his pair of tympani. He reformed and regenerated the classic orchestria of Haydn and Mozart into a cosmopolitan musical organization which could include the musical instruments of all nations in a happy family of scientific harmony. Then he showed the kind of music that should be used by such an orchestra. His music was made to mean something special in every bar and was soon called program music. But it remodeled the artistic world. He gave his examples in his overtures, such as Benvenuto Cellini and King Lear. But the climax of his idea was not reached until it was employed by the latest modern composer, Richard Strauss. His works were at first pronounced impossible by many conductors, as were those of Berlioz formerly, but they are now the delight of the cultured musical world.

Was a Fine Triumph.

No finer musical work has been heard than the tone poem, work 40, "A Hero Life," by this same Richard Strauss, and its fine performance by the Boston Orchestra last evening, under its able conductor, Max Fiedler, was the greatest triumph that organization has ever had in this city. It was long, as a hero's life should be, but there was not a bar in it that could be left out without serious musical loss. At its close the conductor was given an ovation, which he magnanimously shared with his splendid orchestra.

Ernest Schelling, the composer, was also the soloist of the evening, playing his own characteristic work, a "fantastic suite for piano and orchestra." Mr. Schelling's name is German, indicating his Teutonic extraction. But he is an American-born citizen, even from New Jersey. It was a matter of some surprise to see a movement on a symphonic program called "Virginia Reel," "Molto Vivace," but the amazement was intensified when the auditors began to hear the familiar notes of "Dixie," followed by those of the "Suwanee River." It was an American artistic triumph by an American composer who has triumphed in American music all over the Old World. Under his scientific writing and skillful playing "Dixie" captivated Berlin and Leipsig, as it had before charmed Robert E. Lee and Abraham Lincoln.

After the reel yesterday afternoon Schelling was recalled time and again. The whole work is scholarly and beautiful and is a demonstration of what America must soon have in greater abundance. The power of the first part of the program last evening was so great as to make the familiar Wagner numbers at the end of the evening be taken rather as a matter of course, as elder children, whose noses are for the time, "out of joint." Of course they are a great and good works as ever they were, but the world moves and calls for what is newer and, in its way, more to present liking.

There was the usual large audience.

WORLD, New York City. MAR 19 1909

OLD BRUCKNER MUSIC NEW TO GOTHAM EARS.

Boston Orchestra Produces His Eighth Symphony and Other Works Novel Here.

By Reginald de Koven.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been prolific of novelties this season and there were no fewer than two on the programme of its final evening concert in Carnegie Hall last night. There was no soloist; the orchestra, playing superbly, being all sufficient. The principal novelty of the programme was the symphony No. 8, C minor, by Anton Bruckner, which, though produced in 1892, was played for the first time in New York last night.

Why a composition so important and interesting in spite of its length should have been so long in reaching us is difficult to understand. Of the several symphonic novelties heard this season this Bruckner work appeals to me the most as possessing more intrinsic music, a more unified and cohesive structure, more salient melodic thought and more frankly sought beauty than any of the others. It is modern without aural offense, subtle and inward without indefiniteness and mystification.

Though the score bears no motto, an attempt has been made to attach a programme of the Aeschylus "Prometheus" to the work without much plausibility. To the scherzo of the usual four movements the composer gave the title "The German Michel," typifying a boor or yokel, which the rough gayety of the movement justifies in a way, while the noble adagio is known as the longest symphonic adagio movement and among the most beautiful. These two movements impressed me most at the first hearing of a work which, though long, is never dull, and though somewhat theatric in style, is still both noble and dignified in design and treatment, and garbed in vivid and effective orchestral colors. Said to be the best of Bruckner's nine symphonies, it strikes me as being from the hand of a master not yet come into his own.

The other novelty, an "Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare," by Scheinpflug, a young composer of Bremen, proved to be an episodic and rather disjointed work, melodious, with its introduced old English theme, and effective from an inherent buoyant sincerity and vitality rather than from finished workmanship or originality in melody or structure. Which comedy it illustrates the composer has not made known, and the illustration is evidently more in the spirit than in the letter, though perhaps "The Merry Wives of Windsor" is suggested.

A performance of Debussy's "Afternoon," rather lacking in poetry and finesse, and a showy reading of the "Meistersinger" prelude closed a programme, after which both Mr. Tredler and the orchestra received much parting applause. But no matter who the conductor there is only one Boston Symphony.

From EVENING SUN, New York City. MAR 18 1909

Max Fiedler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to town to-day on their last visit of the season. At start of this final roundup, it was announced that Fiedler had signed for another year and asked his release from Hamburg until May, 1910. He will run over to Germany this summer.

Manager Fred Comee arrived with the news that the touring Boston men had, as usual, been the first in the nation's capital to play to the new President's lady. He looked more serious when asked as to the name of one Bruckner on to-night's local programme.

"Mr. Fiedler is an ardent believer," said the practical man, "in the genius of Anton Bruckner."

"So were our Dr. Muck and Arthur Nikisch and Felix Weingarten before," echoed William Walter, who had come from Boston again to Brother Eugene's play. "But unlike them Fiedler believes that the time has come when this strange genius will be recognized by our public.

"Bruckner's eighth symphony had never been played in America until Mr. Fiedler performed it in Boston the other day. He regards the adagio as being the most beautiful slow movement in the whole history of music."

Everybody but Charley Ellis heard from; but who's that man "Weingarten" our Boston authorities mention?

TIMES,

New York City.

MAR 19 1909

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Bruckner's Eighth Symphony and Scheinpflug's Overture Played

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is in New York on the last visit it will make this season, and gave its last evening concert yesterday in Carnegie Hall. There was no solo performer, and interest of the concert was centred on the orchestra's performance of Bruckner's Eighth Symphony in C minor, Paul Schinpflug's overture to a comedy of Shakespeare, Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," and the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger."

Mr. Fiedler seems to have undertaken to carry on the Bruckner crusade that Dr. Muck brought to New York in each of the two years in which he conducted the orchestra; and thus in three successive seasons there have been three of Bruckner's symphonies given in New York by the Boston Orchestra. The one heard last evening was played for the first time in New York, and the recent performance of it in Boston was the first in this country. Though the symphony has been eighteen years in reaching the United States, for it was finished in 1890, it has somewhat more to commend it to the acceptance of music lovers than most of the others by the same composer that have been heard here. It is in parts more musically interesting; some of the ideas are more tangible and more coherently presented; yet the work suffers from most of the faults that are so patent in the others.

It is exceedingly long; it is exceedingly diffuse and discursive. Many of the musical subjects in themselves lack interest, and the composer's method of development by incessant repetition and the elaboration, piece by piece and fragment by fragment, of many of his themes becomes in the end—or rather, long before the end—exhausting. There is in this eighth symphony the same strange juxtaposition that is found in the others, of finely conceived and even noble passages alongside of laborious, dry, and tedious music making. In this, as in his other symphonies, Bruckner betrays the lack of concentration of idea and of the power of self-criticism, that works to destroy the value and potency of his work.

There is here, as elsewhere, the strong suggestion of Wagner's influence that he gladly admitted. It is seen in the character of certain of his themes, in his instrumentation, and in the general physiognomy of more than a few pages of the score, as in the climax of the last movement, which recalls again the last scene of "Das Rheingold." The long adagio, which some have found to be the finest of all symphonic adagios, has certainly many fine and deeply impressive passages, but it is characteristic of Bruckner that these are passages only, and that he does not sustain the whole movement on a high level of interest. The heavy-footed scherzo has rough humor, and the trio maintains the listener's interest longer than any other section of the work.

Mr. Fiedler conducted the symphony with intense zeal and conviction, and realized, as it seemed, all the composer's intentions in sympathy with his spirit. There were many in the audience who applauded warmly, yet the symphony clearly did not impress itself deeply upon the great body of the listeners. The fervent admiration for Bruckner that a number of great conductors and authoritative students of music have expressed by words and deeds was scarcely more convincingly explained by this performance than by those that have preceded it in the recent experience of New York concertgoers.

Scheinpflug's overture to a Shakespearean comedy is the work of a man whose name is strange to New York. It is a good piece of musical humor, with traits of a true comic spirit expressed by means not altogether conventional. There are mirthful themes, and brilliant elaboration of them, though this elaboration seems at times somewhat artificial. The composer has not indicated which of Shakespeare's comedies suggested this music to him. Mr. Philip Hale in his annotations to the programme hazards "The Merry Wives of Windsor" as a guess, and it is plausible to find a reference to Falstaff in some of the ponderous measures of the music. However this may be, there is enough in the music to give pleasure for its own sake.

From STAATS ZEITUNG,

Address New York City.

Date

Bostoner Symphonie-Concert.

Gestern Abend fand in Carnegie Hall das letzte diesjährige Abend-Concert der Bostoner vor ganz gefülltem Saal und unter einem Erfolg statt, der sich nach Schluß der äußerst gelungenen Darbietung zu einer Ovation für den Dirigenten Herrn Max Fiedler und seine stolze Künstlerschaar steigerte. Das Programm enthielt als pièce de résistance Bruckner's Achte Symphonie, die eine über alles Lob erhabene Ausführung fand. Sämmtliche Sätze des gigantischen Werkes wurden lebhaft beklatscht, sa daß Herr Fiedler am Ende das ganze Orchester aufstehen und danken lassen mußte. Wir werden über das Riesenwerk und die kongeniale Wiedergabe morgen sprechen.

Das Programm enthielt noch eine andere Novität für New York, nämlich Paul Scheinpflug's Ouverture „Zu einer Komödie von Shakespeare", ein heiteres, liebenswürdiges Werk, das viel Anklang fand. Debussy's „Nachmittag eines Fauns" und das „Meistersinger"-Vorspiel vervollständigten ein Programm, das der Zuhörerschaft lebhaftes Vergnügen verschaffte.

NEW YORK PRESS,

New York City.

MAR 19 1909

NEW YORKERS WELCOME BRUCKNER'S GREAT MUSIC

His Eighth Symphony Is Offered by Fiedler in Carnegie Hall.

ITS FIRST PERFORMANCE HERE

Boston Orchestra Plays the Inspired Work in C Minor Unevenly but Impressively.

Bruckner's titanic Eighth Symphony, more than an hour in duration, had its first New York hearing last night in Carnegie Hall, and behold! it aroused genuine enthusiasm, if not the tempestuous kind shown in 1892 at its premiere in Vienna. The performance was not due to any special cordiality shown here in the past toward the music of this great, neglected composer.

No, indeed! Certain pernicious influences, consistently opposed to the admittance of light, have worked with venomous weapons against the promulgation of Bruckner's art-message, influences that have shown the utmost gentleness toward unimportant emanations of a Paderewski. But, then, Bruckner has been silent these many years, whereas Paderewski, the pianist, is alive and can boast many friends in New York.

Far from being the result of encouragement, last night's performance of the Eighth Symphony was due to the courage of Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, just as the performance of Bruckner's Ninth, last season, was due to the bravery of Dr. Muck. These men realize that great music seldom makes an immediate appeal to the public; they feel it is their mission, irrespective of short-sighted criticism, to make their audiences acquainted with whatever holds an important position in the literature of music.

Fiedler, then, should have the thanks of every subscriber to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. If he had accomplished nothing else in his present engagement, his unselfish championship of Bruckner's cause, which also is the cause of those who want enlightenment on all musical subjects, stands out as an achievement.

Time will prove, slowly but inevitably, that Bruckner's Symphony in C minor is a masterpiece of orchestral literature, an expression in symphonic form of feelings that never have been expressed before as they are here, and never will be again, a veritable torrent of inspiation and of ideas. See what Hugo Wolf, another great composer, wrote to Dr. Emil Kauffman in 1893 about this work:

"I share absolutely your feelings concerning the tremendously overpowering adagio. Probably there is nothing in music to be compared with it. Certainly not as to contents, though, to be sure, in a formal sense, it fails to give full satisfaction, especially because of its excessive breadth and expansion. Here it is that Bruckner falls short of Beethoven. Still, the first movement, bristling with energy, sturdily constructed and concise, is absolutely unique; perhaps, indeed, the most perfect achievement of its kind we possess. The effect of this movement as played by an orchestra is simply overwhelming and destroys every critical inclination."

Thus Wolf, and similarly the musical elect of Germany, with few exceptions. Since then Bruckner's last symphony, uncompleted, was brought to tonal life, a work that in sublimity of vision, in harmonic mastership and in instrumental coloring perhaps stands still higher. Yet the Eighth Symphony always will hold its own by reason of its compactness and clearness of form compared to the composer's other works and because of the inherent nobility and humanity of its emotional substratum.

Let it be conceded that this work, like Bruckner's other symphonies, is inordinately long for modern men and women, whose minds always are dwelling on what they will do next. But such criticism does not carry great weight. Works of genius are not created for the special benefit of folk who are worried and fretted by the hustle and bustle of big cities. They are for all times.

The important fact revealed last night in a by no means impeccable but fervent and deeply felt performance was the immense sweep and power of the composer's musical ideas and the inspired mastership with which he molded them into a colossal symphonic monument. There is in the themes of Bruckner the breath of divine origin, and when his brass-buckled orchestra gives utterance to them it seems as if a mighty organ, in a world above and beyond this, were pealing their stupendous message.

Bruckner's Eighth symphony might be called "A Hero's Life," or, more appropriately, perhaps, "A Soul's Struggle." There can be little doubt that the composer carried in his heart a literary key to his works, even if he expressed all he had to say in absolute music. There is not one theme in this symphony which does not bear an almost gesticulatory meaning, though there is not the slightest flavor of theatricalism.

The first theme of the opening movement, for example, proclaimed by bass viols, 'cellos and violas, suggests painful struggling against something inevitable; the second seems a vision of hope and peace. The first theme of the scherzo depicts unmistakably the exuberant joy of a typical Teuton, and the exquisite trio, one of the most charming episodes in Bruckner's music, describes appropriately what the composer himself once said of it, "Der Deutsche Michel Traeumt ins Land hinaus."

As to the long-breathing opening theme of the wonderful adagio, it thrills with the spirit of religious devotion, plaintive and humble, while the second theme, almost liturgic in its nature, conveys inevitably the idea of kindly consolation. The final movement, with the galloping rhythm of its opening measures, is martial in character. How question that here the composer had a battle in mind? Note with what beautiful results he injects into the din of warfare a contrasting chorale, as it were the battle hymn of the soldiers.

In form the first movement is most nearly perfect. There are none of those digressions which critics have found fault with in most of Bruckner's works. The scherzo, quick, spirited and easily assimilated, pleases immediately, and last night got the most applause. But after all it is the adagio, in which, by the way, Fiedler made a liberal cut, that lingers in the memory as the profoundest and most moving part of the score. Unabbreviated, this adagio is the longest slow movement ever written, but also one of the most beautiful. Here let the Bruckner detractor croak about weary wastes. Yet this movement, with its three tremendous crescendos, is perfectly perspicuous in form and to those who know it well contains not one moment of monotony. An adagio, this, marvelous for its expression of noble yet intense passion and pathos.

There is in Bruckner's symphony an inexhaustible treasure of euphonious counterpoints. No clever juggling with warring thematic shreds such as Strauss indulges in, but the conjunction of real musical ideas that convey the impression of inevitable affinity of feeling, and every thought, every feeling is clothed in instrumental colors absolutely appropriate. Never does the orchestra scintillate for its own sake, even in its most gorgeous moments.

After this colossal symphony Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare," also performed for the first time, sounded vulgar. Yet this work, decidedly suggestive of Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," is a clever and effective composition, and the audience seemed to enjoy it. Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" brought the interesting programme to a close. Fiedler conducted the Bruckner symphony with evident enthusiasm. But the work is extremely difficult and there were many signs of insufficient rehearsing.

From

Address

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Thomas Whitney Surette Gives the Preliminary Lecture to To-night's Event.

In Music Hall, Academy of Music, yesterday afternoon, Thomas Whitney Surett gave the lecture recital on the programme of the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Opera House of that building this evening, both being under direction of the Brooklyn Institute. The list includes the symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," by Rimsky-Korsakoff; the tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Strauss; prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," Debussy, and the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" and overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner. Of these, Mr. Surette took only the first and second for extended interpretation, devoting brief description to the Debussy number and omitting the Wagner selections because of their familiarity. Assisted by Miss Ethel May Colgate at a second piano, he played rather full excerpts from both the first mentioned. Attention was called to the high connective violin solo which represents Scheherazade, and to the Russian's expression of a certain type of thought in music which bears close resemblance to that written by Mendelssohn and Wagner when expressing similar thought. "This shows there is a kind of language of music," said Mr. Surette, adding, "That is an advantage of programme music; it brings this fact to our notice." In the second number of the suite is such repetition as occurs in the Pathetic Symphony, very Oriental in effect, followed by a combination of notes such as Strauss uses in more extreme form. In the third number, Mr. Surette found "nice little tunes and cadences," and advised his hearers to make the most of them, "for you won't hear any more this afternoon."

When taking up the tone poem by Strauss, Mr. Surette said that "He is undoubtedly a great genius, but he is developing the perverse side of it when he writes things which are outside of the domain of art. Undying things in art must be normal and elevating—uplifting. I think in the case of 'Salome' that writing falls beneath this rule, though it is interesting as a composition. Strauss is allowing this perverse side to become more and more evident." Here the "Sinfornia Domestica" and others similar were mentioned, and it was said that these are inferior "for the reason that Strauss is trying to produce something that music cannot do, something that does not lie at all within its sphere." The effect of the combination of F minor and B minor chords in "Electra" was shown on the piano. "They sound together. So there you are—and where are you?" asked the lecturer, adding that in the orchestra the one chord is taken by the harp and the other by the wood wind—"and my anger — anguish — are somewhat mitigated by this." Here he explained how harmonics have developed along more and more difficult lines as the study of music progresses, and how the relations of harmonics are opening out an already new world. What was objectionable to the musicians of his day when Beethoven made new combinations of harmony now seems simple to us who can realize the advance of musical thought. Application of what had been said of Strauss was also made to Debussy, though the numbers by each, programmed for to-night, were thought fine examples of their best—which ranks high.

From GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

New York City.

MAR 19 1909

THE REAL BRUCKNER.

AFTER hearing Anton Bruckner's eighth symphony at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night one could not but wonder why it has taken upward of sixteen years for this mighty composition to reach American concert halls. It was performed for the first time anywhere at a Philharmonic concert in Vienna under the direction of Hans Richter, Dec. 18, 1892. Yet its first performances in America are said to have been those of last week at the public rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston. Only yesterday did New York hear it.

In the interim Bruckner has not lacked apostles here. The late Theodore Thomas did not neglect him utterly, nor did Mr. Gericke. Dr. Muck came here a reputed Bruckner enthusiast. One story has it that when it was settled that he should suceed Mr. Gericke in Boston he forthwith planned to present the nine symphonies of Bruckner at nine successive concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Since Karl Muck's doctorial title is not his only academic attribute, the story seems not wholly improbable. But the good Doctor did not execute that extremely educational project. He did, however, conduct the seventh and ninth symphonies of his idol. He conducted them not only in Boston but in New York. The seventh revealed "great moments." It would be ungracious to the last degree to deny the moments in deploring the hours! As for the ninth, it is unfinished, its one virtue.

Dr. Muck, one fears, was a voice crying in the wilderness when he tried to prepare the way of Bruckner. His successor, Mr. Fiedler, is no less a Bruckner enthusiast, but with a difference. He has proceeded to do what to those who stand without the cult seems merely the obvious thing. Observing that the master's eighth symphony had not been given here, he straightway gave it.

In this symphony one hears the real Bruckner, not the crabbed, half ludicrous pedant who boasted that he was doing for the symphony what Wagner had done for the opera, and then matched Beethoven by putting forth his symphonic message in nine instalments. The Bruckner of the eighth symphony dwells upon the heights and speaks the language of the immortals. In melodic invention, in structure, in orchestral treatment, in sustained interest, this symphony is far removed from the symphonies of Bruckner heard here before. Of the garrulous, the pedantic, the unimportant, the tiresome, there is little in the work; of genuine music, great music, a wonderful profusion.

Take the scherzo. Call it, if you will, the "German Michael," the merrymaking clodhopper. But what vigor, swing, strength, are in it—what hearty humor! And the trio has the caressing warmth of sunlight falling peacefully upon the peasants' dance. Then comes the adagio, said to be the longest symphonic adagio in existence, and by some (Mr. Fiedler, among others) the greatest. Music of such lofty inspiration cannot seem long, and even after this sublime adagio the finale is not an anti-climax, but a true culmination in its thrilling immensities of sound.

After Bruckner, however, Scheinpflug is an anti-climax. The first half of the programme consisted of the Bruckner symphony alone. The second half began with a second novelty, entitled "Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare," by Paul Scheinpflug, a young German composer living in Bremen. The overture is amiable enough music. One of the principal themes is an old English tune, "Meridian Alman," from the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book. This English tune is first sung by the English horn—which may be a German joke. Otherwise, the most salient point in the piece is an unexpected use of the Glockenspiel in the final measures. But Glockenspiel and English horn, the good Scheinpflug does not confide to which comedy of Shakespeare this is an overture. On internal evidence Mr. Philip Hale ventures to surmise "The Merry Wives of Windsor." If so, it is easy to prophesy that Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor" overture, now sixty years old, will be played and enjoyed long after this Scheinpflug composition, only just published, lives only in the pages of reference books.

The programme, a generous one, continued with Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude. Both are beautiful music and fit subjects for the virtuosity of the Boston players. The performance of the orchestra, it may be added, was a delight, and the interpretation of the Bruckner symphony was a triumph for Mr. Fiedler.

J. P. S.

From STAATS ZEITUNG,

Address New York City.

Date

Konzerte.

Frl. Germaine Schitzer erspielte sich in ihrem gestern Nachmittag in Mendelssohn Hall stattgefundenen Pianorezital einen bedeutenden Erfolg. Den Bericht über dieses Konzert, sowie über das des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters (Bruckner's Achte Symphonie) und der Flötenvirtuosin Frl. de Forest Anderson bringen wir in der Wochenübersicht im morgigen Sonntagsblatt.

[210]

SUN,

New York City.

MAR 10 1906

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

BRUCKNER'S EIGHTH SYMPHONY PERFORMED.

Also Paul Scheinflug's Overture to One of Shakespeare's Comedies, the Hearer to Guess Which—The Symphony a Work of Great Aspiration and, in the Slow Movement, Inspiration.

The fifth and last evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night began with Anton Bruckner's eighth symphony, which had never before been heard in this city. The work was begun in 1885 and completed in 1890. Its first performance took place in Vienna in 1892 at the Philharmonic Concert under the direction of Hans Richter. The symphony had to face the uncompromising hostility of Eduard Hanslick, the famous Viennese critic, whose power was immeasurably greater than that of any critic known to English speaking peoples.

Bruckner's admirers flocked to the concert and the performance of the new work was greeted with such demonstrations as are reserved in this city for the revelation of some overpuffed and belauded prima donna. The musician Bruckner was always a storm centre, for he was elected by opponents of Brahms as a representative of the Wagnerian spirit in instrumental music. This apparently never did Brahms any harm, though it unnecessarily embittered him against a very honest and well meaning man.

If the advocates of Bruckner had also celebrated him as the embodiment of Wagnerian imitation in instrumental music they would have had the mighty reenforcement of truth in the battle for their cause. But in the waging of artistic wars truth is not always a welcome ally.

The symphony heard last night bears all the hallmarks of Bruckner. Its thematic material is moulded in his familiar patterns. It is rectangular in the allegros and grandiose in the adagios. It is ponderous in the scherzo and pompous in the finale.

The harmonic plan is intricate and its design offers little that is profoundly convincing. There are many pages of music made with resolution rather than inspiration, and there are passages which approach perilously close to empty commonplace. Finally, the voice of Wagner is heard not infrequently, till in the closing measures of the work it bursts forth in all the pomp and circumstance of the close of "Rheingold," and Mr. Bruckner's gods march triumphantly into the Walhalla of Baireuth.

Yet in spite of these traits this is not a symphony to be sniffed out of court. It is the work of a deeply serious man, who labored with infinite pains and with solid intellect. There are several heaven storming pages in the score. It was not altogether Bruckner's fault that the heavens refused to open and to gladden his heart with a glimpse of eternal glory.

The first movement struggles vigorously with aspirations too big for the composer's management. Time and again the hearer fancies that the splendid instant is at hand only to find that the tone poet is compelled to pause in his flight for want of breath. The working out is ingenious, but it is machine ingenuity and not spontaneity.

We fare somewhat better when we enter the second movement, which is the scherzo. Here we find a rude, aggressive theme of four notes as the foundation of the movement. There is not a spark of humor in this scherzo nor is there any of that thrilling grimness which makes imposing some of the scherzos of Beethoven. As for grace, Bruckner knows it not. This scherzo is simply persistent.

But its trio is altogether different. Here for once the composer seems to have sallied forth into the Wienerwald and rejuvenated himself with the spirit of outdoor life. It is as pastoral as Bruckner, the recluse and scholiast, could well be. And it has fluent melody and sonorous harmony to give it charm.

The third movement is said to be the longest adagio in symphonic music. Whether that be true or not the claim made for it that it is the greatest adagio has at least some reason for existence. Not that we should be ready to award it the palm, but no one can fail to perceive the depth and breadth of this musical conception.

It is broken into blocks, as all Bruckner's movements are. It lacks the irresistible logic of relentless musical development. It conveys the effect of episodic construction. It is too long, much too long. And it is in places pretentious rather than satisfying. But as a whole it is a notable piece of writing, beautiful in mood, rising at times to splendid flights of imagination, orchestrated with noble color and deeply felt from beginning to [illegible] [illegible] admirers of Bruckner were wont to believe that if he could only have heard his own music oftener he would have applied the process of self-criticism and come out of the trial a strong and triumphant master, acknowledged by the whole world.

They had some ground for their faith. Indeed what unprejudiced hearers of this movement must feel is genuine regret that Bruckner could not have had the benefit of closer contact with his time, of larger acquaintance with the thought and emotion of other sincere men, to the end that he might have brought himself to cast his large aspirations in a firmer mold and with the method of a more practical art.

The last movement of this C minor symphony has little to commend it to the general music lover. It is like the other three in the honesty of its intent and the effort of its treatment. But it lacks any evidence of the divine spark. It is a piece of prodigious labor, and that is all. Its ultimate outcome in an echo of Wagner's "Rheingold" has been mentioned.

The other novelty of the concert followed the Bruckner symphony. It was Paul Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare." The composer has not told us what comedy, and Philip Hale in his programme notes is timid in suggesting that perhaps it is "The Merry Wives of Windsor." The truth is that one would have some difficulty in fastening it upon any other of Shakespeare's comedies. The whole mood of the composition is one of rippling merriment, swift and humorous action, laughter and satire.

The composer furthermore introduces in this composition an old English tune He does not say what it is, but trusts the erudite and indefatigable Hale to find it. He tells us that it is "Merdian Alman" by Giles Farnaby, and that it is to be found in the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book. That ought to satisfy us that the scene of this action is merry England.

And finally when we hear a ponderous and pompous theme, fat and conceited like a certain knight, and when this theme comes to grief with a thunderous plump as of one falling into a river with a huge weight, after which there is much more merriment and satirical laughter, what are we to remember if not Sir John Falstaff, Mistress Ford and the buck basket?

At any rate it is a right good overture, written with spirit and color, and worthy of a hearing in any town and in any season. It was excellently played, despite the labor which the orchestra had just completed in its superb performance of the symphony. The other two numbers on the programme were Debussy's prelude to the "Afternoon of a Faun" and Wagner's "Meistersinger" vorspiel. Max Fiedler conducted the novelties with much skill and sympathy.

EVENING MAIL

New York City.

MAR 19 1906

BRUCKNER SYMPHONY BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

New Work, While Much Too Long, Contains Much Inspired Writing—Scheinpflug's Overture Also a Novelty—Musical Notes.

By EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

There was a smaller audience at Carnegie hall last night than the last concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra should have attracted, but it is evident that the name of Bruckner has not yet made itself a power, especially when there is no soloist and when another new German name is presented. True, Scheinpflug was responsible for the very lightest sort of music that we may hear from the Boston orchestra, but the name was enough to sound an alarm to those who writhe under the ultra-modern German music.

Had the recalcitrants really attended they would probably have enjoyed one of the most interesting of the season's offerings. The Bruckner symphony, No. 8, was heard here for the first time last night, and it justified the belief that Bruckner was one of the most potent writers of the later men. His Ninth symphony, given under Dr. Muck, brought in its wake a series of tirades, and there is no doubt that the work heard last night will arouse the same amount of argument, although, even barring its overweening length, it abounds in beauty. Indeed, the adagio is one of the most inspired pieces of writing we are likely to hear in these modern days, when inspiration seems buried under tons of orchestration, called, for want of a better name, intellect.

The order of form was somewhat changed and the scherzo came before the adagio, forming an excellent contrast to the opening movement, in which there were many eloquent and potent utterances. Bruckner's greatest antagonists must concede thematic material of unusual quality and originality of treatment, and while he was discursive, sometimes irritatingly so, there is an embarrassment of riches constantly flowing from an unfathomable fountain of ideas.

The influence of Wagner is in places so strong that it seems frankly acknowledged, especially in the last movement, where the "Siegfried" motif recurs under many different treatments. Suggestions of the "Magic Fire" may not have been equally intentional. The symphony was begun in 1885 and was completed in 1890, but it did not receive its first performance until two years later, when Richter gave it at a Philharmonic concert in Vienna.

The second German work of the programme was a short and brilliant bit of writing called by the composer, Paul Schienpflug, "Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare." He gives no further clew to which comedy may be in mind, but there is reason to believe with Philip Hale in his programme annotations that Falstaff and "The Merry Wives of Windsor" are suggested. Scheinpflug has for some time been the concert master and assistant conductor at Bremen, and this, his opus 15, has only been from the publisher's hands since last month.

Mr. Fielder added to these numbers a French work, Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and Wagner's prelude to the "Meistersinger's," making thereby a programme of extremely modern tendencies, with the German school in predominance. It was hugely interesting as a programme scheme no less than in his carrying out of the numbers. Willy Hess, the eminent concert master, who was called to Europe suddenly through the death of his wife, was in his chair.

From NEW YORK HERALD,

Address New York City.

Date MAR [illegible]

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS NOVELTIES

Anton Bruckner's Eighth Symphony and a Composition by Mr. Paul Scheinflug New to New York.

Two novelties graced the programme of last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, but to offset this there was no soloist. The audience was large and it applauded liberally, even compelling the players to rise on one occasion and bow their thanks as the conductor bowed his.

Anton Bruckner's Eighth Symphony was one of the novelties. It was heard here for the first time, although it is sixteen years old. It is a long and serious work, with uplifting moments and many that are uninteresting. Quarts and quarts of good black ink have been spilled in a controversy over the greatness of the composer. Let that suffice. The other novelty was an overture to a comedy of Shakespeare by Mr. Paul Scheinflug, which proved tuneful and effective.

After the novelties came the delicious "Afternoon of a Faun," by Mr. Debussy, and, just to send the audience home at peace with music and the world, the orchestra played the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger."

Mr. Fiedler conducted earnestly, as is his wont, and the orchestra played excellently.

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date MAR [illegible]

MUSIC

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS BRUCKNER.

When the present generation of concert-goers has grown old there may still be expected to appear here, at decent intervals, a new symphony by Anton Bruckner. This, at least, is the indication given by the rate of progress thus far made in this part of the world by the music of the industrious Austrian composer, who finished his work and passed on in 1896. Bruckner wrote a sheaf of symphonies, but most of them are still unknown here, though another one, his eighth, in C minor, was added last evening to the local repertory by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Max Fiedler. It took a little over an hour to make acquaintance with this score, and when its story was told the impression made was not greatly different from that left on at least one similar occasion. Bruckner speaks in the grand manner, and with a voice that often attains surpassing beauty of orchestral color. Certain of his proclamations, notably that of the brass choir in the final movement, begin with the eloquence of an oracle, but ere they have progressed far what they are uttering is found, after all, to be not much more than some musical truism long since bereft of any but the tritest character. Or, to refer again to the nobly sonorous message of the brass instruments above cited, it is one of several passages in which Bruckner has not been able to forget what Richard Wagner had done before him; here, it is "Parsifal" that haunts the consciousness of the composer and of his auditors.

This C minor symphony is in four movements, the first marked allegro moderato, the second a scherzo, with an andante middle section; the third a very long and often very lovely adagio, and the finale a solemn summing up of the matter. The opening theme piques curiosity, and at the same time gives promise of a grim power not destined to be realized. The melodic contours soon lose their functional quality, and there are long passages from which the impulse and fervor of creation are wholly absent. Yet even in this first movement, the least interesting of the four, there are episodes that momentarily arouse the hearer's perception of what is broadly or persuasively beautiful. The scherzo is shorter, and it represents the composer at his best. Its leading theme, aptly described by the annotator of the programme book as possessing a rough humor, discloses vitality and provides a basic design that yields some variety in its development. The trio of the scherzo, already referred to, is gracious and winning. Bruckner set no bounds to his musical meditation in the adagio, and it is full of fine fancies, some of them pursued until they elude the composer and his auditors, and some again carried to definite conclusions. The last movement falls below the second and third in interest, at least at a first hearing, but it is stamped with the same touch of grandiloquence that ever and anon comes near to being transformed into genuine eloquence and conviction, only to fall short of compassing real importance of musical thought.

The performance of this Bruckner score by Mr. Fiedler and the Boston musicians was strongly accented throughout, and the work fairly glistened with orchestral felicities. The brass choir was especially happy in its very considerable task; Bruckner leaned heavily upon this section of his band, and wrote for its members with consummate skill. The role given to the four tenor tubas by the composer was particularly fortunate, and last evening's doings emphasized the distinction and effectiveness of these instruments. The audience showed by its temperate applause that the new symphony had not created a deep impression.

Not content with playing one novelty, Mr. Fiedler followed the Bruckner work by Paul Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare," Op. 15. Scheinpflug is a new German composer, about thirty-five years old, and this overture has just been published. It betrays orchestral inexperience in its opening measures, which lack incisiveness, though the theme calls for that quality, and its introduction of an English sixteenth century melody (which Mr. Philip Hale identifies with that of "Meridian Alman," set by Giles Farnaby) is far from spontaneous. Once infused into the score, however, this pleasant old dance tune exercises a happy influence upon the remainder of the overture, and the piece as a whole proved worth giving. After these two new compositions came Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," which has been more poetically played here, and the concert ended with the one commanding work of the programme, Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

[illegible]

EVENING POST,

New York City.

MAR 19 1909

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

One cannot help feeling sorry for Anton Bruckner in looking back on his sad career. He was a very poor man all his life, and almost his only joy was that which composing gives. He was fifty years old before musicians paid any attention to him, and only during the last twelve years of his life (he died at the age of seventy-two) did he enjoy some fame. His life was embittered by the venomous attacks of the Brahms clique in Vienna and elsewhere, the leader of this clique being Hanslick, who simply hounded the poor man, partly because he was an adherent of Wagner. Once the Austrian Emperor asked Bruckner to request a favor, and the composer said naïvely: "Please your Majesty, ask Hanslick not to write that way about me."

Yet Bruckner was largely to blame for his misfortunes. He sacrificed his life on the altar of the symphonic moloch. He set the villanous and suicidal example of writing symphonies lasting over an hour, in which he has been followed by Mahler, Paderewski, and others, to their great detriment.

Last night, at Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played his eighth symphony. It lasted an hour and seven minutes, forty of which were a downright bore. In this work Bruckner has very little to say, and, as usual, the less a symphonist has to say, the longer it takes him to say it. It is not the custom of this journal to review compositions—or books, or pictures—at a length proportionate to their size or duration. No attempt at describing this Bruckner symphony will therefore be made. It is a big work, but not a great one. It lacks ideas, and no display of contrapuntal art or gorgeous coloring can atone for that fatal defect. The nearest approach to melodic originality is in the adagio, for which the unfortunate claim is made that it is the longest slow movement ever written. It lasted just twenty-five minutes. Were it half as long, it would please twice as much. There is atmosphere in it, and it is the only part of the symphony one would care to hear again.

Mr. Max Fiedler is a Bruckner enthusiast, and it is needless to say that under his direction the symphony was played wonderfully. But the greatest applause of the evening was after Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," and Wagner's "Meistersinger Vorspiel," which closed the concert. Before these came a second novelty—an overture to a Shakespeare comedy by Paul Scheinpflug, which was published only last month. This Bremen musician has learned a lesson from Richard Strauss; he lets the critics guess which comedy of Shakespeare he means. Critics like that; it makes copy. It really makes little difference what you guess. The piece is tolerably interesting in any case; but the best thing in it is an interpolated English tune of the sixteenth century, which Philip Hale found is "Meridian Alman," set by Giles Farnaby. By any other name that tune would have sounded sweet; it is so seldom one comes across a real live tune in a modern orchestral work.

From EVENING SUN,

Address New York City.

Date

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

DR. FIEDLER'S BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S LAST CONCERT.

A New Symphony by Bruckner Interests Less Than a Musical Curio by Scheinpflug and Debussy's Beautiful "Afternoon of a Faun"—"Faust" Last Night at the Metropolitan—Third Performance of "La Princesse d'Auberge" at the Manhattan.

The last of the evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last evening afforded two novelties in New York and two familiar numbers. Bruckner's Symphony No. 8, in C minor, was played with distinction, and turned out to be a long composition, very ambitious, full of tonal glories no more glorious than the great sounds evoked by Wagner, and built upon analogous architectural lines. Dignity and workmanship were both evident, but it was not very interesting.

Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare" was a music curio of real charm; sportive, illuminating, full of fancy and of orchestral jokes. The Boston men did it justice; and they also won deserved applause for their fine display of Debussy's exquisite prelude to the "Afternoon of a Faun," in which all the mystery of shadowy woodland is seen, with the shy, elusive figure slipping through the stillness. The "Meistersinger" prelude concluded the concert. The [illegible] filled with a fully appreciative

EVENING WORLD,

New York City.

MAR 19 1909

Bruckner's Eighth Symphony Gets a Hearing

A Work of Great Power and Charm Presented by the Boston Orchestra.

BY SYLVESTER RAWLING.

IT'S a pity we have had to wait so long to hear Bruckner's eighth symphony. If Dr. Karl Muck had offered us that two years ago instead of the composer's seventh or his unfinished ninth, we might have escaped a lot of controversy. To Max Fiedler, Dr. Muck's successor as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, we are indebted for an exposition last night at Carnegie Hall of this remarkable work. It is too long, as all modern symphonies are wont to be, but it is never dull. It is melodious throughout and replete with sensuous charm. We shall gladly welcome a chance to hear it again.

As long ago as 1892 this symphony got its first performance in Vienna, and it seems strange that never until last night were New York music lovers given a chance to hear it. No more strange, however, than that Smetano's opera, "The Bartered Bride," the success of the season at the Metropolitan Opera-House, had to wait a quarter of a century before it was introduced to us.

Speculation as to the composer's programme may be overlooked at a first hearing, and the work enjoyed for its own sake. There is all of the Bruckner discursiveness in the first movement, but its elevation of spirit is not to be denied. The scherzo is delightful throughout, breathing joyousness. This is followed by twenty minutes of an adagio, so compelling in conception and so beautiful in detail that one forgets its length. Then comes the finale, a lofty proclamation, fittingly rounding out the whole.

The symphony was played well-nigh perfectly by this unmatched orchestra, and Max Fiedler by his conducting of it won a new place for himself in the estimation of New York music lovers.

From EVENING TELEGRAM,

Address New York City.

TWO NOVELTIES PRESENTED BY BOSTON BAND

Famous Symphony Orchestra from the Hub Offers Two Interesting New Compositions.

ROBERT MANTELL REVIVES SHYLOCK

Some Notes of Interest in the World of Music and Drama.

"THE Big Band from Boston," paying its last visit of the season, drew a typically brilliant audience to Carnegie Hall last night to listen to a programme that may fairly be called an embarrassment of riches. There were two novelties, the more important being Bruchner's Eighth Symphony, which requires an hour and a quarter for its performance. It is a work not only of Wagnerian quality, but magnitude. Mr. Fiedler presented it with the air of a lover, and the beautifully balanced orchestra revealed all the imposing beauty of this interesting work. Splashes of vivid musical color, tone combination as modern as Strauss and as opulent as Wagner, abound in the symphony. An adagio of unusual beauty and elevation, and an appealing trio are the more memorable movements of Bruckner's composition.

The second novelty was Scheinpflug's overture to a Shakespearian comedy (presumably "The Merry Wives," according to Philip Hale), a piece of musical humor at once charming and amusing. De Bussy's "Afternoon with a Faun," and Wagner's "Prelude to the Mastersingers," played as only the Boston Symphony can play, completed the programme.

[212]

Boston Symphony.

A brilliant audience that filled every available part of the house and left many standing greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its final concert of the season at the National Theater yesterday afternoon. It was a discriminating audience as well as a thoroughly appreciative one. Never before, perhaps, had Director Max Fiedler a more responsive body of trained musical artists beneath the sway of his baton, and never before was a program better suited to bring out the best there was in them.

The ovation of the day was given Ernest Schelling, who appeared not only as the soloist on the pianoforte, but in the rendition of his own composition, a fantastic suite for pianoforte and orchestra, with four movements, allegro marziale scherzando e molto leggiero, with a trio, andantino; an intermezzo, adagio, and concluding with a Virginia reel, molto vivace, in which were blended with artistic daring and exquisite effect "Dixie," "The Old Folks at Home" and "Yankee Doodle." The audience applauded again and again, repeatedly calling Mr. Schelling to the footlights in enthusiastic testimony of its appreciation. While the program included two Wagnerian numbers, the "Prelude" and "Love and Death," from "Tristan and Isolde," and the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," magnificently rendered in all their beauty, the audience manifested greater pleasure in its appreciation of an exquisite Tschaikowsky suite for full orchestra from the score of the ballet "Nutcracker," op. 71a, beginning with its 'ouverture miniature" and followed by five charming danses caracteristiques: a. Marche; b. Trepak, danse russe; c. Danse arabe; d. Danse chinoise; and e. Danse des Mirlitons, concluding the suite with the Valse des Fleurs. The overture to "Der Freischutz," by Weber, was the opening number, beautifully played.

TRANSCRIPT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 27, 1909

CONCERTS OF YESTERDAY

MR. FIEDLER MAKES A LIGHT PROGRAMME

At the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, Mr. Fiedler relaxed the succession of long and usually novel symphonies that he has maintained for a month and more. Four pieces, each short in its kind, as the writing of music goes nowadays, made his programme, and three of them—Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, Brahms's "St. Anthony" Variations and Liszt's concerto for piano in E-flat have long been familiar. Then, for ending stood the new music of the day, an overture, "On the Sea Cliffs," by Mr. Maquarre, the first flutist of the orchestra, and it as well laid no stress upon the attention. Curiously, besides, two of the four items seem to be the best-liked orchestral pieces of the composers who wrote them. Schubert's symphony in C, the symphony that used to be of the heavenly length, may excel in the extent and the range of its beauties, the Unfinished Symphony, but it does not excel it in their quality and it hardly exerts so swift and so possessing a charm. An audience must hear the symphony in C with a little patience. It listens to the Unfinished Symphony in tireless gladness Schubert's soft beauty can pall like all things that seem wrought so easily and that have their note of sweetness. There is not time for such mischance in the Unfinished Symphony. The detractors of Brahms will deny brusquely that he has ever written or ever could write a popular orchestral piece. Yet, as popularity goes in symphony concerts, the quick, warm and sustained applause that followed the "St. Anthony" Variations yesterday was significant. The new symphonies of the last month, except Bruckner's, have had less from their hearers on Friday afternoon.

This applause for the Variations and the eager and absorbed attention with which the audience followed them, had their meaning too. The professional "Brahmsite" and often the professional musician can find little interest in the piece outside the technical problems Brahms has set himself and the ingenuity with which he solves them. Doubtless, they preoccupied Brahms who like to propose himself such feats and, too often in some of his other pieces, labored obviously over them. They are interesting to study on paper, they are interesting to the technician and the musical scholar to hear. It is safe, however, to surmise that nineteen out of twenty of the listeners who found such pleasure in the Variations yesterday were unaware of the existence of this prowess, unless they chanced upon the enlightening paragraph in the all-knowing programme book. What charmed them in the music—again it is safe to surmise—was first Haydn's buxom melody in itself with its homely flavor and propulsive force and then the freedom and the warmth with which Brahms has wrought his variations upon it. They may be as full of calculation as technicians and the "Brahmsites," who, like all devotees, will set their idol in the worst light, would have us believe. None the less, Brahms to the hearer of average musical intelligence has disguised this problem-making and problem-solving far more persuasively than he has in other pieces where there should be no room for such exercises. The years go, the Variations pass and repass; and still they keep a freshness of mood, an elasticity of imagination, a cheerful glow of spirit that are unusual after all in the sum of Brahms's music. The official biographer wrenches his fancy to find a parallel for each variation in some episode in the life of St. Anthony. Brahms, like Haydn before him, took the saint, who in this case is only a title, by no means so seriously. What is really warm in him is the bonhomie that he could show to his intimates and the last flashes of the romantic sentiment that like every German he had in his youth. Technical problems or no technical problems, the Variations have often a frankness of melody that is unusual with him.

And the contrast was interesting, too, between this melody of Brahms and the melody of the Schubert of the Unfinished Symphony that had just preceded him. Mr. Fiedler is not of one of those restless souls among conductors who would roughen Schubert's euphony or who would mar his sustained song by quest for the newly emphasized phrase and a strange poignancy of accent. Rather, he went to the othere extreme. As it seemed to us, his pace in the second movement of the Unfinished Symphony was unusually slow. It tended even to linked sweetness long drawn out. It made Schubert's music a little too soft, almost a little sultry. Instead of calm was languor. The fine undulation of the music, the sense of shimmering life in it were lacking. As Schubert was thus oversoftened, so the homely, old Haydn of the theme and the robust Brahms of the variations came like a cool and tonic air blowing across Mr. Fiedler's Schubertian hothouse. He was only just to Brahms, playing the variations lucidly, warmly, with rich diversity of tone. He had been a little more than just to Schubert and Brahms seemed in the immediate contrast of a curiously sturdy and vigorous melody. The listener was half ready to believe that Schubert had sung too fluently, and that Brahms's comparative reticence and insistent sobriety were a grace.

Liszt and Miss Schnitzer, who will play better tonight when she is more at east and in more intimate relation with the orchestra, but who was exciting enough in exciting music yesterday—Liszt and Miss Schnitzer bridged the way to Mr. Maquarre's new overture. Certainly the composer took joy of his orchestra, scattering instrumental color harshly over his score and urging his instrumental voices sometimes to the utmost. Mr. Maquarre clearly loves the sonorous in his ears and the ascent or the descent of racing progressions. Certainly the overture is all eagerness for expression. The exuberance of the music is toneless; the quick transitions speak of ceaseless agitation. Mr. Maquarre is too impatient to worry a figure or sedulously to fit a touch mosaic. But what are these tempestuous moods and what clue does the title—or for that matter, the music—itself give to them. "Sur les Falaises," Mr. Maquarre calls his overture; "On the Sea Cliffs," goes the translations. Presumably they are the great white cliffs that rise smoothly enough out of the Channel, that are carpeted with green turf, that sometimes stretch like plateaus inland, and that shine at the slightest provocation of sunlight. Of course the fierce Channel storms, the short, sharp Channel seas now and then lash them; but in softer weather they are the images of smooth, stolid, shining calm. Presumably the overture reflected moods of place, and certainly the moods of the music were as swift and changeful as the Channel seas, but little indeed did they reflect in tones the summer calm and the soft mists that now and then enwrap these cliffs. The overture sorely needs a programme or at least a footnote as well as a title. As it is, whichever Mr. Maquarre imagined, it is far too easy to take the overture as an energetic and expert exercise in instrumental color and contrast. H. T. P.

BOSTON POST, SATURDAY,

MARCH 27, 1909

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

By Olin Downes

The 19th public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra was held yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Miss Germaine Schnitzer, pianist, played the Liszt E flat concerto.

Mr. Fiedler gave a vigorous and straightforward reading of Schubert's unfinished symphony, but the feature of this concert was the uneven playing of the magnetic Miss Schnitzer and the superb performance of the Brahms variations.

Miss Schnitzer appeared nervous; was rhythmically unsteady; inclined to run away from the orchestra, and then unable to keep the pace she had set. But she injected her personality into every measure of the scintillating, rhapsodic music, and in spite of the deficiencies mentioned, it was a singularly engrossing and exciting achievement. The very nervousness enhanced the thrill of the rushing finale.

Mr. Maquarre's overture, flamboyant and picturesque, was composed in 1903, when the first flutist of the Symphony Orchestra was living at a seaside resort in France. It is written with enthusiasm, with engaging gusto. It is lavishly scored, as one who suspected that some day the thing would be whacked and tooted and fiddled by an orchestra of noble dimensions and nearly unlimited power. At the concerts of next week Mr. Gustav Strube's symphony in B minor will be performed for the first time.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER,
MARCH 27, 1909

BRILLIANT LISZT WORK AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

MISS SCHNITZER PLAYS THE E FLAT CONCERTO

Schubert's Sweet Unfinished Symphony and an Overture by Andre Maquarre Also Given.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

"Unfinished Symphony".....Schubert
Variations on a Haydn Theme.....Brahms
Piano Concerto in E flat.....Liszt
Soloist, Miss Germaine Schnitzer.
Overture. "Sur les Falaises"...Andre Maquarre

Our orchestra has come back from its tour wearing its laurels modestly. It resumed business at the old stand, yesterday afternoon, with a programme which did not have an hour-and-a-half symphony on the list and which did not present a single puzzle to be solved. It is just as well to rinse our ears out with such music as Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" once in a while. This sweet work was written at a time when composers were allowed to write tunes and when beauty was held to be one of the canons of musical creation.

Not that we would wish composers to write in just that way today. The composer of the future, however, will add, to such delicious melody as Schubert wrote, the wealth of tone-color of a Strauss, and the figure development of a Brahms. But it was a great relief to listen to the old and simple work, even with its repetitions and its formal symmetry. It was played with excellent taste and without any attempt to force grandeur into its artless prattle; the fault lay in the opposite direction. There was a tendency to pianissimize, and to retard languorously. There were, of course, no technical difficulties in the path, and the ensemble was exquisite.

It was pleasant, too, to hear the classical old guard in the audience applaud the work long and heartily. The charm of melody is perennial and Schubert's symphonies are but songs in disguise.

We sometimes doubt the old Latin saying—"Variatio delectat." At any rate we feel that when a skillful composer begins varying a theme he rarely knows where to stop. Beethoven, Brahms, Strauss, Noren, and a host of others have fallen under the sway of the variation demon. Given a clear theme with a few ear-marks (syncopations etc.) to recognize it by, and a man like Brahms could vary it almost forever. Fortunately, however, in this case, he does not squeeze the last drop out of his tonal lemon. The variations were the more interesting because comparatively brief. They were excellently contrasted and did not scorn melodic effects. It made an interesting display of the woodwind, horn and strings each in turn, and the final climax was a real culmination. The reading and performance were all that could be desired.

Liszt's E flat concerto belongs to the best style of modern musical spice. If we gauge by form and by balance of piano against orchestra it is not a concerto at all, but a very brilliant Fantasie. But it is inspiring and exciting, all the same, and it snaps its fingers in the face of the classicists. Its treatment of the chief figure of seven notes, which begins the work, "tutti," to which Liszt once playfully attached the words—"Dass versteh't ihr alle niche" ("That you ne'er can understand") is masterly, and the concerto never commits the crime of being dull even an instant.

The artist, too, was well suited to the work. If we have sometimes found Miss Germaine Schnitzer too exuberant, in this work all her abundant enthusiasm and scintillating technique had legitimate outlet and expression. Fire, energy and dash were the chief characteristics of the performance, and the climaxes were worked up with a breadth that was commendable. Her octave and chord playing was superb. Miss Schnitzer won, and deserved, an absolute triumph.

It was impossible to count the number of recalls to which she responded. No artist could have been more enthusiastically appreciated. And the work itself! It seems only now that Liszt is coming out of his own shadow as a great pianist.

Our orchestra is a hotbed of composers. In this programme we had our well known flautist, Andre Maquarre, bursting forth as a composer, and next week we are to have a symphony by another member of the band—Mr. Strube. "On the Cliffs" evidently does not go back to the time of the ancient cliff-dwellers, for the overture is modern in its general treatment. Not so modern as the symphonies we have lately lived through, and ("Deo Gratia") not so long, either. It begins with a fierce downward phrase, as if one of the inhabitants had fallen off the cliff.

There is much restlessness and agitation in the work, and many sharp contrasts, rather than any attempt at long-breathed melody.

There are radical progressions in the overture, but all the figure treatment is logical and coherent, while the final climax is finely worked up. Therefore "On the Seacliffs," as the English title runs, was a work that was made very welcome and the applause was persistent enough to call the composer to acknowledge it. Andre Maquarre must feel convinced that a prophet is sometimes honored in his own country.

BOSTON TRAVELER,
TUESDAY, MARCH 30, 1909

MUSICAL EVENTS

The works that Mischa Elman will play at the pension fund concert in Symphony Hall on next Sunday evening have finally been decided upon. He will play the Beethoven concerto for violin in A major and Saint-Saens' introduction and rondo capriccioso for violin and orchestra. Seats are now selling at Symphony Hall.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
BULLETIN.
MAR 5-1909

Recital by Violinist.

Richard Czerwonky will give a violin recital at Memorial Hall at 8:15 o'clock to-night. The young artist was with the Boston Symphony Orchestra as soloist last season. He has won the Mendelssohn prize twice and the Joachim prize once. He is leader of the Czerwonky String Quartet. His programme includes a wide range of selections. The critics have commented favorably upon his technique and have commended the enthusiasm with which he plays.

SUNDAY GLOBE—
MARCH 28, 1909.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr Fiedler introduced another new work at last week's Symphony concerts, an overture by Mr Andre Maquarre of the orchestra, entitled "On the Sea Cliffs," which was played for the first time in America. Miss Germaine Schnitzer, the young pianist who has shown marked ability in her recitals here, was the soloist, playing Liszt's first piano concerto, and the other selections were Schubert's unfinished symphony and the Brahms variations on a theme by Haydn. Mr Willy Hess was at his old post as concert master.

This seems to be an age of skilful young female pianists, for this season several have appeared in recitals and at the Symphony concerts and displayed artistic powers which would have been considered marvelous a few years ago. Miss Schnitzer, who is not yet 22 years old, has already won favor here by her sound musicianship, and that favor gained in recitals was increased by her performance of the Liszt piece, which, though familiar, is full of that tonal coloring so dear to the soloist and pleasing to the auditor when rightly set forth.

The slight figure of the artist gives little evidence of a physical vigor which is aple to cope quite successfully with the many fortissimo passages running through the orchestral score; but Miss Schnitzer's finger and arm power are finely developed, and in this part of her work she generally maintained the proper relations between the solo instrument and the band.

Finger dexterity, clear in rapid runs, arpeggios and the different chord passages, she has seemingly sufficient for all demands. Her cantabel is sweet and in legato passages she displays a smooth and even touch. The famous "problem of the triangle" was worked out in splendid style, the brilliant figures and delicate rhythms being given with a dash and clean-cut enunciation suiting exactly the mood of the composer. The strenuous finale was played with such a gusto, if such a term may be applied to the work of a lady pianist, that the audience began to applaud before the concerto was finished. It was a brilliant performance throughout and Miss Schnitzer was well deserving the many recalls she received after she had ceased playing.

Mr Maquarre's overture is a pleasing little program piece, a meditative and poetic work in which one can readily find suggestions of moods and thoughts conjured up by idlers at the seashore. His treatment of the wood winds deserves special mention, the themes given them being arranged admirably.

Mr Fiedler's reading of Schubert's unfinished symphony was thoroughly sympathetic, though of course traditional, and all the plaintive harmonies were brought out in beautiful cadences, each section of the orchestra giving perfect utterances to the haunting melodies. Miss Schnitzer could not have found better orchestral association than was offered her in the concerto, and the variations on Haydn's theme were given with all due significance of intonations and instrumental combinations.

This week's program will include a new symphony by Gustav Strube of the orchestra, a work which is still in manuscript and will be played for the first time anywhere. Several of Mr Strube's compositions have appeared on the Symphony programs, though nothing so large as the new work, which the composer says is classical in form but entirely modern in treatment.

The rest of the program will be devoted to excerpts from music dramas by Richard Wagner. These will be the prelude to "Lohengrin," the "Bacchanale" from the Paris version of "Tannhauser," the funeral music, "Dusk of the Gods," and the "Walkyres" from "Die W[illegible]

THE SUNDAY HERALD,
BOSTON, MARCH 28, 1909

19TH CONCERT OF THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Miss Germaine Schnitzer Pianist—Mr. Willy Hess Greeted.

By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, gave its 19th concert last night in Symphony Hall. Miss Germaine Schnitzer was the pianist. The program was as follows:

Unfinished Symphony, B minor.....Schubert
Variations on a theme of Haydn.....Brahms
Concerto in E flat No. 1, for piano.....Liszt
Overture, "On the Seacliffs".....Maquarre

This concert does not call for an extended notice. All but one of the compositions were familiar, and there were no forced readings. The proper tempo of the second theme of the first movement in Schubert's symphony has long been a subject of discussion. Mr. Fiedler took the lovely melody at a slower pace than we have been accustomed to and thus gave the melody a marked emotional character. The transition was a little abrupt, and sticklers for continuity of thought and general musical flow might take an exception; yet the contrast was effective. In spite of the beautiful and purely Shubertian second theme of the second movement, the reputation of the composer would be exhanced if only the first movement had been written. The second falls far below it.

The reading of Brahms' variations was contrapuntally lucid, and each set had its own appropriate character, with one exception—the charming variation marked "grazioso" might have been treated more elastically, and it might have been played in a more tenderly romantic spirit.

Mr. Maquarre, the remarkable first flute of the orchestra, is known here as a composer of pieces that have been played at Pop concerts and of songs. The overture was performed for the first time in this country. It was composed about six years ago when Mr. Maquarre was spending a summer at a French seaside resort. The main body of the overture has little that is salient or distinguished, but in the second of the preceding slow movements there are passages that are picturesque and, indeed, imaginative. Mr. Maquarre has facility in the matter of instrumentation, and perhaps the overture would have made a stronger impression if it had been performed without cut, which affected its structure. As it was, the composer was heartily applauded.

Miss Schnitzer first visited Boston in 1906, and she had then been engaged to play at a Symphony concert. Her arrival was delayed by reason of the death of her father, and the engagement was necessarily cancelled. She played here with the orchestra last night for the first time in this city. During the last two years she has gained in breadth and in sense of proportion without any loss of the peculiar brilliance that distinguished her when she first came. Her performance of Liszt's concerto was an admirable one in conception and in carrying out of the intention. Her technic rests on solid foundations and it is highly developed; but she has much more than a praiseworthy technic, much more than the brilliance that easily arouses applause.

She played with rare elegance in bravura passages; her melodic expression was tasteful and emotional in the Lisztian manner; and her purely virtuoso display was characterized by a verve that did not untrun clearness and respect for the phrase. She well deserved the applause that recalled her many times.

Mr. Willy Hess was warmly greeted by the sympathetic audience on his return to the duties of concert-mast[illegible]

Extra Concert for Pension Fund.

An extra concert in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given next Sunday evening. It has heretofore been customary to give but two such concerts for this good cause, but when Mischa Elman offered his services for an extra concert this spring it was felt the opportunity should not be missed. Mr Elman will play among other things the Beethoven concerto, with which he has had a remarkable success in New York this year. He will also play another number which will be announced later.

The principal orchestral part of the program will comprise Beethoven's overture, "Leonora" No. 3, Berlioz' overture, "Benvenuto Cellini" and Liszt's first Hungarian [illegible]

EVENING TRANSCRIPT,
MONDAY, MARCH 29,
MUSIC AND DRAMA

MISS SCHNITZER AND HER FIERY LISZT

Her Playing at the Symphony Concerts—Gervase Elwes for a New English Singer—A Tested Experiment in Berlin—The "Free People's Theatre" and Its Working—Beethoven's Choral Symphony to End the Season Here—The Metropolitan Opera and Its Next Visit to Boston—Miss Le Baron Engaged for the Castle Square—Henrietta Crosman in a New Play—Barrie and "Samson"—Mme. Sembrich in Europe—Mr. Safonoff's Farewell

Miss Schnitzer chose wisely when she picked Liszt's concerto in E-flat for her first appearances, on Friday and Saturday, with the Symphony Orchestra. The concerto, unless some rare pianist, like Mr. Joseffy, is able to give it an individual and curious cast of his own, ought to sound like a magnificent and sustained improvisation, creating itself out of itself. From the outset, it asks a nervous and exciting power of the pianist. The orchestra begins, and then he—or in this particular case she—declares her mastery in the first measures that fall to the solo instrument. They must stride, have their air of authority, bring their suggestion of force in reserve. The slow section is not reposeful. It is nervous musing, eager to set itself free. Then, with the tinkling triangle—and Mr. Ludwig played it with the delicacy that Liszt imagined—come the scherzo and release. Thereafter the concerto is the pianist's own. The music gathers strength, pace, brilliancy. The piano answers, persuades, leads, masters the orchestra, pauses for a moment, asserts itself anew, gains at every turn larger, freer, more impetuous and rhapsodic voice. A concerto, if you will, but a concerto that once the nervous preluding is done becomes a glowing rhapsody for the piano over, rather than with, the orchestra. No wonder pianists love it; no wonder that repetition does not lessen its nervous thrill. It has been exciting for fifty years.

Miss Schnitzer is young, and a little hard with the unconscious hardness of youth. It is by an effort of will and comprehension that she has summoned, in the music of her recitals here, moods of melancholy, of reflection, of sober and tender quiet, of romantic musing. She has been her freer, her natural self, when the music has called her to large power of tone, to rhythmic energy, to broad eloquence, to rhapsodic warmth of feeling, and to rich brilliancy of expression. Her tone has beauty, but at its best it is a full-bodied, full-blooded beauty that drives with its propulsive power and stirs by its nervous intensity. The large surety that is in all that Miss Schnitzer does, told when the piano declares that it is, and will be, the master at the start, of the concerto. She was beginning in eloquence that was no forced rhetoric. In the slow section the warmth and the body of her tone, the elastic play of it in light and shade served her and the music no less well. Thence onward, her whole playing was rhapsodic. She flung off the scherzo like momentary and glinting improvisation, showering itself about the triangle; and then, with larger and larger voice and fiery and more fiery intensity she advanced through the ardors of the finale. She gave it speed and sweep, splashed it with tonal color and brilliant ornament; she made its contrasts seem the impulse of the moment, and without a trace of caluculation, drove the music in mounting glow and rising pace and freedom to the gathering climax. It was Liszt with his nervous energy, his rhapsodic thrill, his dazzle and his excitement.

As English singers used to come to us, they were oftener more commendable for the natural quality of their voices than for the intelligence, the artistry, and the sense of style with which they used them. Now some of them seem to be reversing this appeal. Their voice is—what it happens to be. In their use of it lie their interest and their merit. Mme. Blanche Marchesi, for example, is virtually an English singer, and it is the expressiveness of her tones and not their quality in pure song that makes her distinction. Mr. Gervase Elwes, the English tenor, who sang here for the first time in a recital at Steinert Hall on Saturday afternoon, is in still more unusual case. It is hard, indeed, to define the quality of his voice. He calls himself a tenor; but not a Latin from Calais to Palermo would count him one. His tones lack the penetrating, the vibrant, the peculiar carrying quality of a pure tenor. They have neither the silvery brightness of such a voice in its upper reaches nor the golden richness it sometimes gains as it approaches the range of a high baritone. Yet baritone quality is oftenest the salient characteristic of Mr. Elwes's voice, but even curiously veiled, shadowed, even hard. Under any name, it lacks sensuous beauty and sensuous appeal, giving pleasure by what it does rather than by what it is.

Even so, Mr. Elwes's tones command no very wide and no very intense range of emotion. He ended his recital, for example, with a group of familiar and unfamiliar songs by Brahms—"Botschaft," "Wir Wandelten," "Der Kuss," "An Die Tauben" and sundry others—songs of diversified and often deeply felt moods. Perhaps, Mr. Elwes accepts that strange standard of certain English musical prigs and pedants who fancy Brahms so "intellectual" that he must be stripped of all feeling; but the singer seems too intelligent for such a distorting notion. Yet there was a persistent lack of emotional, of communicating, of diversifying and discriminating quality in his singing of these eight songs. Not one of them wrought their mood unmistakably and absorbingly upon the hearer. Yet in them, as in the eighteenth-century pieces and in the folk songs of the rest of the programme, shone the virtues that are Mr. Elwes's best traits. He sings, whatever the language, with unusual clarity and precision of diction. He sings with intelligent sense of the melodic line and with an admirable fidelity of it. He directs his voice, technically, with practised and discerning skill. He is apt in his phrasing. He is just in his emphasis. He does all things in good taste, unforcedly, wholly sincerely. The refinements of vocal artistry, within the limitations of his tones, are at his command. It is the communicating spark, be it of voice or feeling, that is lacking to him.

[213]

THE BOSTON TRAVELER
MONDAY, MARCH 29, 1909.

MUSICAL EVENTS

The soloist at Friday's and Saturday's Symphony concerts was Miss Germains Schnitzer, the young pianist who has proven one of the season's most interesting artists.

Miss Schnitzer is remembered from her previous recital for the exquisite velvet lining which surrounds her pianissimo tones. They are distinct, as well, although they be hushed, and are beautifully joined in well formed phrases. This element of pianistic poetry is not always compatible with the well-nigh masculine animation and vigor which appears more properly to be a native trait of Miss Schnitzer's.

The other number of interest was the new overture, "On the Sea Cliff," by Mr. Maquarre, the admirable first flute of the orchestra. The work appears to be a highly-colored series of sketches, scenes or episodes. Doutless the cuts which Mr. Fielder observed emphasizes this impression. Mr. Maquarre has no elongated thematic stories to tell. With agile brush he paints a few bold strokes which to an imaginative mind ought to be salient and vivid.

The simple, serene, singing melodies which Schubert gives now to strings and now to the woodsy flutes, oboes, clarinets or horns in his "Unfinished Symphony" will always insure it appreciative listeners.

Even revelers in abstruse, problematic and psychological music must at times crave as refreshment for their jaded spirits moments of such tranquil beauty as may be found in the andante of this symphony. The consummate purity of tone and the intimate blending of the different choirs of our orchestra serve to refine upon its beauty the more.

Of the Brahms variations, the tricky fifth with its nimble chatter of woodwind and violins and the spirited sixth with its crisp and rhythmic horns offorded particular delight.

ARTHUR B. WILSON.

Mr. Fiedler proposes to bring out another novelty of more than ordinary importance and interest at the twentieth public rehearsal and concert of the Symphony orchestra in Symphony Hall on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. This is a new symphony by Gustav Strube of the orchestra which is still in manuscript and will be played for the first time. The rest of the programme will be devoted entirely to excerpts from music dramas by Richard Wagner.

The seventh and next to the last Symphony concent to be given in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, will take place on next Thursday evening. The soloist will be Miss Nina Fletcher, the violinst, who already is very favorably known to the musical public of Boston.

As announced last week, an extra concert in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given on Sunday evening, April 4. It has heretofore been customary to give but two such concerts for this good cause, but when Mischa Elman offered his services for an extra concert, it was felt the opportunity could not be missed. Mr. Elman will play among other things the Beethoven Concerto, with which he has had a remarkable success in New York this year.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

SCANDAL IN BOSTON SYMPHONY

Flute Soloist Maquarre and Mrs. Lenom Sent to Jail.

Boston, March 8.—A round trip to the Pacific Coast in which Daniel Maquarre, flute soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Lenom, wife of another Symphony player, participated, ended today in the Superior Court here, where both pleaded not guilty to a statutory offense, failing to furnish $3,000 bail, were sent to jail to await trial.

The pair disappeared simultaneously in November. They were located recently by Mr. Lenom in San Francisco, where Mrs. Lenom had opened a millinery store and Maquarre was giving music lessons, and they were arrested at the request of the Boston authorities. Neither of the accused was represented in the court's proceedings today and neither made an effort to obtain bail.

---

om EVENING MAIL

dress ..... New York City.

te ..... MAR 6

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie hall Thursday evening, March 18, and Saturday afternoon, March 20. Thursday evening the feature is to be the first performance in New York of Bruckner's eighth symphony in C minor. The feature of the Saturday afternoon programme will be Ernest Schelling's fantastic suite for piano and orchestra, with the composer as soloist.

TRIBUNE

ss ..... New York City.

The last concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York this season will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 18, and on Saturday afternoon, March 20. The feature of the Thursday evening concert will be the first performance in New York of Bruckner's Eighth Symphony in C Minor. This will be played for the first times in America in Boston on March 12 and 13. On Saturday afternoon one of the features of the programme will be Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite" for piano and orchestra, which has already been played in New York with the composer as soloist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

---

ess ..... PUBLIC LEDGER

MAR 7 1909

heralds, etc.

The last Boston Symphony concert of the year will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 15, at 8:15. A most interesting feature of the programme will be the performance by the composer of Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite" for pianoforte and orchestra. This work was played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston a year ago by Mr. Schelling with much success, and it will be played not only in Philadelphia, but in Washington, Baltimore and New York during the March trip of the orchestra. It is in this suite that Mr. Schelling, with unusual boldness, makes use of the tunes "Dixie" and "Old Folks at Home."

* * *

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The last Boston Symphony concert of the year will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 15, at 8.15. An interesting feature of the program will be the performance by the composer of Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite" for pianoforte and orchestra. This work was played with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Boston a year ago by Mr. Schelling with much success, and it will be played not only in Philadelphia, but in Washington, Baltimore and New York during the March trip of the orchestra.

---

m STAATS ZEITUNG,

ress ..... New York City.

te .....

*

Das letzte diesjährige Konzertpaar des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters findet in Carnegie Hall am Donnerstag Abend, den 18. März, und Samstag Nachmittag, den 20. März, unter Leitung von Herrn Max Fiedler statt. Die pièce de résistance des Donnerstag-Konzertes wird die erste New Yorker Aufführung von Bruckner's Achter Symphonie in C-Moll sein. Dieses Kolossalwerk wird am 12. und 13. März seine amerikanische Erstaufführung in Boston erleben. Es wurde kürzlich in Deutschland mit ganz ungeheurem Erfolg aufgeführt. Im Samstag-Nachmittag-Konzert gelangt Ernest Schelling's „Phantastic Suite" für Piano und Orchester unter Mitwirkung des Komponisten zur Aufführung, welches Werk in der verflossenen Saison seine New Yorker Erstaufführung hatte.

* * *

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

..... New York City.

..... 7 1909

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 18 and Saturday afternoon, March 20. The feature of the Thursday evening concert will be the first performance in New York of Bruckner's Eighth Symphony in C-minor. This will be played for the first times in America in Boston on March 12 and 13. Its recent performances in Germany created nothing short of a sensation. On Saturday afternoon one of the features of the programme will be Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite," for piano and orchestra, which has already been played in New York with the composer as soloist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

..... SUN

..... 1909

IN HARMONY'S REALM

Concluding Baltimore Concert Of Boston Symphony March 17.

The concluding Boston Symphony concert of the year in Baltimore will be given at the Lyric on Wednesday evening, March 17, at 8.15. An interesting feature will be the performance by the composer of Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite" for piano and orchestra. This work was played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston a year ago by Mr. Schelling with much success, and it will be played not only in Baltimore, but in Philadelphia, Washington and New York during the March trip of the orchestra. It is in this suite that Mr. Schelling, with unusual boldness, makes use of the tunes of "Dixie" and "Old Folks at Home."

The annual recital of Mr. Emanuel Wad, professor of piano at the Peabody Conservatory, will be given Friday afternoon in the Peabody Concert Hall.

Professor Wad, besides being a pianist of marked originality and power, is a good program maker and can be counted on to present a well-rounded group of compositions, that are interesting in themselves and effective mediums for the expression of his artistic individuality.

His numbers will be as follows:

Theme, with variations, in A	Paderewski
Etude in B flat minor	Mendelssohn
Three Caprices	Scarlatti
Fantasia in C, Op. 17 (by request)	Schumann
Toccata in F sharp minor	Saint-Saens
Caprice in E	Sinding
Marche Grotesque, Mazurka in A minor, Impromptu in A flat, Nocturne in B, Polonaise in A flat	Chopin

---

NEW YORK PRESS,

..... New York City.

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall on the evening of March 18 and the afternoon of March 20. The feature of the Thursday evening concert will be the first performance in New York of Bruckner's Eighth Symphony in C minor. This will be played for the first times in America in Boston on March 12 and 13. Its recent performances in Germany created a sensation. On Saturday afternoon one of the features of the programme will be Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite" for piano and orchestra, which has been played already in New York with the composer as soloist.

WORLD,

..... New York City.

.....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 18, and Saturday afternoon, March 20. The feature of the Thursday evening concert will be the first performance in New York of Bruckner's Eighth Symphony in C minor. This will be played for the first time in America in Boston on March 12. Its recent performances in Germany created nothing short of a sensation. On Saturday afternoon one of the features of the programme will be Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite" for piano and orchestra, which has already been played in New York with the composer as soloist.

TIMES,

..... New York City.

.....

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The last pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 18, and Saturday afternoon, March 20. The feature of the Thursday evening concert will be the first performance in New York of Bruckner's Eighth Symphony in C minor. This will be played for the first time in America in Boston on March 12 and 13. On Saturday afternoon one of the features of the programme will be Ernest Schelling's Fantastic Suite for piano and orchestra, which has already been played in New York with the composer as soloist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

---

rom .....

ddress .....

ate .....

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has announced that the contract with Max Fiedler as conductor of the orchestra has been renewed for another year. Negotiations to this end have been on for several weeks, but only now has Mr. Fiedler learned definitely that he is able to stay away from Hamburg for another season.

[214]

---

rom .....

ddress .....

MAR 18 1909

GALES INCREASING

SALES INCREASE—5 GOTH.. lb..lb SYMPHONY CONCERT WILL NOT BE A FAILURE.

A promising increase in the sale of seats for the concert to be given at The Buckingham next Tuesday evening by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Max Fiedler and the auspices of the Waterbury Music league, gave the officers of the league a slight hope yesterday that the public will realize the importance and worth of this great concert. Still, unless the entire support of the music loving public is given, it promises to be a great popular as well as financial failure. Max Fiedler, the eminent German leader, who will conduct the orchestra stands today as one of the most notable interpreters of Tschaikowsky, with whose works he is thoroly in sympathy. He has conducted them often in St. Petersburg. And as with Tschaikowsky, so with the other Russians, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Glazounoff, Balakireff, Rachmaninoff and the others. Bohemian music as represented by the two great Czech composers, Dvorak and Smetana, has found in him a sturdy champion. The "younger" Frenchmen as represented by Caesar Franck and his followers, D'Indy, Bruneau, Dukas, Debussy, he has followed with sympathetic interest and was the first to play many of their works in Germany. Elgar, the leading English composer, has found in him an influential friend.

As for the modern Germans, he is an intimate friend of Richard Strauss, an ardent admirer of and believer in his genius, and perhaps his greatest interpreter. He has found much to admire in Max Reger and so much does Reger believe in him that last summer he particularly asked Mr. Fiedler to present his new concert—overture to America which will be done later in the season.

He is a profound believer in the genius of Edward MacDowell and he was the first to play the "Lamia" of that lamented composer. Altogether Mr. Fiedler is one of the broadest and best equipt conductors that ever came to America and his programes have been models of what is needed to retain the interest of an audience.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

---

om .....

ddress .....

ate .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A gradual increase in the sale of seats for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Buckingham next Tuesday evening has given renewed hope to the officers of the Waterbury Music League, under whose direction the concert is to be given. There is no reason why the audience should not be as large and as brilliant as that which greeted the organization when it appeared here last under the direction of Dr Carl Muck. The orchestra gave its first concert on October 22, 1881, and is therefore well on toward the end of its twenty-eighth season. An idea of what it has done in these years may be had from the fact that the first concert of the recent trip to the Middle West, in Buffalo on Monday evening, January 25, was its 2,669th. This means that from the date of its organization it has averaged not far from 100 concerts each season. This is a record that cannot be-equalled by any orchestra in the world. The great so-called "permanent" orchestras of Europe do not give anywhere near such a number of concerts in the course of a season because they do not command the entire time of their musicians. As concert organizations they are usually appendages to the more important opera house orchestras and are subordinate to these. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has absolute control of the time of all its members for at least 30 weeks, which is the length of the regular symphony season, which provides for 24 public rehearsals and concerts in Boston, five monthly trips a week each to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, and one annual trip of a week to cities in the Middle West.

SUN,

..... New York City.

..... MAR 1 1909

Boston Orchestra Matinee.

The last afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The programme consisted of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite" for piano and orchestra, and Weber's "Freischütz" overture. Mr. Schelling played the piano part in his own composition. The audience was large and sympathetic.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

MUSIC TRANCE BY SYMPHONY

Audience Forgot It Was Alive For the Time Being--Great Ovation Followed.

The Boston Symphony, under the matchless guidance of Max Fiedler, gave its fifth and last performance at the Lyric last night to an audience that filled every seat in the house, save the boxes.

While the Symphony has presented, on various occasions, many superb offerings, it has never given anything that was more liberally applauded, nor more graciously received than Richard Strauss' tone poem, "A Hero's Life."

The old-time critics, who have followed the Boston Symphony from its first performance here, shook their gray locks and declared that it was the finest thing that the orchestra ever gave, and no one denied it. The music lovers, transported to most joyous sensations, had no theoretical ideas or criticism, because they enjoyed the work and it was sufficient. And those who came to hear the Symphony because it is considered quite the thing to do, applauded enthusiastically, carried away with the splendid score and its matchless execution.

While Herr Fiedler deserves the bulk of commendation and praise for the brilliant reading and interpretation of the score, no less credit is due to Willy Hess, concertmeister and violinist, whose execution of the solo portion of the tone poem, especially in the second and third numbers, interpreting the love scenes, was thrilling and indeed splendid. There was sufficient applause, however, at the conclusion of the brilliant number for all, and Fiedler, Hess and the orchestra, as a body, seemed gratified at the appreciation with which their efforts were received.

The soloist of the occasion was Ernest Schelling, the composer. Mr. Schelling, despite his rather European name and appearance, is an American, born in New New Jersey. His number was a fantastic suite for piano and orchestra, and proved so unusual and out of the ordinary solo work tnat he, too, was given a great ovation after his performance. The last portion of his fantasy was termed a Virginia Reel, and included a most harmonious and unique blending of "Dixie" and the "Swanee River."

As perhaps everyone who attends performances of any kind realizes, whenever "Dixie" is presented, almost from the moment the opening bars resound, there is an outburst of applause, generated from patriotic impulses rather than appreciation of the musical value of the number or its rendition. But because "Dixie" is—well, "Dixie"—the applause is never failing.

But last night, realizing that the interpolation of the popular and charming number was an important portion of an artistic blending, even with another well-known and well-liked number, there was not a scintilla of applause when the violas in a crooning lullaby effect first awakened the well-known strains to the audience. There was a flutter of surprise, a sensation of complete expectancy, and then the vast audience settled back to await the conclusion. And when Schelling ceased, the big audience broke into a wave of applause that lasted for many minutes.

The balance of the program was rather well known, and included the popular overture from the "Flying Dutchman" and the big Forest number from Siegfrid, of "The Ring." Both are eminently conspicuous Wagnerian numbers and were most ably presented. Debussy's "Afternoon of a Swan," a most delicate and charming number, was also presented.

As usual, the audience was most representative and fashionable.

---

ss .....

The Boston Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third and last concert of the season at Parsons Theater next Monday evening. Max Fiedler will conduct the performance of the program, which follows in detail:—

"Symphony in C major, No. 7." ..... Schubert
I. Andante; Allegro ma non troppo.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro vivace.
Tone Poem. "Death and Transfiguration. Op. 24." ..... Strauss
Concerto for Violoncello, Op. 45." (First time in Hartford). ..... Gradener
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," ..... Wagner
Soloist, Heinrich Warnke.

Reserved seats are for sale at Gallup & Co.'s, No. 201 Asylum street.

FAILURE THREATENS

Seat Sale for Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert Portends Financial Disaster.

At the Buckingham pharmacy, where the seats are on sale for the concert to be given at Buckingham next Tuesday evening, March 23, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Max Fiedler and the auspices of the Waterbury Music League there has been a small increase in the sale of seats within the past two days. The house is hardly half sold out, however, and unless the sale improves within the next few days there is little doubt that the concert will go on record as one of the greatest financial failures in the musical history of the city. Artistically or musically it will be a great success as never before in the history of the city has so great an organization visited the city to play a program so rich in musical worth and so interesting even to the most casual student of the art. Music in Waterbury during the past few years has been fostered and cared for by a few deeply interested, sincere persons. Without remuneration these men and women have labored to raise the musical standard of this city of 60,000 inhabitants or more, but apparently in vain. The greatest musical attractions in the country have been brought here without success only to face half empty halls in spite of the fact that the theaters would fill on the next night or soon after such a concert with a display of the lowest strata of American music, that of the average musical comedy. It is to be hoped that the sale for the great concert next Tuesday will take a decided step within the next few days and thus give the greatest musical organization in the world the reception which it deserves at the hands of the Waterbury music lovers.

---

om .....

dress .....

te .....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It is creditable to America that practically all our musical institutions are supported by a music loving public, whereas in Europe, where art is a development of many generations, the state must come to the support of the larger orchestras and opera houses. This rapid growth of love and appreciation of music is due in great degree to the influence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, famous the world over as one of the best, if not the very best, anywhere. It is creditable also to our own city that public patronage encourages these players to return each season for a series of three concerts, each an entertainment that for completeness leaves nothing to be desired.

The third and last concert this season by the Boston musicians is certain to meet the highest expectations in every manner and should be enjoyed by an audience taxing the capacity of the Parsons Theater Monday night. Seats are obtainable at John M. Gallup & Co.'s music store.

...eau in the World

.....

s .....

.....

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert next Monday evening at the Parsons Theater, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, promises to be one of the most delightful and interesting ever given in this city. Those who attended the last concert by this orchestra pronounced it to be the best to date, but Mr. Fiedler, the conductor, has arranged an even more attractive program for the coming season. Among the numbers is the tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," by the eminent composer, Richard Strauss. This will be the first time that his orchestral work has been heard in this state and on account of repeated requests to have something on the program by the author of "Salome," the most talked of work now before the public, Mr. Fiedler has consented to give the opportunity of hearing his work. Seats are now selling rapidly at John M. Gallup & Co.'s music store, and every indication points to a crowded house.

EVENING MAIL,

ess ..... New York City.

e ..... MAR 22 190

Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic Suite," which the composer played last season with the New York Symphony orchestra, was the interesting feature of the last Boston Symphony concert of the season Saturday afternoon. The work gave the same satisfactory impression as a composition that it did upon the first hearing, and Mr. Schelling played it with great brilliancy and technical authority.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Undoubtedly the last appearance which the Boston Symphony orchestra will make in this city for some years to come is its appearance next Tuesday night when it is to render an exceptionally fine program under the direction of Max Fiedler of Hamburg and the auspices of the Waterbury Music league. Until there is an evident spirit and a desire for good music in the city, no more effort to bring so pretentious an organization to the city will be made. The small coterie of sincere music lovers who have from year to year attempted to raise the standard of music in the city and to interest the general public in these events have determined to make no more effort in this direction. The sale of seats to the Boston orchestra's concert is slowly increasing and there will no doubt be a representative audience at the concert.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Sally Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y
MAR 20 1909

1 .....

ess .....

.....

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Excellent Programme, Including Two Wagner Selections, Rendered.

Before a large and enthusiastic audience of music lovers the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fifth and last concert of the season in the Opera House of the Academy of Music last night. An excellent programme was given under the direction of Max Fiedler, who, it was announced during the evening, had been engaged for next season, and would be seen at the Academy again next winter. Wagnerian selections played a prominent part in the programme, two of the five numbers being the work of the great German composer. They were the "Waldweben," from the second act of "Siegfried," and the overture to "The Flying Dutchman." Both were presented with the volume and majesty required by a Wagnerian composition, which a great symphony orchestra is best qualified to give. The other numbers were the four movements of the Rimsky-Korsakoff symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

n .....

ress .....

.....

IS it indeed true that music lovers in Waterbury have not formed the habit of going to local concerts, even such as they would have made it a point to hear in New York or Boston? This is the explanation the Hartford Times kindly makes of the fact, reported in that city, with considerable surprise, that there was danger lest the Boston Symphony Orchestra would not be supported here in its concert next week. That is no doubt part of the truth. The other part is that Waterbury people, even those who like to be called music lovers, and are music lovers, to some degree, expect to be personally solicited to buy tickets to almost any musical entertainment. If there is a single conspicuous person announced, the affair becomes at once a show with a big attraction, and there is a rush for seats. Mary Garden in Salome could fill Buckingham Hall twice, or even thrice. An organization perfected by years of discipline, as the Boston Symphony Orchestra is, until it presents music of highest quality in its most perfect form, is like a well-balanced dramatic company without a star. Everybody knows it will do fine work, and they will enjoy it, but they're not challenged by a picturesque anticipation. It would be unworthy of the Oratorio Society and of the Boston Orchestra if the members of the former should go out among their friends, as they sometimes have, and solicit them to take tickets. Everywhere it goes, with an occasional rare exception, the Boston Symphony draws everybody who has the money and can find a seat. These few exceptions are cut out of the itinerary of this distinguished organization. Waterbury can't afford to get off the list. There is plenty of time to make this concert the most successful ever.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

rom .....

ddress .....

ate .....

STORY OF "FINLAND" AND JOHN SIBELIUS

SYMPHONIC POEM CAUSED COMPOSER'S EXILE.

Russia Feared Its Effect Upon a People With a Spirit All Ready for the Flame—To Be Performed Here at the Request of Prominent Local Musicians.

One of the remarkable compositions to be rendered here on Tuesday evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the symphonic poem "Finland" composed by Jean Sibelius, who was exiled from his own country for creating the work which almost led to the cession of Finland from the oppressing power of Russia. The choice of this number is made at the request of a number of prominent local musicians, who have been most anxious to hear the work since the great sensation which it created when first played by the orchestra in this country.

Sibelius is a Finn and one of the great lights of the modern musical world. His works seem truly inspired and he cuts himself loose from the musical boundaries of tradition enough to make them startingly original and interesting. He is to his native Finland what Tschaikowsky was to Russia.

JEAN SIBELIUS.

"Finland" was written by Sibelius in his native land. An act of oppression arousing the deadened senses of the oppressed Finns inspired him to create this work which in musical language tells the history of Finland and depicts the suffering of her sons in this day when, brought from the high pedestal of her independence, she is subservient to the will of the Russian. When the work was first performed in Finland the audiences were roused to such a high pitch of patriotic enthusiasm that it was at once forbidden performance by the Russian authorities and the composer was driven into exile. The composition still remains one of Finland's forbidden fruits though it has since been recognized wherever played as one of the greatest achievements of modern composition.

In striking contrast to this composition wil be the selection from DeBussy's suite "The Afternoon of the Faun" which, contrary to the Sibelius composition, depicts the peace and beauty of nature rather than the fury and struggle of a nation in suffering. DeBussy, like Sibelius, marks a change in the world of composition and this being one of his most popular orchestral compositions its rendition under Dr. Fiedler's baton is anticipated with great pleasure.

The piece de resistance of the great concert, however, will be the rendition of the greatest of modern symphonies, the Tschaikowsky B-minor or Pathetic symphony, which, written at the greatest stage in the career of the great Russian composer, is filled with the richest in his great temperamental gifts. It is interesting to note that the program to be rendered here will involve the entire force of the orchestra numbering over 100 men. From the opening of the long program with the Weber overture to "Oberon" to the final great Wagner prelude to "Die Meistersinger" the men will work, work with a will and with that consistent artistic purpose for which the orchestra is noted.

---

[215]

...spaper Cutting Bureau in the World
Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 20 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The fifth and last of the Institute-Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in the Academy of Music. From a musical standpoint, it was one of the real notable events of the season, because of the programme played.

Two of the numbers aroused considerable comment; they were most unusual and therefore interesting. These are Rimsky-Korsakoff's Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." The Russian composer's work is an adaptation of the "Arabian Nights" tales into a symphony. The voyage of Sindbad, the Oriental festival at Bagdad and the shipwreck furnish great opportunities for the musician's flights of imagination. His orchestration is highly colored, and he seems to be striving at all times to hold the rapt attention of his auditors, just as tho narratives of the "Thousand and One Nights" are written in such a manner as to sustain the attention to the last. A delightful opening is made with violin solo and harp accompaniment. Often throughout the four movements of the piece the blare of brass and the clanging of gongs and cymbals is halted to allow the sweet, plaintive tone of violin and harp to come again to the front. Even more engrossing is the Strauss poem. Imagine an orchestral composer depicting with his instrumentation the struggles of a sick man with death. One motive is called the Fever; it surges and falls in a lifelike manner that is almost gruesome. The prettiest feature is the Childhood motive, usually carried by flute or oboe. Throughout his struggles the dying man sees visions of his childhood, and often the Fever motive and the Death motive are intertwined with this happy little piece of melody. Under the vigorous baton of Max Fiedler the orchestra more than did justice to these wonderful compositions. Three favorites were also on the programme—Debussy's prelude to "L'Apres-Midi d'un Faun," and Wagner's "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" and overture to "The Flying Dutchman." It would be unfortunate if anyone were to attempt to pick a flaw in the playing of this really unique organization of musicians, for, after all, there is only one Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It is announced that Max Fiedler has been re-engaged as conductor for the season of 1909-1910.

EVENING POST,
New York City.

Apropos of the first performance in Boston and New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of Bruckner's eighth symphony, Mr. Philip Hale has contributed to the programme book a long disquisition full of interest. A few excerpts follow:

As a teacher at the Conservatory, Bruckner was a singular apparition, yet his classes were crowded by those who respected his ability and character while they wondered at his ways. There was a clique against Wagner in the Conservatory. Bruckner was known as a Wagnerite, and the young romanticists among the students gathered around him, and so Felix Mottl, Arthur Nikisch, Gustav Mahler, Emil Paur, Josef Schalk, Ferdinand Löwe, were not only his pupils, they were his long and tried friends.

Bruckner saw nothing, remembered nothing, learned nothing from travel or by his life in Vienna. Nothing broadened his horizon. He passed in Vienna as an "original." He was without manners or graces of any kind. His personal appearance and his dress provoked the smiles of those who did not know him, but the sterling worth of the man within won all hearts, save that of Hanslick. As Dr. Louis says: "A man of fine feelings might smile at Bruckner's appearance; he would not laugh at it." With Bruckner's simplicity was mingled "peasant shrewdness." He was extravagant in his expressions of gratitude; he was distressingly grateful, so surprised did he appear to be when any one showed him a slight kindness. . . .

He was dependent on his salary, for his compositions brought him scarcely anything. He received one hundred florins for his "Te Deum," but his first six symphonies were published at his own expense and at that of some of his friends. . . .

Bruckner was furious against all writers who discovered "programmes" in his music. He was warmly attached to the ill-fated Hugo Wolf, and was never weary of praising the declamation in his songs: "The fellow does nothing all day but compose, while I must tire myself out by giving lessons"; for at sixty years Bruckner was teaching for three guldens a lesson. Beethoven was his idol, and after a performance of one of the greater symphonies he was as one insane. After a performance of the "Eroica," he said to Hruby—would that it were possible to reproduce Bruckner's dialect—"I think that if Beethoven were alive, and I should go to him with my Seventh Symphony and say, 'Here, Mr. Van Beethoven, this is not so bad, this Seventh, as certain gentlemen would make out' . . . I think he would take me by the hand and say, 'My dear Bruckner, never mind, I had no better luck; and the same men who hold me up against you even now do not understand my last quartets, although they act as if they understood them.' Then I'd say to him, 'Excuse me, Mr. Van Beethoven, that I have gone beyond you in freedom of form, but I think a true artist should make his own forms for his own works, and stick by them.'"

THE BOSTON PHILHARMONIC.

Last Concert of the Season Characterized by Music of the Modern Composers.

It seems only yesterday when Wagner was a modern, but, beside Rimsky-Korsakoff, Richard Strauss and Debussy, he has become a classic and an authority, so rapid has been the progress in the way of harmony in very recent years. This was in evidence last evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its closing concert, under Institute auspices, in the opera house of the Academy of Music, under the very capable leadership of Max Fiedler, who, by the way, it was definitely announced, last evening, is to be retained at the head of the organization for the season of 1909-10. There will be only rejoicing, especially among those who heard the concert last evening, that Mr. Fiedler is to be continued at his post. He even made Strauss suave and Debussy's weaving harmonies graphic. As for Rimsky-Korsakoff's Oriental, symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," opus 35, after "The Thousand and One Nights," it was made cumulative, programme music though it was. Wagner was very skillfully programmed, first in his "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," and atmospheric piece, that followed fitly the equally dreamy, poetic and atmospheric fancies that preceded it and led up to Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman," that needed no programme and made a sonorous piece for the dismissal of the audience.

How thoroughly the moderns have learned the Wagnerian use of the leit motif was seen in the Rimsky-Korsakoff suite, with its introduction, carrying the Scheherazade motive, for solo violin and harp, the harp having been set close to the edge of the stage in order to give it due prominence, its light and weaving sea motive and its ship motive, mostly by the wood-wind, all being carried up to full orchestral effect in the predominance of the sea motive, the end being tranquil. Three stories are then told by the orchestra in three distinct movements, viz., that of the kalendar prince, of the young prince and the young princess, and of a festival at Bagdad, closing with the ship being attracted to the magnetic mountain on shore, where, with clangor and amid a terrific storm, it goes to pieces, according to the old Arabian story. The composer advances gingerly to his Oriental music, devoting his early attention to unfolding the set themes until the young prince and princess story is told, when he resorts to pure romanticism, of the folk-song character, a number that brought out enthusiastic applause.

In the fete scene at Bagdad was a beautifully invented contrast of themes, one the sea motive, European in conception, and the other a dance after the fashion of a tarantelle. In the storm scene, where the vessel dashes on the rock, the motives are brought out in a burst of grand orchestration, ending with the Scheherazade motive long drawn out with harp and violin in a high, continuous note.

Strauss was represented by his "Death and Transfiguration." Many music lovers object to this and other subjects chosen by the composer, but it must be confessed that, if Strauss had not named this piece so lugubriously and if there had been no programme to show that it represented the struggles of mankind against adversity and worldly failure, it would be accounted good to hear. To the unadvised the piece, but for its humanity and intensity, might have meant struggle, followed by victory, or calm, followed by storm and clearing weather. With the programme, however, there was heard the faint, distressing breathing of a dying man, his struggle to conquer the great Destroyer, his failure, his recollections of joyous boyhood and strenuous manhood, his death, evidenced by an abrupt stop, and a long transfiguration elaborated with all of the resources of the composer. As a composition it is closely knit, logical in its progressions and employing all of the skill of the players. As indicated above, Mr. Fiedler gave a masterly reading of the score, leading with suavity and yet with increasing power from the beginning to the end.

Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" was the most atmospheric among the numbers. It is scarcely a paradox to say that in order to enjoy and understand it the listener must not listen. That is to say, it is not tuneful. Rather is it harmonious, creating an atmosphere of warmth and haziness. Every light modulation was beautifully brought out by Mr. Fiedler's baton. Continuing the audience in a similar mood was Wagner's "Waldweben," his suggestion of rustling leaves not now arousing the imagination more than do the atmospheric compositions of musicians of a later date. His dramatic overture to "The Flying Dutchman" made a fitting close to a concert that, as a whole, breathed of spring and summer memories. The house was filled and there was much enthusiasm.

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, MAR 20 1909

MUSICAL.

Fifth and Last Concert of the Season by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A really splendid concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, without soloist, closed their series for the season at the Academy of Music last night, and again a closely attentive gathering of music lovers that filled the auditorium, seemed to find keen enjoyment in the proceedings. And there was reason enough for this in the character of the programme as well as in the manner of its interpretation. An unusual array of music was offered. There was no symphony as is the custom, but there was a concentration of so-called "programme" music not often presented on one occasion. There were four compositions, the music of which told a story or pictured a scene. These were Rimsky-Korsakoff's Symphonic Suite "Scheherazade;" Straus' tone poem "Death and Transfiguration;" Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," and the "Waldweben," from Wagner's "Siegfried." And even the fifth number of the list, the overture to Wagner's "The Flying Dutchman," though not in the form generally assumed by "programme" music has a pronounced element of the picturesque.

If there was kinship in the underlying story-telling purpose of each composition there was diversity in the method of the composer and style of music which gave them an individual and comparative interest as expositions of given ideas. Moreover there was apparent the hand of authority in the creation of each work that makes them products of distinction in their class. The Debussy prelude was played once before in Brooklyn this season (though not at these concerts), but the others were, presumably, strange enough to ears of most of the listeners to be very impressive as forceful revelations. The "Scheherazade" is a truly quaint collection of four movements, the motive for each being a tale from "A Thousand and One Nights," the composition taking its title from the Sultana Scheherazade, who saved her life by telling so many stories to the Sultan Schahriar. The four tales chosen by the composer as titles for the four movements are, "The Sea and Sinbad's Ship;" "The story of the Kalandar-Prince," "The Young Prince and the Young Princess," and "Festival at Bagdad. The Sea. The Ship Goes to Pieces on a Rock Surmounted by a Bronze Warrior. Conclusion." A musical motif for the Sultana appears through the different movements which are ingeniously charming as well as curiously suggestive.

The Strauss tone poem is one of this composer's well-known works in this form and shows his extraordinary mastery of orchestral effects. The Debussy prelude has to an unusual degree the beauty of poetic fancy. Wagner's "Waldweben" is an old friend and it was good to renew the acquaintance of "The Flying Dutchman" overture. Mr. Fiedler's conducting was productive of admirable results, and his season's work has indicated that he is a painstaking and insistent disciplinarian, although his manner is rather more commonplacely demonstrative than the public has been used to at these concerts. The conductor who achieves the best results generally does not and should not work as hard in the presence of his audience as does Mr. Fiedler. His final programme was, however, highly interesting as revealing the scope of his powers and his first season closes auspiciously. Rumors have been in circulation regarding the prospect of his continuance with the orchestra next season, and the matter was not definitely settled until the present week. He is to continue to conduct the orchestra for at least another season.

All the concerts of this orchestra in Brooklyn this season have contributed towards maintaining its high standing, and the uniformly large attendance at all the concerts is an assurance that the local public appreciates them at their true value.

From EVENING TELEGRAM,
Address New York City.
Date

With Symphony and Oratorio.

THE farewell concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given on Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall with Mr. Ernest Schilling, the pianist, as the soloist, playing his Fantastic Suite for orchestra and piano. This proved to be a remarkable composition, full of poetry and color, with the brilliant piano part ably supported by the orchestra, which is used as much more than mere accompaniment. Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony and the Freschutz Overture concluded the programme, and a grateful audience departed with the consoling thought that Mr. Fiedler will return with the orchestra as its conductor next season.

[216]

TIMES,
New York City.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Berlioz's Symphony, Schelling's Suite, and Weber's Overture Played.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played its afternoon concert yesterday in Carnegie Hall, and thereby closed its New York series for the present season. The programme contained Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," the "Fantastic Suite" for orchestra and piano by Mr. Ernest Schelling, in which Mr. Schelling played the piano part, and the overture to "Der Freischütz" of Weber. Berlioz's symphony has several times been heard here in recent years, yet it has never been able to acquire a firm hold on the public's affection. Conductors like it, perhaps because it gives them much to do to elaborate and elucidate all the details of depiction and characterization that Berlioz attempted to put into his music. It is an interesting piece to read about, for it has an important place in the development of Berlioz's musical ideals, of his orchestral genius, of the modern tendencies of programme music; it has an important place, too, in his biography, connected with curious episodes in the life of this strange and fascinating genius. It is interesting from every point of view except one—and that is as music to listen to. There are some pages of undeniable charm, of sinister power; but in general its musical inspiration pants far behind the ambition of the composer.

Mr. Schelling's suite he played here with the New York Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Damrosch a year ago, after playing with the Boston Orchestra in Boston, and he has since played it with the Chicago Orchestra and at a music festival in Munich, where it aroused much interest. It was good to hear it again, for it is music of singular originality and distinction. It is well termed "fantastic"; the ideas are individual and the play of fancy through it is unrestrained and exuberant. The whole suite betrays the workmanship of an accomplished pianist, as was to be expected. The writing for the piano shows a skillful command of all the resources of the instrument; it is constantly, almost uninterruptedly, employed. What might have been taken less as a matter of course is the brilliancy, the finesse and daring of the orchestration, which has a much more than subsidiary part in the composition. The orchestra is more than an accompaniment: it is organically knit together with the piano part. Mr. Schelling has sought for new and striking orchestral colors. Some of his effects are original; and while some are tentative, apparently, more of them seemed to justify themselves in the extremely finished and brilliant performance which the orchestra gave than was the case at the first hearing of the piece. The musical substance of the work is interesting, and there are traits in it of a true poetic feeling. The first movement, an "allegro marziale," has a theme of strongly marked and syncopated rhythm suggestive of a Scottish spirit. The second is a light and breathless scherzo, with a trio in a rhythm of five beats that is fascinating. There are tenderness and passion in the slow movement.

The last movement has three themes, the first and last of which, respectively, are "Dixie" and "Old Folks at Home," and is entitled "Virginia Reel." Here the composer has given his fancy free rein, and has treated the popular melodies with much skill and humorous brilliancy. There are few popular airs that have as much genuine melody or as stirring a pulse as "Dixie," and few that have a more heartfelt sincerity than Stephen Foster's tune. They are real musical material for a musician that has so much sympathy and so much technical resource as Mr. Schelling; and his treatment of them is most interesting from a musical point of view. The suite, as a whole, is charming and music, music of true distinction. It is modern in its point of view, and there is an original and unconventional feeling for harmony at the bottom of it. It is not profound music, nor was it the intention of the composer to be profound. He has sought for a free and untrammeled outlet for an active fancy, and the suite is full of such fancy.

Mr. Fiedler took only a temporary farewell of his New York audience at the close of this concert, for he has been re-engaged to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season. His conducting has given pleasure; there has been, indeed, more satisfaction derived from it by the New York admirers of the Boston Orchestra than many of them expected after Mr. Fiedler's first appearance at its head last November.

The orchestra played both orchestral numbers with spirit and understanding. Their work in the Berlioz symphony was specially brilliant, and was rewarded by applause lasting for several minutes. Mr. Schelling played as always, effectively, with true feeling and sure technique. The audience was of good size.

...The First Established and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

...ess

During their exceptionally interesting local season, which closed last Monday, Director Fiedler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their five concerts performed one symphony each of Beethoven, Berlioz, Brahms and Paderewski (played by the composer); an excerpt from Gretry's dance music; a group of songs by Grieg, Mozart and Strauss, together with two arias of Weber, sung by Mme. Marie Rappold; overtures of Beethoven (2), Wagner (1), Weber (1); two Wagner preludes, Macdowell's picturesque symphonic poem "Lamia"; the Saint-Saens C Minor Concerto, played by M. Paderewski; Strauss's tone-poem, "Ein Heldenleben" and a scene from "Feuersnot"; the "Fantastic Suite" of Schelling, and the Tschaikowsky concerto in D for the violin, played with prodigious brilliancy by Mischa Elman. The series has given incalculable profit and pleasure to large and enthusiastic audiences, and Mr. Fiedler and his players are to be congratulated on maintaining the distinguished tradition of the orchestra.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

New York City.

MAR 21 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN JUBILANT MOOD

Following its usual and most praiseworthy custom, the Boston Symphony Orchestra made its programme of yesterday afternoon entirely different from that of its Thursday night concert. Thus, while on Thursday the feature of the concert was Anton Bruckner's incoherent and tiresome Eighth Symphony, with all its mistaken striving after disjointed phrases, yesterday's afternoon's offering was largely of the ligh and jubilant order. Thursday the orchestra relied on its ensemble work for its attractiveness; yesterday afternoon it brought forward and relied partly on Mr. Ernest Schelling's solo work. Mr. Schelling appeared not only as pianist, but also as a composer.

At the last matinee concert by this orchestra Paderewski appeared as a composer and soloist, and it was quite fitting that at the afternoon concert following Mr. Schelling, a sometime pupil of the great Pole, should be heard in the same two roles. His fantastic suite is an ambitious work, at intervals showing originality and naivete. In the last movement several American airs, for instance, "Dixie," "Old Folks at Home" and "Yankee Doodle," are interwoven with the lively vivacious Virginia reel music that constitutes the chief part of the movement, and these, enlarged and embroidered, bring the composition to a brilliant, breathless finish.

The other fantastic number on the programme was Berlioz's First Symphony, with the sub-title "Episode in the Life of an Artist." Mr. Berlioz has striven in this five-part composition to put into musical shape a sort of De Quincey story. A young musician attempts suicide with opium, but takes only sufficient to cause a heavy stupor. While in this condition he dreams of love, fury, anguish, dances, the fields, murder and hanging. The different phases and subjects are treated in the usual manner. The love theme, which was written before "Die Walkuere," and which Siegmund's love song strongly resembles, runs through the entire symphony. A tuneful waltz constitutes the second division; and the pastoral scene has its usual booming thunder music. The Berlioz symphony was much more enjoyable than the Bruckner composition, for it had, at least, continuity, and added several tuneful episodes.

To make the two concerts balance, Thursday night ended with the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," by Wagner, and yesterday Weber's overture to "Der Freischuetz" brought the afternoon and the season to a close.

NEW YORK HERALD,

New York City.

MAR 21 1909

BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S MUSICAL FAREWELL

Crack Players from the "Hub" Say Goodby for the Season in Burst of Melody.

Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony received a rousing interpretation at the hands of the Boston orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, where the players from "the Hub" were heard for the last time this season.

The French master's symphony, which was considered in its day a revolutionary work and as presenting almost impossible technical difficulties to the orchestra, was played with fine virtuosity and was received with much applause from a crowded house. At its close Mr. Fiedler, the conductor, was presented with a giant wreath and the members of the orchestra were made to rise and bow their thanks.

Mr. Ernest Schelling, the soloist of the afternoon, made a favorable impression with his own "Fantastic Suite" for piano and orchestra, an interesting composition, in the final movement of which clever use is made of "Dixie," "Old Folks at Home" and "Yankee Doodle." Mr. Schelling played the piano part capitally and had the advantage of an admirable orchestral accompaniment. He was many times recalled.

The concert ended with a fine performance of Weber's "Der Freischütz" overture, in which the admirable finish and tone color of Boston's crack orchestra were conspicuous.

WORLD,

New York City.

MAR 21 1909

HUB ORCHESTRA SHINES IN FANTASTIC SYMPHONY.

Many Recalls for Fiedler After His Hundred Men Perform Berlioz's Music Superbly.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its farewell concert of the season in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. At no previous concert has this orchestra excelled, if it has even equalled, the almost perfect execution revealed in the performance of the "Fantastic" symphony of Berlioz, with which the concert opened. This work, with its complicated orchestration, gives exceptional opportunity for orchestral virtuosity, and the opportunity was accepted without disaster. It was a marvellous display of accomplished musicianship where one hundred men played as one. At the close Dr. Fiedler was recalled several times. He made the whole orchestra bow acknowledgements with him.

Ernest Schelling was the soloist. He played his own suite, a "fantastic," for pianoforte and orchestra. This is a charming bit of composition, fluent, melodious and prettily orchestrated, with all due prominence, of course, given to the piano. Chiefly interesting was the trio of scherzando, a little conversation between the woodwinds and the piano. Pleasing too was the last movement, built largely on "Dixie" and "The Swanee River."

Weber's "Der Freischuts" overture, played with fine spirit, finished the programme.

STAATS ZEITUNG,

New York City.

MAR 21 1909

Das letzte diesjährige Abendkonzert der Bostoner, das am verflossenen Donnerstag in Carnegie Hall stattgefunden hat, brachte Herrn Max Fiedler und der berühmten Künstlervereinigung einen großen Erfolg. Herr Fiedler hat mit der überaus großzügigen und imponirend kraftvollen Wiedergabe von Bruckner's kolossaler „Achter Symphonie" wohl seine reifste und größte Leistung hier geboten, und das Orchester hat sich wieder einmal mit Ruhm bedeckt. Bruckner gehört hier bei uns noch immer zu den unentdeckten, resp. zu den meist aufgegriffenen und mit dem größten Vorurtheil behandelten Komponisten. Eine kleine Besprechung seiner 9 Symphonien, namentlich der zuletzt gehörten Achten, wird daher ganz am Platze sein, und wir werden im nächsten Sonntagsblatt darauf zurückkommen.

Mit dem gestrigen Nachmittag-Konzerte haben die Bostoner für diese Saison Abschied von uns genommen. Das berühmte Orchester hat sich unter der Leitung Fiedler's durchaus auf der alten Höhe erhalten, und dieser Dirigent hat sich sein Terrain, das er anfags schrittweise nehmen mußte, schließlich ganz erobert. Er ist ein Orchesterleiter von seltenen musikalischen Gaben, von größter Energie, Umsicht, Kaltblütigkeit und einem sehr gewählten Geschmack. Da er dazu über ein ausgesprochenes Stylgefühl verfügt, so war sein bedeutender Erfolg nur selbstverständlich.

* * *

STAATS ZEITUNG,

New York City.

Das am Samstag Nachmittag gleichfalls in Carnegie Hall abgehaltene Concert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, das letzte New Yorker Concert der berühmten Vereinigung in unserer Stadt, stand unter einem guten Stern. Berlioz' „Phantastische Symphonie" fand unter Max Fiedler's Leitung eine ganz vortreffliche, namentlich koloristisch tadellose Durchführung. Das Werk gehört nicht zu des großen französischen Meisters erfreulichsten. Ein großes und ungemessenes Wollen findet da nur theilweise und unvollständig Erfüllung, aber so gespielt, ist das großangelegte Werk seiner Wirkung stets sicher.

Die zweite Nummer des Programms war Ernest Schelling's bereits vor zwei Saisons gehörte „Fantasie Suite" für Piano und Orchester, wobei der Komponist als Solist am Piano fungirte. Die Komposition macht beim ersten Anhören mehr Effekt als in der Folge, denn das thematische Material erscheint nach wiederholtem Anhören als recht dürftig. Doch ist dem Werk große Geschicklichkeit in der Mache und ein Blick für das Effektvolle nicht abzusprechen. Der Klavierpart ist brillant behandelt, aber auch die Orchesterfarben mischt der Komponist mit sicherer Hand. Uns gefällt der erste Satz am besten; das Publikum wird aber stets mit dem Molto Vivace des letzten Satzes, „Virginia Reel" gehen, in das Herr Schelling sehr wirksam das rhythmisch so flotte „Dixie" und andere amerikanische Volkslieder verschlungen hat. Der Beifall war ausnehmend stark, und Herr Schelling durfte als Komponist und auch als Pianist wiederholt seine Verbeugung machen.

Weber's „Freischütz"-Ouverture, unter Fiedler's Leitung in sublimer Weise gespielt, schloß das Konzert.

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date APR 21 1909

THE LAST BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The first warning that New York's winter of music is nearing its end is annually given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and for the current season this notice was served at yesterday's matinee at Carnegie Hall, which marked the last appearance here of the visiting organization until next November. As if to emphasize the precious qualities of this Boston band, Mr. Max Fiedler and his men chose as their principal number yesterday the "Fantastic" Symphony of Hector Berlioz, than which few compositions in the repertory demand for their performance a more crystalline clarity of string tone or a greater virtuosity in the other groups of players. The Boston organization is a shining exemplar of what an orchestra should be in these respects, and it is safe to say that the supremely expert presentation of the "Fantastic" Symphony yesterday would have pleased Berlioz even more than it did the fine audience. The gaunt themes beloved of the romantic Frenchman were sounded with a proud nobility of utterance by the violins and the heavier strings; the English horn and the oboe lent to the colloquy "in the fields" a delicate yet piercing beauty, giving the precise suggestion of remoteness and inconsequence intended, while the peals of thunder that rolled from the drums, at the close of this third division of the symphony, came and went with consummate skill. The full flavor of the Walpurgis Night music of the final movement was achieved by means of the splendid responsiveness of the players in every choir to the requirements of the score and to the directions of the conductor. Mr. Fiedler did his share, and the result will remain among the season's many delightful memories.

As to the music in and for itself, it loses some of its importance as the years go by, but none of its picturesqueness or of its sardonic humor. Not by any modern seeker after character in music, often at the cost of beauty, has the ingenious craftsmanship of Berlioz been surpassed. And, as the annotator of the programme book observes, Beethoven had not been dead four years when the "Fantastic" symphony was first performed, on December 5, 1830; "Schubert had been buried a little more than two years; Schumann had just obtained his mother's permission to study music; Verdi was a poor and unknown student at Busseto; Wagner was studying at Leipsic with the cantor of the Thomasschule; Brahms and Tschaikowsky were unborn."

Until the third movement of Ernest Schelling's "Fantastic" suite for pianoforte and orchestra, which followed the symphony on yesterday's list, it may well have seemed to some listeners that Mr. Fiedler had not chosen wisely in placing together two works approaching each other in mood and bearing similar titles. The first two movements of Mr. Schelling's admirably written suite, which had made a success when first played here a season or two ago, are examples of blithe and wholesome musical thought, avowedly aiming at no depth of feeling, but altogether happy and charming in intention and execution. From the point of view of to-day perhaps the first bit of musical speech that carried words of tenderness and seriousness at this Boston concert came when Mr. Schelling, who was himself at the pianoforte, played the expressive theme of the third movement of his composition. It fell gratefully upon the ear, and while it is not by any means a remarkable melodic idea, it stood out on this occasion with surprising effectiveness. This side of music's emotional function was set forth authoritatively in the programme's final number, the overture to Weber's "Der Freischütz."

To recur to Mr. Schelling's attractive suite, this new hearing of the score brought further admiration for the composer's ease and freedom of orchestral and pianistic utterance, and for the frank and engaging quality of his thematic invention. In the third movement there is a suggestion of the same purity and chivalric tenderness of thought that marked a good deal of the music Edward MacDowell wrote; perhaps in both cases the spirit of the music may be called essentially American. With the fourth and last division of his suite Mr. Schelling's well remembered conjuring with "Dixie" and "Old Folks at Home" came to the front, and the popular response by the auditors was instant. The composer-pianist's interpretation of his own music was marked by modesty, enthusiasm and an ample skill.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

New York City.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

THe last of this season's series of Boston Symphony concerts took place in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony, Ernest Schelling's fantastic suite for piano and orchestra, and the overture to "Der Freischutz" were the compositions played. The symphony and overture are, of course, among the most familiar of orchestral compositions, and Mr. Schelling's suite, although written recently, was not a novelty. The programme itself was not one, therefore, to make the occasion especially notable, but the concert will be remembered undoubtedly as one of the most brilliant and interesting of the ten given here this winter under Mr. Fiedler's direction. There were several reasons why the concert should especially be remembered. In the first place Mr. Fiedler's reading of the symphony was one to command attention and approval, and in the second place the orchestra was in splendid form and played superbly. Finally, the playing of Mr. Schelling, who appeared as the soloist in the performance of his own composition, was a source of pleasure in itself.

The fantastic symphony sums up Berlioz. It is a mirror of his strange genius, and reflects equally his strong and his weak points as a composer. The vivid imagination, with its bent toward the strange, horrible, and grotesque, the extraordinary power of musical characterization within certain lines, the mastery of the orchestra, and the intuitive feeling for orchestral effects, all of which Berlioz possessed in such a preëminent degree, are revealed most strikingly in this work. On the other hand his incomplete mastery of structural design, and the inability of his musical invention to meet the demands of his poetical imagination, when those demands were for ideas of pure beauty, and not merely of power or grotesqueness, are made equally apparent in this work. But the symphony is one that interests even though it does not charm, and when it is played as it was on Saturday it makes a great effect. Mr. Fiedler's reading of it was on strongly dramatic lines, and compelling in its power. The band responded to his direction with wonderful sympathy, and played with great spirit and finish and resonant and beautiful tone quality. Seldom has it played more beautifully than it did in the second movement, "A Ball," which contains the most purely beautiful music of the score. Especially fine was the performance of the fourth movement, the "March to the Scaffold," in which the brass choir covered itself with glory. The applause that followed the performance was enthusiastic and prolonged.

Mr. Schelling's suite is a composition of unusual merit, the work of an accomplished and highly gifted musician. Its melodic content is pleasing, and the ideas are handled with skill. As would be expected from such an accomplished pianist, the solo part is most grateful and effective, but this is not all. Mr. Schelling has written for the orchestra with skill and success, and some of the most charming portions of the work are those in which the orchestral effects are most prominent. The suite is in four movements. The first, "Allegro Marziale," is based on a strongly marked and spirited theme, and abounds in effective passage work and cadenzas for the solo instrument. The second movement is a gay scherzando. This is followed by an intermezzo, which has melodic charm and atmosphere. The finale is a "Virginia Reel." In this the composer has employed two well-known tunes—"Dixie" and "Old Folks at Home." His treatment of themes is most musicianly. They are developed and made an essential part of the movement. Mr. Schelling played the solo part in a most brilliant and finished style, and was admirably accompanied. The composition unmistakably pleased the audience, and the pianist-composer was recalled many times.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST.

APRIL 4, 1909

MR. STRUBE'S SYMPHONY

Mr. Gustav Strube's Symphony in B minor received its first performance at the Symphony concerts of last week, the composer conducting. It is Mr. Strube's second symphony and is in four movements. It should be heard soon again, for it represents an important phase in the development of the composer, to say nothing of its great intrinsic value as a composition.

Mr. Strube claims that his symphony follows traditional paths as regards structure. That seems an extreme statement, when one considers, for instance, the capricious and vaguely outlined scherzo. But let us yield Mr. Strube his point, admit that he pays reverence to the incrusted shell of the symphony in four movements, while giving his fantasy very free rein within those bounds. Practice in analyzing symphonies will not help you to explain that scherzo, and if the remainder of the work is symphonic in its themes and its grammar it is more rhapsodical than architectural in its inner spirit.

It is said, too, that in this symphony Mr. Strube claims to have bid a last farewell to the snares of the French school and its alluring progressions. He will have to produce something more to convince his audiences of that. Mr. Strube is in one sense a traitor to his country. He has evidently made a profound study of modern French scores and mastered their secrets to an astounding extent, not merely as regards the letter, but the spirit, the point of view. He has equalled and beaten most of the Frenchmen at their own game. But with all this it may be said that he has never written more truly original pages than many passages in this work.

The writing is clear as an engraving. You can listen and see every note of the wonderful score, a score that stands by the side of any modern partition and asked favors from none in its wonderful brilliancy, its fresh undiminished beauty, its rare, precious, glowing colors. He is no symbolic study, but an untrammelled fight into regions where beauty reigns, joyful and supreme. Perhaps the sign post read "Debussy's route," but it is with Mr. Strube that we travel. The first movement catches one up at once into its exhilarating, mercurial measures. What a wonderful relief to the ears it was, after the gaudy sounds of opera by night. A fault that struck one at a first hearing is a tendency to roll a delectable phrase or harmony on the tongue, to repeat it again, until to the casual hearer it loses its savor.

The scherzo is very original, but rather unoriginated. That is it seems as if the composer had been swept away on the current of his irresponsible harmonies, his rhythms and his beloved instruments until he could no longer hold a tight rein over them, and out rush ideas, each crying for the lion's share of utterance, effectually overturning the laws of sugcession and order and symmetry. How finely the opening theme of the finale is prepared and announced! And with each sentence one wants to revert to that instrumentation, at once such a feast and such a rest for the ear. The symphony should be heard again this season, when the town and the writer is not so stuffed with opera as to render clear thinking in any other direction well nigh impossible.

[217]

TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY. APRIL 2, 1909

Sanders Theatre: Nina Fletcher Reappears

At Sanders Theatre in Cambridge last night, Miss Nina Fletcher, a violinist who left our concert rooms a year or so ago for further study, was heard for the first time since her return, with the Symphony Orchestra in a concerto of Max Bruch. Contrary to expectation, the concerto was that in D minor (opus 44), with its apocryphal departures from established concerto form—a work of large dimensions, summoning the widest range of the instrument's capacities, and calling for sustained powers, both of execution and of interpretation. More than the earlier concerto, the one in G minor, which walks the paths of tradition for the most part demurely, that of Miss Fletcher's choice displays the ripening traits of Bruch, the master of orchestral intricacies, especially as associated with the timbres which embellish a vocal melody. It savors of the craftsman in choral works; it is full of melodies which sing of themselves—from the limpid sweetness of soprano to the plaint of contralto or the baritone in sombre eloquence. Whole passages of its double notes have the fluid melody of part singing; between brilliant orchestral crashes in interlude come reveries which, in their adaptability to the tones of the human voice, might go back to the theories of the men who were writing for violin in the time of Spohr's "Gesang Scene" concerto. The player's choice was thus both happy and discreet. She does not, and probably will not, essay the broad sonorities of her instrument, though her tone, when the bow seeks the lower strings, is full and resonant, and she sounds its depths without raucousness.

Were Bruch's second concerto to undergo mathematical measurement, the length of its passages in double notes, placed end to end, would probably prove surprising; they would doubtless claim a generous proportion of the work. Bruch, with the vein of choral work lurking in his mind would rather use two voices than one, even three strings in preference to two. Given, therefore, a left-hand technique of the deftness which has been developed by Miss Fletcher, and a supple bow arm which evokes the subtlest nuances, an effective performance of most of the concerto was assured. Purity of intonation, grace and a new repose of style were the qualities the player brought to the concerto. She spun its fleet passages, too, with their due shimmer and lightness, though with a bow which sometimes outstripped the left hand. If the solemn declamations of the opening adagio called for a strength which was not hers, Bruch's melody of the second movement, beginning wondrously and fading into the commonplace, benefited by a phrasing and a sweetness of tone which concealed its falling-off. It is sung in dialogue, alternating between solo violin and the whole body of accompanying violins. The full volume of strings failed to give it the eloquence which it gained from the solo violin, sounding its intensity, and bringing distinction even to the commonness of its close. From this, and from the poetry which the player read into the legato passages, it was apparent that her excellence is a matter of style. Her technique, is not of the order which dazzles; she employs a dexterous left hand and a bow arm apparently without joints, solely for the expression of a certain fineness and finish which is feminine. She attempts none of the Valkyrie shouts with which Maud Powell used to startle and electrify her hearers. It is doubtful if they will ever be within her power. But she returns with a new assurance when in the presence of audiences which is another happy augury for her future. In what she has undertaken, moreover, the possibilities of future development are both alluring and endless. The ardors of the stylist have turned out to be nof beneath the dignity of such an artist as Mr. Kreisler, and they should invite the efforts of one who already reveals such aptitudes in that vein as Miss Fletcher.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, APRIL 3, 1909

CONCERTS OF YESTERDAY

MR. STRUBE'S SYMPHONY FOR THE FIRST TIME

The Ablest and Most Imaginative and Individual Work Thus Far of the Composer—Its Harmonic and Instrumental Beauty, Suggestion and Daring—Mr. Fiedler and His Fragments of Wagner—A Conservatory Concert with Two Novel Pieces

Mr. Strube's symphony made this the major interest of the concert. In form, especially in the dry specifications of print, it seems conventional enough. A slow introduction leads in the opening allegro; and adajio and a scherzo follow in the normal course; a brief slow introduction again leads into the allegro of the finale. Those loyal souls that show to the sonata form as to a sacred thing may trace it throughout the symphony. Those who love clearly defined melodic thoughts will find Mr. Strube's, at least in his first statements of them, readily recognizable. They are oftenest full-bodied and salient musical ideas, but, with one exception, their full virtue only appears in his treatment of them. All of them have individual mood and accent, and the dominating subject of the show movement, as it rises into sustained song, has clear beauty of its own and brings as clear and swift emotional response. Elsewhere those themes are distinctly serviceable themes to wear the harmonic dress, to stand against the harmonic background, or to wear the instrumental lines that Mr. Strube has bestowed upon them. Moreover, zealous as he is for free and individual development of his musical thoughts, and devoted as he is to their harmonic and instrumental vesture, he has, for these days, one conspicuous virtue. He does worry his melodies, shaking and reshaking them, twisting and turning them until he has wrung the last drop of development or of suggestion out of them. No more—to continue these canine analogies— does he chews his themes into bits, and then make endless play with the fragments. His is no symphony of dovetailed scraps, no ingenuously fitted tonal mosaic. It is an organic, closely wrought whole. Each movement moves steadily forward in its development with clear creative force. The symphony is plentiful in subtly accomplished delicately adjusted and assiduously polished detail. Yet Mr. Strube never loses his air of spontaneity, and of a more vigorous creative energy than has been apparent in any other of his pieces. Nowhere does it suggest the rather languorous and sweetish dawdling that has clouded some of his more recent minor pieces. A genuine impulse to create seems to have prompted the symphony, and Mr. Strube has plied with the rejoicing energy of a man who has at last touched his prime, who feels and in his heart knows his powers.

The distinction and the individuality of these powers lie in the harmonic dress and the instrumental coloring of the symphony. Not that Mr. Strube's is music all color. Each movement and each elastic division of each movement has a frame and body of its own, and is substantial music. But the imagination and resource that have anointed and clothed this body, and that have given the music fascination to the fancy and appeal to emotions, are primarily a rare power of harmonic and instrumental coloring. Mr. Strube, sitting in his place in the orchestra these many years, has heard much that the composers of our generation have ventured and wrought in these things. Yet when he comes to the test of a symphony of his own, he keeps his own individuality. There is not a suggestion of imitation in the music and hardly a suggestion—and that altogether trivial—of any remembered thing. Mr. Strube has reflected deeply upon harmonic possibilities, and with imagination he has vitalized his thoughts. No American composer has gone further and more imaginatively into harmonic venture and daring than has he in this symphony. Similarly, Mr. Strube thinks in terms of instruments. He is no composer merely "scoring" for orchestra ideas that have come to expression and amplification in another medium. To him the orchestra is an endlessly varied palette of instrumental color, whence he may choose and assort, blend and contrast, his tonal tints. He has an instrumental imagination; his creative emotion expresses itself spontaneously and communicatingly in terms of tonal color. Again in his instrumentation has he greatly dared and subtly imagined. (Fortunate he that a band of virtuosi were playing his music yesterday.)

The justification of these things, the everlasting justification of all ventures and experiments, is as old as their beginnings: Do they kindle the listening imagination, bring answering emotions, engross the hearer in the music, proceed to beauty and move with ordered power? Of the imagination that fills Mr. Strube's harmonies and instrumental coloring, of their luminous brightness or their shadowy glow, of their emotional incisiveness of their poetic suggestion, of the iridescent and endlessly fascinating web into which they wove his music, there could be little doubt in those that head yesterday with engrossed and sympathetic ear. The end, and notably in the scherzo, with its seconds, and in the adagio, had justified the means. They had justified as well, and as never before, Mr. Strube as a composer of rare imagination.

H. T. P.

ADVERTISER, APRIL 3, 1909

STRUBE'S NEW SYMPHONY BY THE ORCHESTRA

ORIGINALITY SHOWN AND UNDENIABLE SKILL

Remainder of the Programme Devoted to Wagner and Played Con Amore.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Symphony in B minor.....Strube
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner
Siegfried's Funeral Music.....Wagner
"Good Friday's Spell" from "Parsifal"..Wagner
"Ride of the Walkyries".....Wagner

Altogether a noble programme and excellently carried out. Mr. Strube conducted his own symphony. He was greeted with cordial applause when he appeared on the conductor's stand and the most friendly interest was manifested in his new work. The symphony began well, its introduction being expressive and the succeeding first movement coherent and intelligible as well as ingenious. There is good figure treatment in the work and many derivations and subtleties. There is a vein of sadness running through it that makes Strube a sort of German Debussy, but this is not meant in any sense of plagiarism, for there is originality enough in the first movement and its introduction.

The Adagio leans heavily towards the reed instruments and all through the work there is much prominence given to the oboe and the French horn. As the gloom, or pensiveness, of the first movement is carried still further in the Adagio, one feels like paraphrasing Emerson's question—"Why so sour, my little man?" The effect thus far, both because of the instrumentation and the subject matter, is rather monochromatic. It is a plaintive school with which we are not much in sympathy, but the work is a strong one in this school.

The Coda of the Adagio, with its beautiful horn phrases, is a true climax, full of poetry and of originality.

The Scherzo is very free. At times it is almost like an Oriental dance. It is quaint and bizarre rather than playful. The predominant reed color is here contrasted with the baleful tones of muted horns and trumpets. There is much jugglery of figures here and undeniable skill is displayed in almost every phrase.

The Finale is worked up well. There is some transference of figures, some dialogue of oboe and flute, some dancing of nymphs and dryads in a sylvan forest (although there is no "programme" to the work), but the symphony still leans towards "cerebral music," the music that one must think about rather than revel in. We note "Tannhaeuser" pass by in a most recognizable manner, in this procession. There is broad final treatment; in fact, all through the work, Mr. Strube works up his climaxes well.

Summing up, we can say that this symphony is modern without being a puzzle. It is a distinct advance on Mr. Strube's preceding orchestral works. It was worth playing and hearing and the composer-conductor deserved the three recalls which he received. A little more of brightness, more diversity of style, and a little more melody, would make Mr. Strube a strong factor in American music.

After this the remainder of the concert was by a composer named Wagner. This composer really has some good musical thoughts. He uses a modern orchestra, but he does not employ it for noise. He manages to put some meaning into even the smallest of his figures, and he does manage to convey what he means to the auditor without any perceptible straining.

People do not write this kind of music at present for at least 17 different reasons. The first of these reasons is—they can't! Perhaps it is unnecessary to give the others.

The glory of the Wagner part of the programme was indescribable. Mr. Fiedler took some of the tempi slower than we have been accustomed to, but matters only gained by this. The great climax in the "Lohengrin" Prelude was magnificently worked up and the final celestial ending, on four violins in harmonics, was most delicately shaded. The Bacchanale was sumptuous, sensuous, and a musical orgy of intense power.

The Funeral Music, it ought not to be called a Funeral March, of Siegfried, was as broad and dignified as we have ever heard it. One could defy any of our prolix modern composers to say as much in a page as is said in the first three chords of this great number. Mr. Fiedler gave more accent to the ever-recurring Death-figure than we are accustomed to, but we found the effect warranted by the result.

The tender promise of release from both Winter and Sorrow, that is breathed in the "Good Friday's Spell," was deliciously in contrast. One revelled in every measure.

Then came the whinneying of the steeds, the gallop of the Walkyrie. There are many gallops in orchestral music. There is a ghostly gentleman who gallops in the Lenore symphony, Frau Holle gallops in the "Im Walde" symphony, Berlioz causes Faust to have a very disagreeable broncho ride at the end of "Faust," but none of these are able to present such a stable as is here displayed.

In the Musical Horse Show Wagner is entitled to the blue ribbon. And Mr. Fiedler played the works, each and all, as if he loved them. It was a pure and unalloyed musical pleasure, that last half of the concert, and the orchestra played as if inspired. Bravi! Mr. Fiedler and orchestra. Bravi! and thanks; not even Hammerstein and all his starry warblers can dim your glory!

HERALD, BOSTON, APRIL 4, 1909

SYMPHONY GIVES ITS 20TH CONCERT

Strube's Composition in B Minor Heard with Interest.

Symphony orchestra, 20th concert, with the following program:

Strube.....Symphony in B minor (MS.) (First performance.)
Wagner.....Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Wagner.....Bacchanale from "Tannhauser"
Wagner.....Funeral March from "Dusk of the Gods"
Wagner..."Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal"
Wagner.....Ride of the Valkyries

Mr. Strube, one of the first violins of the orchestra, stepped out of the path that he has followed for the last four or five years, that of the symphonic poem, and produced at this concert his symphony in B minor. This work in four movements is one of interest throughout. The composer has followed the strict sonata form, but he has colorded and intensified it with his own individuality and given it the modern emotional speech.

Mr. Strube has scored his symphony for a large orchestra, has made special use of the tender and pathetic tone of the English horn, the dark coloring of the bass clarinet, the deep and sustaining quality of the tuba, the sparkling glitter of certain harp arpeggii, and the light and sharp color of the glockenspiel. From long and practical acquaintance with the varied timbres of the orchestra, Mr. Strube has learned the art of opposing and of blending the qualities of the different choirs, and his orchestration shows not only individuality of tone color but sureness in the handling of it.

The first movement, Allegro commodo, opens with an introduction that has a distinct poetic feeling of quiet meditative beauty. The first movement opens with the announcement of the initial subject by flutes and clarinets. In themes of quiet nature Mr. Strube seems to have been introspective at the time of writing, and to have intimately conceived music with a poignant sense of longing. There is no sentimental gloom or tragic despair, but a plaintive yearning that is of the wholesome, meditative kind.

The slow movement, adagio ma mon troppo, is the portion of this symphony that will undoubtedly appeal to the largest number of hearers. This movement is really a song for the plaintive voices of the orchestra. The sustained melodic outlines, veiled now and then with a cry as of some strong emotion, have that same character of intense and ecstatic longing that has just been mentioned. Combined with the yearning quality of the themes Mr. Strube has added now and then a sharp and sudden tinge of dissonance that brings for the moment a more intense feeling of yearning, but with no touch of melodramatic or tragic sorrow. The scoring of this movement is of interesting workmanship to the student of orchestration and is, to use the phrase of the painter, in tone with the emotional speech of the music.

From the character of the scherzo a hearer might easily be led to believe that the composer had in mind, when writing, the gambols of fairies, nymphs, fauns and satyrs. The movement is bright, light, playful and evasive.

A peculiar use of the intervals of the second and the minor second in this movement gives a glittering edge of charmingly fresh character to certain parts of the music.

The fourth movement, allegro energico, opens with a martial atmosphere of trumpets calling out a theme of rather pagan character, accompanied by a boisterous chattering of other voices of the orchestra.

A quieter episode of legato nature breathes of peace as though amid luxuriant gardens and of rest after victory.

Mr. Strube evidently wrote this symphony with a spirit of love and ardor. There is no halting of the musical thought, no tiresome spinning out of thematic material nor padding in the passages of development.

With all his command of counterpoint, Mr. Strube has not indulged in any attempt to make an exhibition of his technique at the expense of interest. From the beginning to end is shown continuity of thought, seriousness, sureness of aim and stirring vitality. There is no slowing down or failing of strength, for the last movement makes as strong, if not stronger impression than any one of the preceding.

This composition is undoubtedly Mr. Strube's best work.

The composer conducted his own work, and the orchestra responded nobly to his leadership and played the difficult music in a splendid manner.

The familiar Wagner numbers were enthusiastically applauded.

[218]

SUNDAY GLOBE
APRIL 4, 1909.

STRUBE'S NEW SYMPHONY.

An Interesting Composition Played for the First Time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There was a special interest in the Symphony program of last week, for not only had conductor Fiedler scheduled another "first time" symphony, but the composer was one whose association with the orchestra had made him a familiar figure, and whose abilities had long been recognized as being of a high order, both as composer and conductor. Gustav Strube's works cover a good deal of musical ground and at least a half dozen of them have appeared on the Symphony programs since he joined the first violin group in the orchestra about 17 years ago. The new B minor symphony, which is in four parts, is his largest work, and has been in hand for two years. He calls it "absolute music," and there are no tone pictures or definite program outlined. While classical in form the treatment is modern.

Mr Fiedler retired temporarily from the conductor's desk and Mr Strube directed the performance of his work. Primarily the symphony seems to be notable in the manner in which a plethora of melodic material is utilized and apportioned in changing rhythms and among the different choirs without producing a lot of cross harmonies. The various subjects are worked out with skill, for Mr Strube appears to know not only the resources of an instrument but also its harmonic, or if need be, the inharmonic, relation to its orchestral neighbor, and many of his combinations fall very pleasantly upon the ear.

In his melodic ideas he is modern, but not ultramodern, and so, although the first movement may sound vague to some auditors, the gentle and somewhat soothing second part and the odd phrasing of vivacious and puzzling dance themes in the scherzo are of a nature to please the general public. The finale of the first movement and the theme allotted the trumpets near the close of the second part are admirably worked up, as is also the beginning of the finale in which the horns and trumpets figure prominently.

The last movement is lively, more defined in character than the preceding ones, and contains hints of plaintive themes which have been carried through from one part to another, making the four divisions sections of a whole and not unrelated movements. In this Mr Strube has done capital work, for the symphony holds together well. Rapturous applause greeted the composer-conductor after each movement, and at the close he was recalled many times, fellow-players joining the audience in the testimonies of appreciation.

After the symphony Mr Fiedler conducted the second division of the program, which, being entirely Wagnerian, would not have suited Dr Muck, but which found great favor with the audience. There were five excerpts from the music dramas—familiar bits played with splendid effect and applauded vigorously.

Beginning with the prelude to "Lohengrin," the feature of which was the exquisite work of the lighter string contingents, the "Tannhauser" bacchanale followed, making a fine contrast to the dainty forerunner, Mr Fiedler working up a musical orgie of great brilliancy and verve. It was a perfect tone picture of Venusberg minus the stage figurantes.

In the Siegfried funeral march from "The Dusk of the Gods" the various motifs were voiced with all due resonance, the heavier instruments having their turn to show up grandly in the fortissimo passages. The "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" each motif and figure was significantly and tenderly expressed and the ride of the Valkyries went with a dash and vigorous swirl of instrumentation that brought forth the heartiest applause.

The rehearsal this week will take place Thursday afternoon on account of the regular date falling upon Good Friday. There will be two works, new to Symphony patrons.

The first is a theme, variations and fugue for organ and orchestra by Geo W. Chadwick. This work is still in manuscript and while it has been played at one of the conservatory concerts, the performance by the Boston Symphony orchestra may properly be called its first. The other novelty is by the Russian, Glazounoff, and is a musical picture, entitled "Spring." The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's fifth,

ADVERTISER.
APRIL 5, 1909

PENSION FUND CONCERT OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

To give a pension fund concert in the midst of an opera season and on the same night as an operatic concert, was not the wisest thing in the world, but we suppose the chance of securing the cooperation of Mischa Elman was the cause of it. After all the audience was larger than could have been expected and the performance, of course, was full of delight.

Mischa Elman was the bright particular star of the occasion and won innumerable recalls. But the chief point of his work at this concert, and the highest point he has reached in Boston thus far, was the interpretation of Beethoven's great violin concerto. This work can only be given by masters of the violin; it is the touch-stone of the highest technique and interpretative power. It demands a breadth that very few can satisfy.

To say that young Elman met these requirements is to place him among the elect of violinists. He has a wonderful bow-arm for one so young. In his broad sweeps in phrasing he reminds of Kreisler. The first movement, with its strong four-noted figure, was especially successful and it was properly majestic rather than merely vehement. The finale is much weaker than this first movement, but Elman's dash made the Rondo interesting and effective.

The orchestra gave good support in the Concerto and also played the great "Leonora, No. III" and the "Benvenuto Cellini" overtures famously. The concert ended with Liszt's First Rhapsody, transcribed for the orchestra, a dashing and brilliant ending to a successful concert.

BOSTON JOURNAL-
APRIL 5, 1909.

ELMAN SOLOIST AT PENSION CONCERT

Symphony Orchestra Furnishes Treat to Patrons at Sunday Affair.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in aid of its pension fund, held at Symphony Hall last night, was a great success, and music lovers who were fortunate in being present enjoyed a treat.

Mischa Elman, violin, was the soloist. An overture and concerto by Beethoven for the first part and three other selections by Berlioz, Saint-Saens and Liszt were on the program.

The solos by Elman were played with the perfection expected and received the applause which was due from the audience. Mr. Feidler conducted.

Strube's Work Delights Symphony Audience

Gustav Strube appeared in a triple capacity, conductor, composer and player, at the twentieth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday night. His symphony in B minor was performed for the first time and every movement was applauded with enthusiasm by an audience which taxed the capacity of the hall. While the auditors were disposed to be severely critical at the start, Mr. Strube won them before the final movement and at the conclusion of the performance of his work he was called to the desk seven times, but refused to repeat the allegro, the players applauding with the others.

While the first movement, the andante, is perhaps ambiguous, it is painted in brilliant tones of orchestral color.

The third movement, the scherzo, shows genius and a boldness in disregarding tradition not expected of a composer who has trained so long with an organization like the Boston Symphony. The whole work was brilliantly colored and the instrumentation modern to a delightfully startling degree. At periods during the performance one would be led to wonder what it meant, what it was about, yet enjoy the exquisite setting.

As a whole Strube's B minor symphony is a most welcome contribution to orchestral literature.

Mr. Fiedler conducted the second half of the program, a Wagner section, with characteristic enthusiasm and closed a notable concert with the "Ride of the Valkyries."

BOSTON HERALD,
APRIL 5, 1909.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

Remarkable Enthusiasm Over Mischa Elman's Playing.

Last night's extra concert of the Symphony Orchestra in aid of its pension fund was made notable by a program of special strength and beauty and by the enthusiasm displayed over the playing of Mischa Elman, the young violinist. The audience filled the hall.

The program consisted of Beethoven's overture "Leonore III," Beethoven's concerto for violin in D major, Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," Saint-Saens' introduction and rondo capriccioso for violin and orchestra and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody No. 1.

Mr. Fiedler conducted, and both he and the musicians seemed moved to strive for unusual heights of fervor, inspiration and interpretative finesse. That the heights were reached was evident early in the "Leonore" overture, and the audience was made emotionally ready for what Elman was to do with the Beethoven concerto. The orchestra with the utmost sympathy fell into the mood of the young player, particularly in the intense appeal of the larghetto. At the close of the piece Mr. Elman was called out repeatedly by insistent applause that was unusually vigorous for a Symphony throng.

This demonstration was mild, however, compared with that which followed the young man's remarkable work with the Saint-Saens piece. His hearers seemed determined that he should play again and refused to be satisfied with repeated appearances and bows. It looked for a time as if the affair would be turned into one of the nominating convention variety, but the youthful artist was firm and his admirers finally tired themselves out.

BOSTON GLOBE-
APRIL 5, 1909.

PLAUDITS FOR ELMAN

Young Violinist Stirs a Large Audience.

Symphony Pension Fund Concert One of Great Merit.

The third benefit concert by the Symphony orchestra this season, to swell its pension fund, was given last evening in Symphony hall and proved a memorable one, owing largely to the participation of Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, whose offer to play for the pension fund was mainly responsible for the third benefit being given this year, instead of but two, as has been the custom in past years.

The hall was practically filled with music lovers, some of whom were devotees of fashion in the matter of apparel. Many artists were to be seen in the hall and Mrs John L. Gardner was in her acustomed place in the balcony.

About half the evening's program was given by young Elman, whose selections were of a contrasting character, namely, Beethoven's concerto in D major and Saint-Saens' introduction and rondo capriccioso, the soloist having the accompaniment of the full orchestra in both pieces.

Young Elman fairly electrified his audience in each case, receiving eight recalls after the Beethoven number and more than that after the other, the calls in the last instance apparently having been insistently intended as an encore. But none was given, very likely for the reason that orchestral scores had been provided only for the solos that were on the program.

The audience apparently had a fine time, showing its enthusiasm by means of vigorous hand clappings. To a large extent the members of the orchestra themselves clapped as heartily as the auditors, and they gave other indications of the liveliest admiration for the boyish looking genius who has made such a conquest in the American musical world during the last few months.

Max Fiedler, conductor of the orchestra, and of course a volunteer, like young Elman, came in for the heartiest kind of plaudits, also, after each of the numbers on the program. It was a graceful act on his part, that in each case he had the entire orchestra stand and participate with him in the responsive salutation given in recognition of the applause.

The performance was as successful from a financial standpoint as it was artistically, the resulting addition to the pension fund, it is said, amounting to not much less than $3000.

TRANSCRIPT,
APRIL 10, 1909

Dvorak's symphony, "From the New World," unheard here since the autumn of 1904, when it was played at a commemorative concert a few months after the composer's death, will be the largest item in the programme of the Symphony Concerts for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. It was played often here in the decade between 1895, when it was written, and 1904, but of recent years, like the rest of Dvorak's music, it has fallen out of the orchestral fashion. The composer wrote it while he was living in New York, and at a hint from him the curious made speed to discover and debate the suggestions of Negro and Indian music that they believe they found in the symphony. All this is forgotten now, and the music exists for its own intrinsic beauty, as in the shadowed song of the larghetto, the pervading richness of its orchestral coloring, and the energy of its finale. Two pieces by American composers also stand on Mr. Fiedler's programme—Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem, "The Devil's Round," after the macabre verses of the French rhymer, Rollinet, that depict the nocturnal prowlings of the devil among all sorts and conditions of men to the refrain, "Hell's a-Burning"; and a new suite for strings by Mr. Foote—"absolute" music with no designation but its key, E major, and played for the first time at any concert. The unquestioned classic, to begin the programme, is Beethoven's overture, "Coriolanus."

JOURNAL-
APRIL 12. 1909.

Delightful Novelties On Symphony Program

Two enjoyable novelties were presented for the first time at the twenty-first concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Saturday night. One was "Theme variations and fugue for organ and orchestra," by George W. Chadwick. Wallace Goodrich was at the organ. The work was so well received Mr. Chadwick had to bow his acknowledgment from the floor. The other novelty was Glazounoff's "Spring," a dainty musical picture for orchestra.

The program opened with Mozart's "Masonic Funeral Music," a memorial tribute to B. J. Lang, and as is usual, was received without applause. Mr. Fiedler gave real pleasure and aroused enthusiasm by his superb reading of Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony. The concert closed with a spirited performance of Liszt's "The Preludes."

Next week's program will include A. Foote's suite for string orchestra for first time; C. M. Loeffler's "Villanelle du Diable," and Dvorak's New World Symphony.

TRANSCRIPT.
APRIL 5, 1909

While one audience sat joyfully through all this vocal energy and emotional and melodramatic tumult at the Boston Theatre, another in Symphony Hall was hearing Mr. Strube's new symphony. There is no need to dwell afresh upon the harmonic and the instrumental imagination, resource, daring and accomplishment, or upon the sense of tonal contrast and blendings, adjustments and shadings that it again disclosed. Its pervading moods, however, the emotional ends that these means accomplish, as justly distinguish it. These are the days when many a composer, especially if he is young and striving, wrestles with tragic and overwhelming despair, finds refuge in frenetic outbursts, is oppressed with the weight of a universe of grim and torturing emotions, at which he now mocks or again hurls himself. In contrast Mr. Strube's moods have a notable and persuasive reticence, an unusual and a significant serenity, and a fine and deep rather than a crying and a clamoring intensity. He is pensive and even melancholy, as the English hour is pensive, and not despairing. His emotion, in the slow movement, has a deep continence and sincerity—the emotion of a man who is as strong to control as to feel. His orchestral energy is a sane and [illegible] energy rather than a nervous [illegible] of his scherzo [illegible] a cheerful brightness of a delicately pagan joy of life and [illegible] and movement, for their own sake. [illegible] fancy is the piper. The symphony is truly a symphony of remarkable technical imagination and accomplishment. It is only a little less remarkable as a symphony of continent, sane and finely felt and expressed emotion. In form and dress it is ultra-modern; but the emotional substance and mood of it is as old as the Greeks.

It was Mischa Elman, the understanding and the discriminating musician, as well as Mischa Elman, the puissant violinist, who played Beethoven's concerto with the Symphony Orchestra for its pension fund at Symphony Hall. Gone for the moment was the Elman who has done virtuoso feats and made them seem like the flowering of melody, the play of figure, the voice even of musical idea. Gone no less was the Elman who can sing pure melody for the sake of its own lovely and penetrating song and sing it with a voice that equally mingles intensity and beauty. Gone as well was the Elman who will have his boyish humors with his music (when it invites them) with himself and with his audience. Gone even was the Elman of the nervously intense moods, of the passionate fire of execution, emotion and accomplishment of Tschaikowsky's concerto that he first played here. Instead rose with Beethoven's concerto, a new Elman of deeper and broader and finer powers than he has yet disclosed here.

One of these Elmans might have sentimentalized the slow movement of the concerto; another might have made it nervous with overemphasis. The Elman that actually played it sang it with an exquisite beauty of sustained and supple tone, and that beauty sprang as much from the continence of feeling that animated it and from the just understanding that gave it substance, as from the finely-tempered skill that brought it to voice. The Elman of sheer tonal and technical brilliance might have played the finale of the concerto and dazzled his hearers. Again the Elman that actually played seemed intent only on a beauty of tone that suffused his violin into and upon the other orchestral voices and that wrought delicately with them the charm of Beethoven's flowing but not racing arabesques. Akin to the beauty of his performance of the slow movement, to the fineness of his performance of the finale was the deep, continent and secure eloquence with which Mr. Elman played the long allegro that begins the concerto. He wrought the largeness of Beethoven's design; he fused into it each detail. The large contours of the melodies rose under his hand; the rich vigor of the musical idea spoke in his tones; each detail, each ornament came to its due and polished place; and over all was a beauty that was at once of the violin and of the music, of the voice of Beethoven and of the voice of the youth who had heard it. The performance was the crown of all that Mischa Elman has done here—the crown not merely of artistry but of the mind and the spirit that give it understanding and imagination, life and eloquence.

Herald
Apr 16, 09.

ASSISTANT MANAGER OF SYMPHONY DEAD

Frederic R. Comee, for 23 Years with the Orchestra, Succumbs to Typhoid After Three Weeks' Illness.

HARVARD GRADUATE AND UNIVERSITY CLUB MEMBER

Frederic R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, died last night at his home, 1390 Beacon street. Death was due to typhoid. Mr. Comee was taken seriously ill last Sunday, but had not been well since returning from the last trip taken by the orchestra, to New York, about three weeks ago.

Mr. Comee was born in Fitchburg, Jan. 2, 1854. He was graduated from Harvard with the class of 1875. He was assistant manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra for 23 years. Mr. Comee was a member of the University Club of Boston, the Harvard Club of New York, and the University Club of Philadelphia. He leaves a widow.

[219]

HERALD,
APRIL 8, 1909.

SUICIDE BY GAS OF SYMPHONY MUSICIAN

Eric Loeffler, 'Cellist with Boston Orchestra More Than a Quarter of a Century, Found Dead in Room.

MISSING TWO WEEKS, HAD ASSUMED ANOTHER NAME

Eric Loeffler, for 26 years a 'cellist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was found dead in his room at a lodging house, 99 West Springfield street, today, with a gas tube in his mouth. He had closed all the windows, stopped up the cracks in the doors and windows, and had tied the gas tube around his head so that it could not slip off. He had been dead for several hours when found at 4:30 o'clock this morning.

The tragedy was discovered by Mrs. Nellie Folan, who smelled gas and notified Mrs. Alice McLeod, who runs the lodging house. She called Harold Tracy, a boarder, and the door of Loeffler's room was smashed in. The man was found lying on the bed, neatly dressed, with the gas tube connected with two jets at one end and the other end in his mouth. Dr. S. E. Courtney was called, but the man was dead. The body was removed to the city hospital morgue.

Several notes were found on a table, addressed to relatives and friends. A note was addressed to Mrs. McLeod, saying that the writer was sorry for the trouble he was about to bring upon others. He asked that his brother, Charles Martin Loeffler of Medfield, be notified. It was this note that led to the identity of the dead man. He had gone to the house on April 1 and hired a room under the name of Fred Jacobs.

Loeffler had lived for the past five years with Arthur Butler of 523 Columbus avenue. He disappeared about two weeks ago and his friends had been looking for him for several days at the different hotels he was known to frequent, but no trace of him had been found until this morning.

Loeffler and his brother, Charles, the composer, came to this country 26 years ago. Although his brother, who is a violinist and music teacher, has achieved more distinction since he came to Boston, both men have been very successful. Eric was rated at Symphony Hall as a brilliant musician. He had recently renewed a two years' contract with the orchestra. He was 46 years old and unmarried.

His mother died recently in Germany and it is believed that this preyed upon his mind. Besides his brother there is a sister living in Germany. His brother, Martin, was notified and started at once from Medfield to take charge of the body.

BOSTON GLOBE—
APRIL 16, 1909.

DEATH OF F. R. COMEE.

Assistant Manager of the Symphony Orchestra Passes Away Suddenly of Typhoid Fever.

Frederick R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston symphony orchestra, died suddenly at 12:40 o'clock this morning at his home at 1390 Beacon st, Brookline.

Mr Comee was taken ill Sunday and suffered from a severe attack of typhoid fever. He became gradually worse, and during the day yesterday it became evident to the attending physicians that his condition was critical.

THE LATE F. R. COMEE.

At midnight he seemed to be brighter and hopes for his recovery were entertained, when suddenly he suffered an ill turn, and the end quickly followed. Mr Comee leaves a wife.

Mr Comee has been well known and of much influence for good among musicians and music lovers for a quarter of a century. He was born in Fitchburg Jan 2, 1854.

He was graduated in literature from Harvard university in 1875 and at once became interested in music. A few years later he became identified with the Boston symphony orchestra, and after four years he was promoted to the position of assistant manager.

He filled this position for 23 years.

His wife was Miss Clara Galloup of Boston.

ADVERTISER,
APRIL 9. 1909

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S TRIBUTE TO B. J. LANG

PROGRAMME INCLUDES MASONIC FUNERAL MARCH

New Work by Chadwick Won Instant Favor, and It Should Become a Standard.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Mozart—Masonic Funeral Music. (In memory of B. J. Lang.)
Chadwick—Theme, Variations and Fugue, for Organ and Orchestra.
Tschaikowsky—Symphony, No. 5, E minor.
Glazounoff—"Spring." Musical Tableau.
Liszt—"Les Preludes." Symphonic Poem.

It was fitting for the Boston Symphony Orchestra to pay a tribute to the memory of Benjamin Johnson Lang, for there has scarcely been another who has woven his influence so thoroughly into the warp and woof of Boston's musical advance. He made the Apollo club the leading male chorus of America; he founded the Cecilia and brought many new works to us in its concerts; he introduced Wagner's "Parsifal," Bach's B minor Mass, Brahms' Requiem, Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust" and his requiem, and many other important works, in Boston; he was long the organist and for a time conductor of the Handel and Haydn society; he was one of the most influential teachers that Boston ever possessed. Arthur Foote, Ethelbert Nevin, Frank Lynes, Helen Hood, Margaret Ruthven Lang, and many other prominent American musicians were his pupils. His influence was very great in shaping Boston's musical advance, and it was eminently fitting that our representative musical organization should honor him. To many it is a puzzle that Mozart, a devout Catholic, should also have been an enthusiastic Mason, but it must be remembered that the church had not, in the 18th century, taken the determined stand against Masonry that it maintains at present. The Masonic Funeral Music is not, in itself, very interesting save for the fact that Mozart used a Bosset horn in the score—not present, we believe, on this occasion.

Mr. Chadwick's Theme and Variations for Organ and Orchestra is an important work. Of all the American composers we consider Mr. Chadwick the one man who has most thoroughly combined great contrapuntal skill with poetic inspiration and melodic beauty. His learning has never made him pedantic. Let one study the fugal treatment in his "Judith" and this fact will be made clearly manifest. Something of this admirable quality shines forth in the present composition. The fugue is well developed and interesting.

The organ is excellently combined with the orchestral forces throughout the composition, as one might expect from a man who is himself a skillful organist and an orchestral conductor. The theme is melodic and well suited to treatment. The work is not prolix, as almost all modern variations are. The variations are well contrasted and work up to a fine climax. After the fugue there is a most majestic ending. It is legitimate, clear and masterly music, and Boston may be proud to possess such a composer.

Mr. Wallace Goodrich played the solo part in a most artistic manner. There was well-deserved enthusiasm at the close and Mr. Chadwick was called upon to receive the homage of the audience. This composition ought at once to become standard, for there are very few works that combine organ and orchestra successfully, and this may stand as a model of what such a work ought to be.

Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic Symphony" has, with the public, overshadowed all his other symphonic works. This is especially unjust in the case of the E minor symphony, for this work is as characteristic, almost as finely wrought out, as full of ingenious and effective combinations of tone-color as the succeeding work. For once that the fifth symphony is given the "Pathetique" receives a half-dozen performances. It was a keen delight, therefore, to study this less known work and to compare it with its more famous sister. It is Russian to the backbone and is a reproof to those young "Para Demoi" Russians who accused Tschaikowsky of being but German in disguise, of not being sufficiently national.

The performance was one to be long remembered. The bassoons deserve mention for their work in the prominent theme of the first movement. There was plenty of Muscovite brooding in this and also some of the barbaric impatience of the Slav. The wind instruments were often sent into the depths, in the manner of Tschaikowsky. The horn solo of the slow movement was beautifully played. But the waltz still seems to us the weakest part of the symphony. This dance movement does not seem ever to attain to the epic style necessary to a symphony.

The Finale received a magnificent reading. There may be a few bits of tinsel in its barbaric splendor, but these suit well enough to the general character of the movement. The chorale-like theme of triumph was given with so much fervor that a marvelous degree of enthusiasm was shown at the close. The conductor was thrice recalled and the orchestra was obliged to rise in response to the continuous applause. Mr. Fiedler and his men here added another leaf to their laurel wreath.

Glazounoff's "Spring" was a delightful pastoral picture. It was largely in the 6-8 rhythm that suits so well to rustic happiness. It contained bird warblings galore. Even the Wagnerian bird from "Siegfried" was among the poultry. In fact one might say that the work was a combination of "Waldesweben" and the "Good Friday Spell" translated into Russian, but that made it no less enjoyable. Glockenspiel, flute warblings, and other bits of tonal sugar, sweetened the score, but it did not become cloying. It did not have enough contrast to suggest Spring to a New Englander. When our Spring tone-poem is written we shall have violins in highest harmonics—thermometer up; contrabasses in the depths,—thermometer down; blasts on bass tuba,—wind rising; delicate flute passages suggesting light flannels; clashes on kettle-drums and cymbals,—violent sneezes; bassoon solos,—a severe cold in the head; there are many possibilities in such a tone-picture adapted to our climate. Glazounoff fortunately needed none of these effects and his pretty "tableau" was delicate and successful.

Liszt's "Les Preludes" is a noble composition. Even today the world has not fully waked up to the full greatness of Liszt as a composer, but he is gradually emerging from the shadow of Liszt, the pianist, and from the penumbra of his friend Wagner. In this work we have coherency, brilliancy of scoring, splendidly worked-up climaxes and the loftiest musical thoughts. Of all the "Poemes Symphoniques" we regard "Les Preludes" as the best. Its performance was a most brilliant one.

Mr. Fiedler is gradually coming to be recognized as most powerful in the modern school and he has evidently imbued the musicians of the orchestra with some of his own enthusiasm. Not an iota of the technique and routine work of the orchestra has been lost, yet there is an abandon and fire in such a work as this which mere drillmastership could never impart.

Perhaps it might be as well to remind the more brutal of the New York critics of this. There were some who insulted all his work at the beginning. They predicted that our orchestra would sink to the level of a beer-garden band if they were long under Mr. Fiedler's control. It has been long under Mr. Fiedler's control, and is likely to remain so for a while longer, but the organization still seems to maintain that technique and ensemble which makes it the first orchestra of the world today. The especially successful and brilliant concert of yesterday may stand as a good proof of the foregoing statements.

F. R. COMEE DEAD.

Page 21 Globe

Assistant Manager of Symphony Orchestra.

Filled Position More Than 20 Years —Was Born in Fitchburg.

Frederic R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, died suddenly at 12:40 o'clock this morning at his home at 1390 Beacon st, Brookline.

Mr Comee was taken ill Sunday and suffered from a severe attack of typhoid fever. He became gradually worse, and during the day yesterday it became evident to the attending physicians that his condition was critical.

At midnight he seemed to be brighter and hopes for his recovery were entertained, when suddenly he suffered an ill turn, and the end quickly followed. Mr Comee leaves a wife.

Mr Comee has been well known and of much influence for good among musicians and music lovers for a quarter of a century. He was born in Fitchburg Jan 2, 1854.

He was graduated in literature from Harvard university in 1875 and at once became interested in music. A few years later he became identified with the Boston Symphony orchestra, and after four years he was promoted to the position of assistant manager.

He filled this position for 23 years.

His wife was Miss Clara Galloup of Boston.

TRANSCRIPT, APRIL 16, 1909

FREDERIC R. COMEE

Assistant Manager of Symphony Orchestra Dies Suddenly of Typhoid Fever

Frederic R. Comee, for twenty-three years assistant manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died suddenly this morning at his home, 1390 Beacon street, Brookline, of typhoid fever. Mr. Comee was taken ill on Sunday, and yesterday his physicians recognized that his condition was critical. He rallied, apparently, toward midnight, but a sudden relapse brought the end at 12.40 o'clock the morning.

Mr. Comee has been well known to Boston music-lovers for a quarter of a century, and will be widely mourned. He was born in Fitchburg, Jan. 2, 1854. He was graduated in literature in Harvard nUiversity in 1875, and took up the study of music. A few years later he became connected with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and in 1886 became assistant manager, holding this position until his death. Hew as a member of the nUiversity Club of Boston, the Harvard Club of New York and the University Club of Philadelphia. He is survived by a widow, who was Miss Clara Galloup of Boston.

TRANSCRIPT,
APRIL 9, 1909

MUSIC AND DRAMA

NEW PIECES AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mr. Chadwick's Theme and Variations for Organ and Orchestra—A Fresh Trifle by Glazounoff—Tschaikowsky and Liszt for the Rest of the Programme—A Newly Discovered Manuscript of Wilde—Mr. Hammerstein Likely to Bring His Company to Boston Next Year—The Hess-Schroeder Quartet to Continue—Forthcoming Programmes—Massenet's New Opera—Another Theatrical "War"

In conformity with the usual custom in Holy Week, the twenty-first rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday afternoon. To the programme previously announced was appropriately and justly added Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music as a tribute to the memory of Mr. B. J. Lang. Mr. Chadwick's Theme Variations and Fugue for organ and orchestra was the most engrossing novelty on the programme. Berlioz's famous dictum concerning the combination of organ and orchestra may have had a repressive effect upon composers; it certainly has proved amply true within no very distant memory. But Mr. Chadwick has had the courage of his convictions to take up the problem afresh. In this work he certainly demonstrates positively that this combination is not only grateful, but not incompatible with realizations of effective and beautiful contrasts of timbre. To be sure, one is still a little in the dark as to whether there is a real and fundamental affinity between the two, or whether it is the conspicuous skill of the treatment that causes the illusion. The probable solution is simply that the underlying principles have not been thoroughly understood before, but the success of Mr. Chadwick's solution is unequivocal. These variations were first played by Mr. Goodrich at a Conservatory Concert under the composer's direction. A second hearing only reaffirms the first favorable impression. Mr. Chadwick, it is true, has written music of greater substance, deeper imagination and emotional eloquence. It seems as if this piece had been written primarily with the thought of tonal contrast and assimilation. Yet the effect of the whole is so genial in invention, so clear-cut and ingenious at every turn that it is difficult to recall a work in which Mr. Chadwick has seemed so unostentatiously in command of his forces. To characterize Mr. Goodrich as an organist is surely superfluous; he has assuredly been long recognized as hors concours. His performance of the organ part in Mr. Chadwick's variations was marked by his usual rhythmic solidity, dexterous manipulation of registration and tonal balance with the orchestra; in short the unostentatious mastery of true viruosity.

There was more than ordinary curiosity to hear Mr. Fiedler's interpretation of Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, especially after the acknowledged impression which he made with the same composer's "Pathetic" symphony. Mr. Fiedler gave a performance that was alike brilliant, full of appreciation of the true sentiment of Tschaikowsky, without exaggeration and undue rhetorical emphasis on the whole. There were some details which might proffer legitimate excuse for question, such as the inordinately slow tempo of the introduction of the first movement, as well as the first announcement of the first theme of the main body of the movement. But even these questions may be idle, in the face of an interpretation which was worthy to stand beside that of the sixth symphony. Incidentally this E minor symphony seems to resist the advance of time; furthermore the indisputably orthodox character of its technical development should refute with some warmth the assertions of those who would see therein merely a suite.

The tableau musical by Glazounoff, "Spring," is quite obviously an occasional composition. It is written with the impeccable, nay almost irritating, technical skill characteristic of its composer. One would like to see Glazounoff struggle under the weight of a musical utterance which taxed his technical resources! This piece is not without a certain charm; it has seductive color, a pleasing melodic vein, but its individual conviction is not overpowering. It was distinctly worth while to have heard this "Spring," but there are several others of the same sort among Glazounoff's works which do not demand a hearing. On the other hand it would be interesting to hear Glazounoff's pretty and ingenious ballet suite, à la Watteau, "Ruses d'Amour," or even the somewhat meteorological "Seasons." It is unfortunate that Mrs. Newmarch did not specify the works in which Glazounoff has been influenced by Brahms; it would seem as if he had listened to Wagner to more purpose, although he is far too skilful to plagiarize.

The concert ended with an exceedingly brilliant performance of the familiar Liszt 'Preludes" in which Mr. Fiedler showed his admirable technical and interpretive grasp.

E. B. H.

[220]

SUNDAY HERALD, APRIL 11, 1909.

SYMPHONY'S 21ST CONCERT OF SEASON

Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony Makes Deep Impression on Audience Because of Its Dramatic Intensity.

MR. CHADWICK PLAYS NEW WORK ON ORGAN

BY PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, gave its 21st concert last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Masonic funeral music, Mozart; Theme, Variations and Fugue for organ and orchestra, Chadwick; Symphony No. 5, E minor, Tschaikowsky; "Spring," musical picture, Glazunoff; symphonic poem, "The Preludes," Liszt.

Opera has been admirably performed at the Boston Theatre for two weeks by the Manhattan Grand Opera Company. We have had the pleasure of hearing operas familiar and unfamiliar, operas of various schools. There have been uncommonly strong dramatic performances by Miss Garden, Miss Gerville-Reache, Messrs Zanatello, Renaud, Gilibert and others. The orchestra led by Mr. Campanini was dramatically eloquent.

Yet to some Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony last night had more dramatic intensity than any of the operas performed. Listening to the music of the operas and seeing the dramatic action of the lyric tragedians, the hearer was moved by the sight of others suffering, by the sight of this man or that woman dreeing a weird. Listening to Tschaikowsky's music each sensitive or imaginative hearer was moved by the thought aroused in his own mind.

Tschaikowsky himself related the program of his fourth symphony, and we know that he had a program for his "Pathetic," although he was not persuaded to disclose it before his death. He was singularly reticent in his letters concerning the fifth, but who can refrain from thinking with Ernest Newman that this symphony was written to a program; that the work "embodies an emotional sequence of some kind"? There is the tread of inexorable fate; this tread disturbs the beauty of the andante; it checks the forced gayety of the dancers in the waltz; and is the triumphant spirit in the finale something more than a heroic defiance of the inevitable, a brave stand before the approach of death?

We are interested in the woe of Canio or of the Navarraise; we are moved by the infinite sadness of Melisande; we understand the tragedy in the humble home on Montmartre and the agony of Rigoletto. We endure the spectacle of the anguish of these men and women on the stage, applaud, and go comfortably to bed. Tschaikowsky's music awakens in the breast the haunting, unanswerable questions of life and death that concern us directly and personally. For the most important person to each one is one's self.

I have pried through the strata and analyzed to a hair,
And counselled with doctors and calculated close and found no sweeter fat than sticks to my own bones.

Mr. Chadwick's variations and Fugue for organ and orchestra were composed last summer and played at a New England Conservatory concert last November. His idea in writing them was to see whether the modern organ and the orchestra are necessarily antagonistic, or at least unsympathetic. It might be said that the modern organ is not the organ that Berlioz had in mind when he uttered his famous dictum. To some the modern organ has little of the true and peculiar quality of the instrument known to Buxtehude, Bach and even to Rheinberger and Merkel. The glory of the instrument is in its diapason tone and quality; not in an infinite variety of stops that bring it into futile rivalry with an orchestra.

Mr. Chadwick has skilfully constructed agreeable variations on a flowing and pretty theme. When the foundation stops were used, and when soft stops of true organ quality are employed, especially in the sustaining of chords, there is a blend of timbres and there is no thought of rival and warring forces. There are passages, however, in which the organ loses its impressive characteristics and then ceases to have value as a special instrument. Mr. Goodrich played with taste, and the work and the performance were evidently much enjoyed by the audience.

Mr. Chadwick's experiment is much more successful than those made by certain predecessors, nevertheless the organ is not a concert instrument. Its proper place is in the church. Its true literature is music written for it with appreciation of the inherent character and limitations of the instrument. The organ is best heard with an orchestra, when it has the modest duty of sustaining chords, and has few florid passages and only discreetly conceived melodic measures of a solo nature.

Glazunoff's "Spring" is prettily scored, and while the contents are not of marked importance they suggest Spring, the Spring of the poets and of some other lands, not the Spring of New England.

The concert began with a performance of Mozart's Masonic Music, which was played in memory of Mr. Lang.

TRANSCRIPT, APRIL 17, 1909

"Fred" Comee

As managers go, the late Frederic R. Comee, the assistant manager of the Symphony Orchestra who died suddenly on Friday, was unusually familiar to the public of the concerts. For twenty-three years he had been a member of the managing staff of the orchestra; every Friday afternoon, the season through, he stood in the corridor of Symphony Hall; and many a regular auditor had come to know his burly figure and smiling face. Only a week ago, though he was then suffering, he had been in his usual place as cheerful as ever; and when the news of his death ran through the hall yesterday afternoon, surprise quickened regret. The orchestra is twenty-eight years old, and Mr. Comee had been in its service for twenty-three, so that to the younger generation he seemed an established part of it from the days in which they had first known it. In recent years, with the more frequent visits of the orchestra to other cities, Mr. Comee had supervised its tours, and he was almost as familiar a figure at its concerts in New York or in Philadelphia as he was here in Boston. The Harvard Club in New York knew him only a little less well than did his own club here, and liked him no less. His associates in the work of the orchestra knew him best of all and on a side of which the outside world saw little. For Mr. Comee was as diligent in business, intelligent in resource, energetic in action, fair-minded in decision, as, when he had put aside the work of the day, he was apt in amusing story, bright talk and quick sympathy with the chance comrades of his club or the guests of his own dinner table. More than once in the diversified tours of the orchestra he brought it triumphantly out of some emergency and always in his dealings with its men—no easy task—fairness and consideration commended. He seemed to take his work lightly, because his readiness of spirit lightened it for him, but he did it none the less well.

H. T. P.

ADVERTISER, APRIL 17, 1909

FINE NEW SUITE BY ARTHUR FOOTE PLAYED

FOLLOWED "CORIOLANUS" AND STOOD THE TEST

Symphony Programme This Week Wholly Orchestral—Two Works by Dvorak Included.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven—"Coriolanus," Overture.
Arthur Foote—Suite in E, for String Orchestra.
Dukas. Scherzo—"The Sorcerer's Apprentice."
Dvorak—"From the New World" Symphony.

A programme wholly orchestral, but none the less interesting on that account. Our orchestra plays grandly enough, and the programmes are brilliant enough, to stand without the aid of vocalist, pianist or violinist. For ourselves we would be glad to see the experiment tried of giving many more purely orchestral concerts.

In the midst of all the strivings and strainings of new schools, of scintillating tone-colors, of unheard-of progressions, how like a rock stands Beethoven! Dignity and power were in every phrase of the "Coriolanus" overture, and no modern contrasts, however sharply drawn, could excel the contrast here between the chief and the subordinate theme, the masculine and the feminine, Coriolanus and his wife and mother. We can say of it, as Beethoven himself said of Handel,—"Das ist das Wahre!"

It was no mean test to come after such a lofty work, but Arthur Foote bore this test famously. His suite is not so ambitious as the orchestral suite in D minor, but it has some great points nevertheless.

The first movement was fluent and beautiful, and the surety with which the voices were led spoke of reserve power that was inspiring to the auditor. The second movement, a "Pizzicato and Adagietto," we scarcely cared for as much, but the audience evidently prized it more, and it was abundantly applauded. It gives a good contrast between a bright pizzicato and a mournful Adagietto, the latter being played with bow on muted instruments. Then comes an abbreviated return of the first (pizzicato) part, giving a shortened form of Scherzo with Trio. The beauties here are of a slightly more conventional type than in the other two movements.

But it was the finale that awakened our heartiest recognition. Seldom have we heard so well-constructed a modern fugue. The subject was workable, clear, and not too long. The four-voiced exposition was an excellent one and ushered in a set of strettos and episodes that were most masterly. An effective organ-point, with brilliant counterpoint above it, led up to a coda that was a true climax. And with all this skill and learning there was not a dull moment in the work. It is certainly one of the best of Mr. Foote's compositions and we were glad to see the audience so responsive to it. At the end the composer was twice obliged to bow from his seat in the audience, to acknowledge the unceasing applause. Never was tribute better deserved.

Dukas' Scherzo, which pictures the sorcerer's apprentice turning a broomstick into a water-carrier and then being unable to stop his bringing of endless buckets of H_2O, is more than a mere jest, it is H_2O, a very brilliant score, and contains some graphic melody. It is full of bassoon work, and these instruments deserve high praise for the manner in which their part was carried out. The reading and the performance were most praiseworthy.

BOSTON POST, SATURDAY, APRIL 17, 1909

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

BY OLIN DOWNES

The Symphony rehearsal of yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall presented an uncommonly interesting programme: "Coriolanus" Overture, Beethoven; Suite for strings, in E major (first performance), Foote; Scherzo. "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," Dukas; Symphony, "From the New World," Dvorak.

The "Coriolanus" overture is exceptionally strong and concise in its workmanship, noble and dramatic in content and it is a modern masterpiece. Within the short period of time consumed in its performance one beholds, as it were, the unfoldment of an entire drama. How wisely Beethoven moulded his themes to his purpose, chiselled them in conformance with the demands of musical structure! How masterly his treatment of the sonata form, his altering of laws laid down by himself, for the sake of dramatic verity! Mr. Fiedler felt the heroism, the consuming fire which originated that overture and he conveyed his appreciation.

Mr. Foote's suite, as it now stands, was written in the years 1907 and '08. It is sane and pleasant music, well constructed, and the fact that its idiom is rather conventional does not trouble us. The second movement, a rapid, fanciful pizzicato with a contrasting passage for the muted strings, is a charming moment; but strongest of all is the final fugue, a warm, vigorous bit of writing. At the conclusion of the performance Mr. Foote, who was present, received an ovation.

Mr. Fiedler, we think, was far from Dukas when he led a crackling performance of one of the cleverest, wittiest pieces in modern music. Dukas unites the brilliancy of the Hebrew with the Frenchman's lightness of touch. He employs Strauss' orchestra, expurgated. Clearness, ingenuity, an exceedingly snappy, graphic style are his characteristics. His worst thunder is sharp and vibrant without heaviness, his utmost climax glitters and refracts tone as pure ice refracts the rays of the sun. Mr. Fiedler made a tremendous effect, but he handled the pointed and polished remarks of Paul Dukas without gloves, with an athletic directness not entirely in place. Recalling Dr. Muck's finished, debonair treatment of this "bon mot," the contrast is very apparent.

After this electric, but rather hollow entertainment of the "New World" symphony was fairly ravishing. We are not concerned with the theories that gave rise to the work. Thank heaven we are not at this time obliged to discuss the merits of Indian and Greaser melodies as available for serious musical treatment. The programme book mentions only one melody, the second theme of the first movement, as a direct derivation from an American folk-song. But the symphony is a tissue of folk-melodies. In the first movement these melodies happen to be more Scotch, and for the rest of the work more Bohemian than American. What interests us, what absorbed the audience yesterday is the fact that it was listening to glorious, absolute music and nothing else. Certainly this is a greeting to the "new world," an explosion of nature, brought about by the contact of a new, thrilling land with an impressionable melodist, one of the greatest who ever lived. Dvorak was a son of the soil. He was imbued with its savor, and he sang, as the bird sings, of the freshness, the beauty, the poetry of unsullied nature. So his work, a strange conglomeration of classic and modern methods, was doubly in season, doubly calculated to get into the bones. Mr. Fiedler caught all its vigor and buoyancy and he did ample justice to the brilliant orchestration. He was especially successful—or was the music especially successful?—in the scherzo and the largo, which was interpreted as the romance of the primeval forests that it is.

Dvorak's "New World" symphony wears well. It is useless for critics to argue that it is not American and that there are no real American melodies on the plantation. That Dvorak built upon the foundation of plantation music is not only proved by Mr. Krehbiel, but by some of the chamber-music which he created at the same time, which is even suggestive of the banjo. That the Southern tunes are African, and not American, is also untrue, for the negro would not have brought forth such melodies if he had lived in Africa a thousand years; they are the outcome of plantation-life and of that alone.

There are other composers who are turning to the American field for inspiration. Only recently the present reviewer received, through a third party, a request from Puccini as to information regarding the folk-music of America in the forties and fifties, for use in his setting of "The Girl of the Golden West." He has already used the "Star-Spangled Banner" (not an American tune by birth) in his "Madame Butterfly."

It was charming to see how well Mr. Fiedler caught up the lilt of the American themes. It may be conceded at once that these bits of tune are not transcriptions of any Southern melodies, but, and this is the more remarkable, they are themes and phrases evolved by Dvorak after studying this music. All folk-music has some elements in common. We can find the "Scotch Snap" in Norway and Russia as well as in Scotland, for example. It is therefore natural enough that some Czech commentators should fondly claim our folk-music for their own.

The Largo is to our mind the best movement, even if it is the least distinctly national. We found this a trifle over-refined in the performance and the English horn solo somewhat too subdued. But the melancholy and quiet brooding of the movement suit excellently to this instrument, which, with the Viola, is the true representative of pensive sadness.

The transference of figures from the preceding movements into the finale is finely done. Beethoven was the father of this kind of transplanting, and Brahms was its culminator, but many composers fail to make their flowers grow in the new soil of an alien movement. Dvorak fits them in perfectly and the symphony is all the more homogeneous because of these touches. American audiences ought to hear this work oftener.

There was one great shadow over this concert in the hearts of many auditors. The Assistant Manager, Mr. Fred R. Comee, who died suddenly yesterday, was almost a personal friend to every regular attendant on these concerts. Everyone knew his pleasant face, almost everyone had had a pleasant word from him at one time or another. It was a great pain to know that he had gone forever from the post that he had filled so genially and well. Orchestra and audience alike must have felt the shadow of Azrael clouding the sunshine of some of the music.

Frederic R. Comee Dead

Funeral of Assistant Manager of Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Be Held This Afternoon

The funeral of Frederic R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be held this afternoon in Mt. Auburn Chapel, Cambridge, at 4 o'clock. Mr. Comee's death, which occurred at his home, 1390 Beacon street, Thursday night, was a shock to his friends throughout the country, as few of them knew of his illness.

Frederic R. Comee.

Death was due to typhoid. Mr. Comee was taken seriously ill last Sunday, but had not been well since returning from the last trip taken by the orchestra to New York, about three weeks ago.

Mr. Comee was born in Fitchburg, Jan. 2, 1854. He was graduated from Harvard with the class of 1875. He was a member of the University Club of Boston, the Harvard Club of New York and the University Club of Philadelphia. He leaves a widow.

After his graduation from Harvard he entered the service of the old Fitchburg railroad. Later he organized a musical agency in this city, the old Chickering Bureau, and for several years he was treasurer of the Bijou Theatre in its prosperous days when the Gilbert and Sullivan operas were at the height of their popularity.

He became the assistant manager of the orchestra in 1886. Associated in this work with C. A. Ellis, of late years he had had practically complete charge of the routine of the business, and was its travelling manager.

JOURNAL- APRIL 17, 1909.

FINAL SYMPHONY FEATURES CHOSEN

Mr. Fiedler has been induced by many requests that have been sent in to him to repeat Bruckner's eighth symphony which was played with so much success at the eighteenth concert and he has placed it on the program for next week. The second part of the program will be Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll."

The feature of the twenty-fourth and last program, to be played April 30 and May 1 respectively, will be Beethoven's ninth symphony, which has not appeared on a symphony program since Symphony Hall was built and has been given only once in the last ten years. In the choral movement the orchestra will have the assistance of the Cecelia Society and a quartet of prominent singers.

[221]

TRANSCRIPT.
APRIL 17, 1909

SYMPHONY CONCERT

DVORAK FOR REVIVAL AND FOOTE FOR NOVELTY

The Bohemian's Symphony, "From the New World," for the First Time in Nearly Five Years—The Decline of Dvorak's Music and the Fashion in Which the Symphony Exemplifies It—Some Curious Contrasts—The Fresh, Keen Pleasure of Mr. Foote's New Suite—Youthful Spirit and Mature Workmanship Join Hands In It—Beethoven and Dukas for the Rest of the Programme—Mr. Fiedler's Good Day

If orchestral concerts may be classified even as are plays, Mr. Fiedler made a "pleasant" programme for the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon. It began with Beethovon's overture, "Coriolanus"—a tone-picture, as we might say nowadays, of the hero, a prelude to Shakspeare's august tragedy, what one will except theatre music to the mediocre play by Collin for which the composer really wrote it. The overture was the one piece of the afternoon that asked exacting attention and stirred to grave response. Then followed, for a first performance in any concert, Mr. Foote's new suite for strings, and the audience justly took such joy of it that it twice called the composer to his feet from his modest place in the hall. The applause was deserved return for the pleasure the fine-spirited and finely written music had given; but it seemed no less as deserved recognition of the honorable and diligent place Mr. Foote has occupied these many years, and still holds, in the musical life of Boston. It is long since a new piece by him has been played at the Symphony Concerts, and the audience was quick to seize the opportunity to compliment the composer. Next came Dukas's orchestral setting of Goethe's ballad of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," as vivid and brilliant a piece of instrumental narrative and delineation as has been written in our time, a tour de force of keen imagination and resourceful executive skill that sustain themselves to the end. Finally, for the first time in nearly five years, the audience heard Dvorák's symphony "From the New World." What a vogue it had in its time in the nineties here in the America that some fondly fancied had inspired it! How they and many another held excited debate of its use of Negro and folk-song melodies! The discussion subsided; audiences began to hear the symphony for its own intrinsic qualities and seemingly were less and less impressed by it. The score passed gradually to the shelf; Mr. Gericke took it down and dusted it when he had need to arrange a memorial programme for the dead Dvorák in the autumn of 1904. Since then it has gathered dust again until Mr. Fiedler put it on his rack yesterday. The audience listened with interest and applauded cordially, but some of the elder and more reflective hearers must have wondered if this were really the symphony about which they were so excited in those distant nineties. Today, it justifies poorly enough any sort of tumult over it.

The day was one of Mr. Fiedler's good days, and in all the music, except Dukas's scherzo, his abilities as a conductor shone clear. The heroic voice, the large stride, the ample and incisive accent of Beethoven's overture sorted with his strenuous ways and, now and again, with his men to aid, the music gained the eloquent sonorities that rightly or wrongly do link Beethoven's Coriolanus to the Coriolanus of Shakspeare. Mr. Fiedler loves the emphasizing contrast, and he had it, and achieved it, in the play of the music that suggests the proud and self-absorbed Roman over against the softer women and the softer circumstance that surround and sap him. Mr. Fiedler loves, too, the rhetorical pause, and there is fit room for it in this overture to "Coriolanus." He "nurses" melody and phrase gladly ,and the music that Wagner thought significant of the Roman's mother will bear such "nursing," even thought its dignity now and then fell away yesterday into something too like long-drawn sweetness. In the main, however, Mr. Fiedler made the overture speak with its high eloquence and its noble power, and he and it were good to hear. He and the string choir, quite as much, were as fortunate in Mr. Foote's suite. The little prelude went in graceful melodic outline and clear brightness of tone; the pizzicato was all light and shimmering elasticity; the adagietto had its richness of soberer tonal coloring; and Mr. Fiedler brought the supple and the cumulative energy to the fugue that is the true means to make all the fugues in the world—and how many there must be!—really "sound." Mr. Fiedler was vividly delineative in Dukas's scherzo, and his orchestra clearly told the tale. There were the voices of mystery that bring its atmosphere; there was the diligent broom trotting to and fro to the well; came the bewilderment, the alarm, the terror of the apprentice, the advent of the potent and overwhelming sorcerer, and the subdued broom slinking away to its corner again. Mr. Fiedler was very diligent and conscientious with the music. He duly imparted its contents as a faithful conductor should. Yet somehow his fidelity—his literalness almost—rather dimmed Dukas's brilliance, and he seemed to forget that the scherzo is an instrumental jeu d' esprit as well as an orchestral narrative. Dukas was smiling, even winking, as he wrote. With Dvorák's symphony, Mr. Fiedler was on more congenial ground. He could yield himself to its rhythmical turbulence, its changefulness of mood, its high instrumental coloring (as such coloring went in Dvorak's time). He could catch the snapping vivacity of its scherzo, the langurous sentimentality of its slow movement, the leaps and whirl of its finale. Probably he did not make Dvorák's music sound as only the Czechs—they say—can do; but he played it as though he believed in it and would have his hearers believe with him; as though it were really alive.

"The times change, and we change with them," and Dvorêk's symphony heard again in the spring of 1909 was not exactly what we thought it when we first heard and debated it in the winter of 1895, when Boston and New York listened to it four times within a month. Nodadays the point is not whether and how Dvorêk used Negro folk melodies and their suggestion in the music. "Some will undoubtedly continue to insist," writes the learned "programmist" truly that the symphony 'From the New World' is based, for the most part, on Negro themes, and that the future of American music rests on the use of Congo, North American Indian, Creole, Greaser and cowboy ditties, whinings, yawps and whoopings." And forthwith he proves at length that to Dvorêk's family, to has friends, and to those in general, "from the highest to the humblest," who have heard it in Bohemia, the symphony seems wholly Cezch, wholly of the peculiar traits of the composer, and has no apparent or plausible connection with his miserable stay in America, except as it may bear the impress of his loneliness here, of his longing for his own country, of his quailing withdrawal into himself from the turbulent life life of a city and a land that were strange and distasteful to him. From the beginning to the end of his life, Doovàk was a Bohemian peasant, and an unusually simple-minded one, who happened to have the gift to write music. And circumstance, wanton and unkind, shifted him to New York in the nineties, for advertising purposes and what pass for "musical circles" there. No wonder he pined dolefully and shut himself bitterly within his own spirit.

Nowadays, however, all this is neither here nor there. Few of us that heard the symphony yesterday cared a pin whether Negro or any other folk-tunes suggested much or little of the music, whether the impressions that Dvorák received from "the new world," whence he dated it, stimulated or dulled his imagination. The debates over the symphony are closed. American and Bohemian opinions of it gather the dust side by side. The weary babble about folk-song in general goes tediously onward and will probably to the end of musical tune, but composers yesterday, today, and forever, will still "look in their hearts" and write when they would set their fingers to music-paer. The question, the only question, for us who listened on Friday was whether the symphony interested our minds, touched our imaginations, stirred responsive emotions and gladdened the ear, now by its melodies and their adornments, and now by the richness, the warmth and the variety of the instrumental coloring. The scherzo unmistakably accomplishes most of these things. It keeps its rhythmic vivacity, its adroit contrasts, its bright tonal tints, and its freshness and ardor of spirit. The Czech snap, which is much more important than the "Scotch snap" of the folk-lousts, animates it. The music is sprightly and alive. It is exhilarating to hear. The finale, too, has its energy of word and voice still, its tingling transitions, its fiery contrasts, its long cumulative progressions, its primitive vigor. Perhaps Dvorak heard the confused and turbulent voices of that strange America in it, or perhaps he felt himself "strong and free," as the old ballards says, on the native heaths of his own Bohemia. Be that as it may, the finale has a springing energy that keeps it vital still. But how has the Largo faded, with its insistent melody for the English horn that Mr. Feidler took at rather a droning pace yesterday. Some of used to hear in it, when we were under the first spell of the symphony—and the debate that it quickened—the rising and fading, the advancing and receding, the mysterious and potent voice of the forests of old legend, when winds stir in them and lonely and wandering men listen tremulously to the sound. And yesterday there was but a well-imagined meldoy for the English horn, singing itself insistently, languously over the soft strings, and turning shallower and shallower at each repetition. Mere surface, too simple emotion, as it seemed. And what was the first movement but spirited and contrasting play with instrumental colors and short-breathed and impulsive melodic thought and development, thin and unsatisfying music, again, with all its restless glitter?

Dvorák's orchestral coloring, rich and brilliant, diverse and apt, as it seemed in those days of the nineties, has paled under the ampler, more deeply tinted, and subtler palettes of a new musical generation. It has left him behind there; it has left him behind, too, in all the arts and imaginings of harmony and modulation. And his music has not the substance of melodic idea, the depth and the vigor of emotion, the variety and the largeness of imagination, the amplitude of design, the splendor of beauty or the eloquence of power that make the music of the masters survive every "advance" and every change in the fashions and the methods of their art. Dvorák was only a Bohemian peasant who had the gift to write music that at its best was unconsciously instinct with the spirit of his race. The gift rose not to genius, or something close to it, as it does once and again in Bruckner. For want of substance of thought and idea, of large grasp and large design, his music thins. For want of deep and kindling emotion to more highly organized imaginations and temperaments than his, it has begun to sound tame. Dvorák's music is more than out of the fashion. It is dying a natural death. It is perilous to revive his symphonies nowadays to another musical generation. The star of the more substantial, of the finer, Smetana rises; the star of Dvorák sets.

Mr. Foote's suite provoked no such melancholy reflections. It is a little piece, if the listener, like the composer, chooses so to call it; and it continues only for a short and varied twenty minutes. It asks only a string choir, and Mr. Foote makes light play with its natural but duly changeful timbres. A short prelude runs in clear and graceful melody, ingeniously distributed and imitated through the different groups of instruments—runs charmingly, playfully, with the happy air of surety of design, surety of fancy, and surety of resource all taking their seeming pastime. There is pause, and an insistent pizzicato follows, a little and beguiling exercise, so to say, in the varied timbres and in the fanciful touches that the composer may draw [illegible] lating voices subside, and the music passes into a soberly songful adagietto, all shadowed tonal coloring, the little passing cloud of pensive musing—it is hardly melancholy—upon the brightness of the whole suite. The choir echoes the pizzicato, and there is pause again. Then lustily, the strings swing away into the final fugue. Now a fugue may be the dullest and the prosiest thing in all music, as any one knows who has ever happened to read examination papers in harmony and counterpoint. It may also be as exhilarating, as thrilling even, an exercise for the musical mind and delight to the musical ear as was Reger's in the concerts of last year. Mr. Foote's fugue is never dull and never prosy. It has the energy of imagination, of contrast, of advance and recession, of execution for creation's sake that is much more than half the secret of successful fugue-making. And in keeping with the rest of the suite, and by a true and lively touch of imagination, it is energy at play. Trifle in a sense though the suite is, the music has the imagination, the resource, the spontaneity, the sense of style and the nice adaptation of means to ends that make it an admirable, even a distinguished trifle. And it is one of the maxims of a sincere and sensitive artistry that a little thing, well and truly done, is more to be desired than a large thing clouded and bungled. Moreover in the music, Mr. Foote, wise as he is in execution, is young again of spirit. And he counts his fifties.

H. T. P.

JOURNAL—SATURDAY
APRIL 17, 1909.

MUSIC LOVERS WILL PAY LAST TRIBUTE

To Attend Funeral of Assistant Manager of Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge.

Music lovers of this city will pay their last tribute to the late F. R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for years, at 4 o'clock this afternoon, when funeral services will be held in Mount Auburn Chapel, Cambridge.

The news of Mr. Comee's death came as a shock to his friends throughout the country, for few of them knew of his illness. His many years of service with the Symphony Orchestra gave him the widest acquaintance among musical people, who sincerely mourn his loss.

Mr. Comee became assistant manager of the orchestra in 1886 and has seen it grow from a comparatively modest organization to its present position of the premier orchestra of the world.

BOSTON GLOBE-
APRIL 17, 1909.

WILL BE BURIED TODAY.

Funeral Services for Fred R. Comee to Be Held at Mt Auburn Chapel This Afternoon.

Funeral services for Fred R. Comee, for 23 years assistant manager of the Symphony orchestra, and also of old Music hall, and later Symphony hall, will be held at 4 p m today at the chapel in Mt Auburn cemetery.

FREDERICK R. COMEE.

The death of few Boston men would cause more sincere sorrow locally than will that of Fred Comee, whose acquaintance among musical artists and devotees of the art was remarkably wide.

An enthusiastic Harvard alumnus, of the class of 1875, he did much to encourage college and university musical organizations and was responsible for the popular concerts given by such bodies annually in Symphony hall.

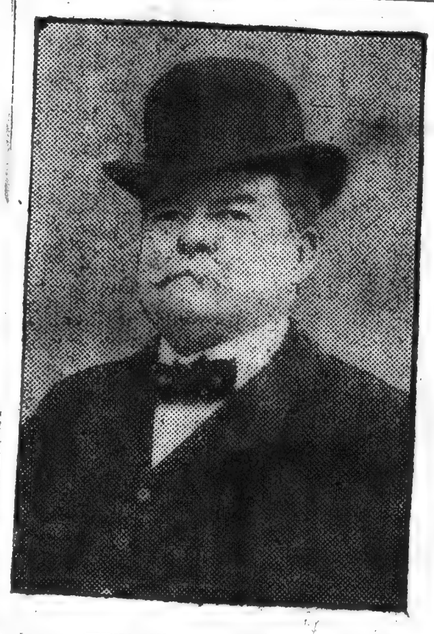
He was born 55 years ago in Fitchburg. His wife, who survives, was Miss Clara Galloup.

HERALD.
APRIL 17, 1909.

FUNERAL OF F. R. COMEE.

Will Take Place This Afternoon at Mt. Auburn Chapel, Cambridge.

The funeral services of Frederic R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will take place this afternoon at Mr. Auburn Chapel, Cambridge, at 4 o'clock. Mr. Comee's death was a shock to his friends throughout the country, for few of them knew of his illness. His many years of service with the Boston Symphony gave him a wide acquaintance among musical people, not only in Boston but wherever the orchestra visited during the 23 years he was connected with it.



FREDERIC R. COMEE.

After his graduation from Harvard in 1875 he entered the service of the old Fitchburg railroad. Later he organized a musical agency in this city—the old Chickering bureau—and for several years was treasurer of the Bijou Theatre in its prosperous days when the Gilbert & Sullivan operas were at the height of their popularity.

He became the assistant manager of the orchestra in 1886 and saw it grow from a comparatively modest organization to its present position. Associated in this work with C. A. Ellis, of late years he had practically complete charge of the routine of the business and was its travelling manager.

Mr. Comee was one of the most popular men in the musical world. His geniality of temper and his fame as a raconteur made him a welcome guest wherever he went. His death is a severe loss to the orchestra as he had created a place not easy to fill.

[222]

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, APRIL 18, 1909

BRUCKNER AND THE SYMPHONY

I was eating a piece of strawberry cake, reflecting the meanwhile, ruminating, as it were, upon the vastness and the incomparable splendor of Anton Bruckner's Eighth Symphony, which, thanks to Mr. Fiedler, we shall hear again next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. I was thinking of that enormous wealth of inspiration, of the gigantic frescoes, the magnitude of which is hardly grasped before another fills the ear. Ever since the voices of Wagner and Liszt and the rest of the young fellows were heard in the land there have ben a majority to make sport of the "antiquated" symphony form. But Schubert finished at least one colossal and immortal work, in which he contented himself with pouring his inexhaustible ideas into a mould previously prepared. Schumann found very personal expression in a manner outwardly, if not inwardly, that of a symphonist; Brahms stood on the shoulders of Beethoven and created a 10th symphony in C minor, then developed until, in his fourth symphony, ht achieved music that is as pure, absolute, alembicated, as music can be.

We are liable to forget the basic, universal nature, the fundamental principles of the symphony. Every great composer has altered the form to give full and characteristic expression to his ideas. Every great composer will—and great composers flourish today, as encouragingly as they did 100 years ago. No two men will stretch a glove to exactly the same size and shape, but many men will continue to wear different gloves for some time to come. The comparison is not an absolute parallel of course, but it points the moral.

In all likelihood each generation for years to come will furnish one and probably more than one symphonist who will write living music. The symphony was not made and ordained by an individual, though Haydn and Beethoven did perhaps the most toward its present supremacy as a musical structure. It owes its being to the conspicuous and inconspicuous lives and labors of musicians since the days of Philip Emmanuel Bach, and before him. It has its origin in primal laws of beauty and proportion and its tenets spring from man's highest desire, the need of a perfection that we do not find in the world about us, the voicing of aspiration toward the pure ideal, which, something whispers, exists beyond.

Since the days of Brahms and Bruckner—two tremendous B's—great symphonies have continued to appear. Jean Sibelius, for one, of today, has produced at least two big canvases, and there are no weighty indications of the death symphonic in the immediate future.

While everyone with something to say will modify the structure as proves necessary to give plastic expression to his ideas, and while some will steer as clear as they can from anything that resembles a symphony, the prime essentials will contiue to exist and underly creative activities.

Bruckner, himself a frank and child-like soul, was filled to madness with admiration of Wagner and Beethoven. The programmatist of the Symphony concerts quotes his speech to a friend after a performance of the "Eroica"; "I think that if Mr. Beethoven were alive and I should go to him with my seventh symphony" (this symphony was the first work of Bruckner's to be heard here), "and say, 'Here, Mr. Van Beethoven, this is not so bad, this seventh, as certain gentlemen would make out,' . . . I think he would take me by the hand and say, 'My dear Bruckner, never mind, I had no better luck; and the same men who hold me up against you even now do not understand my last quartets, although they act as if they understand them.' Then I'd say to him, 'Excuse me, Mr. Van Beethoven, that I have gone beyond you in freedom of form, but I think a true artist should make his own forms for his own works and stick by them.'" But Bruckner was a born symphonist, who followed faithfully, though often in a horrible and grotesquely extended manner, the precepts of Beethoven.

Six of Bruckner's symphonies have been played in Boston, the 3d, 4th, 5th, 7th, 8th, 9th. Of these the third is the weakest. The fourth ("Romantic") approaches nearest the 8th in finish and conciseness of workmanship, and in beauty of material. The fifth is one of the most fantastic. I have heard it but once, but I shall never forget the adagio, with its impressive opening, a peculiar pizzicato passage for the strings over which the other instruments soon commence strange songs. The 7th, in E major, is a very rich work, and its slow movement is known to be or supposed to be a dirge for Richard Wagner, to whose friendship and encouragement Bruckner owed so much. It was the ninth symphony of which Bruckner said: "I undertook a stiff task. I should not have done it at my age and in my weak condition. If I never finish it, then my Te Deum may be used as a finale. I have nearly finished three movements. This work belongs to my Lord God." And this last symphony, in which sublime thoughts struggle with halting speech for utterance, has been cited as a pathetically appropriate monument to the life and the genius of Anton Bruckner.

Several causes are responsible for the verbosity and the twaddle that so obscure the inherent greatness of all of the later symphonies. Bruckner won his musical learning by the hardest struggle with poverty, and he was not a well-versed musician until about his 40th year. Sechter, his chief teacher, was himself too much of a contrapuntist and a splitter of hairs. He encouraged, instead of pruned, Bruckner's tendency toward over-elaboration. It may be said here that when Bruckner did graduate from apprenticeship he was a supreme master of the artifices of composition. We know how, when examined for an organist's position in Vienna, he improvised upon a given theme until his examiners themselves were confounded in following him. He waited until late in life to hear the performance of one of his symphonies, and his career was arduous. The man who spent 10 hours a day at the piano and three at the organ regarded music as his supreme solace, and he was fearless, like a child, in putting his thoughts upon paper. One can fancy him sitting down full of glee—the pudgy figure, the little, round head, a high forehead and small, almost cunning eyes, to put his thronging thoughts on paper. If he had heard his works more frequently he would probably have observed their defects. He did materially alter one symphony, after personally conducting its performance. But he could not restrain his love of putting notes on paper, his glory in his ideas and his contrapuntal prowess. And his ideas, revolved in silence, grew inward instead of outward, often losing their force and cogency.

The eighth symphony, however, escapes these faults almost entirely, and at the 18th concert this season it won such a triumph as seldom comes to so new and pretentious an orchestral composition.

What did Hanslick have to say of this symphony after the first performance at Vienna, 1892?

"Like all the Bruckner symphonies that I chance to know, this one interested one in parts, but was amazing, indeed repellant, upon the whole. To say it in a few words, the peculiarity of the work consists in the transfer of Wagner's dramatic style into the symphony. Bruckner falls not only every moment into Wagnerianisms, turns, effects, reminiscences; he even seems to have chosen certain Wagner pieces as models for his architectural construction, especially the 'Tristan und Isolde' prelude . . . Character[illegible] of this symphony, Bruckner's latest is the immediate juxtaposition of dry contrapuntal school wisdom and immoderate exaltation. Thrown about between intoxication and vacuity, one is left, at last, without any definite impression; one arrives at no artistic enjoyment. Everything passes by one in a high-handed manner, forbidding survey, without order, stretching out into horrible extension. Each of the four movements, most often the first, charms by some interesting figure—a flash of genius. Oh, if the rest could be omitted! It is possible that this Katzenjammer style, with its confusion of dreams, belongs to the music of the future—a future that we do not envy. But for the time being we hope that the symphony and chamber music will be kept unsoiled by a style that is in its rightful place only as an illustrative means in definite dramatic situations."

Bruckner, too, had his troubles with admirers. The symphony was programmed: "The author of this programme is not named, but we may easily guess the rogue—who is hated least of all by his master." The opening of the first movement was dubbed "the form of the Eschylean Prometheus." "An especially tiresome part of this movement has been given the beautifying name of the greatest loneliness and silence.' And the scherzo, which does, in truth, smell of the sod, had the caption of the 'German Michael,' after 'Michel,' a rough fellow. In the adagio we are given to behold no less than 'The all-loving Father of mankind in His entire and boundless wealth of mercy.' As this adagio lasts 28 mniutes, pretty nearly as long as a whole Beethoven symphony, sufficient time is thus given the listener to contemplate the unusual spectacle. The finale, at last, with its barock themes, confused construction and inhuman noise, appearing to us to be nothing more than a model of bad taste, is, so the programme says, 'heroism in the service of the divine.' The trumpet calls that are blown in all directions are the 'annunciators of everlasting salvation, heralds of the divine idea.'"

No wonder that Bruckner, when royalty asked him to name a wish, desired that he be freed from the criticisms of Eduard Hanslick. And how was the symphony received? Tumultuous jubilee, handkerchiefs waved in the air, countless calls for the composer, etc.

SPRINGFIELD SUNDAY REPUBLICAN: APRIL 18, 1909.

There will be much regret in the musical world over the death, at the age of 55, of Frederick R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston symphony orchestra. His duties brought him in contact with a great many people, and he made friends easily. He was associated with the orchestra almost from its inception, taking up that work after he left college. Much of the arduous detail of management devolved upon him, and in recent years he suffered several severe attacks of illness from which he perhaps did not give himself time fully to recover. It was largely through his efforts that the Springfield concerts were arranged for.

SUNDAY GLOBE—APRIL 18, 1909.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Foote's New Suite, the Symphony Novelty.

Another Season of the "Pops" to Begin May 3.

Recitals of the Closing Season—Gossip.

Arthur Foote's suite in E major, for string orchestra, was the novelty number at the Symphony concerts last week, being given its first performance in public at the Friday afternoon rehearsal. The "Coriolanus" overture by Beethoven, the Dukas scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," and Dvorak's "New World" symphony were the other selections.

In bringing forward Mr Foote's melodic little suite Mr Fiedler continued his good work in giving practical encouragement to resident musicians by performance of those compositions which seem to him worth while. Macquarre, Strube, Chadwick and Foote have successively figured on the last four programs, and in no case has Mr Fiedler's judgment been at fault regarding the quality of the works performed.

The three parts of the suite Mr Foote has divided into a prelude, an interrupted pizzicato and a fugue. The work is very brief and is scored for a string orchestra. Taking a simple short theme for a foundation it finds repetition in a dozen or more forms in the different groups of instruments. The treatment is largely of the legato character and the harmony glides from one choir to another in the most amiable way, concluding with long sustained notes in the higher fingering of the violin tapering to a whispered diminuendo.

Opening with a lively pizzicato of an elaborate nature the second part closes in a similar way, an interruption by bowed instruments making a strangely contrasted connecting link between the two. The pizzicato is cleverly managed, with tonal colorings distributed through all the string sections. The fugue begins in canonical measures, the original subject being stated briefly and succinctly and the answering themes introduced skilfully and without abrupt transitions in tempo and phrasing. The performance gave evident pleasure, for at its close the composer was forced to bow his acknowledgments in recognition of the applause.

The "Coriolanus" overture deserves to be credited with the proper "pomp and circumstance" that gives musical illustration of grim episodes in the career of the hero. Beethoven's pictures were presented in vivid colors by Mr Fiedler's forces.

"The Sorcerer's Apprentice" went along in the jolliest way, with its comical and diabolical utterances of wood-winds, especially in the bassoons, its sharp trumpet blasts and other jumping-jack quirks of orchestration. The program closed with the "New World" symphony which shows Dvorak's undeniable talent in treating negro melodies in symphonic style. Praise is due the orchestra whatever one may think about the merit of the work itself.

Bruckner's eighth symphony, which was received with conflicting opinions as to its importance when played at the 18th pair of concerts, will be repeated this week. The "Siegfried Idyll" will make up the second part of the program.

For the closing program next week Mr Fiedler announces the ninth symphony, by Beethoven, which has not appeared on a Symphony program since Symphony hall was built and has been given only once in the last 10 years, then at a Pension Fund concert under Mr Gericke. For the choral movement of the symphony the orchestra will have the assistance of the Cecilia society and a quartet number of prominent sincers, whose names will be announced in due time.

"Pops" Soon to Begin.

The 24th season of the "Pops" will begin Monday evening, May 3, in Symphony hall and continue for nine weeks, the last concert being given Saturday evening, July 3. The concerts will be given every evening except Sundays at 8 o'clock, and the conductors for the season will be Gustav Strube, Arthur Kautzenbach and Andre Maquarre.

JOURNAL—MONDAY, APRIL 19, 190

SYMPHONY CROWD CALLS FOR FOOTE

Author of Suite Played by Orchestra Forced to Bow Acknowledgments.

One of the best features of the Symphony concert Saturday night was the suite for string orchestra by Arthur Foote, the Boston organist and composer. It proved to be spontaneous yet scholarly in a marked degree. It fairly overflowed with melody—with cheerful, youthful spirit. There were three movements, prelude, pizzicatti and adagietto, and fugue. The prelude was perhaps too saccharine for an audience that has a fancy for Strauss and Debussy, not to mention Bruckner; but after the second movement, with its suggestion of zephyrs blowing over a moonlit ocean, the applause was enthusiastic and the composer had to make his bow from his place in the balcony. The same enthusiasm prevailed after the performance of the sparkling fugue; and Mr. Foote had to bow again and again.

The concert opened with a stirring interpretation of Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture. After the Foote novelty came the Dukas scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," with its lively description of the broom that turned into one servant and then into two, filled the room with water and the apprentice with consternation. The last number was Dvorak's "New World" symphony, which, almost tenderly performed, gave the audience very much pleasure.

BOSTON POST, APRIL 24, 1909

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

BY OLIN DOWNES

The last Symphony rehearsal but one this season took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. In memory of the late Fred R. Comee, the lamented assistant manager of the Symphony Orchestra, the concert opened with the funeral march from Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

One could do the memory of Mr. Comee no greater justice than to quote a few lines of the eulogy published in the programme book: "His knowledge of human nature, his amiable disposition, his tolerance, his marked sense of humor turned business acquaintance into friendship, and all who had to do with him respected his ability and were fond of the man himself. He was scrupulously honest, industrious, never discouraged, quick and ready in an emergency, always of good cheer. His pride was in the organization of which he was a member His devotion to the interests of the orchestra was untiring and unselfish. The loyalty that bound him to many friends with hoops of steel distinguished him in his office."

Bruckner's eighth symphony, performed in Boston for the first time two or three weeks ago, was repeated by general request, and it made less of an impression than on the previous occasion. This was chiefly due to the performance, which revealed more detail and less of the prodigious vitality of the music than at the first reading. It was one of those psychological moments when every man in the orchestra appeared sick unto death of the work (evidently the weather had accumulated in the instruments, especially the brass) and Fiedler, in his desire to impress every measure upon those who listened, became guilty of over-elaboration, which is a very unsafe proceeding, even with the strongest of the symphonies of Anton Bruckner. Again the slow moment made a deep impression. The finale seemed for the most part doddering and imbecile, save toward the last.

The concert came to an end with Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl."

[223]

ADVERTISER,
APRIL 24, 1909

"HEROIC" SYMPHONY HEARD ONCE AGAIN

PLAYED IN MEMORY OF FRED R. COMEE

Bruckner's Great Symphony Is Worth Studying — Fascinating Changes of Harmony.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven—Funeral March from "Heroic Symphony."
In Memoriam. Frederic R. Comee.
Bruckner—Symphony, No. 8, in C minor. By request.
Wagner—"Siegfried Idyll."

There was no soloist in this concert, nor was one wanted, for the orchestral music was absorbing from beginning to end. Yet the programme was badly arranged and lacked balance. To give over an hour and a half of music before the intermission and only fifteen minutes after it, proves the latter part of the above assertion, while the "Siegfried Idyll" coming after the Bruckner Symphony sounded tame. The grandiose coda of the symphony would have made an admirable end of the programme, while the whispered cadences of the Idyll (the Melody of Peace and the "Siegfried, Refuge of the World," motive, in augmentation,) made but a lame and impotent conclusion.

It was eminently fitting to pay tribute to the memory of the Symphony Orchestra's loyal servant, Mr. Comee, and there is no doubt that many a personal remembrance blended with the music, for "Fred Comee" was a friend to hundreds. Possibly one ought not to say a word about the music here, but we think that Mr. Fiedler would make the movement still more impressive by quickening it a little.

The Bruckner symphony is great music. If any auditor in the concert tonight finds it over-long the fault is in him, not in the music. It is something worth studying. The first and second movements have a constant tendency to sequence work, but everything is logical and tangible, and there are moments of absolute greatness in both. Bruckner knows what to do with his figures. Like Wagner he can repeat very frequently without the risk of becoming tedious. The changes of harmony are fascinating.

The Scherzo is sturdy enough and its chief figure of four notes in upward progression is given over and over again, and then it is put in contrary motion and played downwards and given a few hundred times more; yet never is there a moment of tedium for the trained auditor. The Trio is in strong contrast and one thinks occasionally of the Wagner of "Tristam and Isolde" both here and in the Adagio, but the treatment is Brucknerian and is properly symphonic.

Again we found the Adagio lofty in the highest degree. Its climaxes are worked up with an indescribable dignity. Certain parts suggested the beautiful "Rhine Journey" in "Goetterdammerung" and there was something gloriously Wagnerian in the use of the brass. Only Bruckner seems to have caught the true Wagnerian spirit in his modulations. He has a very different style from the Beethoven and Brahms schools. All the instruments played well, but the horns superlatively so. The end of the Adagio, with its horn passages, is as lofty as anything the present reviewer can recall in modern music. This is the very apex of the symphony. The finale falls off a trifle. There is a forcible beginning, some blaring trombone work, several striking organ points, especially on the kettledrums, and some well-written counterpoint, but the greatness of the Adagio is not attained.

This symphony would stand a test that would cause much modern music to shrivel up; it would sound well in a piano arrangement; it would make a very effective piano duet. It is not carried to success by mere tricks of tone-coloring; in fact sometimes the scoring could be improved; but the ideas and their development could not.

We were glad to see Mr. Fiedler recalled at the end of the symphony. His intelligent and loving work have borne excellent fruit in this case, and the orchestra deserves homage also. But if he ever gives this programme in any other city we would counsel his placing the Siegfried Idyll at the beginning, or else leaving it out altogether and making the Bruckner symphony the entire programme.

The "Siegfried Idyll" is one of the best examples of "family music." Wagner wrote it as a birthday present to his wife. Mendelssohn in a similar way, composed "Son and Stranger" (opera) for his parents as a surprise upon their silver wedding. Both these works were not written with thoughts of music publishers and public performances. It was quite another branch of family music when Strauss celebrated his wife and baby, and uncles, aunts and relatives, with a view to large sales and quick profits.

The fact above stated about the original privacy of "The Idyll" makes the scoring of this work much lighter than was Wagner's wont. This added to its unfitness as a concert finale and a succession to Bruckner's ponderous ending. Nevertheless, even with this defect, the concert of yesterday was thoroughly worth while.

TRANSCRIPT,
APRIL 24, 1909

THE CHORAL SYMPHONY

BEETHOVEN'S TONE-POEM TO BE PLAYED AGAIN

The Revival Next Week for the First Time in Nine Years at the Regular Symphony Concerts—The Temptation in the Music to "Editing" and Experiment—Mr. Damrosch's Recent Double Performance of the Symphony in New York—The Other Innovations That He Attempted—The Debated Question of Pause or No Pause Before the Finale

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, for the first times in nine years, Beethoven's choral symphony is to be performed at a pair of regular Symphony Concerts. In the spring of 1900, it was the last piece that the Symphony Orchestra, then under Mr. Gericke, played in the old Music Hall. Once at a concert for the Pension Fund of the orchestra he undertook it, five years ago, in Symphony Hall. Now Mr. Fiedler has once more restored it to the regular concerts and set himself to the preparation of it with his familiar energy. The Choral Symphony, besides, has been much the fashion this season at orchestral concerts. Mr. Mahler undertook it not long ago in New York with the orchestra of the Philharmonic Society and carried it to a performance that was eloquent in the more "dramatic" portions of the music, and that attempted none of the innovations for which the symphony offers peculiar temptation. Three weeks before, however, Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra had been plentiful with them. He performad the symphony twice in a single concert; he assembled a group of singers for the solo parts; here and there he amplified and "edited" the score as Beethoven left it; and once he made and once he omitted the debated pause before the beginning of the last—the choral—movement. Experiments of many sorts are an old story since Bülow's time with the ninth symphony. Many a conductor cannot resist the temptation to "write in" what he fancies Beethoven would have written, had he not been deaf, or had he had modern instruments and modern instrumental skill in his orchestra. With each renewal of such experiments comes fresh debate of them and of the editing of the choral symphony in general. It was plentiful in New York a month ago, and below follow two instances of it.

A mere record of the last of the Symphony Society's concerts of Beethoven's music might suffice if it had been a duplicate of the corresponding concert last season. But the concert was something very different, wrote Mr. Krehbiel in the Tribune. It was, indeed, different from any other concert which Mr. Walter Damrosch has conducted in New York, or the forces under his control, have ever given. The programme consisted of a single number, and this was performed twice. The number was the Choral Symphony. The scheme of a double performance of the symphony smacked a good deal of sensationalism in the announcement. Von Bülow tried the experiment once in Germany, but much could be forgiven the erratic doctor which could scarcely be pardoned in another. But Mr. Damrosch seemed not only willing to endure the comments which he must have known would be called out by his proceeding, but to invite others. He not only repeated the symphony after a brief intermission, but he essayed an experiment, without precedent so far as we know, and gave the solo parts into the keeping of a small chorus of thirteen voices—three sopranos, three contraltos, four tenors and three basses. He also called together a chorus, unusual in its composition, at least of three hundred voices. Moreover—and herein lay the feature of the performance which was most fruitful of results—he subjected the great work to a careful study and made such changes in the score as he believed would bring it closer than usual to the appreciation of the listeners. They were all of a character sanctioned by the approval of some of the best men of the musical world. It is enough to say that much of what Wagner and von Bülow did to bring to notice the melodic ideas which have sometimes been blurred, or hidden by the shortcomings of the instruments in use in Beethoven's day, and the want of skill in the players, was repeated by Mr. Damrosch.

Three features, however, were striking enough to assert the attention of every amateur. The first has been mentioned: Instead of a quartet, a small chorus sang all the solo music except the opening proclamation in the vocal finale and the tenor solo. The effect of this change was striking, too striking to be disposed of at the time. There was a loss in contrast—there was a gain in homogeneity. There was less gasping for breath, less evidence of a struggle with the cruel difficulty of the music, but also less color. The second feature was one which Mr. Damrosch submitted to a trial. At the repetition of the symphony he separated the slow movement and the finale by a very brief pause. He did what no conductor has done before in New York except Mr. Weingartner at a Philharmonic Society concert some five years ago. At that time the proceeding was enthusiastically commended by The Tribune's music reviewer. Last night's experiment confirmed him in his opinion that it was thus that Beethoven intended that the work should be performed. It is, indeed, not only highly illuminative of the composer's poetical purpose, if that purpose was a celebration of humanity's struggle for joy, it is essential to a clear expression of that purpose. Let a hurried argument be attempted.

The last movement of the symphony opens with a turbulent presto of the wind instruments, a mad and despairing shriek, which is interrupted by the famous recitative of the basses; then the discordant fanfare is repeated with angry emphasis, and again comes an expostulation from the instruments, which seem to be trying to adopt the human form of speech. Now, in succession, come brief reminiscences from the three preceding movements, separated from each other by declamatory passages in differing moods from the basses. After the three movements have thus been passed in review the wood-wind instruments suggest the melody which later we find associated with Schiller's "Ode to Joy," and the bass intruments express their satisfaction with the tune as plainly as inanimate instruments can. Now they act on the gracious suggestion of the wood-winds, sing the melody to the end in unison, and then deliver it to the orchestra, which puts it through a series of variations. These are running out into a complacent ritornello when the horrid opening din is heard again louder and more rasping than before, for now the strings, too, add their voices to the clamor. As before, there comes an interruption, but this time the expostulation comes from human lips and is clothed with articulate speech. The sole baritone addresses the instruments: "O friends, not these tones. Rather let us unite in more pleasant ones, and more joyous." Then, like the bass instruments before him, he sings the joy melody to Schiller's words to the end and transfers it to the chorus. Vocal variations supported by the orchestra take the place of the instrumental, which had gone before. The poet-composer's desire for that definiteness of expression which could come only from the word has been achieved. A perfect apparatus composed of many parts, each efficient in a degree but endowed with a higher efficiency through coöperation, hymns the praise of joy.

If Beethovon had wanted the finale to succeed the slow movement without a pause, it is easily said, he might have omitted the customary double bar between the two movements or written "attacca" over it. He did neither of these things. But note this, that he omitted the hold which is found in the score at the conclusion of the first and second movements. The dissonant orchestral screech which begins the last movement is like a conjunction in grammar—an and, if, but or not. It ought not to be regarded as a beginning but as a continuation of the discourse. Again, there is a double bar and [illegible] enumeration and alignment of the forces [illegible] now no one would think for a moment a pause was permissible; everything is rushing eagerly toward the solution; a new attempt is made, and, because articulate speech is brought in to help, success is attained.

Last night's public had an opportunity to hear the effect of the customary pause between the third and fourth movements, and also the effect of the device which we believe was in Beethoven's mind. A full demonstration was spoiled by a burst of applause which followed the slow movement on the second performance; but there remained enough of the effect to appeal to the discerning. The symphony benefits from the device.

Many musicians of the present time, added Mr. Henderson in the Sun, have felt that Beethoven needed editing, a great deal according to one or two of them. There used to be in this city a musician who said that he would like to study orchestration for two or three years with Richard Strauss and then reorchestrate Beethoven's fifth symphony. Doubtless he would have begun by extending the list of instruments employed, for Strauss himself could best reorchestrate this composition with the apparatus found in his own scores. There is no doubt whatever that new and extraordinary sonority could be imparted to the entrance of the finale. Suppose that instead of being scored for Beethoven's elementary orchestra it were written out anew for the usual body of strings, three flutes, two oboes, English horn, two bassoons, contra bassoon, four clarinets, bass clarinet, double bass clarinet, eight horns, six trumpets, bass trumpet, three trombones, contra bass trombone, tuna and —à la Wagner—six harps. It would sound very different, would it not? There might also be a heckelphone and a sarussophone, with megaphones for the solo quartet. It would doubtless be tremendously imposing, but the real question is, would it sound any longer like Beethoven?

Now that is precisely the one question which has to be answered whenever anyone undertakes to edit any of Beethoven's orchestral scores. It is not regarded as reverential to meddle with those scores at all. Beethoven knew what he wished and he wrote it. Without doubt this is true in the majority of cases; but long before Mr. Damrosch this question was raised: Are there not places in the score of the ninth symphony which show that the composer was constrained to write as he did either by the state of orchestral technic in his day or the possibilities of the instruments that were at his command? Mr. Damrosch's more technical departures from custom consisted in the carrying of the violins and the flutes up to what seemed the logical conclusion of certain melodic phrases; in the "filling out" of the rests in the trumpet parts and in the trombone parts in the finale, and in other reënforcements of the wood-winds in that movement. They did not in any way change the instrumental color of Beethoven. They did not reconstruct either his melodic scheme or his balance of tone. They did fill out certain passages, but in a manner not boldly pronounced.

Mr. Damrosch's devotion to the ideas of his one-time teacher in the art of conducting, von Bülow, led him to do things much more reprehensible than the editing of the phrases alluded to in the foregoing cursory comments. At the end of the first movement of the symphony, for instance, Bülow has filled out the last three measures of the tympani part in quite indefensible manner. This piece of editing cannot offer as its excuse the plea that Beethoven would have done the same thing if he could. Beethoven unquestionably wrote the passage as he wished it to sound. There is another spot in the ninth symphony where Bülow went even further, for he interpolated parts for seven tympani, doubling the successive notes of a melodic phrase. Beethoven [illegible] effect, and it is utterly foreign to the character of his music. Therefore Bülow's impudent editing should be relegated to the museum of musical curiosities. Mr. Damrosch, though he used the passage at the end of the first movement, had not the hardihood to introduce the seven [illegible] against Beethoven.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

An Intimate Memorial Rite—Bruckner's Eighth Symphony Again and to a Prepared and Expectant Audience—A Suggested "Programme"—Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" for Spring Music

The Symphony Concert began yesterday afternoon in the intimacy that befits a long-standing public which has come to know those that minister to its pleasure week by week and year by year, to hold them in individual regard and to miss and to regret them when death or separation takes them away. It so knew the late Frederic Comee, for twenty-three years the assistant manager of the orchestra; and it so understood the untiring and unselfish loyalty with which he had served it. The Symphony Orchestra, at its concerts, has this very year honored the memory of a departed scholar who cultivated the arts, the late Professor Norton, and a departed musician who made music fertile in Boston, the late Mr. Lang. The one was a distinguished figure in the whole community of Boston and of Cambridge; the other had followed the Symphony Concerts from their beginnings a quarter of a century ago. The orchestra paid public tribute to both. Yesterday, when it played the "funeral march" from Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony to the memory of Mr. Comee, it was paying more intimate honor to one who had been of its own ranks, whom it had long known, and whom it lamented sincerely. The audience understood as sensitively and listened as whole-heartedly. Not often, happily, has the Symphony Orchestra had occasion for such intimate rites, but in them and in the mood of the audience toward them was proof of the fine and close tie that has come to bind the public of the concerts to the men that give and direct them. Like all such bonds, it is not a thing to be discussed or to be paraded, but when the rare moment comes to disclose it, as it did yesterday, it is at once clear, firm, touching and significant. The pity of such moments is the lack of diversified and adaptable memorial music. Siegfried's apotheosis in "Götterdämmerung" may serve only for the mighty dead. The funeral march orchestrated from Chopin's sonata is too poignant for memorial dignity. Mozart's "Trauer-Musik" has its place; but the ultimate resort is the slow movement or the whole of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, and they that hear fashion it to the mood that the occasion has stirred in them. Yet there must be other pieces as fitting—the adagios of some of Bruckner's symphonies, for example—if conductors would only seek them out and custom come to hallow them.

Coincidently one of these symphonies, and the one with the most moving adagio of them all, happened to follow the memorial music. Evidently, Mr. Fiedler regards Bruckner's symphony in C minor as the most important new piece of the year, and, following the precedent that Dr. Muck set with novel music by Strauss, Debussy and Bischoff, he willingly complied with requests for a repetition. Six weeks ago, when the conductor and his men played the symphony for the first times, it clearly interested and stirred the audience more deeply than had any other of Bruckner's music, and long as it is, irritating as it is at moments, and disappointing as it is at others, it kindles as eager listening and as responsive feeling yesterday. Thus, at last, and at least with the symphony that is his masterpiece, has Bruckner come into a just esteem here. Mr. Gericke played his symphonies on occasion because they were music that the public of the concerts should know; Dr. Muck played one in each year of his stay because he believed in the underlying beauty of Bruckner's voice and in the unique qualities of his imagination and would lead his hearers into them. Mr. Fiedler, in turn, has played this eighth symphony as one who held it in glowing admiration, who had searched out the secrets of its exaltation and intensity, and who would impart them in like ardor and elevation of spirit. He has accomplished nothing the year through, not even "Ein Heldenleben," with such sustained and diversified power, with such largeness and depth of imagination, with such fineness of feeling and such apt and varied eloquence of impartment. An orchestra like ours may easily attain the glow and the richness or the ethereal and the poignant quality of Bruckner's instrumental coloring. Not every conductor, though his will be the best in the world, can enter as deeply as has Mr. Fiedler into the passionate aspiration and exaltation of spirit in the pure-hearted and simple-minded old man (who was a composer most of all by the grace of God) of which this instrumental coloring is the moving voice.

Moreover, as with every other composer of distinct individuality, familiarity with Bruckner's peculiar idiom only leads to the clearer appreciation of all that it would express and attain, and to the fuller emotional response to it. At a first hearing of any of Bruckner's symphonies, it is easy for the listener to occupy herself overmuch with the mechanics and the methods of the composer—to dwell upon his alternation of ascending and descending progressions, to grow impatient over his halts for mere schoolmaster's counterpoint, to light upon the moments when invention and imagination flags and confusion clouds; to note each reminiscence of Wagner; to pounce upon Bruckner's limitations and shortcomings. There is a like state of mind—Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony nowadays provokes it—when listeners have be-particular piece. Yesterday, with the repetition of Bruckner's symphony in C minor, the audience was at the golden mean. It knew Bruckner's ways sufficiently to be unconcerned about them, and it recalled enough of the beauty and the power, the aspiration and the exaltation of the music to be attuned to emotional response to it. In such mood Bruckner's long and mounting progressions and his surging climaxes lift the hearts of his hearers, as well as the instrumental voices that are achieving them. In such mood the beauty of the adagio becomes as luminous, as ethereal, as celestial as the light that St. John of the Revelation saw streaming from heaven, and the voice of the music is as the voice that said: "And there shall be no more death; neither sorrow nor crying; nor shall there be any more pain." Equally, with an audience so prepared to response, does the ceaseless striving and struggle and choked lament of the first movement and the interval of merely human happiness that the scherzo affords, become part of a large, imaginative and emotional design, that for once Bruckner accomplished, leading into the compassion and peace of the adagio—"and He shall wipe away tears from their eyes"—and into the solemn and triumphal exaltation of the finale. "And I saw the seven angels . . . and to them were given seven trumpets . . . and there were great voices in heaven." Bruckner disclosed no "programme" for any of his symphonies; probably he had none. But he knew and believed in the Book of the Revelation. Ingenious minds have tried to adapt this eighth symphony to the myth of Prometheus. Rather, in the last two movements, it is music of the Apocalypse.

[224]

It is hard to "round off" a concert after such rarefied spirit and ennobled voice, and this time Mr. Fiedler took refuge in a piece that should be all contrast—the "Siegfried Idyl" that Wagner spun a little too lengthily and too tenuously for Cosima's birthday at their villa by Lucerne in the first happiness of their life together. That birthday happened to be Dec. 24, but it is quite possible to hear the piece as music of the spring, wherein by all precedent from Theocritus even to Swinburne all idyls belong. Siegfried's horn blows through the music and its voice surely is of the woods; birds trill as well; there is longing in the piece, and the warmth and the brightness of gentle, eager happiness. It is music of the spring quite as much as the spell of Good Friday or the forest voices of "Sieg[illegible] from it into the [illegible] drops and the break[illegible]uds of a spring rain seemed only the [illegible]table thing. H.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

The End of the Season—The Final Symphony Concerts—A "Debussy Evening" by Mr. Copeland—The Spring Concert of the People's Choral Union

The twenty-fourth and last pair of Symphony Concerts for the year fall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next at Symphony Hall. Two symphonies, moreover, make the programme. The first is Mozart's in D major, No. 35, one of those that are seldom performed nowadays and actually unheard here for nearly twenty-five years. It is short, light and interesting, and it is good to find Mr. Fiedler departing from the Mozartean routine that would limit his symphonies in the modern concert room to the three that he wrote in 1788, almost at the end of his life. They are surely the finest of the many that came from his hand, but they are also the most hackneyed. The other and the major symphony is Beethoven's ninth in D minor—the symphony that ends with a setting of Schiller's "Hymn to Joy," and enlists a solo quartet and a chorus. Rather strangely, nine years have passed since it was performed at a regular pair of Symphony Concerts. Nine years ago, this spring, it made the final item of the final concert in the old Music Hall. Some years later Mr. Gericke put it on the programme of a concert for the Pension Fund of the orchestra. Now, at last, Mr. Fiedler has restored it to the Symphony Concerts proper. Next week the Cecilia will provide the chorus, and in equal force at both concerts, while the four solo singers will be announced soon. In another column an article describes some of the "editing" and amplification that the Choral Symphony, always tempting matter for such experiments, has lately undergone in New York.

The last of the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, for the season, in Cambridge will take place in Sanders Theatre on Thursday evening. Following the precedent that Dr. Muck set last year, Mr. Fiedler has put on the programme a piece by one of the advanced students in the musical department of Harvard, Philip Greeley Clapp's tone-poem, "Norge." The other numbers are Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration;" the prelude to "Lohengrin" and "The Ride of the Valkyrs" from Wagner; and Bruch's third concerto for violin with Mr. Hess to play the solo part.

With the increasing vogue and the wider understanding of Debussy's [illegible]

SUNDAY POST, APRIL 25, 1909

[illegible] Copeland.

For the first time since the Symphony orchestra has played in Symphony Hall, Beethoven's Ninth Symphony will constitute the major part of the orchestral programme, at the last concert of the season 1908-09. This symphony was performed six years ago at a Pension Fund concert. The choruses will be sung by members of the Cecilia Society. The concert will open with a Symphony in D by Mozart, which has been given but once at the Symphony concerts, 23 years ago.

The last of the Symphony concerts in Cambridge will take place next Thursday evening at Sanders Theatre. Mr. Philip Greely Clapp's tone-poem, "Norge," which interested many when played by the Pierian Sodality orchestra last season, will be given its second performance by the Symphony men in accordance with a custom originated by Dr. Muck, to produce at the last Cambridge concert of the season a meritorious work by some member of the music department at Harvard, so "Norge" will be played, if Mr. Clapp is successful in finding the parts which have been lost. Mr. Hess will play Bruch's third violin concerto at this concert, and the remainder of the programme will offer Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," the Prelude to "Lohengrin," and the "Ride of the Valkyries."

The season of Pops this summer will continue two weeks longer than heretofore, and it will introduce a new conductor, Mr. Andre Maquarre, the excellent first flutist of the orchestra. The other conductors will be Gustav Strube and Arthur Kautzenbach.

SUNDAY HERALD, APRIL 25, 1909.

BRUCKNER'S EIGHTH SYMPHONY REPEATED

Frederic R. Comee Is Honored at Orchestra's 23d Concert.

By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, gave its 23d concert last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Funeral march from "Eroica" symphony, Beethoven
Symphony, C minor, No. 8.....Bruckner
"A Siegfried Idyl".....Wagner

The funeral march was played in memory of Frederic R. Comee, who died early on the morning of the 16th. The program book contained the following note:

"Frederic Robbins Comee was assistant manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra for 23 years. The duties and responsibilities constantly increased. His business life was one of infinite and vexing detail. He mastered this detail so that quiet, unostentatious administration was as a second nature to him. In the discharge of his duties he was brought into close relationship with the conductor and members of the orchestra, with audiences in various cities, with merchants, railroad men, inn keepers. This enforced relationship might easily have led to friction. His knowledge of human nature, his amiable disposition, his tolerance, his marked sense of humor turned business acquaintance into friendship, and all that had to do with him respected his ability and were fond of the man himself. He was scrupulously honest, industrious, never discouraged, quick and ready in an emergency, always of good cheer. His pride was in the organization of which he was a valued member. His devotion to the interests of the orchestra was untiring and unselfish. The loyalty that bound him to many friends with hoops of steel distinguished him in his office. His one dominating thought was for the welfare of the Boston Symphony orchestra."

The public tribute of the funeral and memorial march was eminently deserved. It was an eloquent expression of the affection and respect in which Mr. Comee was held by his associates. Composers and public men have thus been honored at concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was a pleasure to see long-continued, faithful and intelligent service recognized in like manner.

Bruckner's titanic symphony was played for the first time in this country by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall the 13th of last month. Last night it was repeated "by request."

The repetition was welcome, and may there be many repetitions in future, for the work is one of the most important that have been produced here in recent years, and it is not extravagant to say that it is one of the great symphonies of the world. The first performance was so recent that it is not now necessary to discuss at length the character of the music. After a second hearing the work seems still more stupendous in its plan, still more noble and beautiful in its lofty thought and expression. There are pages that remind one of the visions seen by John on the isle of Patmos. "And I heard, as it were, the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of mighty thunderings."

There are also pages of ravishing beauty, as those of the trio in the Scherzo, as those devoted to the exposition of the first and second themes of the Adagio, as those of the second theme in the Finale. The Scherzo with rough humor and its episode of rare melodic beauty finely orchestrated, are of this earth, but the other movements leave the earth behind in a sustained and fearless flight. This is especially true of the first movement and the Adagio.

In the finale there is here and there a drooping of the wings, but the opening measures of this finale and the close are towering and exultant. There was no feeling of incongruity when the first measures of the symphony followed immediately Beethoven's sublime march, and there could have been no severer test. The performance of the symphony was masterly, and Mr. Fiedler led as one deeply imbued with the spirit of the composer.

The wonder is that Bruckner, the long ignored, poor, humble school teacher, grotesque in appearance, a peasant in speech and action, should have had apocalyptic visions and spoken musically with the tongues of angels. The sentence with which Dr. Louis, his biographer, sums up Bruckner's career, contains the answer to this question asked of other men: "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven."

The concert might well have closed with the symphony.

The quartet that will assist in the performance of Beethoven's ninth symphony this week is made up of Miss Laura Combs, Mme. Gertrude Stein, Theodore Van Yorx and Myron W. Whitney, Jr.

JOURNAL- APRIL 26, 1909.

Tribute to Comee Paid at Symphony

Tribute to the memory of Frederic R. Comee, assistant manager of the orchestra, was paid at the Symphony concert Saturday night, with a special performance of the funeral march from Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. Just and eloquent tribute was also paid in the program. "His pride," it was said, "was in the organization, of which he was a valued member." It was not until the orchestra poured forth Beethoven's noble lamentation that the realization of the loss the orchestra had met seeemed actual and complete.

After this impressive little memorial service, the orchestra undertook the big work of the night, the performance, by request, of Bruckner's Eighth symphony, which had its first hearing in the United States at the Symphony concert on March 13 last. The symphony is a strange mixture of grandeur and simplicity, of crisp melody and prolix "workings-out." On the whole, it made this time, as before, a profound and favorable impression. Mr. Fiedler was at his best. The other number on the program was Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl."

The quartet of soloists for this week's performance of Beethoven's Ninth symphony has been selected as follows: Soprano, Laura Coombs; contralto, Gertrude May Stein; tenor, Theodore Van-Yorx; bass, Myron W. Whitney, Jr.

TRANSCRIPT, APRIL 26, 1909

The quartet to sing in the performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony, at the Symphony Concerts this week, comprises Mmes. Laura Coombs and Gertrude Stein and Messrs. Theodore van Yorx and Myron Whitney, Jr. Miss Coombs is a new singer to our public; Mme. Stein has sung here often, and as it happens, in the last preceding performance of the Choral Symphony at the Symphony Concerts, nine years ago; Mr. van Yorx took the tenor part in it when it made the chief item in a concert for the Pension Fund in 1904; and Mr. Whitney is measurably familiar by his own recitals here.

JOURNAL- APRIL 27, 1909.

NINTH SYMPHONY QUARTET

The following singers have been selected to be the quartet at the performance of the Beethoven Ninth Symphony in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening: Theodore Van Yorx, tenor; Laura Combs, soprano; Gertrude May Stein-Bailey, contralto, and Myron W. Whitney, Jr., basso.

GLOBE- APRIL 27, 1909.

The following singers have been selected to be the quartet at the prformance of the Beethoven ninth spmphony in Symphony hall Friday afternoon and Saturday evening: Theodore Van Yorx, tenor; Laura Combs, soprano; Gertrude May Stein-Bailey, contralto, and Myron W. Whitney Jr, basso.

[225]

SUNDAY HERALD,
MAY 2, 1909

MUSICAL SEASON OF 1908-09 REVIEWED

Admirable Performances of the Manhattan Opera Company Brilliant Feature—Miss Garden's Comment.

MR. FIEDLER'S SUCCESS AS SYMPHONY LEADER

By PHILIP HALE.

The musical season is supposed to end with the 24th and last concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra. After this concert there may be recitals by belated singers and pianists, pupils' concerts, concerts for charity; but the season is over.

The season of 1908-09 was not one of great brilliance, if the admirable performances of the Manhattan grand opera company, Oscar Hammerstein, director, are left out of consideration. These performances are fresh in the memory, and it is not now necessary to speak again of the operas performed here for the first time, the singers, or the ability of the conductor, Mr. Campanini. Yet it may here be remarked that Miss Garden before sailing for Europe last week whispered to a reporter in New York that she believed the standard of acting in opera had been raised in the last several seasons chiefly through her own instrumentality. She had also made the school in Paris, which had developed some wonderful actors, including Maurice Renaud. Mr. Renaud, like Baptista Minola, is an affable and courteous gentleman, and he can afford to smile at this statement, for he was famous long before Miss Garden was ever on the stage.

The chief features of the last season were certain performances of the Boston Symphony orchestra—those of Remsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," Gretry's three dance pieces, Noren's "Kaleidoscope," Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," Elgar's symphony, Bruckner's symphony No. 8, and there was the production of symphonies by Paderewski and Strube; the concerts of the Flonzaley quartet, the production of "La Vita Nuova" by the Cecilia, the singing of Miss Destinn, Mme. Jomelli, Miss Gerville-Reache, Mme. Blanche Marchesi, Mme. Sembrich, Mrs. Hunt, Mr. Bonci and Dr. Wuellner in concert; the piano playing of Miss Arnaud, Miss Schnitzer, Messrs. Paderewski, Sauer, Gabrilowitsch, Lhevinne, Copeland, Proctor, Gebhard; the violin playing of Mischa Elman; certain performances by the Longy Club, and at Mr. Dolmetsch's concerts. There was curiosity to see and hear Mme. Chaminade, and there were the usual "prima donna" concerts by Mme. Eames and Mme. Nordica. Mme. Melba sang only at one of Mrs. McAllister's musical mornings, and was not in good vocal condition.

Mr. Fiedler, who succeeded Dr. Muck as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at once made friends as a conductor and as a man. He succeeded in pleasing the audience by his programs. The concerts as a rule have been interesting and there have been some performances of unusual excellence. There have been other performances that suffered from prosaic interpretation or from extravagance in tempi—as in the first movement of Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony—or in dynamic force. Mr. Fiedler has been more fortunate in his reading of the works of the modern German school than in those of the French composers and of Beethoven and Wagner. The orchestra lost a valuable 'cellist in the death of Eric Loeffler. The management and the public will long mourn the death of Frederic R. Comee.

There were many chamber concerts—too many for all of them to be heard by large audiences. The most interesting, beyond doubt and peradventure, for exquisite ensemble, wonderful euphony and poetic spirit were the three given by the Flonzaley quartet Jan. 7, Feb. 4, March 18. The programs of the Kneisel Quartet were not so interesting as in former seasons. The concerts were given in Fenway Court Nov. 10 (with the assistance of Courtland Palmer, pianist), Dec. 8 (Mr. Foote pianist), Jan. 5 (Mr. Gabrilowitsch pianist), Feb. 16 (Mr. Consolo pianist), March 16 (Mme. Goodson pianist). The Hess-Schroeder Quartet brought out one or two entertaining works. The concerts were given on Nov. 17, Dec. 22 (Mr. Schelling pianist), Jan. 19 (The Hoffmann Quartet assisting), March 26 (Mr. Gebhard pianist), and April 13 (Mr. Fiedler pianist). The Longy Club gave its concerts Nov. 23 (Mr. Fiedler, conductor, assisting), Dec. 21 (Mme. Sundelius soprano, Mr. Fox flute), Feb. 8 (Mr. Loeffler viola), Mr. Gebhard pianist, Mr. Kloepfel trumpet). The Hoffmann Quartet gave its concerts Nov. 16 (Mr. Anthony pianist), Dec. 14 (Mr. Platt pianist), Feb. 3 (Mr. Spry pianist). The Czerwonky Quartet gave concerts Dec. 9, Feb. 10 (Mr. Fox pianist, April 14 (Mr. Gebhard pianist). Mr. Dolmetsch gave concerts of ancient music Dec. 28, Feb. 9, March 10. The Adamowski Trio gave a concert for the Chopin monument at Warsaw Feb. 22.

Of the pianists, the following played here for the first time: Miss Adele Verne, Oct. 24, a woman of considerable mechanical proficiency, but with little charm; Mme. Chaminade, Dec. 12, who Chaminaded in an agreeable and soothing manner; Miss Germaine Arnaud, who made her first appearance at a Symphony concert Jan. 23 and played most brilliantly and delightfully—she afterward was heard in recital and confirmed the marked impression already made; Miss Edith Altemus, March 19, a pianist of very moderate ability.

The genius of Mr. Elman was fully revealed at his first appearance with the Symphony orchestra, also at his first recital, Jan. 12. At his later recitals, Feb. 1, March 20, he showed the results of overwork. Mr. Hartmann gave a recital Oct. 26 and should have had a larger audience, but he has little magnetic force. Mr. Spalding made his first appearance in Boston Jan. 4, and was probably not in condition, for his intonation was often impure. Mr. Czerwonky gave three or four recitals.

The Handel and Haydn Society gave two performances of "The Messiah" Dec. 20-21, one of "Elijah," Feb. 7, and one of Gounod's "Redemption," April 11. The society lost by death the faithful services of Mr. Daniels, its president.

The Cecilia gave a performance of Parker's "Legend of St. Christopher Dec. 9, a miscellaneous concert, Feb. 2, and it produced "La Vita Nuova," which is noted in the list of new works printed later. The Cecilia assisted in the performance of the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven.

The Apollo Club celebrated its 200th concert by engaging Miss Farrar as a soloist. Its season was a prosperous one.

The People's Choral Union gave concerts Jan. 17 (Jordan's "Barbara Frietchie" and Gade's "Crusaders," and April 25 (Gounod's "St. Cecilia" mass, and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise." Mr. Wodell was the conductor.

The Boston Singing Club gave two concerts.

Mr. Debuchy gave an orchestral concert in Symphony Hall with Mme. Calve as soloist Nov. 17. No orchestra visited the city. It is said that the Theodore Thomas orchestra of Chicago will give a concert in Boston next season. There were concerts by visiting bands.

Mme. Sembrich gave her annual recital; a farewell—but dry the starting tear! not a farewell forever, oh, no—Nov. 6. Mme. Melba was heard at one of Mrs. McAllister's concerts Dec. 29. Miss Farrar gave a concert here with orchestra Jan. 22, and showed that she has much to learn in purely lyric interpretation. Mme. Eames and Mr. de Gogorza gave a concert together Feb. 19, and even now their joint appearance has a sentimental interest. Mme. Nordica gave a concert on March 13 and sang in her customary concert manner, with heartiness, if not with aesthetic discrimination. Other recitals were given by Mr. Hamlin, Oct. 13; Mr. Meyn, Dec. 10; Mr. de Gogorza, Miss Anita Davis, Jan. 13; Mr. Townsend, whose concert with orchestra was one of unusual interest, Jan. 14; Miss Mary E. Williams, Feb. 4; Miss Clara Sexton, Feb. 23; Mrs. Hunt, March 1; Miss Bullard, March 23; Miss Katherine Lincoln, March 27; Mr. Elwes, an English tenor, with a voice that is not inherently emotional, sang on March 27 with considerable art.

Mme. Blanche Marchesi on Feb. 4 gave a recital that will long be remembered for fine and expressive diction and for the artistic use of a voice that is naturally without sensuous quality.

Dr. Wuellner's recitals, Nov. 16, Dec. 17, Jan. 28, 30, were distinguished by the dramatic intensity and the intellectual power of the interpreter. In purely lyrical measures, his lack of true vocal art was apparent. The accompaniments played for him by Mr. Bos should not pass unnoticed.

An event of the season was the sudden death of Mr. B. J. Lang, whose musical versatility, natural tact and shrewdness, indomitable energy, courage and enthusiasm had much to do with shaping the history of music in Boston and directing and raising the musical taste of the public.

This list does not pretend to be a complete one, and the list of first appearances and works performed here for the first time is doubtless incomplete. The abbreviations are as follows: B. S. O., Boston Symphony Orchestra; F., Flonzaley; K., Kneisel; H. S., Hess-Schroeder; L., Longy; H. & H., Handel and Haydn.

1908—Oct. 10. Max Fiedler conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.
Oct. 17. Sauer's piano concerto No. 1. The pianist was the composer.
Oct. 19. Adeline Genee, dancer, at the Colonial in a vulgar piece. "The Soul Kiss."
Oct. 24. Adele Verne of London, pianist.
Oct. 24. MacDowell's "Lamia" (B. S. O.) First performance anywhere.
Nov. 9. Harry Lauder at the Orpheum.
Nov. 9. Apollo Club gave its 200th concert.
Nov. 10. Courtland Palmer's piano quintet. Mr. Palmer, pianist. (K.)
Nov. 13. Chadwick. Theme variations and fugue for organ and orchestra. New England Conservatory of Music.
Nov. 14. Three dance pieces from Gretry's "Cephalus and Procris," arranged by Mottl. Mme. Marie Rappold, soprano. (B. S. O.)
Nov. 16. Dr. Ludwig Wuellner, interpreter of songs.
Nov. 16. Reger. Sonata in C for violin and piano. (H.) Messrs. Hoffmann and Anthony.
Nov. 17. Reger, overture to "Sigurd"; Erlanger, spinning chorus from "Kermaria"; Bruneau, suite from "L'Attaque du Moulin." (Debuchy's concert.)
Nov. 21. Sibelius, "Song of Spring" and "Finland." (B. S. O.)
Nov. 23. Falconi, sextet for piano and wind instruments (L.)
Nov. 24. William Wolstenholme, organist, of London.
Nov. 27. Isadora Duncan, dancer, in Jordan Hall.
Dec. 8. Grieg, allegro and scherzo from unfinished quartet; Foote, piano trio, B flat major, No. 2 (K.)
Dec. 9. Pogojeff, quartettino, op. 5; Kaun, quartet, C minor (C.)
Dec. 10. Reger, variations on a theme by Bach for piano. Mr. Anthony.
Dec. 12. Noren, kaleidoscope for orchestra. Emmy Destinn, soprano. (B. S. O.)
Dec. 12. Cecile Chaminade, pianist and composer, in Symphony Hall.
Dec. 14. Isadora Duncan danced Beethoven's 7th symphony in Symphony Hall.
Dec. 14. Lina Cavalieri, soprano; Tina Lerner, pianist. (Mrs. McAllister's concert.)
Dec. 20. Mrs. Caroline Mihr-Hardy, soprano (H. & H.)
Dec. 21. Woollett, suite for piano and wind instruments (L.)
Dec. 22. Schillings, andante and scherzo from quartet in E minor. Juon, trio caprice, op. 39 (H. S.)
1909—Jan. 3. Mischa Elman, violinist. (B. S. O.)
Jan. 4. Albert Spalding, violinist.
Jan. 7. Leclair sonata for two violins and cello, op. 4, No. 1. (F.)
Jan. 14. Perilhou fantasia for piano, organ and orchestra. Miss Hawkins, pianist. Hill, E. B., "Song and Music." (Mr. Townsend's concert).
Jan. 16. Schillings, "Harvest Festival," from "Moloch." (B. S. O.)
Jan. 19 Sinigaglia, serenade, op. 33. (H. S.)
Jan. 23. Scheinpflug, overture to a comedy of Shakespeare. Germaine Arnaud, French pianist. (B. S. O.)
Feb. 2. Alexander Kubitzky, Russian tenor, at a Cecilia concert.
Feb. 3. Tartini, sonata a quattro, D major. (H.)
Feb. 4. Dohnanyi, quartet op. 15. (F.)
Feb. 7. Mme. Jeanne Jomelli, soprano. (H. & H.)
Feb. 8. Enesco symphony for wind instruments. (L.)
Feb. 9. Mr. Bonci, tenor, first time in concert; Marianne Flahaut, contralto, first time. Symphony Hall.
Feb. 10. Tanieff, quartet No. 6. (C.)
Feb. 13. Paderewski's symphony in B minor. First performance. (B. S. O.)
Feb. 16. Grieg, third and fourth movements of posthumous quartet. (K.) Ernesto Consolo, pianist, of Chicago. (K.)
Feb. 27. Elgar, symphony in A flat major. (B. S. O.)
Feb. 28. Schillings, music to Wildenbruch's poem, "Das Hexenlied." Dr. Wuellner, reciter. Pension fund concert.
March 5. Chamber music by H. Woollett. Sonata for flute and piano, Danses Paiennes, etc. Mrs. R. J. Hull's concert.
March 6. Berta Morena. First time in concert. (B. S. O.)
March 11. American String quartet (female).
March 13. Bruckner, Symphony No. 8. Graedener, 'cello concerto. (B. S. O.)
March 16. Philippine Constabulary band.
March 18. Boccherini, quartet A major, op. 33, No. 6. (F.)
March 19. Miss Ethel Altemus, pianist, first time. Glen Hall, tenor, first time in recital.
March 25. Wolf-Ferrari's "La Vita Nuova." Cecilia Society.
March 26. Reger, four movements from suite op. 103 A. for violin and piano. (H. S.)
March 27. Gervase Elwes, English tenor, in Steinert Hall. Maquarre, overture, "On the Sea Cliffs." (B. S. O.)
March 29. Emma Tetrazzini, Mr. Polese (Ashton), in "Lucia." Mr. Hammerstein's first production in Boston.
March 30. Massenet's "Thais." (Mary Garden, M. Renaud, Mr. Valles, Miss Trentini). First performance here.
March 30. Concert of J. Howard Richardson's compositions.
March 31. Mme. Tetrazzini, Mr. Sammarco (Germont), in "La Traviata."
April 1. Debussy's "Pelleas and Melisande." (Miss Garden, Dalmores, Dufranne, Miss Gerville-Reache, Vieuille, Crabbe). First performance here.
April 2. Offenbach's "Tales of Hoffmann." (Miss Zeppilli, Mme. Doria). First performance here.
April 3. Maria Labia in Puccini's "La Boheme."
April 3. Mme. Agostinelli (Aida), Mr. Zenatello (Radmes), Miss Gerville-Reache and Mr. Sammarco in "Aida."
April 3. Strube's symphony in B minor. (B. S. O.)
April 5. Charpentier's "Louise." First performance here. (Miss Garden; Mme. Doria, Messrs. Dalmores, Gilibert.)
April 6. Mme. Tetrazzini and Maurice Renaud, in "Rigoletto."
April 8. Miss Gerville-Reache in Massenet's "A Navarraise." Mr. Zenatello as Canio in "Pagliacci." Taccani tenor in "La Traviata."
April 9. Massenet's "Our Lady's Juggler." First performance here. (Miss Garden, Messrs. Gilibert, Dufranne, Crabbe, Valles, De Segurola, Veuille.)
April 10. Glazounoff, "Spring," op. 34 (B. S. O.)
April 13. Fiedler, sonata for 'cello and piano. (H. S.)
April 13. Lazzari, movement from violin and piano sonata. Miss Collier and Mr. Anthony.
April 15. Albany Ritchie, violinist.
April 17. Foote, suite in E major for strings, op. 63. First performance. (B. S. O.)
April 27. Glazounoff's theme and variations for piano. Miss Edith W. Bly, pianist.
May 1. Miss Laura Combs, soprano, in Beethoven's 9th symphony.

The Pops.

Tomorrow night brings the first of the "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall. For seven months Symphony Hall has been devoted to music in its higher and severer aspects, but with the last notes of Beethoven's ninth symphony last night the season proper came to an end and the graceful tunes of the men who have written waltzes, marches, and the like will be heard. Only rag-time is tabooed.

It will be the 24th season of these concerts. The first were given in the spring of 1885 and with the exception of one year they have been given every spring since. They are as peculiarly a Boston institution as is the sacred codfish. Other cities have tried them, only to meet with killing frosts. For over 30 years, since Theodore Thomas gave such concerts in the old Central Park Garden New York has tried vainly to have popular summer concerts by a good orchestra. Boston has never faltered in its loyalty to the "Pops." When they were first given in Symphony Hall there was a great decrease in patronage, for then Symphony Hall was deemed almost inaccessible. But the patronage has steadily grown until it is now practically as large as it was in the old Music Hall.

This year the Pops will be conducted along the same lines as in the past. To many of the patrons it will seem strange not to see Mr. Comee about the hall, for since the concerts have been in Symphony Hall he had practically entire charge of them, and his death will leave a gap not easy to fill. The season will be longer than usual, for it will run from next Monday night to Saturday night, July 3, or nine weeks. The usual season has been eight weeks, and last year, owing to the convention of women's clubs, it was reduced to seven.

In the nine weeks the orchestra, which will consist, as usual, of 55 men from the Symphony orchestra, will be under the direction of Gustav Strube, Arthur Kautzenbach and Andre Maquarre. Mr. Strube is a favorite with Pop audiences. He knows their ways and what they like and, in addition to these qualities, he is an excellent conductor. Mr. Kautzenbach conducted last season for the first time. He is one of the 'cellists of the orchestra, and in the three weeks when he was the head of the band his youth and enthusiasm appealed to all. Mr. Maquarre has never conducted at these concerts. He is the first flute of the orchestra, and one of the most talented musicians in its ranks.

There will be some special nights, all of which have not yet been arranged. "Tech" night this year will be one of more than ordinary glory, for this spring, the new president of the institute is to be installed in office and an unusual number of alumni will be present. Harvard night will come as usual toward the end of the season and there will doubtless be a Dartmouth night on the eve of the Harvard-Dartmouth ball game. In the past few years the conductors have discovered that the public takes kindly to special musical nights, such as a night when the major part of the programe is devoted to music by Wagner, Tschaikowsky and writers of lighter music. These will be given from time to time. As in years past light refreshments, including beer and light wines, may be had during the concerts. The prices will be the same as in the past. There will be a limited number of tables outside of the enclosure on the floors.

The concerts will begin at 8 o'clock and last until 11. The program for the opening night is as follows:

March Militaire (first time).....Schubert
Overture, "Sakuntala" .....Goldmark
Menuet (first time) .....Lully
Waltz, "Buergerweisen" (first time)...Strauss
Selection, "Pagliacci" .....Leoncavallo
"A Fairy Tale," for string orchestra and harp (first time).....Strube
Indian Dance from Suite No. 2.....MacDowell
Overture, "Le Baruffe Chiozotte" (first time) .....Sinigaglia
Overture, "The Bronze Horse".....Auber
Selection, "Little Nemo" (first time)...Herbert Dollar waltz (first time).....Fall
March, "Nechledil" .....Lehar

SUNDAY GLOBE
MAY 2, 1909.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Last of the Season's Symphony Concerts.

Interesting Program for the Opening of the "Pops."

Contest by College Glee Clubs---Gossip.

The 28th season of the Boston symphony orchestra closed last evening, Mr Fiedler's final program containing only two numbers, Mozart's D major symphony and Beethoven's immortal ninth. In the latter the orchestra was assisted by the chorus of the Cecilia society and the following soloists: Miss Laura Coombs soprano, Mme Gertrude May Stein contralto, Mr Theodore van Yorx tenor, and Mr Myron W. Whitney Jr baritone. Miss Coombs appeared for the first time here. Mme Stein, in 1899 and 1900, and Messrs Yorx and Whitney, in 1904, sang the Beethoven score with the orchestra.

Mozart's dainty work may sound trivial to the ultra modern musician, but its melodic beauties, its directness of purpose and its simplicity entitles it to more frequent performance than seems to be its fate. In the opening allegro movement the principal theme is disclosed at once by the violins, and then without cross harmonics to interrupt this motif is developed regularly, the joyous mood being retained through all the upbuilding.

How well Mozart understood the violin, and how fond he was of its utterances continues to be shown in the cantabel form of the second part, and also in the succeeding menuetto. The first, a charming little song, which the violins gave with exquisite effect; the latter a bit more playful in style, given with prominent assistance in the wood winds, and closing with the humorous and abrupt group of staccato notes. The bright finale again brought the violins to the fore in long, sustained figurations in the upper register, played with clarity, rapidity and unanimity of execution that displayed the high order of their ensemble work.

Beethoven's choral symphony is the last of his immortal group and the most difficult of performance. The vocal finale for quartet and chorus is so tremendously difficult that it is frequently omitted and only the three instrumental parts performed at a concert. To some people the finale is wearisome, to others it is a masterpiece, that is if well sung. Then there is a divergence of opinions about portions of the score, and there have been many revisions made by musical experts, who have changed the instrumentation when they thought it could be improved, the resources of the modern orchestra justifying this "vandalism" when done judiciously. Mr Fiedler has made a few changes that he considered proper, mainly in some fortissimo passages in the first movement and later in some of the brass parts, to make the measures more sonorus.

An Enthusiastic Audience.

The audience was very liberal in applause, Mr Fiedler being greeted with unusual warmth, which shows that his good work here is appreciated. And he gave a lucid and stirring reading of the great symphony, this marvellous combination of the tenderest emotions, grand climaxes and tonal grandeur.

The complex themes, some eight in number, the big crescendos of the full orchestra, the opposing parts which finally harmonize and the suggestion of melancholy that runs through the first section were potently expressed. And the peculiar drum beats were not made unnecessarily vigorous.

The oddly syncopated rhythms in the scherzo were splendidly "dotted" by the violins, a musical bit which Sullivan copied in the conjurer's song in "The Sorcerer." The wind instruments deserve mention for the manner the second theme was intoned. The horns did nobly in the subsequent theme and the finale went as merrily as need be.

Very beautiful was the whole performance of the adagio, a picture of serenity, a hymn of joy and peace. The first theme was played delightfully by the strings and interluding horns and clarinets. The lesser theme also was adequately set forth by the second violins and other groups.

The choral movement enters with vehemence, a controversy taking place between all the instruments, ending with a titanic outburst, all of which was duly emphasized by Mr Fiedler.

The Choral Finale.

Mr Whitney, who had to make his vocal entrance after the instrumental fusilade, delivered his recitative with good effect, which is difficult to do under the conditions imposed upon the baritone. Miss Coombs has a sweet, high soprano, and carried her part in the quartet well. Mme Stein, the excellent contralto, and Mr Yorx, who is a pleasing tenor, were individually satisfactory. Mr Whitney's fine baritone completed a good quartet which managed to accomplish good results in a formidable task.

On account of the strength of the third movement the choral finale comes as a sort of anti-climax unless there is a large body of singers to make it impressive. The hundred or more from the Cecilia society responded admirably to all demands and were able to cope quite successfully with the sirenous association of the orchestral forces. But the quartet, chorus and orchestra [illegible] admirable unity.

In the past season 36 selections have been played, Wagner leading with 15, Beethoven coming next with nine and Schubert R. Straus and Tschaikowsky credited with six each. Eleven works were performed for the first time in America and 16 had their first local performance.

The soloists numbered 18, of which six were pianists and seven vocalists. Messrs Hess and Warnke, if the orchestra were among the number, and Messrs Strube and Maquarre were represented on the program as composers, the first by a symphony, which he conducted, the second by an overture. Conductor Fiedler played piano accompaniments for the vocalists, Mmes Rappold, Destinn and Morena, and the eighth Bruckner symphony was repeated by request. The 29th season will open with the rehearsal Friday afternoon, Oct 8.

"Pop" Concerts in Symphony Hall Begin Tomorrow Evening.

Tomorrow night brings the first of the "Pop" concerts, and whatever the weather may be, warm or cold, this is accepted as a final sign that we are on the edge of summer. For seven months Symphony hall has been devoted to music in its higher and severer aspects, but with the last notes of Beethoven's ninth symphony last night the season proper came to an end and in place of the tonal riddles of the moderns will be heard the graceful tunes of the men who have written waltzes, marches and the like, for only rag-time is tabooed.

It will be the 24th season of these concerts, which are popular in fact as well as in name. The first were given in old Music hall in the spring of 1885 and with the exception of one year they have been continued every spring since then.

To many of the patrons it will seem strange not to see Mr Comee about during the concerts, for since they were moved uptown he had practically entire charge of them and his unexpected death will leave a gap not easy to fill. The season will run from next Monday night to Saturday night, July 3, or nine weeks.

It has been generally the custom to have more than one conductor during a season and that will be followed this year. The 55 men from the Symphony orchestra will be under the direction of Gustav Strube, Arthur Kautzenbach and Andre Maquarre. Mr Strube, who begins the season tomorrow evening, is an old-time favorite with "Pop" audiences.

Mr Kautzenbach took the baton last season for the first time. He is one of the 'cellists of the orchestra, and in the three weeks when he was the head of the band he became very popular. Mr Maquarre has never conducted at these concerts. He is the first flute of the orchestra. Like Mr Strube he is a composer of great promise, who this year had a work on a Symphony program.

As usual there will be special nights. "Tech" night this year will be one or more than ordinary glory, for this spring the new president of the institute is to be inducted into office, and an unusual number of alumni will be present to help in the celebration. Harvard night will come as usual toward the end of the season, and there will doubtless be a Dartmouth night on the eve of the Harvard-Dartmouth ball game.

As in years past light refreshments, including beers and light wines, may be had during the concerts, and the prices will be the same as in the past, 25 cents admission, 50 cents reserved seats in the balcony, and 75 cents reserved seats at tables on the floor within the enclosure. There will be a limited number of tables outside of the enclosure on the floor, which the admission price allows one to occupy. The concerts will begin at 8 and last until 11 o'clock.

The program tomorrow evening is as follows:

Marche Militaire.....Schubert
(First time.)
Overture, Sakuntala.....Goldmark
Menuet.....Lully
(First time.)
Waltz, Burgerweisen.....Strauss
(First time.)
Selection, I Pagliacci.....Leoncavallo
A Fairy Tale, for string orchestra and harp.....Strube
(First time.)
Indian Dance from suite No. 2.....MacDowell
Overture, Le Baruffe Chiozzotte.....Sinigaglia
Overture, The Bronze Horse.....Auber
Selection, Little Nemo.....Herbert
(First time.)
Dollar-Waltz.....Fall
(First time.)
March, Nechledil.....Lehar

SUNDAY HERALD.
MAY 2, 1909.

SYMPHONY'S LAST CONCERT OF SEASON

Beethoven's Gigantic Ninth Given with Aid of the Cecilia Chorus, Whose Singing Is Feature of the Finale.

UNFAMILIAR WORK BY MOZART REVIVED

By PHILIP HALE.

The 24th and last concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The orchestra was assisted by the chorus of the Cecilia Society and by Miss Laura Combs, soprano; Mme. Stein, contralto; Thedore Van Yorx, tenor, and Myron W. Whitney, Jr., baritone. The program was as follows:

Symphony in D major (K. 385)....Mozart
Symphony in D minor, No. 9....Beethoven

The symphony by Mozart had not been played here since 1885. It was written originally in serenade form, with a march and a second minuet, which were afterwards cut out, for some festivity at the house of Hafner, merchant and burgomaster at Salzburg. Mozart had already composed a serenade for wedding at this house. When he wrote the symphony at his father's request, he was living in Vienna, busied with the first performances of an opera and with his courtship of Constanze Weber. He wrote the symphony in great haste, and sent the movements as he completed them to his father. When Mozart received the work for performance at one of his own concerts in Vienna, he was surprised to find the music as good as it was.

The music is in turn lively and pretty. There are hints, both in melodic line and in harmonic and orchestral color, of passages in "The Marriage of Figaro," which was produced three years later. The symphony would be still more effective were it to be played by a small orchestra in a small hall.

Much has been written about the Ninth Symphony, a symphony that has been and is a stumbling block to certain conductors and hearers. It is easy to smile at such books as "Le Livre de la Genese la IX. Symphonie de Beethoven" by Ricciotto Canudo, with its fantastical theories and titles given to the leading themes, but the comments of more ordinary mortals have led conductors into singular experiments. Some have rewritten passages. Some, fearing the inherent difficulties in the finale, have transposed this finale a tone lower. There are hearers who, knowing the theory of Wagner—that the Ninth Symphony was the logical end of purely instrumental music and Beethoven introduced singers in the finale to show his impatience with the orchestra as a medium of full expression—look on the symphony as a polemical work, and in turn decry all absolute music written after Beethoven's death.

We know, however, that while Beethoven was at work on the symphony, he was meditating another. One with a purely instrumental finale was for the Philharmonic Society of London. The other with the introduction of a chorus at the end was to be entitled, the "German" Symphony. We also know that the idea of introducing a chorus in the ninth came to him only after he had begun composition, for there are sketches of a purely instrumental finale made in 1823, although Schiller's "Ode to Joy," which furnished the text for this finale as it stands, tempted him to music as early as 1792.

On the other hand Beethoven in a notebook containing a few sketches for the 10th symphony wrote: "This symphony could be characterized by the entrance of voices in the finale, or even earlier in the Adagio." Is it not probable that Beethoven simply wished to use all possible resources in the expression of his thoughts?

The music remains, in spite of the commentators and the too anxious conductors. The instrumental movements are among the proudest achievements of man. Mr. Canudo may begin his "explanation" of the opening Allegro by saying: "In the beginning was space; and all possibilities were in space; and life was space"; he may find in a certain page the "religious affirmation of Creation"; he may entitle the first theme of the Adagio "The rhythm of the blessed cosmic night" and thus take his pleasure.

The music of the first three movements is not the less sublime or beautiful because it has no program, because it has no text for singers. With the exception of a few stupendous passages in the finale, where Beethoven is among the stars, the finale falls below the movements that precede it. The "theme of Joy" is not in itself one of Beethoven's most fortunate inventions, and there are pages both for singers and for orchestra that disconcert even if they do not seem to the hearer abnormal and impotent. The answer made by some is that if an ideal performance could be attained the grandeur of the thought would then be overwhelming. Unfortunately, human voices have their limitations.

Yet, if the first three movements are performed alone, there is a sense of incompleteness. If the finale is transposed, the effect is diminished. And so, the ninth symphony as a whole is still a stumbling block to many.

The performance last night of the first movement was impressive, and the passion of the composer found in Mr. Fiedler a sympathetic interpreter. The rhythm of the scherzo was strongly marked and there were many fine dynamic contrasts. It was a pity that the drums lacked tone. There was [illegible] mous passages. The adagio is music incomparable by reason of its deep emotion and supernatural beauty. It might have been played with more poetic feeling, in a more imaginative spirit, and at the same time with more finesse.

The difficulties attending a performance of the finale are so great that any hearer acquainted with them and having a practical knowledge of what singers can and cannot do is always charitable and ready to praise the endeavor. The Cecilia Chorus, which, I am told, was prepared for this concert by its conductor, Mr. Wallace Goodrich, did admirable work, and its singing was the feature of the finale. The solo and quartet music has been sung here more effectively than it was last night. Even when the quartet is composed of extraordinary singers, there are measures which suggest only a wild scramble.

Thus ended the 28th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra and the first season with Mr. Fiedler as conductor. The audience welcomed Mr. Fiedler most heartily, and, in the course of the concert, gave many demonstrations of the respect and the affection in which it holds him.

The first concert of the 29th season, Mr. Fiedler conductor, will take place on Saturday evening, Oct. 9.

GLOBE-
MAY 4, 1909.

"POP" SEASON OPENS

Symphony Hall Filled at First Concert.

Conductor Strube Presents New Numbers and His Own Work.

Before an audience from which the habitues of former years were almost conspicuously absent—though practically every table on the floor was taken, the balconies were well filled, and a large section of Boston society was in evidence—Gustav Strube conducted the first "Pop" concert of the season last night in Symphony hall. Merely as a matter of record, it was the 24th season of these concerts, which began in Music hall so long ago that they followed in their first year a series of prize fights.

The fashions in Pops have slowly changed during the years; whereas day clothes and informality once prevailed, the concerts are now rather dressy; whereas it once was smart to go for the opening night invariably, it is now smarter to cut the first night and go on the second; only a few years back a table for the season was necessary to mark one as really taking an interest in life; now one takes chances of getting a table on the night when a program happens to please him.

The opening program contained six numbers marked "first time," though these included a military march by Schubert, sufficiently well known elsewhere if not in the Pops, and a sweet and simple minuet by Lully, which is also not unknown—to say nothing of selections from "Little Nemo." However, the audience didn't mind the "first time" numbers, and except that it did really give respectful attention to Mr Strube's own composition, got along with its conservation and orders to the waiters quite as well as though Handel's "Largo" were being played—or for that matter as though the orchestra was outside.

erhaps the only criticism of the program in an adverse way was that it was a trifle heavy. It began with the Schubert march, brilliantly played; then came Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, which is not exactly frothy; then the Lully minuet, exceedingly graceful, and the barcarolle from the "Contes d'Hoffmann," for an encore number, the first section ended with a first-time, typical Strauss waltz called "Buergerweisen," which is fairly sure to become very popular.

"I Pagliacci," in selections, started off the middle part of the program. Then came Mr Strube's composition, "A Fairy Tale," for string orchestra and harp, played for the first time. It is an imaginative bit, exquisitely scored, and carrying the characteristics of folk-lore music. Its theme, in a minor key, carries through like the refrain of some of the older French tales, but the princess is rescued at last by a brilliant hero, flashing in major runs, and the story ends in piercing sweetness, high in air. Obliged to play an encore to this number also, Mr Strube handed out another "popular favorite," "Loin du Bal," which was listened to with all the old-time fervor.

The highly colored Indian dance from MacDowell's orchestral suite No. 2, and another first-time number, Sinigaglia's "Le Baruffe Chiozzote," finished the second part of the evening. And here developed another change of the fleeting years.

Time was when it was the universal custom to leave the tables at the second intermission and promenade through the corridors. It was as much a part of the program as ordering refreshments. The tables were deserted, and he or she who ventured to remain seated became unduly prominent. This year the promenaders were almost a minority.

Auber's "Bronze Horse,"—or as a New Yorker present called it, "The Bronx Horse"—some first-time selections from "Little Nemo" that set the audience whistling, a first time waltz called the "Dollar Waltz"—though it wasn't longer than half a dollar—and Lehar's "Nechledil" march, sent the people home.

Tonight is another mixed program, some of the features being Thomas' "Raymond" overture, the "Peer Gynt" suite, "Carmen" selections, a first-time overture called "Hunyady Laszlo," and selections from "Aida."

JOURNAL-
MAY 4, 1909.

FIRST POPS' NIGHT IS GREAT SUCCESS

Music, Refreshments and Merriment Hold Sway at Symphony Hall.

MUSIC RUNS GAMUT FROM GRAVE TO GAY

Strube Establishes New "First Time Record" With Program That Delights Audience.

It ought to be enough simply to say that the Pops began last night.

Symphony Hall was crowded, and there was good music—and beer—labeled Boston, New York and Vienna.

This is the twenty-fourth season of these musical and other "light refreshments." The start was actually made twenty-five years ago, but there was a jump of one season some years since; still, as it is, the record of the Pops is unequaled in the land.

A Schubertian novelty, a "Marche Militaire," opened the concert. Goldmark's rich and rare "Sakuntala" overture followed. Then came the first of the season's dances and the second of the novelties, a minuet by Lully. Of course "Waltz King" Strauss could not long be put off, and he took fourth place on the program, offering something new called "Burgerweisen."

By this time the Pop patrons were present in full numbers, with many an indescribable gown and unspeakable hat; the encore spirit was bubbling high; the smoke of Havanas and Key Wests and Connecticut River Valleys was rising thick and fast; and the men with white aprons were scurrying around among the little round tables with trays fraught with everything drinkable, except milk and Cochituate. Then were the Pops in full swing.

Sinigaglia, the writer of beautiful chamber music, was represented by an overture, which came after a bit of "I Pagliacci," Strube's "Fairy Tale," and the blood-curdling MacDowell "Indian Dance." Auber's "Bronze Horse" was the third overture and ninth regular number. Some of Victor Herbert's best music from "Little Nemo" was agreeably familiar, though marked "first time." Fall's "Dollar Waltz" was the seventh and last novelty, and then the "Pepsters" were reminded of home and mother, and the 11 o'clock hour by the No. 12—the good night sign—which brought a march by Lehar, of "Merry Widow" fame and fortune.

The Pops remain unique, serving the best of "light refreshments" for soul and body. They will run on every night, except Sunday, until July 3. Tonight's program includes, for the first time, a popular selection from "Carmen," by Bizet, and on the program, also, is another new Strauss waltz.

[227]

HERALD,

MAY 4, 1909.

"POP" SEASON OPENS IN SYMPHONY HALL

Brilliant Throng Gathers and Listens to Splendid Program by Orchestra Directed by Conductor Strube.

With traditional but ever pleasing ceremonial, the annual dedication of Symphony Hall as the temple of the "pops" took place last night—and the temple was thronged with the faithful.

Clouds of incense ascended in honor or My Lady Nicotine; there were copious libations to old Gambrinus and Bacchus was not forgotten by his devotees, yet all this worship was decorous. For, though the followers of these minor deities that rule the fane along with music during the jocund spring of the year were full of zest in the performance of the rites, their hilarity was held within those proper bounds that befit the Boston of the Puritans. There was no sight nor sound of the descendants of Morton of Merrymount and his giddy crew.

Gustav Strube conducted the orchestra; the musicians did their part in the festivities with their accustomed zeal, and the program was just what is expected at the "Pops."

Of these there was one feature of the dedication that was strikingly new, it pertained to the feminine portion of the big assemblage and particularly to the headgear thereon. The hat vintage of early 1909 was conspicuously in evidence. Viewed from the balconies the main floor of the house looked as if many natural history museums, conservatories and kitchen gardens had been caught up by a whirlwind and blown into the place in variegated wreck. Apples, tomatoes, orchids and birds of gay plumage were mixed in brilliant confusion.

There were inverted flowerpots and baskets in bewildering array, while sprinkled here and there were gorgeously decorated coal scuttles. Not a few of the hats, too, were of those generous proportions that require classification on the Swiss railroads as wheels and make payment as bicycle freight necessary.

Spring gowns were on view also, and there was much craning of necks and buzzing of comment as the more striking or beautiful ones moved down the aisles and among the gorgeous hats. One sheath gown arrived late and created a mild sensation. It and its wearer were the cynosure of thousands of eyes, both masculine and feminine.

On the program there were seven pieces that were labelled "first time." That is, they had not been played at the "Pops" before. They were Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala," which was received with storms of deserved applause; a dainty, tuneful minuet by Lully; Strauss' "Buergerweiser" waltz; a "Fairy Tale" for strings and harp by Mr. Strube, which was so tinged with the melancholy of the minor key that one felt that these fairies must have caught the grip by being out on recent cold and rainy nights; Sinigaglia's overture to "Le Baruffe Chiozzotte"; selections from "Little Nemo," and Fall's "Dollar Waltz."

The audience was enthusiastic enough to justify several extra pieces and the orchestra generously contributed them. The program for tonight is as follows:

March, "Kaiser Friedrich".....Friedemann
Overture, "Raymond" .....Thomas
Prelude .....Chopin
Moment Musicale .....Schubert
Suite, "Peer Gynt" .....Grieg
Selection, "Carmen" .....Bizet
Berceuse .....Strube
Humoresque .....Dvorak
Introduction to act 3, "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Overture, "Hunyady Laszlo" (first time) Erkel
Selection, "Aida" .....Verdi
Menuet .....Bolzoni
Waltz, "Tiralala" (first time) .....Strauss
March, "Frisch drauf los" .....Blon

OPENING NIGHT OF THE "POP" CONCERTS IN SYMPHONY HALL.

POST,

MAY 4, 1909

OPENING OF THE POPS

It was a music loving audience that gathered at Symphony Hall last evening to hear a splendid programme by Gustav Strube and 55 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the opening night of the Pops.

It was a brilliant audience and the scene from the second balcony, looking down upon the groups below drinking and eating, mostly drinking, was a most striking one.

Many of the old familiar faces were seen, even the waiters who assisted in the popping of the corks were the same as of other years, and it was the same good music that is always to be found at the Pops.

The programme was a most popular one and contained many new pieces, among which was a beautiful creation by Director Strube for stringed orchestra and harp, entiled "A Fairy Tale." It scored a decided success and the music seemed to have been taken out of a fairy tale of childhood days. There was nothing lavish or gorgeous about the music, but just a simple, tender thing that made one like it whether he wanted to or not.

Lully's Menuet was another new piece and was well received, together with Sinigaglia's overture "Le Baruffe Chiozzotte" and Fall's "Dollar Waltz."

Mr. Strube directed in his usual masterful manner and was well-received by the audience, who look forward to another brilliant season of concerts.

One of the pleasing numbers of the evening was the typical Strauss piece. It was a waltz played for the first time entitled "Burgerweisen."

ADVERTISER,

MAY 4, 1909

EVERYBODY IN SOCIETY AT THE OPENING "POP"

Display of Gowns and Hats in Symphony Hall Placed the Stamp of Approval Upon Boston's Spring Season of Mirth and Music.

Spring has come, low temperature and winter undergarments to the contrary. The symphony season is over, the "Pops" are here. To the true Bostonian this is the spring's real arrival.

Hundreds flocked to Symphony hall last evening to pay homage to the great God Fashion, to steins and beer, to light music and lighter wines.

In the formal evening dress of the man and in the "Merry Widow," the directoire, the sheath gown, the Gainsboro, toque and peach basket of the fairer sex, the crowds paraded, sipped cool drinks, munched pretzels, tapped tune to the rhythmic music and gossiped. Quite everybody socially was there, for the opening night, as formerly, was the night when society as a whole put its stamp of approval on the "Pops."

Gustav Strube, a most popular leader at these concerts, led the players, who made up their repertoire from Victor Herbert, Leoncavallo, Auber, Strube, Goldmark, Strauss and Lehar, composers whose names stand often on these programmes. Of the various numbers played last evening, possibly Auber's "Bronze Horse" was the most enjoyable. It is exactly in the right vein for "Pop" music. A typical and fashionable opening ushered in the season of "Pops" at Symphony hall.

TO LECTURE ON SORDI[illegible]

REDUCTION RATIO 14x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC.

TOPICS OF TIMELY INTEREST

HAS STRAUSS PLAGIARIZED?

An Italian Critic Suggests That Telepathy Has Influenced "Elektra."

Richard Strauss would seem to be the last man to charge with plagiarism, for he has been recognized from his first efforts as a new thinker in music and eminently an original genius. But a pamphlet published by Fratelli Bocca (Bocca Bros) in Turin under the title "Telepatica Musicale a propositu dell' Elettra di Richard Strauss," sets forth elaborately, in an essay and in the "deadly parallel" fashion, suspicious resemblances to an opera, "Cassandra," by Vittorio Gnecchi, which was performed at Bologna under the conducting of Toscanini in 1905, and published by Ricordi the same year. A letter in the London Times concerning this pamphlet says:—

The resemblances, of which (in addition to the examples in musical notation) there is an elaborate index of some hundreds, are deeply interesting both to musicians and to students in psychical research. Elaborate rhythmical figures are to be found in combination with themes, both practically identical; also passages of vocal declamation, and even of the same subject illustrating the same definite idea, the most striking instance of all being a passage for horns marked by Gnecchi "con islancio" (a some what rare direction usually written "con slancio"), and the same passage for the same instruments in "Electra" marked by Strauss "con islancio."

Since the discussions upon the methods of Handel and the ancestry of "Israel in Egypt," there has been no more interesting musical problem. Strauss has the advantage of Handel in being alive, and therefore able to throw a light upon it in propria persona. If, as the Italian critic in his polished essay so courteously suggests, these truly amazing coincidences are the result of telepathy, the brain-message occupying three years in transmission from sender to receiver, it will be a relief to all lovers of genuine art, and an overwhelming case for the psychical society. But the burden of proof lies upon the receiver; and the explanation of the composer of "Electra" will be eagerly awaited both by them and by the lesser-known composer of "Cassandra," whose ideas have been so curiously and mystically conveyed from Bologna to Berlin.

The London Times, having received a copy of Tebaldini's pamphlet, and examined the tables of musical examples, noting also that Strauss in common with the public, had opportunity of becoming acquainted with Gnecchi's work,—says:—

A perusal of these tables leaves no doubt that there are a number of passages which superficially bear a strong textual resemblance; but, on the other hand, every musician knows that such evidence may be extremely misleading. Nothing is easier than to pick out from two musical works phrases which, separated from their context and deprived of clear indications as to tempo, dynamic force, and color, appear almost identical. Take, for instance, the first figure with which "Elektra" opens—an emphatic statement of three notes of the chord of D minor in arpeggio. Mr Tebaldini quotes this as example XIII. Not only has Strauss used it a thousand times in his earlier symphonic work, but it might be found in a precisely similar form in the works of many of the classical composers, and yet it would not yield a shred of evidence of plagiarism, for it is in itself as much a part of the common musical language as is any figure of speech.

The Times writer examines several of the examples given to show that they are not conclusive. He says:—

In one case Mr Tebaldini seems to press his point too far, and that is in example III. Here he says: "The aforesaid theme in both scores is composed in each bar of two identical chords set forth in inverse order." The order of the two chords, then, is reversed; but further, allowing for a difference of key, they are not identical. The bass of the progression in "Cassandra" moves by an interval of a major seventh, that in "Elektra" by an interval of an augmented fourth. There could be no harmonic likeness, whatever likeness of rhythm the passages may show, and even that is not very noticeable. But it is concluded that "when all has been said against Mr Tebaldini's evidence, there remains sufficient to leave a powerful impression on the mind." Finally, says the Times: "It may be well to add that Mr Tebaldini is careful to remark that the general manner of treatment in the 'Elektra' is as unlike that of 'Cassandra' as possible, for the Italian composer makes use of none of the special methods of polyphonic combination which are the peculiar property of Strauss's style."

A YOUNG AMERICAN COMPOSER.

"Norge," By Philip G. Clapp, Produced By the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the last concert of the Boston symphony orchestra in Sanders theater, Cambridge, Max Fiedler produced "Norge," a tone poem for full orchestra and piano, written by Philip Greeley Clapp, a student in the music department of Harvard, who is undertaking composition and possibly conducting, as a profession, and who will go next year to continue study in Europe. A year ago, says the Boston Transcript, in compliment to the college and in encouragement to the young composers whom its musical department would nurture, Dr Muck put one of their compositions—a tone-poem, "Hero and Leander," by Mr Davidson—on the program of his final concert at Harvard. It pleased Mr Fiedler to continue the innovation, and he chose Mr Clapp's "Norge." Last spring, at a concert of music by composers who had studied at Harvard to mark the centenary of the Pierian sodality, that orchestra played Mr Clapp's piece and he himself conducted in it.

Remarking upon it the Transcript says: The remarkable and the surprising distinction of Mr Clapp's tone-poem is his sensitiveness to his orchestra and his ability—for a youth who is still a student—to make it do his will and impress his purpose upon his hearers. Mr Clapp has scored "Norge" for a full modern orchestra; he has assembled a numerous battery of instruments of percussion, not for din, but for appropriate use and emphasis; and he has added to his band a piano obligato (which he played himself last night) rather for the coloring it may add to the tonal web than for exposition or development of his melodic material. It is true that Mr Clapp's melodic ideas have no especial saliency or interest in themselves; they do not transfix the imagination or linger in the memory. They are neither reminiscent nor individual. They are, indeed, the melodic thoughts of a young composer, with a distinct aptitude for orchestral coloring, who would exercise his skill upon the development of these ideas, and, through it, make his imagination play. They are interesting, not for themselves, but for Mr Clapp's treatment of them. The purpose of his tonal suggestions and impressions is to summon the mood of the North. . . . So often, his music in imaginative and expressive quality, is a grim and somber and turbulent music, large and bare and restless of voice. The light—the coming light—begins to play upon it and to warm it, first pitfully and uncertainly, then in clearer and clearer gleams. In Mr Clapp's imagination the whole landscape becomes expectant of the sun that is to glow across the glimmering darkness, and the music obeys his impulse. . . . And the power and the thrill of the stirring are in the close of the tone-poem. The means to this suggestion and this "atmosphere" are almost wholly the means of instrumental timbres. Already Mr Clapp, as the phrase is, thinks in instruments, already these varying timbres in contrast and combination are the natural voice of his musical thoughts and his pictorial imaginings; already he shows an aptitude, a resource, a suggestive power and finesse, even, in instrumental coloring that are innate as well as practice and training, grow and the experience of the years may build much.

AN ESTIMATE OF MAX FIEDLER.

A Conductor That Pleases the General Public.

In a review of Max Fiedler's first year as conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra "H. T. P." in the Boston Transcript praises his work highly, but with differences. "He is hardly a conductor for connoisseurs, he is a conductor to please the general public"; he pleases in Boston, in the smaller cities of New England and also in New York: "Thus Mr Fiedler may rejoice at least in a deserved and duly earned popularity." Well, that is careful praise; and in like manner is contrasted the programs of Dr Muck, in which he aimed to create a scheme of harmonious music "of a particular period, of composers of a particular race, or out of pieces that had a general kinship of matter and manner"—with Mr Fiedler's "highly diversified programs, with their weekly variety and their sharp contrasts in their several items." This critic observes that "by every sign that his conducting has given, the classics appeal far less to Mr Fiedler than do modern, ultra-modern and romantic music." No doubt he tries conscientiously to do his duty by Beethoven, Schumann, Schubert and Debussy, etc. But "Mr Fiedler would rather be playing the music of the moderns and the romantics than all the classics, alive, dead or moribund, that there are in this world." And he "molds his classics over much and over calculatingly," he tries to make them sound modern—"as much as possible as if it were written to-day." This seems really an arraignment of Mr Fiedler's musicianly quality, for nothing can be worse in an interpreter than to force the meaning of the artist. But the summing-up is that "He has proved himself a conductor of large and luminous power, of large and passionate imagination, of vitalizing energy, of vivid contrast and telling strokes, of sonorous and plangent orchestral tone, of rich and deeply tinted instrumental color, of ample stride and intense accent."

A BAND CONCERT IN WORCESTER.

Rather an odd concert, musically, was lately given in Worcester for the benefit of the Worcester musicians' association, and Mechanics hall was crowded. There were nigh to 150 musicians, from every brass band and theatrical orchestra in the city, and they were conducted by E. D. Ingraham, leader of Battery B band, having had but one or two rehearsals, but it is recorded that the heterogeneous force played "with force, precision and delicacy." An episode was the presentation to Mr Ingraham of a gold medal from Battery B band and a bunch of American Beauty roses. The program was very ingeniously arranged in special groups; thus the Miserere from "Il Trovatore" was given by four cornets and four trombones; "Annie Laurie," with variations was performed by 16 clarinets; "The Lost Chord" was done by 23 cornets and trombones, and by cornets, trombones and euphoniums was produced the great sextet from "Lucia di Lammermoor." In the report of the entertainment it is not stated just where the whole force was massed, nor does it appear that the strings had anything to do, so that the orchestral players must have become simply band players. But the overture to "William Tell," a bit from "Carmen," a Suppe overture, some marches and a version of "Nearer, my God, to thee" were given, while the celebrated Reeves march, "2d Connecticut National Guard," evoked enthusiasm, and "The Star Spangled Banner" closed the affair. It all reads like a performance of the late lamented Patrick Sarsfield Gilmore's wonderful band, which played everything,—classic, religious, dramatic, operatic and the regular band music. Once, after giving in our City hall, a really superb performance of "The Heavens are Telling," which brought only feeble applause, he followed it with his notable "Sleigh ride," full of brilliancy, bells and whip-cracking, which brought down the house. He turned to one of his old friends and said quietly with that exquisite mincing Dublin accent of his, "I perceive that Springfield is truly appreciative of classical music."

Gabrilowitch at Mount Holyoke College.

It is a matter for congratulation by all music-lovers in this vicinity that Ossip Gabrilowitch has been secured to give a recital at Mount Holyoke college next Wednesday at 2.30 p. m. in Mary Lyon chapel. Mr Gabrilowitch is just closing a season of phenomenal success, embracing appearances in nearly all the cities of size in the United States, as well as playing some 12 times in New York city. His electrifying performance of the Tschaikowsy concerto at one of the Boston symphony concerts in this city is still fresh in the minds of all, but his appearance at Mount Holyoke is the only opportunity offered this year to hear him in a recital program.

OSSIP GABRILOWITCH.
[Who gives a recital at Mount Holyoke college Wednesday.]

Other Note and Comment.

Yolanda Mero is called by Dr Paul Ertel, in his "Artist-Biographics," "the greatest pianist Hungary has produced since the days of Liszt." She is one of Henry Wolfsohn's stars for the coming season. She was born at Budapest in 1887, 22 years ago. She was taught by her father from her fifth year, and became a pupil at the conservatory of that city a year later, though far too young to enter according to the rules. She was there taught by Augusta Reuneman, a pupil of Liszt. At the age of 14 she gained a scholarship and diploma, and in the next year a concert tour abroad ending in a spring concert with the Dresden philharmonic society, she had begun her career. Since then she has gained reputation in Berlin, Leipsic and London,—in which last-named city she gave a series of recitals last November. She was highly praised by critics of London papers, such as the Globe, Telegraph, World and Ladies' Field. She will appear in America under Mr Wolfsohn's management in the season of 1909-1910. Another important artist under Wolfsohn's management will the celebrated Fritz Kreisler, violinist, already known in this country, and often compared with Joachim as a master of his instrument.

Mr Gabrilowitsch is quoted in an article by Daniel Gregory Mason in the Century magazine as saying that "the influence of Liszt can be seen not only in all modern piano music but in every important orchestral piece. . . . He created a new orchestral style, which Berlioz, after all, did not do. . . . Liszt is the father of Strauss, Mahler and the rest of the modern Germans. . . . Liszt is bad when he wants to go up in the sky, where he doesn't belong. 'But as to his affectation,' I should be a little careful about using that word. It has become his label—one of those labels that people pin to a man to save themselves the time and trouble of thinking about him for themselves and forming an individual opinion." Mr Gabrilowitsch neither here nor in his other remarks on Strauss and Wagner adds much, if anything, to our guidance. He says that Gustave Mahler is "quite as impressive as Strauss",—"a virtuoso of the orchestra. His colors are more peculiar, more individual, than those of any other composer. Both men, of course, really derive their method from Liszt, though Mahler, who does not care for Liszt, would not admit it. Mahler is also, I think, the greatest of living conductors."

The American institute of normal methods in music will hold summer schools July 6-23, at the Northwestern university, Evanston, Ill., and the New England conservatory of music at Boston. Edgar O. Silver of Boston and the publishing house of Silver, Burdett & Co. The western school is the oldest summer music school in the West, and the coming session will be its 21st annual, while it will be the 19th of the institute of normal methods. The business manager of the western school is Frank D. Farr, 378 Wabash avenue, Chicago, and William M. Hatch, 221 Columbus avenue, Boston, is business manager of the New England conservatory school; from these officials full information may be obtained.

The Theodore Thomas orchestra of Chicago closed its season without a deficit. Frederick Stock has been well supported by the city, and Manager Wessels has succeeded admirably in his money management. The summary in Musical America says that in all respects the season surpassed all others:—

In addition to the 56 home performances, the orchestra has done considerable traveling, having given 31 concerts in other cities, in Columbus, Toledo, Oberlin, Cleveland, Detroit, Madison, Milwaukee, and four in Toronto, Can. It has also played 13 engagements in Chicago with the Apollo club, at the university of Chicago and in association with other events, such as the debut of Paloma Schramm, and the dancing of Isadora Duncan.

Oscar Hammerstein will engage an American singer for the title role if Richard Strauss will come to New York next winter to conduct his new opera "Elektra." This star will be Lucille Marcell, who has created the part at the Vienna court opera, and whom Strauss regards as his ideal Elektra. She has signed a contract with Felix Weingartner for the court opera for two years, but she has three months' vacation each season. The only question is whether Strauss can get away from his engagements to do the conducting.

The Southern music festival, which was held in Atlanta, closing a month ago, was distinguished by a notable list of soloists, instrumental and vocal. Among them was Scotti, Zenatello, Olivia Fremstad, Frieda Langendorff, Geraldine Farrar and Jeanne Jomelli. There was a full orchestra and a local chorus of 500. This ample choir gave the Pilgrims' chorus from "Tannhaeuser," Beethoven's Creation hymn, Handel's Hallelujah chorus and the Inflammatus from Rossini's Stabat Mater. This was in dedication of the city's new auditorium, one of the largest in the country.

William Shakespeare, London's notable teacher of the voice, will teach in the Washington college of of music through January and February, 1910, and will, after his contract there is concluded, give a series of concerts, together with Sydney Lloyd Wrighton, his pupil.

A music drama by Gnecchi, the new Italian composer, whose "Cassandra" is thought to have helped Strauss to make his new "Electra," will be one novelty in the Boston opera next season.

David Bispham, the noted baritone, will give a series of lecture lessons to advanced pupils at his country home, Rowayton, Ct., in the coming summer.

Marcella Sembrich is to tour in Cuba, Mexico and the far South and West, under the booking of Loudon Charlton.

FAY DAVIS AS ROSALIND.

Miss Fay Davis, who is remembered as an actress of intellectual distinction in Mr Jones's "Whitewashing Julia," Mr Shaw's "Man and Superman" and other modern comedies, is engaged, together with Gerald Lawrence, in playing Shakespeare in London, in an approximation of the Elizabethan manner of staging plays. One part that she has undertaken is Rosalind. Miss Davis is not the actress whom one would pick as an ideal Rosalind. No one, we should say, would understand better the elements of beauty and witchery in this creature of Shakespeare's romantic imagination than Miss Davis, but it does not seem that Miss Davis, with all her gifts of vivacity and piquancy, has quite the Rosalind nature, a nature primarily of high and abundant, though delicate and womanly, spirits, and of a warmth and radiance of sensuous beauty. Nevertheless, Miss Davis has succeeded in a measure in the part. She has been praised for the humor and womanliness of her impersonation.

PAINT AND POWDER PEOPLE.

[Continued From Page 22.]

is all trite enough, but what happens next appears to justify the pretension of the play to be an "original farce." The merchant is suddenly summoned by a dying relative, whereupon he bestows the countess on his business partner, a bachelor whom he can trust to keep a secret, for his chivalrous protection during his own prospective absence. The titled lady is ensconced in the partner's bachelor quarters, and the dramatist emphasizes the chivalrous gentleman's uneasiness under his charge by making him walk the streets all night in the rain, though, since he had to be got out of his flat somehow, for his reputation's sake, sending him to a hotel would have been a more humane expedient. The bachelor's reputation does suffer in spite of his caution, but in the end he is cleared of all stain. And the end is peculiar. The merchant-lover returns to announce that he cannot "resume the suspended elopement," as Mr Walkley phrases it, for the reason that he has seen fit to marry a woman whom he has met while away. The countess's husband shows up about this time, sorry for his misbehavior with the ballet dancer, and the countess, her own attempt at romance having fizzled out, decides to go back to him. The fun of the piece is mainly found in the efforts of the bachelor to protect the woman and himself from the scandal that has fixed upon them. Weedon Grossmith, the experienced comedian, has the part of the bachelor. Miss Compton is the countess.

HENRIETTA CROSMAN (ON THE RIGHT) IN A SCENE IN "SHAM."

Gertie Millar Chats About Americans.

Miss Gertie Millar, favorite player at the London Gaiety, did not keep to herself her impressions of America when she got back to London after appearing as a part of the season in the American production of "The Girls of Gottenberg," one of the Gaiety musical plays. She thought America "perfectly wonderful," according to the reporter who called upon her, and declared that she had had a "lovely time." Then her language lifted itself into the realm of poetry: "The air is champagne. The skies belong to the Riviera." Miss Millar lamented that her song, "The Two Little Sausages," was not appreciated by New York audiences, but she was enthusiastic over the way in which she herself was received, both in public and in private. She modestly told the reporter that she had not been "starred" in America and that her name had always been printed in small type. It is true that Miss Millar is a very likeable performer. She is gentle and piquant and bright, but is in no way remarkable, either as singer or actress.

Plays and Players.

Attractions at the New York theaters this week: "The Great John Ganton," at the Lyric; "The Climax," at Daly's; Jefferson de Angelis in "The Beauty Spot," at the Herald Square: "The Blue Mouse," at Maxine Elliott's theater; James T. Powers in "Havana," at the Casino; E. H. Sothern in repertory, at the West End; Cole and Johnson in "The Red Moon," at the Majestic; Maude Adams in "What Every Woman Knows," at the Empire; "The Candy Shop," at the Knickerbocker; Elsie Janis in "The Fair Co-ed" at the Criterion; Olga Nethersole in "The Writing on the Wall," at the Savoy; Elanor Robson in "The Dawn of To-morrow," at the Lyceum; "The Third Degree," at the Hudson; J. E. Dodson in "The House Next Door," at the Gaiety; Robert Hilliard in "A Fool There Was," at the Liberty; Henrietta Crosman in "Sham," at Wallack's; Grace George in "A Woman's Way," at the Hackett; "A Gentleman from Mississippi," at the Bijou; Mr Mantell in repertory at the Academy of Music; William Hodge in "The Man from Home," at the Astor; "The Girl from Rector's" at Weber's; Frances Starr in "The Easiest Way," at the Belasco Stuyvesant; "Going Some," at the Belasco; William Collier in "The Man from Mexico," at the Garrick; Robert Edeson in "The Call of the North" at the Grand, and a regular show at the Hippodrome.

One article in the current number of the Theater magazine is a sketch of Holbrook Blinn, who some years ago was Napoleon in "The Duchess of Dantzic," and for a season has been Jim Platt in "Salvation Nell." Mr Blinn will have the principal male role in "Israel" when Charles Frohman brings out this Bernstein drama next season. The paragraph of the article concerning Mr Blinn's literary taste is worth reproducing: "Mr Blinn is a thorough student of both men and books, and between appearances at the theater he can usually be found deeply absorbed in some such work as Mark Twain's 'Life of Joan of Arc,' or the latest thing in popular philosophy." The time may come when we shall go into a department store and hear some young saleswoman purr enticingly from behind a counter stacked with freshly-printed volumes: "The latest thing in popular philosophy."

The run of "Miss Innocence" came to an end with a scene of sentiment. When Anna Held left the stage at the end of the last performance at the New York theater, she found A. L. Erlanger, of the firm of Klaw & Erlanger, her managers, waiting with a "massive silver cup," which he straightway presented to her. The inscription on the cup reads: "Presented to Miss Anna Held by Messrs Klaw & Erlanger, in appreciation of her success in F. Ziegfeld Jr's musical production, 'Miss Innocence,' and to commemorate the record season (1908-9) played in the New York theater, New York, May 1, 1909." With the news of the presentation comes the information that the receipts at the New York theater during her engagement, averaged $14,452 a week. One week the receipts were $23,000.

"The Red Moon," a musical piece by Cole and Johnson, two negro comedians, which was played by them and their company at the Majestic theater in New York Monday night, contains a fertile idea: The return of the daughter of an Indian chief to her home after being educated at a government school, and the misunderstandings between the girl and her father as a result of her acquirement of the habits and ideas of civilized life. In "The Red Moon," however, the treatment of the idea is farcical, as was to be expected in such a piece as the class and authorship of "The Red Moon" proclaim it to be. Horseplay markedly characterizes the work, although some of the melodies are pronounced pleasing.

The German societies of Columbia and Barnard joined their dramatic forces and produced the farce, "Ein Muss Heiraten." The New York World complained that the love scenes lacked ardor, which may be explained by the step-sisterly relation of Columbia to Barnard. The deficiency noted by the World is one for the investigators of co-education to treat.

Even that section of the London press which represents fastidiousness and acquaintance with letters is delighted with Rose Stahl, who has just shown London "The Chorus Lady." Max Beerbohm makes her the subject of one of his essays in the Saturday Review, and Mr Walkley, who ridiculed the "artless and commonplace" character of "The Chorus Lady," thought the piece justified itself by "serving as a vehicle for the peculiar personality and talent of Miss Rose Stahl."

In Boston there were surprising protests against Eddie Foy's presenting himself in a burlesque of "Hamlet" on the ground that "Hamlet" ought to be protected from the hands of the burlesquer. Now we find the veteran critic, William Winter, writing a similar protest on the occasion of Mr Foy's performing for the first time in New York his "Hamlet by Freight." "There are," wrote Mr Winter, "themes in plenty for ridicule and for the sport of clowns, without desecrating the most sublime work in our literature."

An English writer attributes the unmistakably improving estate of the English drama to the demand of a few critics for better things. "The level of acting is much higher," he says, comparing the present with 15 years ago. And he continues: "The standard of intelligencee in plays has gone up; playwrights are mixing their materials 'with brains sir.' Compare 'The Builder of Bridges,' for instance, with 'Sunlight and Shadow,' or 'The Mollusc' with 'Betsy' or 'David Copperfield.'"

Miss Georgia Caine, whose peculiar combination of roguery and demureness has long been a delight to connoisseurs in the personalities of women of the stage, is reported by the press agent—to have kissed Henry Woodruff so realistically in performances of "The Prince of To-night" that her husband's jealousy was aroused. He demanded that she give up her part and, with touching wifely devotion, she consented. Miss Caine's husband is William Hudson, a New York broker.

HARRISON GREY FISKE.
[Theatrical manager who has come to terms with the syndicate.]

When the Shuberts appeared to have been left alone in their opposition to the booking agency of Klaw & Erlanger, after Mr Fiske and Mr Belasco made peace with the syndicate, there has come the announcement that Liebler & Co, one of the great firms of managers in the country, will play their companies next season in the theaters controlled by the Shuberts. There is still a long list of popular "attractions" outside the syndicate.

Henrietta Crosman is said to have made a fiery speech in favor of woman suffrage at a meeting of the William Lloyd Garrison equal rights association in New York on Tuesday. According to reports, she advocated a stronger compaign than that of argument. She was for collecting an army of working women and sending them to Washington to storm the capitol, after the fashion of English suffragets in besieging the House of Parliment.

The week's bills at the Boston playhouses will be: David Warfield in "The Music Master," at the Majestic; "The Traveling Salesman," at the Park; Grace Van Studdiford in "The Golden Butterfly," at the Hollis Street; "A Stubborn Cinderella," at the Colonial; May Robson in "The Rejuvenation of Aunt Mary," at the Tremont, and Chauncey Olcott in "Ragged Robin," at the Boston.

The title of George Bernard Shaw's new play is "The Showing Up of Blanco Posnet." It is in one act, which it will take 1¼ hours to play. It will be performed this season at the Afternoon theater in London.

It is said to be almost a certainty that Julia Marlowe will play at the New theater in New York next season. It is understoyd that no contract has been signed as yet, but Miss Marlowe is said to be willing to join the New theater company. She has a tour of her own planned for the early fall, but it is thought she can complete this before she will be needed at the New theater.

"The Marriage of a Star," adapted by Paul Potter from a French play of Alexander Bisson, has served to reintroduce Hattie Williams as an actress of "legitimate comedy," by which is here meant nonmusical comedy. Miss Williams's part is that of a capricious and volatile actress through whose many changing moods her love of her daughter remains firm.

Alfonso Mucha, the Bohemian artist, has painted portraits of four of Charles Frohman's stars—Maude Adams, Ethel Barrymore, Billie Burke and Marie Doro. Miss Adams was painted in the character of Joan of Arc, which she will act in the Harvard stadium, in June, at a single performance, but the rest were painted in their own persons.

It is now said that the original of Margaret Wylie, the character that Maude Adams is playing in the New York production of Mr Barrie's "What Every Woman Knows," was Mr Barrie's mother, a woman whom lovers of Barrie have met already in the pages of his novels and sketches.

If theatrical managers have ever had a superstitious uneasiness about any play in which a poker game was "featured," as they have been reported to have, they should consider the superstition smashed by the success of "The Witching Hour," which has a poker game in the first act.

New Haven will see on Wednesday, at the Hyperion theater, the first performance of Raymond Hubbell's and Glen MacDonough's musical play, "The Midnight Sons," which Lew Fields will take to New York for a summer engagement.

The large public that finds a very worthy pleasure in the novels of William J. Locke will be interested to learn that a dramatization of "Idols" has been procured by Walter N. Lawrence for production in America next season. London has already seen a dramatization of "Idols."

The Associated Press reports from St Petersburg that Tolstoi's novel, "War and Peace," has been dramatized for production at the Imperial opera house. The drama will consist of 50 scenes, and it is reckoned that a performance of the whole play will last five evenings.

A lower court of Nevada decided that Virginia Harned's suit for divorce had no validity because Miss Harned had not lived in the state sufficiently long to acquire a residence. The actress's counsel has appealed from the decision to the supreme court.

Forbes Robertson says of Modjeska: "She was my first Juliet, and certainly the greatest I have ever seen; a very charming and beautiful woman, a great artist, and the most unselfish actress I have ever known."

James K. Hackett is making an excursion for a few weeks into vaudeville. He has a one-act piece, "The Bishop's Candlestick," which reconstructs an episode in "Les Miserables."

"The Yankee Mandarin," a musical play by DeKoven and Paulton, will be produced in Boston next month. It is scheduled to reach New York the latter part of August.

Mary Mannering will appear in a new play to-morrow night in Chicago. It is called "That Miss Gower," and is the work of Emma Brunner.

Vera Michelena of "The Soul Kiss" company was married just before the close of the tour to Paul Schindler, musical director of the company.

George M. Cohan has now written and composed a musical play for Edna Wallace Hopper, in which she will star next season.

Marie Dressler will appear before summer in a new musical play, "The Boy and the Girl."

AMUSEMENTS, MEETINGS, ETC

POLI'S

Week of May 10

"THE PLAYERS ARE COME"—Hamlet

Annual Summer Opening

Poli's Own Stock Company

In the Bristling, Breezy Comedy

MRS TEMPLE'S TELEGRAM

A MESSAGE OF LAUGHTER ON A DIRECT WIRE FROM THE DYNAMO OF FUN

PRESENTED BY

The Very Best Stock Organization that Mr Poli Has Ever Brought to Springfield

Many New Faces and Some Old Favorites

NOTE THE SPECIAL SUMMER BARGAIN PRICES

Entire Lower Floor Evenings Only 30c

DAILY MATINEES 10c and 20c — 1000 Seats for Ladies at 10c

EVENINGS, 10c, 20c and 30c

THIS SCALE OF PRICES FOR THIS SUMMER ONLY

Cash Prizes for Amateur Photographers

Our leading lady and leading man are bound to be popular. We know it, but we want to hurry matters up all we can, and so we are offering prizes to anyone sending us the best snapshot of them. Get out your camera. For the best snapshot of Miss Hayden received before Wednesday, May 19th, Mr Poli will give a five-dollar gold piece; for the second best, $3.00. The same prizes will be offered for pictures of Mr Ingram. The result will be announced Thursday, May 20th, at the matinee performance. These pictures must be taken upon the streets anywhere, but not in the areaway leading to the stage door. Contests will be judged by a committee of photographers.

AGAIN the crowds all turn joyously to 5c-10c 500 Seats at 5c for Ladies at Matinees

Pictorial Vaudeville at The Nelson

As the Ideal and Only Real Picture Show

Two More Great Talking Pictures

Mon., Tues., Wed., "Under Northern Skies" A Powerful Edison Drama

Thurs., Frid., Sat., "Mr Gayboy's Little Lark" A Screaming Farce-Comedy

Mon., Tues. and Wed., A Great Historical Feature Picture "Oliver Cromwell and the Fall of the King"

Illustrated Songs by Mr Hogan, Miss Lenville, Mr Brazel

The show to which parents safely send their children

NOTHING CHEAP BUT THE PRICE

New Programs Monday and Thursday

Talking Pictures Between 3 and 5 — 8 and 10

SOROLLA PAINTINGS IN BOSTON.

REVIVAL OF THE ART OF SPAIN.

Sorolla, a Painter of Life and Light—The Exhibition at Copley Hall.

From Our Special Correspondent.

BOSTON, Friday, May 7.

It is seldom that one painter arouses so great an interest as the Spaniard Sorolla has done in New York, and now in Boston equally. It is a striking indication of the real hunger of the American public for a fresh, strong note in art, at a time when as not before in 30 years the artists of this country have lacked fresh

ALFONSO XIII.

[From a painting by Joaquin Sorolla y Bastida.]

impulse and initiative, while they are subsiding into a complacency that is more academical than the old school painters ever knew. The union of the Society of American Artists with the National Academy of Design has not added strength to our native art, but the progressives have drifted into conservatism of the blind sort, and the easel production, as shown in the exhibitions at the Fine Arts building, has lost its one distinctive feature of the days of Inness, Wyant, Minor, Sanford Gifford, Swain Gifford, Homer Martin and that generation, and lost also the crisp novelties of treatment which came in with the new impressionism. Not, of course, that there are not good landscapes painted—it is our commonplace. But the distinguishing feature of our present art is the large and free decorative painting which for the first time has had any real exemplification in America in the opportunities offered for work in adorning great public buildings,—courts, churches, and such as the congressional library at Washington. William Morris Hunt and John full rank with her own especial impression.

Copley hall has seldom been more thronged with visitors at any of its numerous fine exhibitions than during the display of Sorolla's extraordinary product. It has captured Boston, which is a great triumph after capturing New York. What is the element of fascination which brings the same people day after day—as well as new ones every day—to view these certainly extraordinary paintings? It is not technical art, it is scarcely the art at all—it is life! This is the secret of Sorolla,—he brings to eyes and minds jaded and worn out with technic on the one hand and meaningless impressionism on the other, a sense that there is yet room in art for human utterance, for human of beauty. Another charming picture is one which is copied, so far as a half-tone can do it, of a chase of youth by youth which reminds one of nothing so much in art as the figures on a Greek vase,—"Forever shalt thou love, and she be fair!" Of course there is a complication here, since there are two girls and only one lad, who is doing his best, but the fair Atalantas are far the best runners. These figures are delightfully well drawn, and their marine setting adds a great attractiveness. There is another picture, exceptional for its singular simplicity—for Mr Sorolla does often crowd too many figures together,—in which a girl alone is standing at the edge of the outgoing tide, and all the sea spreads out behind her to the horizon, a delicately wrought harmony of blues with little touches of sunset light.

"Beauty is truth, truth beauty," wrote Keats, and it is a question to be raised now and again with regard to Sorolla whether he accepts that as the basic fact of painting. One would say not. For notwithstanding Keats, while beauty is often truth, truth is not always beauty in the way of art. Mr Sorolla's huddles of people, or men, or women, or children in ungainly attitudes, do not produce the sense of beauty, which means perfection of harmony. As before said, what he is after is life, and life does not always measure itself in terms of art, and art wants crudity eliminated. This he does not care to do. There is one painting here that draws all attention, and yet it has no element of beauty whatever, except of moral beauty—which is not the same as artistic. It is the great canvas which has been loaned by Mr Berwind, its owner, and which has been hanging in the church of the Ascension in New York. It represents a group of crippled and imbecile children at the shore of a dull and tragic sea, without a comforting light; and over them bows and broods a nobly compassionate priest. They are frightened at the water; he is assuring them that a dip in the sea is good for them. The human appeal of this painting is deep and affecting. Left untouched must many things be in this remarkable exhibition; but enough surely is said to show how important is the work of Joaquin Sorolla.

AN OLD ATHOL FAMILY.

Samuel Sweetser Drove 500 Cattle to Brighton Market.

From Our Special Correspondent.

ATHOL, Saturday, May 8.

One of the former well known Athol families who was especially prominent during the first half of the century in Athol, but for the last 50 years has been little known in this town, was the Sweetser family. Samuel Sweetser was a son of Philip and Sarah Richardson Sweetser and a native of Leominister. He was born in 1764. Before his marriage Mr Sweetser kept a store in Warwick for a year or two, then he moved to Athol, buying a tavern at Athol Center. In 1792 he married Miss Hannah Moore of Cambridge. In 1806 Thomas Lord bought the tavern, Mr and Mrs Sweetser building a house at the Center near the tavern. For a great many years he was known as a successful grazer. He owned large pasture lands in Athol, Royalston, Wendell, Petersham, Phillipston, Northfield, Heath and Warwick. He drove great numbers of cattle to the Brighton market and there with his ruddy face and portly figure, in a long white coat, he soon became a well known figure in the market. One year he pastured and drove to the Boston market, nearly 500 head of cattle.

Mr Sweetser was exceedingly kind to the poor. He passed away in 1842, but his wife survived him nearly 15 years. Mrs Sweetser was a sister of Mrs Prescott of Athol. The Sweetsers had nine children, who all lived to maturity. They were Mary, Abby, afterward wife of Rev George J. Tillotson of Connecticut, Samuel Sweetser, Jr., Luke, Abel, Miranda, Marie, Joseph A. and Caroline. It is said of this fine early Athol family that it was characterized by intelligence, industry and thrift and by the devotion to the church and the needy.

Athol high goes to Winchendon to play Murdock academy Wednesday afternoon. On Saturday Northampton high will play in Athol. Manager Hill is trying to arrange a date with Arms academy, for the postponed game in Athol. The week after Athol has two hard games, on the 21st with Worcester, at Worcester and the next day against Springfield high at Springfield. The team will make a good record this year if it can do a little more timely hitting. It is there the chief weakness seems to be at present.

There is naturally a good deal of interest in Athol over the visit of the delegation of business men to Washington, to see of something cannot be done to overturn the choice of the Amsden lot for a post-office building site. Those opposed to the present site have enlisted the services of Jerome Jones of Boston. He is a native of Athol and takes considerable interest in the town. Just what will be accomplished is difficult at present to say. The government has accepted Mr Amsden's lot and he in turn, in order to have it come up to requirements, secured an option on property next to his owned by

"RUNNING ALONG THE BEACH."

[Copyright, 1909, by the Hispanic society of America.]

Lafarge were prophets crying in the wilderness. Now Reid, Blashfield, Simmons, Abbey, Sargent and others are getting their turn, and much notable work is done.

But here comes a new and vivacious impulse out of Spain,—where a great painter has not been known since Goya, and the great renown of Velasquez has overpowered the moderns and can still teach them. That most interesting enterprise, the Hispanic society of America, having built its interesting museum on the hights of western Manhattan, has brought to our public the revelation of one of the most interesting portrayers of human life that has been known, in Joaquin Sorolla y Bastida,—a peasant by birth,—and his portrait confirms this origin, while his fine human sympathy accords with it. The work of Ignacio Zuloaga, which also has been seen in New York and will presently be shown in Boston (also by the Hispanic society's enterprise) comes to complement the record with that of another phase of the renewed national impulse. Both are eminently national,—they paint Spain for the world, and tell us that Spain is very much alive, very distinctively herself, and asserts a claim which is at once allowed to nature as it is natively, without convention. Sorolla shows, it is true, that he can do the conventional work as well as another, and his portraits of royalty—Alfonso XIII and Isabel of Bourbon, and the rest—are quite reminiscent of Sargent in their unflattering truth. As, for example, in the portrait of the young king of Spain reproduced in these columns,—the gorgeous uniform and decorations are there, but what a countenance to go with them! However, this picture is not at Copley hall, the portrait of Alfonso that is in the exhibition has no such accessories, and it is really merciless.

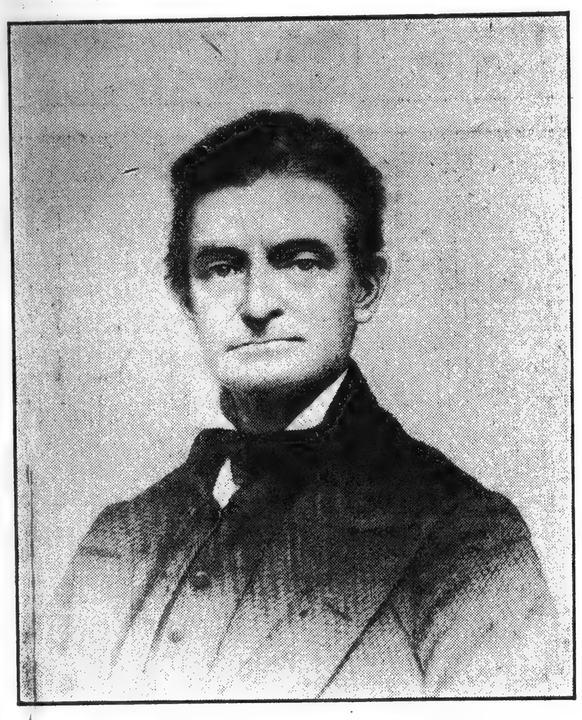
It is not in such pictures that one finds the real Sorolla,—it is in his marvelous renderings of boys and girls in the sea or on the sands, full of animal energy and sportiveness, dashing in chase of each other, pausing before plunging in, wading, resting with backs upward, wet as wet can be, at the edge of the water,—in every sort of posture,—the absolute truth of childhood in a land without concealments. It is the abounding life that makes Sorolla so great,—for it is great to seize thus the normal boy and girl and make every one who looks realize that life and light are the great constituents of physical pleasure. Light! there is another charm—or rather it is a part of life,—life itself is light. How the sun fills the whole air with its warming golden rays! how the waves sparkle and dance! how the breeze dashes the water and wooes the girl and the boy! Here is no "Beach at Scheveningen" stuff; and one sees that the painter is not at all himself when he gives us a glimpse of fashionable Biarritz—that sort of thing is not Sorolla.

This artist is undeniably weak in composition, if one judges by his chief pictures. They are unusually devoid of any such intention,—he shows just enough of planned arrangements to prove that he could do that sort of thing if he cared to. There are nevertheless some really exquisite pictures, like that entitled "After the Bath" (164), which shows a bathing attendant just about to cast a wrapper over the young woman who has come out of the sea. The figure of the woman is beautifully painted in her long robe, which in its clinging folds reveals the fine limbs. It is easily a favorite among the lovers



JOHN BROWN, THE ABOLITIONIST.

[From a daguerreotype taken about 1855.]

even farther, when he stated that in his opinion Dr Oliver occupied the most responsible place in the House as chairman of the public health committee, and he thought it would be a grave mistake if Mr Oliver was not sent back. In the meantime Dr Oliver is saying nothing. He has no desire to force himself on the district, no more than he did last year when he went back for a second time.

AUTO SPEEDING IN SUFFIELD.

Townspeople Favor Crusade by Proper Officials.

From Our Special Correspondent.

SUFFIELD, Ct., Saturday, May 8.

The procession of automobiles has begun and every day cars go sailing through the center of the town at a speed that is neither reasonable nor safe. In the outlying district there is not so much danger from reckless speeding and people who are residents of these district are loth to complain when the drivers apparently have their cars under control, but when cars go through the center of the town at a speed of from 50 to 60 miles an hour it is rather too much for the nervous people who feel that they have some right to the highways. It is a question whether there is greater pleasure enough at a rate above 25 miles an hour to pay for the extra risk involved, and the hazard to the automobiles themselves. There have been several cases recently where accidents have been narrowly averted and no sober-minded people would blame the town officials if they should start a crusade against the more reckless of the transgressors. The town has recently been defendant in two suits for damages that were caused it is claimed by reckless driving, and while the town won both cases it involved a considerable expenditure and the result might have been different in another case. The worst offenders are the drivers of test cars from the factories who go through the streets in a cloud of dust and grind up the highways to be blown by the four winds of heaven into the houses of nearby residents.

The cemetery committee has begun its work of beautifying the Center and Woodlawn cemeteries and they have been greatly improved in the past two years. The work is done by private subscription and this year about $500 is needed to carry out the work planned. If each lot owner will give $2 there will be sufficient funds to carry along the work and all extra monies will go for general improvements. Under this plan the cemeteries are kept mowed, a top dressing of fertilizer is applied to the grass and the driveways are kept trimmed out. Under the old plan the grass was cut but twice a year by the cemetery committee, and as some lot owners kept them mowed themselves there was a lack of uniformity of appearance much to the detriment of the entire plot. If there is sufficient surplus some of the old stones will be cleaned and straightened up, more particularly in cases where there are no relatives left to care for the burying places. The work is in the line of public improvement and should receive the hearty indorsement of the entire community.

Hired help for farm work seems to be more plenty this year than for several seasons past and the wage is rather less. This is due to the low prices received for crops and the consequent shortage of money among the farmers, many getting along with one less man this year than heretofore. Improved farm machinery too makes it possible to do more and more work with horses every year, and one man can take care of twice as much land than was possible a few years ago.

The tobacco warehouses have finished the work of the season and the last of the crop is in the sweat rooms getting ready for market. The sales already made are said to have brought good prices and it looks as though the packers would realize greater profit this year than last. From the viewpoint of the grower, however, the 1908 crop was far from satisfactory, and coming as it did upon the heels of a poor crop of 1907, the growers could ill afford to sell for the prevailing prices, but it seemed to be that or nothing, so those who had to have the money took what they could get and made the best of it. Some of the farmers this year have rented their land preferring to have the rental in their pockets rather than work the whole season for a bare living.

There will be several lots of the hybrid tobaccos that have been created by the experts from the department of agriculture, raised in town this year, and while the growers will not go into them on a large scale the more progressive seem to feel that it the perfection of a new type that will be sought after by the manufacturers lies the only hope of renewed prosperity. Some of the more conservative farmers are returning to the ways of their fathers and will raise more of a variety of crops and the higher prices for which milch cows are held shows a greater demand for dairy herds. The farmer is largely a victim of circumstances and instead of adapting himself to conditions that are inevitable he plods along in the same ruts and curses fate for his hard luck.

JOHN BROWN IS RECALLED

BY PORTRAITS OF HIM AND SON.

The Browns and Springfield—Visits to Massachusetts.

This is the birthday of John Brown of Kansas and Virginia. He was born with the opening century in which he so greatly distinguished himself, in the little town of Torrington, Ct., where the farm-house of his birth is carefully preserved in his memory. But his father soon removed to Ohio and became one of the leading pioneers of and reproduced in Sanborn's "Recollections." It was from the life, soon after his last birthday (May 9, 1859), which he spent half in Concord with his friends there, and the latter half in Boston, where he passed some weeks in May and early June. He was to have sat for his picture to William Morris Hunt, the best Boston painter at that time, but the failure of a coachman to meet the train in Milton prevented the sitting. In the first volume of his "Recollections," Mr Sanborn says of this Concord visit in 1859:—

I had been looking for Brown in Concord for some days, when a little after noon of Saturday, May 7, he appeared at my door (the residence now of Miss Mary and Miss Flora White, not far from the Fitchburg railroad station,) accompanied by his faithful henchman, Jeremiah Anderson of Indiana, who was killed at Harper's Ferry. We gave notice through the churches, Sunday morning, of a meeting that evening, at which Brown spoke, and a few persons gave him money. This was his last visit here. Brown told the story of his invasion of Missouri, and the removal of the slaves, and there were good citizens and antislavery men in the audience who were startled at this practical enforcement of the Golden Rule, as Dr Howe was, a few days later, when he met Brown in Boston. The conversation was reported by Howe in a letter to Parker at Rome, the next winter.

TOLLAND COUNTY MURDERS.

Arrangements Completed For Rockville Baseball Association Annual Fair.

From Our Special Correspondent.

ROCKVILLE, Ct., Saturday, May 8.

Tolland county is fast gaining an unenviable notoriety for its brutal murders, there having been an unusual number in the county in the past three years. For some 20 years there was not a murder in the county, and Judge Reed during his long term as state attorney for Tolland county did not have a murder case in the superior court. But State Attorney Charles Phelps of this city has had a number of murder cases of which the most important was the trial of Frank Sherrie for the Somersville murder on largely circumstantial evidence. He was convicted and hung. The most brutal murder case was that against John Zett last year. He was convicted and hung after a few months in states prison. The two cases reported from Stafford the past week were both of a most brutal character. State Attorney Phelps has not decided what action he will take in the Handel case, as he has been busy in the supreme court this week. He will have a meeting early in the week with Coroner Robert Fisk of Stafford Springs, and consider the evidence in the case. He will at first make an effort to find out the exact age of Ernest Handel, who is now in Tolland jail for the shooting of his brother. It has not yet been shown what his age is, and his age will largely determine the disposition of the case. It is not probable, however, that he will be brought before a jury in the superior court on the charge of manslaughter.

Arrangements are completed for the annual fair of the Rockville baseball association, which will be held in the town hall the 20th, 21st, and 22d. The entertainment on the opening evening will be given by the cadet minstrels of this city, under the direction of T. J. Byrnes. The company is composed of 30 Rockville boys from 10 to 14 years of age, and is expected to make a big hit in an overture expressly arranged for the company by Bandmaster Scott Snow of Hartford. The end men will be Bobbie Davis, Eddie Conway, Charles Sweet and Charles Willis. Among the soloists are Francis Crafty, Fred Reed, William Hannon, John Burke and George Norton. The company has been in rehearsal for some time and many of the latest popular songs will be given. There will be vaudeville attractions on the last two nights with dancing each hourly service will be continued on the trolly, with a half-hour service from Hartford from 4 to 6 p. m. The cars will leave Hartford for Rockville at seven minutes past the hour, arriving here at 22 minutes past the hour. The cars will leave this city for Hartford at 22 minutes past the hour, the run between the two cities being made in 1¼ hours instead of 1½ hours as at present. The interurban cars will arrive and leave this city on the same time as now, but the run will be made in 53 minutes instead of an hour, as the Burnside cars that connect with the interurban at Church corner, East Hartford, will make the run to Church corner in 10 minutes, leaving Hartford seven minutes later than at present. By the new time-table parties arriving in this city on the trolly will have plenty of time to connect with the interurban cars.

JASON BROWN.

[Son of John Brown and now living at Akron, O. Photograph taken in 1906.]

The body of Mrs Ann Tone, a former well known Rockville resident was brought here Thursday from New Britain for burial. She was 85 years old.—The Cornelia circle will meet with Mrs Jacob Yost on Park street Monday afternoon.—Rev E. C. McKinley has been in Boston this week.—President Luther of Trinity college will give a talk to the high school pupils on the 17th.—The funeral of John Wheelock, 73, an old resident of the town, was attended from his late residence on Mountain street this afternoon.—Mr and Mrs David A. Sykes have been spending a number of days in New York.—Grand Knight M. J. Conway and Past Grand Knight M. L. Dillon will represent Rock-

SPRINGFIELD, Masats. June 27, 1846.

Dear Brother John: You will think that by this time you ought to hear from us. We would have written sooner; but so long as we did not know what quantity of wool we might expect here to be sold, we concluded to wait a few days.

We had a splendid ride on the Lake to Buffalo (from Cleveland), and from there the Iron Horse carried us soon to Albany; there we staid over Sunday, and on Monday we arrived here in time for dinner. We have not had much business yet, but by the number of letters we receive, and the wool we hear of on the way, we begin to think we shall have our hands full shortly. Father thinks you had better take a packet boat at Buffalo, and come in that way to Albany,—then the cars to Springfield.

This is a delightful place; and we only want you and plenty of business to make it like home here. I wish Ruth could see the old Bay State once. I was at the U. S. Armory yesterday, and it was a place of guns, sure enough. They have in all here 160,000 muskets ready for action; the making costs Uncle Sam $12 apiece. So much for peace-makers.

I shall have to stop; you will begin to think I am quite a tourist.

Your brother, JASON BROWN.

(Postage 10 cts.)

There is no portrait of Jason Brown at that time; but accompanying this is one taken 60 years later, in 1906. In that year, 1906, Jason was in Massachusetts again, and spent several days at Concord, returning to his son's home in Akron, O., by way of Meadville, where he had once lived. He now resides with his son in Akron, near where he formerly kept sheep and raised fruit, as he afterward did for years in California,—at first near Pasadena, and afterward in Santa Clara county, where he owned a vineyard and spent some years. Jason's favorite portrait of his father is one taken by a good artist a year or two before John Brown went to Kansas with his son-in-law, Henry Thompson, who is still living (at 67) in Pasadena. Mrs May Wright Sewall, who has just returned from California to Maine, spent an hour at his house, in early April, of which she thus writes:—

Yesterday, by invitation of Miss Mary Thompson, I called on her father and herself, and had a most interesting visit of quite two hours. . . . Miss T. was unexpectedly communicative, and showed me some of the personal letters of her grandfather and uncles, which give evidence of the tenderness of heart, as well as the exactions of conscience which characterized these extraordinary men. Sue is teaching, and is also trying her hand at literature. Her father is physically feeble, but he sat up for an hour while I was there, and manifested a keen interest in present as well as in past political issues. Miss T. introduced one of her nephews, and a young grandnephew, who will evidently be trained to rejoice in the courage of his great ancestor,—from whom this infant is in the fifth generation. The historic background of this visit made it very significant to me; and to your suggestion I owe one of the most interesting experiences of the winter.

It may be remembered that Henry Thompson was seriously wounded at the fight of Black Jack in Kansas, and that two of his brothers were killed at Harpers Ferry.

The accompanying unbearded portrait of John Brown before starting for Kansas in 1855 seems to be the favorite among many of his descendants. It was originally a daguerreotype, taken somewhere in the East; then engraved for James Redpath's life of Brown, and from that, or from the daguerreotype, enlarged to thrice the size, and again engraved by Buttre of New York. It has always been a favorite among the beardless portraits, having a sprightly and kindly aspect, not always seen in Brown's pictures, but which was characteristic of him when not ill or fatigued, as he often was in his campaigns. It differs somewhat from that taken in 1854, which is engraved in Sanborn's "Life and Letters," and also from that taken in Boston by Whipple, the photographer, and now engraved in Sanborn's "Recollections." The historic portraits of Brown, however, will be the bearded ones, because he wore his gray beard when last in Kansas, and at Harpers Ferry and in the Charleston prison, where Brackett, the sculptor, saw and sketched him for the marble bust, which is also a good bearded portrait. That bust and all the paintings owe much to the only bearded photograph for which he ever stood, taken in Boston by Black, in 1859, for the late Dr T. H. Webb. The negative of this is lost, but we give a good print of it from an unfaded copy found in Rochester, N. Y., a year or two since evening. The awards will be made on Saturday evening. There has already been a large sale of tickets, and the association hopes to clear a large sum for the support of the Rockville team this year.

JOHN BROWN.

[From a photograph taken in 1859 at Boston.]

Principal Marsh of the Rockville high school announces the honor pupils of the graduating class for 1909, and again these honors go out of town. The valedictory is taken by Ethel M. Anderson of Tolland and the salutatory by Ethel J. Usher of Tolland. Kenneth A. Arnold is third on the roll of honor, a Broad Brook boy. The graduation exercises of the class will be held about the middle of June, and a most interesting program is being arranged. The school has had a most successful year under the direction of Principal Marsh, and now ranks among the best institutions of its class in this section of the state.

The honorary state regent, Mrs Sara Kinney of New Haven, will be present at the May meeting of the Sabra Trumbull chapter, Daughters of the Revolution, on Wednesday afternoon, at the home of Mrs W. C. Tillotson on Park street. She will give a short talk, and Mrs Celia E. Prescott and Mrs Frank Keeney, delegates to the recent continental congress in Washington, will give a report of these meetings. Other important matters will be considered.

The funeral of Frederick Schillinger was attended by many friends from his late residence on Village street yesterday afternoon. He was 61 years of age, and for 15 years had been engineer and machinist at the Hockanum mills. He is survived by his widow and four children, Mrs Edward Schaefer, Miss Annie Schillinger, Miss Matilda Schillinger and William Schillinger of this city.

The summer time-tables go into effect on the Hartford, Manchester and Rockville trolly and on the interurban line on Wednesday, and there will be a reduction in the running time on both lines. The

"The export of canary birds to the United States from this district during the year 1908 amounted in value to $130,355," writes Robert J. Thompson, American consul at Hanover, Ger., "against $136,354 in 1907. It is estimated that there are not less than 5,000,000 caged birds in the United States. The ordinary house canary will eat 25 pounds of seed a year, which represents a cost for each bird of $1.50. It will be seen that this luxury represents an outlay on the part of the American people of $7,500,000 annually for seed alone."

Last year mortgages on farms filed in Nebraska amounted to $34,400,000, as compared with $30,700,000 released. City real estate mortgages filed amounted to nearly $14,000,000, and those released to $9,000,000. The value of chattel mortgages filed was $34,400,000, and that of like mortgages released $19,000,000.

SIC AND DRAMA.

Comedy and Tuneful Opera mong the New Bills of The Week.

VENATION F AUNT MARY"

son Portrays a Quaint and nusing Character at The Tremont.

NT THEATRE—"The Rejuve- Aunt Mary," a comedy in , by Anne Warner. First per- in this city. The cast:

ett	Lila Blow
	Walter Poulter
	Nina Saville
	Harry Cowley
	Jack Storey
ins Jr	Edward Racey
rnett	Paul Decker
	Leia Thompson
Mullins	Harry Jones
Boy	Lester Wallace
ns	George F Hall
	Josephine Daly
Kalamazoo	Lillian Westner
y	May Robson

Rejuvenation of Aunt Mary," in Boston for the first time ening at the Tremont theatre, run of many months elsewhere, the sort of a play that has al- een exceedingly popular in New , and after witnessing the al- ontinuous hilarity with which received last evening, one may believe that the role of Aunt s destined to contribute to the r May Robson very much as, in gone by, the Widow Bedott did Burgess and Joshua Whitcomb mpson's.

ramatization by Anne n popular book of the it is full of the quaint better class of stories mitive rural characters though there is noth- oring of invention, the e of Aunt Mary reminds instances of the innocent cities found in the "Old Home- for it brings into sharp contrast mple, commonplace experiences veryday life in a rural community those to be found among the smart in the great city of New York.

The story is sufficiently original, em- dying episodes in the life of a middle- ed spinster of comfortable financial ondition, but somewhat soured dis- osition, who lives in the country and ntertains the rather narrow views of he gayety of city life that are often found in the rural districts.

Her nephew gets into several scrapes that threaten to cost her a lot of money, and she disowns him. Several of his student friends put up a job on the old lady, to get her to come to the city and sample the joys of urban life. She comes, finds herself in the midst of a rollicking birthday party, amid luxuri- ous surroundings, experiences the exhil- iration of champagne, smokes cigar- ettes, sings "coon songs," visits roof gardens and winds up with a midnight automobile ride.

She returns to her country home with a set of newly acquired tastes that render it necessary for her to get rid of her old home and take up a perma- nent residence amid the seductive charms of the big city.

Her transition from her old-fashioned garments to up-to-date New York lin- gerie, covered all over with pink rib- bons, a baby blue chiffon tea gown and French heeled slippers, in the last act, furnishes the most hilariously amusing episode of the story.

Nearly all the characters, save Aunt Mary, are full of the breeziness of youth, and the whole play goes with a snap that would seem to presage for it a protracted and very successful run in this city. Last evening's audience was a distinctly high-class one, and it indulged itself in a spontaneous hilarity that was the best possible testimony to the cleverness of the author in catering to the perennial desire for innocent diversion and amusement.

Miss Robson presented a strong char- acter creation in Aunt Mary, which often strongly suggested the Widow Bedott, not because of anything like imitation, on her part, but merely be- cause one phase of the role seems to have been drawn by the author of the play along similar lines to those fol- lowed by James Russell Lowell in his earlier work.

But in the latter half of the play Miss Robson's portrayal was totally different from anything in familiar stage litera- ture, and the importunate recalls that she was given again and again, after the second act, showed that she had achieved a personal triumph of which she may well feel proud, and which might reasonably afford her the deepest satisfaction as a dramatic star.

Nina Saville, as Aunt Mary's maid of all work, Leia Thompson, as a needy neighbor with 13 children and a no-good husband, and Harry Cowley, as the hired man on the farm, were among the very best of those supporting the star. Each of them gave a thoroughly con- sistent and clean-cut characterization of a type familiar to every one in any way acquainted with country life.

Lila Blow as Betty Burnett, the soci- ety butterfly who temporarily impers- onates a lady's maid and in that guise by her tactful attentions completely wins the heart of aunt Mary, as she had before won that of the spinster's nephew, Jack, was graceful and always pleasing.

Lillian Westner as the girl from Kal- amazoo, who tried to get rich quick by suing the hero of the story for breach of promise, expecting to make the spin- ster aunt pay up, made an impressive and handsome picture in a stunning gown, in the earlier part of the play, and acted the penitent role in the last act with admiral taste and good judge- ment.

Jack Storey as the nephew of aunt Mary and the source of all her joys and sorrows showed himself a versatile and accomplished young actor, his musical gifts, both as pianist and singer, forming one of the most enjoyable fea- tures of the play.

Walter Poulter, Edward Racey and Paul Decker as Jack's college chums, always rollicking and full of mischief, were all excellent and Harry Jones, Lester Wallace, George F. Hall and Josephine Daly in somewhat less con- spicuous roles each earned the right to a word of genuine praise.

Symphony Hall "Pops."

The first Wagner night at the "Pops" last evening, drew a large and discrim- inating audience. It was quite notice- able that there were practically as many people in the balconies, who came to hear the music only, as at the tables on the floor where the refreshments were served. The program tonight will introduce the "1812" overture by Tschai- kowsky, with Mr Marshall at the organ. The other numbers are:

March, Black Bess	Strube
Overture, The Beautiful Galatea	Suppe
Waltz, Pres de toi	Waldteufel
Selection, Faust	Gounod
Overture, Midsummer Night's Dream	Mendelssohn
Scene Religieuse	Massenet

Solo violoncello, Mr J. Keller.

Ballet music, Coppelia	Delibes
Overture, 1812	Tschaikowsky

Organ, Mr Marshall.

Selection, La Grande Duchesse	Offenbach
Two [illegible] from Henry VIII,	German
Narcissus	Nevin
March, Mit Bomben und Granaten	Bilse

COMIC OPERA AT THE HOLLIS

"The Golden Butterfly" Given With Grace Van Studdiford In The Title Role.

HOLLIS-ST THEATRE—"The Golden Butterfly," comic opera in three acts, book by Harry B. Smith, music by Reginald de Koven. First time in Bos- ton. The cast:

Bertha	Miss Leonora Novasio
Olga	Miss Elizabeth Carmody
Count Androssy	Charles Purcell
Petoffy	Louis Casavant
Baron van Affenkoff	W J McCarthy
Ilma Walden	Miss Grace Van Studdiford
Franz	Walter Percival
Wanda	Miss Alice Hills
Hanska	Joseph Carey
Cora	Miss Juliette Lange
Dora	Miss Zoe Fulton
Tina Korbay	Miss Gene Luneska
Call Boy	Charles W Butler

"The Golden Butterfly," a comic opera of recent production by Harry B. Smith and Reginald de Koven, was presented at the Hollis-st theatre last evening, with Miss Grace Van Studdiford in the principal role.

The opera and its performance was received with favor, and the music was so well liked that there were demands for repetitions of almost every number. Mr De Koven's score is more preten- tious than Mr Smith's libretto, and is of rather better musical value than is commonly provided for a work of this character.

Possibly the musical settings of some of the farcical situations are rather too pretentious, but good music should be welcome, whatever its environment. "Catchy" tunes are not abundant in the score, but there are several deli- cious melodies that will haunt the memory, and much spritely and capti- vating dance music. Mr De Koven has evidently been duly impressed by the popularity of the operas recently im- ported from Vienna, and so, apparently, has Mr Smith, for in both the music and the story there is a strong sug- gestion of the Hungarian influence.

Mr De Koven has given his best efforts to the ensemble numbers and the orchestration. The finale of the first act is splendidly stirring and in- spiring, quite worthy of a grand opera, and, except for an overabundance of brass, the closing of the second act could be as cordially commended. Sev- eral other concerted numbers were too noisy, too vociferously sung and too strenuously played for an auditorium the size of the Hollis.

The story of the libretto of "The Gold- en Butterfly" is not new; it is the same as that of "The Second Fiddle"; a com- edy produced here at the Park theatre four years ago by Louis Mann.

Mr Smith wrote that comedy under the nom de plume of "Gordon Blake," and acknowledged on the program that it was founded on a story published by him in 1885. But the venerableness of the plot is immaterial.

In its present form it has been suffi- ciently modernized and embellished with contemporary wit to be acceptable. It provides opportunities for picturesqu scenery and beautiful costumes, an of these there is lavish provision.

The story is about a stolen opera. penniless young composer sent his sc to the director of the Budapest op house, who produced it as his own. latter offered the prima donna role a chorus girl on condition that if made a success in his opera she w marry him.

The girl was in love with the composer, but could not resist chance to become famous, so acc the condition. She did make a su and was about to be married to t rector, but the young lover prov ownership in time, and the happy ending came about.

Miss Van Studdiford's perfo was thoroughly delightful. Voca has never been heard here to advantage, and there seemed to warmth and naturalness in he than heretofore. She is one of few really talented singers opera today, and the music of ent offering displays her sources to the best advantage.

The supporting cast is of ex cellence, and rarely has a be ing chorus been heard here. Luneska, as the rival prim sang charmingly, as did Hills, who possess a richly contralto voice.

Mr Percival's impersonat young lover was decidedly tional, humorous rather t mental, but he sang well an ly shared in the evening's McCarthy, as the pilferin rector, contributed a large comedy of the performance. of the cast, of whom the than a score, were thoroug

"RACHEL GOLDSTEIN."

Charlotte Hunt Pleases in a Yiddish Character in Theodore Kremer's New Melodrama.

BOWDOIN-SQ THEATRE—"Rachel Goldstein," a melodrama in four acts by Theodore Kremer. The cast:

Joe Rubens	Rowland Edwards
Harry Gould	Harry E Humphrey
Malcolm Bradley	James S Barrett
Samuel Goldstein	Harry Brooks
Mike O'Hara	Tommy Shearer
One-Eyed Pete	Hal Brown
John	Samuel Brack
Augusta Gould	Katherine Clinton
Rachel Goldstein	Charlotte Hunt

Two large audiences enjoyed the pro- duction of Theodore Kremer's drama, "Rachel Goldstein," at the Bowdoin-sq theatre yesterday. Miss Charlotte Hunt appeared as the Yiddish heroine, Ra- chel, and won renewed favor by her clever portrayal of an interesting char- acter of the Hebraic type. The story of Samuel Goldstein and his daught shows incidents in the career of th immigrants, who seek their fortunes this country.

There are many thrilling situa revealed, and from the time they their homeland until the fall o final curtain the action is brisk. young scamp falls in love wi girl, and there is a villain and male associate who plot all schemes to gain advantage lovers. After one or two mur been accomplished the tide turns in favor of the young villain takes his own life a finale results.

The play was adequately Mr Edwards, a newcomer vorable impression as R heart. James Barrett a Clinton left no doubt in their auditors as to the tions of Malcolm Bradle Gould. Harry Brooks as migrant, Tommy Shea role and Harry Hump and Samuel Brack co New motion pictures

ORPHEUM

Lorimer's Melodie English Panto Entertainers W

Manager Moris theatre has arra the most entert sented at the Wi Not only are th pn their merits, varied, making ment that wel of theatre pa

Again head mer, the vers introduces a that he nev them types one of whi by his dai "Three J Lassie," " McIntyre mer's ca the can to retir "I've L such a ment h

The proved fore t cided other lishe com anc sun and wi

KEITH'S VAUDE

Bert Williams, Valerie Other Stars Present Pleasing Program.

This week's bill at Kei distinguished by the pr eral of the best known tainers, who are seen t vantage. Bert William of colored comedians, Walker, has, for inst tensely funny songs a fresh and amusing s which are the eccentr which only he can ex

Mr Williams' droll audience to laughing his first appearance, mirth increases until ing proportions. He that he has never but includes, greatly light, that highly ar neglected darkey,

Valerie Bergere, of a superior orde matics, presents, "His Japanese Wi Miss Bergere is of a U S senato Japanese, doesn' position, and t after the Japan band loves her so everything

For that mat lying motive serious, for and pleasing. ance of good

Miss Berge acter of th creature fr mirable sh repeated thoroughly appreciate husband others in acceptab

Anothe ing of the Bo widely Mr Su by K and was enco

SOCIAL LIFE OF BOSTON AND EN

ON ERDEEN

enant of o Tell of Against

SIS
HER

untess enant the nded inwith er-lic ht

ne t

PAUL REVERE HOUSE GIFT.

Faneuil Hall Chapter Also to Erect Bowlder in Reading.

Mrs. Ida Farr Miller opened her home yesterday at Wakefield for the annual meeting of Faneuil Hall chapter, D. A. R. These officers were elected:

Regent, Mrs. Josephine P. MacQuinn, Wakefield; vice-regent, Mrs. Emily P. Brown, Melrose; recording secretary, Mrs. Ida Farr Miller, Wakefield; financial secretary, Mrs. Rowena G. Fisher, Melrose; treasurer, Mrs. Hattie E. Johnson, Melrose; registrar, Mrs. Mary W. Warren, Wakefield; historian, Mrs. Ellen T. Brown, Melrose; directors, Mrs. Francis R. Nickerson, Stoneham; Mrs. Mary C. Winship, Reading; Mrs. Mary Holden Elms, Melrose Highlands, and Miss Emma Holden, Reading.

At the close of the business meeting the retiring regent, Mrs. Frances R. Nickerson, was presented with a badge of the order, ornamented with her ancestral bars.

It was voted to present to the Paul Revere house an antique desk, which had recently been procured by the chapter, also to erect a bowlder on the site of the First Church in Reading, which stood near what is now the Reading Common.

PLAY BY LOYOLA GUILD.

Crowded House Witnesses Comedy In Boston College Hall.

To a crowded house in Boston College all last night the Loyola Guild, an organization composed of relatives of mbers of the Jesuit order, successfully presented "The Parish Priest," a edy drama in three acts. The pro- on was under the direction of Pro- Joseph H. Willis of Boston Col- nd the proceeds are to be devoted Boston College building fund. y will be repeated tonight and v evening.

y's parochial school orchestra idge furnished the music last sted by the St. Mary's church Miss Mary Barr, director. e cast were Joseph H. Mc- dward Daly, Jr., Willard F. iam C. Gregory, Frederick John J. Henderson, Gene- van, Margaret Coveney, nd.

known women of Dor- nity last night held a arty in Navillus Hall, of the Boston College

AN TO TEACH.

In, Graduate In May 21.

pulls out of the will have on Miss Florence aughter of D. en route to er the aus- l of foreign usic in the Francisco me going f Japan, go, the George ies at untry ed in Col- the

SIMPLE DRESSES FOR SCHOOLGIRL

White Linens, Poplins and Reps, Made in One-Piece Style, Are Always in Good Taste for the Long, Warm Days.

ENVELOPE STYLE IS POPULAR WITH MOTHERS

The long, warm days of May and June will require a number of fresh little dresses for the school child, and it is a wise mother who saves both seamstress and laundress by selecting the simplest fashions to be had. Then the wee lady may appear every day in the spotless white that belongs to childhood.

White linens, poplins and reps, made in one-piece style, with box or side plaits from neck to hem, and a narrow belt at the waist, are always in good taste for school wear, and this year

HOUSEKEEP

By A

USE IN

Mrs. M. E. Br sent the followin country reader's Friday in regard carpet:

The worn carpe rug that will give to any of the facto is done. An ingra better results than I think four square one square foot of

CURTAINS IN C

I really think, M windows of your co be treated very sim hanging dotted Swis silk, why don't you hem at the bottom? a heading the width ered tub organdie is light, rattan-furnishe colored Japanese sil dining room.

OATMEAL C

To make this attract substitute, Annie H., cooked cereal, stir into chopped ham or bacon, apples into cutlet shap in hot lard and butter, half, and brown well on b with spiced prunes. If

SIMPLE LINEN FROCK FOR A GIRL EIGHT TO

Dress Is Made of Pink Linen and Is Trimmed with Narrow Lace Insertion and Fine Tucks. The Hat Is of Yellow Straw, with Mode Satin Ribbon and Daisies for Trimming.

white piques will be added to the smart list. A white pique frock may be made dainty by touches of hand scalloping one with embroidery cotton, and the alloping may extend down one side of front from neck to hem, a pearl on fastening through a buttonhole ch scallop.

plain color chambrays, in silk or cotton weaves, make ng school dresses.

olaided ginghams from Scot- particularly pretty for school wear, and have the advan- not soiling easily. These with their bright, soft always favorites with the when bought in good wear and launder ex- plaid gingham dress with the utmost plain- pattern giving all the y. Sometimes a pip- e added to the edge there should be no broidery trimmings ing in much better up these school envelope style, ut flat on the in two parts, s being con- ss along the arm seams flap, only tened for ent. Of of the hich is leeves. and sing bric he

CE.

ters, in ing od rs. e carry the chop illusion still further on company occasions, thrust a piece of uncooked macaroni into the end of each cutlet and cover with the regular paper "stocking."

JAPANESE FRITTERS.

"My dear Madame Grey," writes a Constant Reader, "can you give me a recipe for strawberry dumplings, and can you te.. me how to stuff prunes? These are two delicious tidbits that I have long wanted to know how to prepare. I enclose a recipe that I picked up in California, which I can guarantee is as dainty as the Japanese themselves.

"Put one-half cup of butter into one cup of boiling water and when melted add one cup of sifted flour all at once. Stir rapidly over the fire until the smooth mass cleaves from the side of the pan. Take from the fire and add one whole egg at a time until four have been used. Beat between each addition until the batter is smooth. Drop in teaspoonfuls into hot fat and fry. Serve with a liquid sauce flavored with vanilla."

Thank you. Here are the recipes you ask for:

SMALL STRAWBERRY DUMPLINGS.

Sift four even teaspoons of baking powder with two cups of flour and a saltspoon of salt. Rub in three even tablespoons of butter and mix with a scant one-half cup of milk. Roll out one-quarter inch thick and cut in rounds; lay four large strawberries on each and fold the edges over; turn over and lay the folded sides down in buttered cups and steam 20 minutes. Do not allow the water to stop boiling during that time. Serve with a hard sauce.

STUFFED PRUNES.

Select the largest prunes that you can buy; wash one-half pound, then cover with cold water and soak two or three hours. Cook in this water until almost done, then add one-quarter cup of sugar and a teaspoon of lemon juice. Finish cooking until the stones will slip , drain and remove stones, fill the tres with chopped nut meats, press ther and roll in powdered sugar.

ETCHERISM FOR EPICURES.

ellow isn't going to munch coun- cery fish-flavored crackers until ssolve," says one man who be- Fletcherism, "and he isn't sip dishwater coffee. He'll wn at one swallow if he has t on the stuff.

may not sound like an ar- Fletcherism, but it is. If ring themselves to eating will demand decently nd they will suffer less in consequenee thereof. a meal is all it ought t going to gobble it at es an hour. drowning everything with con- —he is going to go joy every morsel." ating advise a one- one that demands al. On the con- ows one to eat d it is chewed s. Eletcherism esent the ex- Less dyspep- slow way for n one being ecially those are partly ural secre- e for this t done in after it gan will of the of this eakfast d has- lk, or

RECEPTACLES

New Ones in Chin Violets, Pan

With the coming of several new receptacles sies and other tiny, sho soms are appearing in glass departments. Of t toad stool with perforat insertion of the stems is prettiest for pansies, as t flower faces completely hi For violets there is a broad glass dish with a bulging across the top. This hol stemmed little wild flow enough apart to make the bank of blossoms. It see one ought to be able to vase at home by fitting strainer into a finger bowl idea will prove equally good cups, anemones and primros the mesh of the net is coars Any yellow, red or white b cept roses, are admirably place in brass or copper jars holders have distinct advan ordinary vases, for the reaso may be used for other purp Nothing can be more char instance, and at the same tim pensive, than a shallow jar holding five jonquils and as ma of narcissus. When so few flo used they should be placed iron rings, to be found now i all art departments, and certain oriental shops. The rings a large enough to hold one flower, joined in groups of three or five. sets are put into any kind of s dish one chooses, filling it with The addition of small white pe just on a line with the top of the adds to the artistic effect. If the s are a bit small for the holders each be braced by putting a piece of m or a section of another stem into hole, the object is to make e flower stand erect. A better effect gained by having the stems irregu lengths, rather than all the same. A stiff stalk flowers are used in this wa and later in the spring twigs of appl and other fruit blossoms make a lovel table decoration.

Very long stem jonquils are effect- ive in a deep brass or copper urn. A large number is not required if the blossoms are first put into a tumbler or other small receptacle. This, filled with water, is placed in the metal. Mignonette is another flower that lends itself to metal holders with admirable results, especially as the stems soon defile the water and transparency then detracts from their beauty.

DON'T DANCE THE BABY.

"What there is in people which impels them to dance a baby up and down the very moment they get one in their arms is something I have never been able to answer satisfactorily," says an observer of babyhood. "It may, I admit, quiet them for the time being, but think of the after-effect! It is all wrong, and I verily believe that to just such excitement is due many of the nervous disorders of the children today. Let the little ones alone. They will find quite enough to interest them in what they see about them, if only they are given a chance to develop their powers of observation normally."

TERFLY" LIS STREET

diford and Her e Genuine Suc- Singing and od.

r THEATRE—Grace "The Golden Butacters:

.....Charles Purcell
.....Louis Casavant
.....W. J. McCarthy
ss Grace Van Studdiford
.....Walter Percival
.....Miss Alice Ellis
.....Joseph Carey
.....Miss Gene Luneska

always interesting, lden Butterfly" stands exhibit of this period. fair to say that Mr. old-fashioned, for his vened by political and his case supplied by Mr. omewhat clever libretto. in the light of some of peras this new piece does acing. It is a sort of go- and and comic opera. The erly orchestral and ell sung, particularly the ile of Act I. and "The Leg- lf King" in Act. III. There passages both in the songs t might in grand opera be ripitive passages, slightly of "Robin Hood," "The Stu- and "Red Feather," not to at frigid affair, "The Snow

t is an old one and tells of

GRACE VAN STUDDIFORD,
At the Hollis Street Theatre.

a polite comic opera villain—in this case he possesses the title of a baron. He has pretended to the heroine that he is the legitimate author of an opera in which she is to star, she makes a hit, but in the end finds that the opera is really from the brain and musical genius of her old love, Franz.

Miss Van Studdiford, as the governess who eventually becomes a star, was, to say the least, spirited both in her singing and acting throughout. This was true of the entire company, for they all worked as hard as though it was the opening of their New York season, and not the tag end in already somewhat besmuttered Boston. Miss Van Studdiford has grown somewhat thinner since her last visit here, and measured with the styles of the day she is singing on or off the stage, and there's a constant delight. In the song in the second act of "The Butterfly and the Clover" her voice showed to particular advantage. For the most part it was written to suit the prima donna's lower register, which is particularly sweet and melodious. But (and here we have it) is there any woman singer on the light opera stage today who can, so to speak, "let her go, boys" and hold up a whole ensemble number of 50 or possibly 75 people? The answer is, Grace Van Studdiford. The Hollis Street Theatre is not large, but had it been Mechanics' Hall in which "The Golden Butterfly" played last night every clear, bird-like note could have been heard of the star's remarkable voice, while her enthusiasm made even the audience feel as if it was part of their duty to join in the choruses or else pay a half-dollar extra on their seats.

Mr. McCarthy succeeds Mr. Harrison of the New York production in the part of the baron, and, considering some of the stale jokes he is required to toss, as it were (we cannot fairly say spring), gets away surprisingly well. He is funny in a polite way and his remarks about the girl who was so far back in the chorus that they had to remove the rear wall of the theatre to get her in, were genuinely funny.

Miss Gene Luneska, as the leading lady of the Budapest opera company, possesses an acrobatic voice, which she uses to good advantage, although its bounds and jumps are sometimes a little bit of a shock to the quiet moments of the opera, but her duet with Mr. Percival, "Off to Russia," is extremely well done. Mr. Percival is the hero, Prat and his best piece of work is his fak of the Russian prince, in which he sh unusual dramatic ability. His sin likewise, is dramatic, but not tuner

Mr. Purcell, who plays two part of the rich brewer in the first a the Russian prince in the seco plays a portrait of himself in t character on one side of a n which bears a striking resem Gov. Hughes. The opera Budapest, but then this is a so never mind.

The costumes are elabora and not particularly effecti chosen for their voices ra and the scenery, particul and third acts, extremel

PARK THE

Another audience l tre at the close of "The Travelling s ing well satisfied things that have act comedy since weeks ago were grounds. Marix elling salesman tribe. He is a Coghlan, pre poker game the genus of is played wi

Next Fr Sunday Fred Ni give anc zig-zag Niblo

BOWDOIN SQUARE THEATRE.

Immigrant Girl Is the Heroine of the Melodrama "Rachel Goldstein."

BOWDOIN SQUARE—"Rachel Goldstein," melodrama in four acts, by Theodore Kreimer.

Joe Rubens.....Rowland Edwards
Harry Gould.....Harry E. Humphrey
Malcolm Bradley.....James S. Barrat
Sam'l Goldstein.....Harry Brooks
Mike O'Hara.....Tommy Shearer
One-eyed-Pete.....Hal Brown
John.....Samuel Brack
Augusta Gould.....Katherine Clinton
Rachel Goldstein.....Charlotte Hunt

That Miss Charlotte Hunt is fitted for a part that requires fine character work was shown yesterday at the Bowdoin Square Theatre, when the Yiddish character, Rachel Goldstein, was presented by her. The part is one that calls for action and the plot is built around her. On shipboard, Rachel, an immigrant, meets a wealthy young man, Rubens, and he declares his love for her. A murder has been committed and Rubens is falsely accused. Then Rachel stands by her lover. Apart from the love scenes of the principals, there is of Joe Rubens, Tommy Shearer, an element of comedy which brightens the production. The third act is particularly good; it shows Rachel's home.

Miss Hunt received fine support from the stock company and much interest was centred in Rowland Edwards, who played capably and with ease the part of Joe Rubens. James Barrett said Katherine Clinton, Tommy Shearer, Harry Brooks, Hal Brown and Sam Brack were also very satisfactory. The moving picture program was entertaining.

AUSTIN & STONE'S MUSEUM.

Big dogs and little dogs and long-tailed, human-faced monkeys of assorted sizes gave an interesting series of acts at Austin & Stone's Museum yesterday. The show was by Prof. Wormwood's famous dog and monkey circus, and it was their return engagement here. Many children and hundreds of women welcomed the company.

The program included jumping, tight rope walking and acrobatic feats never before attempted by canines or simians, selections by the dog and monkey orchestra and several solos by dog vocalists.

"The Spray of Life," the Mitchells, the prize dancers of Scotland, and Johnson, the bag puncher, were other attractions. The return of the "Manhattan Girls" brought out hundreds of their admirers. They appeared in a lively comedy and a musical skit, "One Week at the Beach." It was full of fun, music and dancing.

A second stage show included acts by Dolly Carlmore, Roland and Morin, Hamilton and Buckley in "Mr. and Mrs. Bowser," and Tom Bullock in vocal selections, and a new list of motion pictures.

HOWARD AT IENAEUM.

A snappy military show was given yesterday at the Howard by the Yankee Doodle Girls. Sadie Huested, Julia Seyon, the Gladstone sisters and a chorus of 20 skipped around in a carnival of fun and gave a performance alive with wholesome wit.

The singing and dancing were of a fresh and attractive. In the burlesque olio were seen Sadie Huested in songs, the Seyons in a little comedy, "Nomansville"; the Grotesque Randolphs in "Chinatown"; Collins and Hawley, with bright sayings, and Davis and Hazelton, billed as "assassinators of sorrow." The two burlettas were entitled "At the Springs" and "Seeing Boston."

In the continuous part of the bill there were several genuinely amusing acts. Sam Mandell and the Wade sisters offered a singing specialty, and Max Brooks and Sadie Vedder contributed "The New Housemaid." The songs of Grace Orms, the "elongated comedienne," made a hit. Marion and Claude of Cleveland were clever comedians, and the dancing of Skinner and Wood was a feature. As an impersonator, Rosal made a hit. Gaines and Brown, negro entertainers, and the Howardscope rounded out a strong bill. Next week will be featured the famous film, the Summers-Britt contest.

GAIETY THEATRE.

A lively farce from the staged by Harry Emerson, the leading part, constitutes part of the show at the Ga this week given by th querladers company. The Americanized and called Broadway," and New situations are introduc large company of women is almost con and keeps things
merry clip.

A long list of s is on the bill, and olio of variety
Among the fea of Wilson, the Fox and Fox baritone soi comedy of row, and
It All," b
Fox. The costumes

A p rehe
"Ju
on

WILLIAMS CHEERED AT KEITH'S THEATRE

Favorite Arouses Enthusiasm—Other Acts on Program Please Large Audience in the Popular House.

Bert Williams retired at the conclusion of his act last night at Keith's to an enthusiastic demonstration. It was something new to Boston audiences to see the comedian as an individual entertainer, unattended by his colleague, George Walker. The separation is said to be only temporary. Mr. Williams' act is bubbling over with fun. He has many amusing songs and jokes yet nothing is so eagerly accepted as his clever "Nobody" and its distinctively "Williamsque" dance.

There is a small play by Grace Griswold, "His Japanese Wife," that is uncommonly well done. It introduces

WILL A

John P.
Transf

John P.
Jesuit sc to Bosto to Presid ton last
This seiman, ormitio
a mass with t
Mr.
the J lected grand succe
he q
50 agra wa
Un of
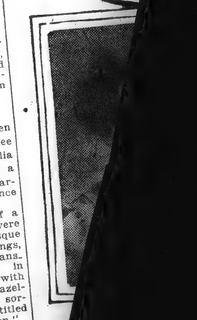
P

SOME OF THE WOMEN PR
MRS. M. ELIZABETH LYON.
(Photo by Conlin.)



THEATRE REPERTORY.

...d to a slight change
...ade in the repertory
...ment of E. H. Sothern
...Theatre beginning next
...day night of the first
..."Lord Dundreary" Mr.
...substituted "Richelieu,"
...first performance of the ...Sothern in this city. The ...announced now runs: Whole
...except Friday and Satur-
...Lord Dundreary"; Friday
...ieu"; Saturday night, Mr.
...ties Marlowe in "Hamlet."
...week's repertory remains
...announced. Seats for the
...will go on sale Thursday

OBE THEATRE.

...excellent bill of vaudeville
...is presented at the Globe
...and Monday patrons were
...d. Martyne and Hardy, a
...and woman, do a clever act,
...king and quick changing;
...d Welcome are a couple of
...nders; the Stoughtons, "the ...gentleman athletes," do sur-
...nes. Frank Cullen has sev-
...ongs; Jack Clalvane has sev-
...e pleasing pictorial numbers,
...ctures are above the average.
...be a complete change of pic-
...songs on Thursday.

CASTLE SQUARE.

...t week of "The Runaway Girl"
...Castle Square. This is the best
...ly to the popularity of this mu-
...medy, especially as the fourth
...of its run began last night, and
...o signs of diminishing audiences.
...gh its production as acted by the ...Craig stock company and a large
...s runs a vein of merriment, and
...is a constant succession of lively
...catchy songs. Everybody in the
...has a part in the success of "The ...away Girl." But a few more weeks
...ain, and then Mr. Craig will have
...e Geisha" ready for production.

THEATRE PREMIER.

At the Theatre Premier the feature attraction is the "Cameraphone," presenting this week Taylor and Hand in a brand new act, a "Rube sketch," Rose Bergere with songs, Charles Ellington, the yodler, a humorous sketch, "The Hand of Fate," William Mandeville, operatic singer, the Spencer quartet, "Farmer Boy's Fun," a singing and whistling specialty, and "Sherry Number," from the New York Theatre.

A fine motion picture bill is also given. Miscellaneous views of various happenings and illustrated songs received much applause. On Thursday the program will be changed.

"POP" CONCERT PROGRAM.

The program of the "Pop" concert in Symphony Hall tonight, Mr. Strube conductor, will be as follows: March, "Black Bess," Strube; overture, "The Beautiful Galatea," Suppe; waltz, "Pres de Lac," Waldteufel; selection from "Faust," Gounod; overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; Scene, Religieuse, Massenet (Mr. Keller); ballet music from "Coppelia," (Delibes); overture, "1812," Tshaikowsky; selection from "La Grande Duchesse," Offenbach; two dances from "Nevin," (a) German; Narcissus," (b) "Mit Bomben und Granaten," Punch.

REDUCTION

RATIO

12x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

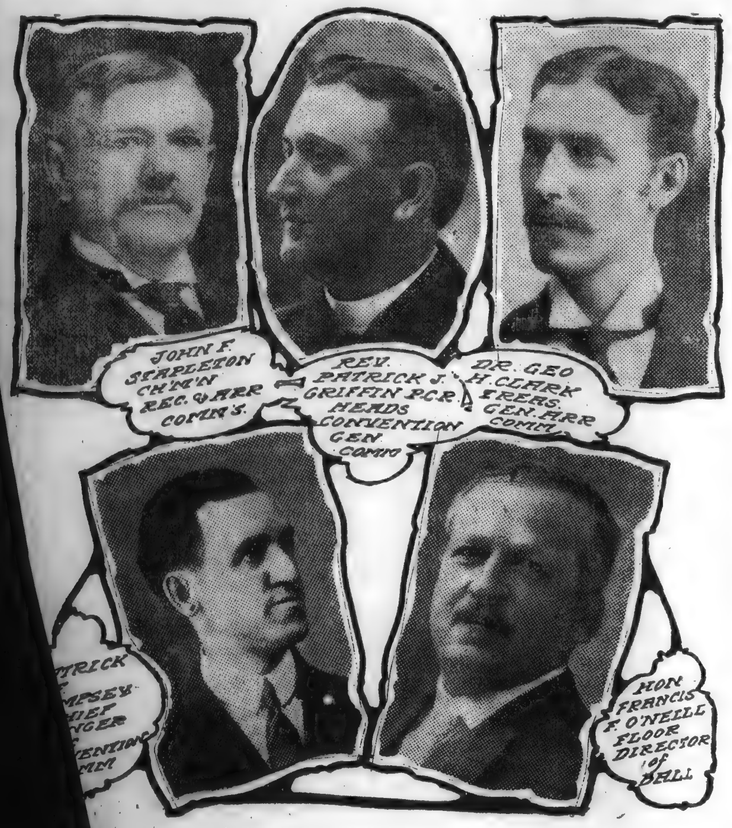
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

STATE CONVENTION IN HOLYOKE.

Massachusetts Catholic Order of Foresters Will Send 600 Delegates for Transaction of Business May 26.



be the largest state con- held by the members of the s Catholic Order of For- that to be held in Hol- nesday, May 26, and the of the order are ar- the visitors the best so- accorded a similar state.

delegates with, in all e number of visitors of the state, will be one of them will be . The delegates will 30,000 members, the tholic organization union, and in the be a great many nt clergymen of of women to the of recent date, ociety is taken will be more in attendance will be espe- women mem- ention will the found- nt of the Boston, large- Arch- dis- the its

and their friends and will be attended by all of the state officers, and this will give the members-at-large an opportunity of seeing the men under whose able management the order has made a larger net increase than was ever made in any one year. The present high chief ranger is Charles E. Bonning of Malden, and the present high court chaplain of the order is Rev James H. O'Neil, LLD, of East Boston, both of whom are delegates to the convention.

Those in charge of the entertainment, which will include a trip to Mt Tom on Thursday, are: General committee, Rev Patrick J. Griffin, Charles F. Stapleton chairman, Dr George H. Clark treas, Fatrick F. Dempsey sec, James F. Bartley, Jos. O'Neil, John J. McIntee, Francis F. O'Neil, who will be floor director at the ball Tuesday evening, May 25, Daniel Cray, Diamond P. Kane. William Pendergast, John T. Freeman, James Mullen, Mrs Margaret A. Bosworth, Mrs Margaret Clark, Mrs Margaret Hyde, Mrs Bridget Donoghue. Miss Katherine Griffin, Miss Helen Gorman, Mrs Mary E. McTigue, Mrs Margaret A. Rockwood, Miss Julia A. Stone, Mrs Mary Green, Mrs Mary A. A. O'Connell, Mrs Bridget E. O'Donnell, Mrs Johanna Ward, Mrs Mary McGregor, Mrs Nora Donoghue, Miss Mary Shea, Miss Katherine Sullivan, Miss Sadie V. Sullivan, Mrs Margaret Sullivan, Miss Frances J. Cummings, Mrs Blanche McConville.

Assisting in entertaining at the event on May 25 will be Richard F. Stapleton, John B. Shea, William Davitt, James F. Bartley, James M. Myers, Henry Frappier, Arthur Bruillet, Lawrence J. Dowd, John T. Freeman, Joseph O'Neil.

CONCRETE BRIDGE OF 56 BC.

Still Stands In Good Repair In the South of France.

In the south of France is a concrete arch bridge known as the Pont du Gard, which was erected in the year 56 BC.

The concrete in this was not composed of crushed stone or other small aggregate of the variety now employed in concrete bridge work, but was of the old style, consisting of alternate layers of large and small stones, gravel, etc, and of cementitious materials.

Vitruvius describes the materials and methods in use before the Christian era, and other writers like Alberti in 1485 and Polladio in 1570 accurately describe the method which "the ancients" (as they call them) employed, "of using boards laid on edge and filling the space between with cement and all sorts of small and large stones mingled together."

It is very likely that the Pont

J
523 - 525 Washi
GREA
W
Today an Co., and while th in the firm nece
the requiremen
after the firm
Space pe
To enabl entire stock o
NOTE on approva
92 Tailore
22 Tailor
15 Covert
24 Eveni
97 Silk
13 Rain
10 Silk
110 Sepa
8 Silk
29 Sep
17 Fea
57 To
43 T
15 T
5 V
25 S
79
49
3
27
17
5
22
1
1

DEN BUTTERFLY" S AT THE HOLLIS

ddiford Takes the Music Too Se- ious Mr. McCarthy Is a Relief, as , Who Is Not a Grand Vocalist.

w three- mith and forth to Theater ses were appoint- impres- music Koven ng, al- sung Van t act. sup- part, fault ut it that act was low as rk- cal o does well when the music is within the limitations of her voice and style. Moreover, she is most efficiently supported. In fact, the company is one of the most capable and most entertaining seen here this season. It needs to be to do justice to the scheme of "The Golden Butterfly," which deals with the fortunes of two songbirds pursued by an impresario, a composer, a Russian prince and a Hungarian count. The scene is laid in Buda Pesth; and that may explain why Petoffy, the rich brewer, speaks English with a strong German accent. Against the romantic interest of the plot is pitted a strong comedy element, which pleased last night's audience immensely. Even the strolling band feature, though stale in conception, was captivating in its execution. Mr. McCarthy made much of the part of Baron Van Amenkoff. His performance was bright and skilful. It had a great deal to do with the success of the piece. Mr. Percival's performance was also enthusiastic and enjoyable.

Minor Parts Well Done.

Most of the minor parts were also well done, and the chorus conducted itself with uncommon liveliness. Indeed, the chorus work was one of the best features of the second act, which takes place in the green room of the opera house. One of the small but impressive parts was Charles W. Butler's call-boy To-To.

The opera is handsomely staged. As a matter of fact, its scenic and dramatic attractions are stronger than its musical attractions. Judging by the hearty reception it got last night, "The Golden Butterfly" will have a very successful day at the Hollis.

UAKERS HOLD A TOWN MEETING

est Against Loss of Six- r-a-Quarter Car Tick- ets Privilege.

phia, May 10.—A town meeting the famous meeting of 1905, to a political revolution in was held tonight at the f Music to protest against e in street car fares caused dition of six tickets for a e academy was crowded to and about 15,000 persons able to secure admission meetings on the outside. ere adopted calling for restoration of the tickets al of State Senator Clar- n his position as repre- e city on the board of transit company. A ominent citizens was y the mayor, councils mpany of the action ng. This committee o take legal action . Before the meet- ades of indignant ions of the city to pid Transit Com- pany, controlling in this city. In agreement with e should be no fare. Subese- e of transfer issued strip s. Suit was restrain the use of the as decided, eld by the e rate of the com- gulations his rate. advan- he sale enator n, the

NOVELTIES ON THE KEITH PROGRAM

"His Japanese Wife" Easily Star Attraction of the Headliners.

"JOYLAND" GOES SOME FOR FUN

Bert Williams of Williams and Walker in Monologue—Other Funny Folks on Bill.

Velerie Bergere, in the title role of "His Japanese Wife," a bright little playlet by Grace Griswold, is easily the star attraction on the Keith bill this week, notwithstanding the fact that the bill is made up largely of headline attractions. The skit is not a new one, either to followers of vaudeville or to Miss Bergere, but it is one the presentation of which has much to do with its attractiveness. Surrounding Miss Bergere are Herbert Warren, who plays the part of the husband of the little Jap, Emma Campbell, Eda Bothner and Clarence Reams, all of whom have incidental parts.

Another unusually attractive number, especially because of the good music and picturesque scenery, is that presented by Clara Belle Jerome and her company, who are booked as "a great bunch of broilers" and lived up to their appellation. Their skit is entitled "Joyland," which is as good a title as could be dug up.

Then there's Bert Williams of the famous blackface firm of Williams and Walker, in a monologue skit. The fact that it's him is sufficient proof of the quality of the number. And he lived up to his reputation. Still another number of interest was that of the Sutcliffe Troupe, Scottish pipers, drummers, dancers and acrobats. The other entertainers of the week include Ben Beyer and his brother in a comedy cycling act; Netta Vesta, a captivating comedienne; Ralph Smalley, the violincello virtuoso; Engene and Willie Howard, presenting the Messenger Boy and the Actor; the Four Onetti Sisters in an acrobatic and gymnastic number and the Kinetograph with a lot of new motion pictures.

EVERYBODY LIKES SHOW AT COLONIAL

"A Stubborn Cinderella" at the Colonial Theater was liked from the very start, and the audience last evening gave every indication that the prosperity would continue for a long time to come. John Barrymore is the life of the cast so far as the men are concerned. The other comedians are all entertaining. The ladies are led by Sallie Fisher and she is easily the most winsome and charming of them all. The array of pretty girls is quite the most notable that the Colonial Theater has had this year.

THE "POPS"

Symphony Hall would seem to be the Mecca of the musical public, judging from tre large audiences which have attended the "Pops" during the first week of the regular summer season. Last night was Wagner Night and the audience in the balconies seemed to have as much enjoyment over the program as those seated at the tables where refreshments were served. The music arranged by Conductor Strube for the coming nights has been chosen to meet the popular taste, as will be shown by the following numbers which are on the program for this evening:

March, "Black Bess,".....Strube.
Overture, "The Beautiful Galatea".....Suppe.
Waltz, "Pres de Toi".....Waldteufel.
Selection, "Faust".....Gounod.
Overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn.
Scene Religieuse.....Massenet.
Solo Violoncello, Mr. J. Keller.
Ballet Music, "Coppelia".....Delibes.
Overture, "1812".....Tschaikowsky.
Organ, Mr. Marshall.
Selection, "La Grande Duchesse"..Offenbach.
Two Dances from "Henry VIII."....German.
Narcissus.....Nevin.
March, "Mit Bomben und Granaten"....Bilse

AUNT MARY E YOUTHFUL

May Robson and a Capable Co venation in Capital Style—D in the Cast and the Play

"The Rejuvenation of Aunt Mary" sounds intresting, to start with, and after witnessing its presentation at the Tremont Theater last night by that inimitable and highly versatile comedienne, May Robson, one is not at all surprised that this delightful American comedy has enjoyed an unbroken run of over two years. It is so wholesome, so droll, so lively and thoroughly interesting that it cannot fail to entertain.

Aunt Mary is a dear old soul, a spinster, of course, and her nephew is one of those good hearted, irrepressible college boys Boston is so used to. Auntie has plenty of money and is generous, too, until Jack gets sued for breach of promise. Then comes chaos for Jack and he seeks shelter among college friends.

Jack's friends lure indignant aunty to him with a message that he is sick, and then comes the metamorphosis brought about by a dinner at which the dear old lady is the guest of honor. Aunty is game from the oysters to the champagne, and, after all, she wasn't as old as she thought she was and proves to be the best fellow of them all.

Old Maid Becomes Young.

What a delightful character May Robson has made of quaint old Aunt Mary. Her mannerisms one laughs at, but there are heartaches, too, and Miss Robson can bring tears as well as smiles, and though we roar all through the banquet while the old maid becomes young and the hermit heart of her is thawed by lights and the inspiring happiness of young people, one weeps with her when it seems as if the boy she idolizes has really gone bad. That is why May Robson is a real artist. She plays with consummate skill on all the chords of the human heart with equal sincerity and conviction.

Jack Storey is John Watkins, Jr. Jack they call the lovable, happy-go-lucky fellow, and Mr. Storey has made him just the kind of a lad one would go through fire and water for, and one gladly forgives him for shooting the cook, pummeling the cab man and even for succumbing to the siren song of the adventuress, and cannot help but be sorry for him when Aunt Mary turns him away to shift for himself, and is delighted in the end when Aunt Mary, now rejuvenated, forgives and forgets and whizzes away in a big red auto clothed in bright red herself and feeling like a two-year-old.

Girl From Kalamazoo.

Lillian Westner is the girl from Ka mazoo who gets jovial Jack into much hot water with aunty, and really isn't inclined to be very har Jack, but is none the less gratefu Edward Racey, who, as Bob Bur Jack's chum, comes so gallantly to rescue and leads Aunt Mary to downfall, aided and abetted by Decker, who as Mitchell, anoth Jack's chums, has much to do w straightening out of the tangle.

The work of the whole cast is ingly convincing and natural is not greatly to be wond sidering the long run the joyed. The men are all g wom for siste in t cont the body Thon as in 200 Bef large Davi in "T ing t usual day. forma the pa a rec proba gle pa The has s as the FOU The Salesm last Mark love opera ing, in d cont mar are au th s

...S AT ...TRES

...cal Plays ...tainment

...Rejuvenation of ...The Golden But... ...to Keith's—"A ...ial—Last Week ...at the Majestic ...lesman" at the ...e-Sq—"Ragged ...—New Palace ...Shows—Com...

...splendid charac... ...old music mas... ...announced his ...lay next season. ...d will enact his ...aster" for the ...which has been ...f time his per... The tendency ...hey have ap... ...one part is to ... Mr Warfield ...play has been ...single season, ...act to perfect ...ns. The act... ...same charm ...Warfield first

...yers ...elodrama. ...Goldstein" ...beautiful ...is in love ...rd. While ...the home ...y Rachel ...the body ...scheming ...hat they ...witness. ...urder on ...his res... ...e crime ...where

...pisodes ...se the ...heatre, ...current ...ole of ...a new ...Ed... ...eading

...e the ...ther... ...ulous ...mmy ...rant, ...own, ...Sam ...tion

...ns. ...on ...ek. ...n- ...n, ...," ...of ...at ...e ...y ...D

vide a rousing continuous bill. Sam Mandell and the Wade sisters will appear in an act filled with merry material, Brooks and Vedder in their "New Housemaid" act are sure to please and Grace Orma, the elongated comedienne, will delight in merry songs.

Then come Claude and Marion Cleveland, "top notchers," in the fun line. Others on the bill include Skinner and Wood, dancing graduates, Rosalie a versatile impersonator, Gaines and Brown vocalists and shoe steppers, Lonnie Follett, the ladlie comedian and the pleasing Howardscope pictures.

Billy Watson's Company the Attraction at the Columbia.

There are several good comedians who visit the Columbia in the course of a season, but not one of them has a larger following than Billy Watson. Watson has been an established favorite in Boston for years, and those who go to the Columbia this week will have the satisfaction of seeing Watson at his best in "Krausemeyer's Alley," which made him famous. The piece has been rewritten and brought up to date, and the original Grogan—Billy Spencer—has been engaged to play his old role.

Watson has also secured the latest New York song hits for this production, several of the numbers being advance songs which he will use in next season's show, and which will be sung at the Columbia for the first time on any stage. There are several favorites in the cast, including Eva Van Osten, Alice Gilbert, Margaret Sheridan, Lulu Leslie, Marion Macey and Eva Goodale. An act specially engaged is the International four, one of the best quartets now before the public.

Wednesday evening Jim Galvin, the well-known Brooklyn heavyweight, will meet Walter Willoughby, the Cleveland whirlwind, in a finish catch-as-catch-can wrestling bout. Friday night the amateurs will assist.

Wormwood's Animal Circus at Austin & Stone's Museum.

Wormwood's dog and monkey circus is coming to Austin & Stone's museum this week for a limited stay. In the company are a quartet of musical canines and an orchestra of dog and monkey performers. There are also comedians, tumblers, dancers, hoop rollers and all-round gymnasts, who seem to enjoy the parts assigned to them quite as much as their audiences.

Among other features will be "The Spray of Life," the great illusion now entering on its second month here; the Mitchells, the prize dancers of Scotland, and Johnson, bag puncher.

For the theatre shows the management announces the return of the "Manhattan Girls," Lawrence and Dale, singing and talking act; Tom Bullock, vocalist; Happy Harry Hamilton and Miss Louise Buckley in the comedy, "Mr and Mrs Bowser," and the latest moving pictures.

Gay Masqueraders in Burlesque at the Gaiety.

The attraction for the week at the Gaiety theatre will be the Gay Masqueraders extravaganza company. Chief among the comedians will be Sophia Tucker, baritone and coon shouter; Wilson, in a sensational bicycle act, and Harry Emerson, who is the principal comedian in the burlesque entitled "A Night on Broadway." This is a piece with a plot to it and a most interesting story, declared to be full of fun in situations and dialogue. It is an adaptation from the German and has been handsomely produced by Frank Tannehill.

The management has paid particular attention this season to the character of the chorus, and there will be found a bevy of genuine beauties in its ranks. One of the scenes shows the house and grounds of a newly elected alderman, and the fete which is in progress gives splendid opportunities for a display of the costumes and of the personal charms of the young women.

First Special Night at the Symphony Hall "Pop" Concerts.

Tomorrow evening will be the first special night at the "pops," and conductor Strube has arranged a Wagner program, which is always popular with patrons of these concerts. Owing to requests the large organ in Symphony hall will be used more the coming weeks than previous years, and programs will be selected in which this instrument will take a prominent place.

Mr Jacques Hoffmann will play the solo for violin in "Album Leaf," by Wagner, tomorrow evening, and Mr J. Keller the 'cello solo in Massenet's "Scene Religieuse" on Tuesday. The program for tomorrow evening is:

March, Coronation.....Meyerbeer
Overture, The Barber of Seville.....Rossini
Danse Piemontese.....Sinigaglia
First time.
Waltz, Enjoy Life.....Strauss
Prelude, Lohengrin, Act I.....Wagner
Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner
Album Leaf.....Wagner
Solo violin, Mr J. Hoffmann.
Overture, Tannhauser.....Wagner
Overture, Czar and Carpenter.....Lortzing
Valse and Pizzicato from the suite Sylvia.....Delibes
Selection, The Fortune Teller.....Herbert
March, Merry Soldiers.....Sabathil

New Palace Theatre.

illustrated talk on "Italy, from Vesuvius to the Alps." In this zig-zag journey the entertaining traveler will take his audience on a picture pilgrimage from end to end of Italy, old and new, along the highways and byways of ancient and modern Rome, showing its temples, its tombs, its modern architectural splendor as well as the colossal ruins of past centuries.

Milan, Venice, Florence and other noted places will be shown in moving and still views, many of them beautifully colored. His closing subject next Friday evening and Saturday afternoon will be "London, from Whitechapel to Windsor Castle."

Additions to the Shubert List.

The association of Liebler & Co with the Messrs Shubert will give the latter no less than 26 additional attractions for their theatres next season. The list includes Eleanor Robson in "The Dawn of Yesterday," Viola Allen in "The White Sister," William Hodge in "The Man from Home," Wilton Lackaye in "The Battle," Dustin Farnum in "Cameo Kirby," Walker Whiteside in "The Melting Pot," William Farnum in a new play, Ezra Kendall in "The Vinegar Buyer," Madge Carr Cook in a new play by Booth Tarkington and H. L. Wilson, "In the Blood," with H. B. Warner, a new play by E. M. Royle; "Miss Philura," with Chrystal Herne, a new play by Henry Blossom; "The Lady of Dreams," by Edmund Rostand; "Foreign Exchange," by Booth Tarkington and Harry Leo... Wilson; "The Deliverer," by Louis N... Parker; "For Better, for Worse," b... Cleveland Moffett; "A Little Brother ... the Rich," by Joseph M. Patterso... "Esther Frear," by Cleveland Moffe... "Vera, the Medium," by Richard Ha... ing Davis; "The Ordeal," by J... Loughran; "The Renegade," by H... Armstrong; a new play by O. He... (Sydney Potter); "The Squaw M... (two companies); "The Head of ... House," by Edward W. Townsend... Frank O'Malley; "Mrs Wiggs o... Cabbage Patch" (two companies... "The Man from Home," by ... Tarkington and Harry Leon ... (special company).

Boston Operatic Societ...

The Boston operatic society ... an operatic concert at Potter h... nesday evening, May 19. The ... will be selected from the oper... the society has produced, ... "Robin Hood," "Erminie," "... and "Atlantis," the latter bei... bert Forrest Odell, the music... of the society.

Among the soloists wil... Sophye Barnard, Miss Louis... Miss Yvonne Fortin, Mis... Mahlon, Miss A. Bertha Cote... George B. Bigelow, Harry ... Bowen, William Wilson... Wingfield and a chorus o...

Entertainments Th...

Melville and Higgins, ... one of the biggest hits ... Keith's theatre this ... the exceptionally stro... important feature will ... pearance of the "Gr... trilloquist. Others wil... in his pianologue; "... roll Johnson, Clinton... ell and Niblo.

The program at ... will include Jack ... tle Scotch comed... of mimics; Eddi... Winning Widow... "The Sis Perkin... Craig and other...

The program ... theatre will in... trio, Marion ... John Mahot... Laura Dean... Farrell, Bi... Dwyer, tri...

Austin... an inte... lection... song...

tour with "Th... season.

Howard Hu... theatrical ag... been engaged... "The Bridge... pert Hughe... in Provide...

From th... Lorimer ... Orpheum ... popular ... might be...

Ralp... phony ... cuit a... Boston...

Cou... Peac... sho... It ... eve... be... fo... 6...

...S OF JAPAN BESTOWED UPON UNIVERSITY PRESIDENT

...LA·K·C·M·G·

PRESIDENT ELIOT of HARVARD.

...nese decoration, official donor and college head upon whom it will be conferred.

HOPES TO FIND A TRUE LAYMAN HERE

Canon Henson Declares He Wants One for an Exhibit in England.

IS ENTERTAINED BY EPISCOPALIAN CLUB

Bishop Lawrence, Bishop Parker and Others Also Deliver Addresses at Reception.

(Continued From First Page.)

on, my name will be made. If I have spoken in a tone of banter, I hope you will attribute it to the attenuation of intellect that is incident to a traveler on American railways."

Bishop Lawrence devoted his remarks to witty quips at the expense of Bishop Parker, Canon Henson, Dr. Babcock and other prominent members of the congress, frankly explaining at the outset that he did not wish anybody to take him seriously, as what he should say would be "in fun." Incidentally Bishop Lawrence remarked that he could well remember the date of the first church congress, because on that day he was married. "It is strange," he added, "how one recalls such little things."

A Bit More Serious.

Dr. Van De Water was a bit more serious than his brother speakers. "Truth," he began, "is not and never has been a thing that falls from the skies, and no man can ever pick it up in concrete form and claim it for himself. No man has the whole of it, no church can claim it all. No creed can get it. The church congress is a kaleidoscope, to be turned in as many revolutions as possible. There is no organization of churches in this country that can more rightly point to a record of truth than this church congress." Dr. Van De Water emphasized the fact that nobody ever advanced the cause of truth by running away from it and on this he hung an appeal for straightforward, open discussion in the forum of the congress.

"God has work that is not done unless we do it," said Bishop Parker. In illustration, he related an anecdote about a miner in Yorkshire, England, who kept asserting there was no God. "If there is a God," shouted the miner, "let Him strike me down." As Bishop Parker told it, a bystander became weary of hearing this line of talk and he smote the miner between the eyes, knocking him flat on his back. Then, looking down on the prostrate miner, he exclaimed, "God is not needed, for as one of His weakest servants I have done the job."

President H. Saville of the Episcopalian Club presided at the reception. A collation was served.

DUFF SENT TO DR...

London, May 10.—Arthur ... British minister resident ... public of Cuba, has bee... minister at Dresden. He ... ceeded at Havana by S... councillor of Embassy at ...

AMERICAN TOUR...

London, May 10.—A ... Tangier to the Daily ... is reported from Meg... of American tourists ... prisoners by natives ... is the most southern ...

IS SEAWO...

The steamer Ma... rett, which was r... yard Sound se... finally floated a... repaired at Ne... day from Nev... since her dis...

...R FINDS WAY ...O SOLVE CRISIS

...o Do What Is ...lers Those Who ...ne to Stay.

...L.—A solution of ...ereby Premier ...agues in the ... posts, was ...between the ...which con... morning. ...Petersburg ...r later, ...rial re... of the ...grati... ...lining ...n of ...will ...tte

GRANT LICENSE TO LUNCH CART OWNER

Case Against Three Chelsea Employees Placed on File.

The Chelsea lunch cart issue, which stirred that city a week ago, when three employees in a lunch cart of James H. Semple, on Broadway, were brought into court on the ground that the cart had not been licensed, was disposed of yesterday, when the board of license commissioners granted the license, and the case against Semple's three employees was placed on file.

It was stated that the Rev. Herbert W. Stebbins, now chaplain in the State prison, who was given the licensing power after the big fire, granted permission to Semple to do business. The commissioners did not become aware ... was without a license un... time for

HAINS ... TO

Counsel ... Plea ... "

COWA... SA...

Jurors As... of ...

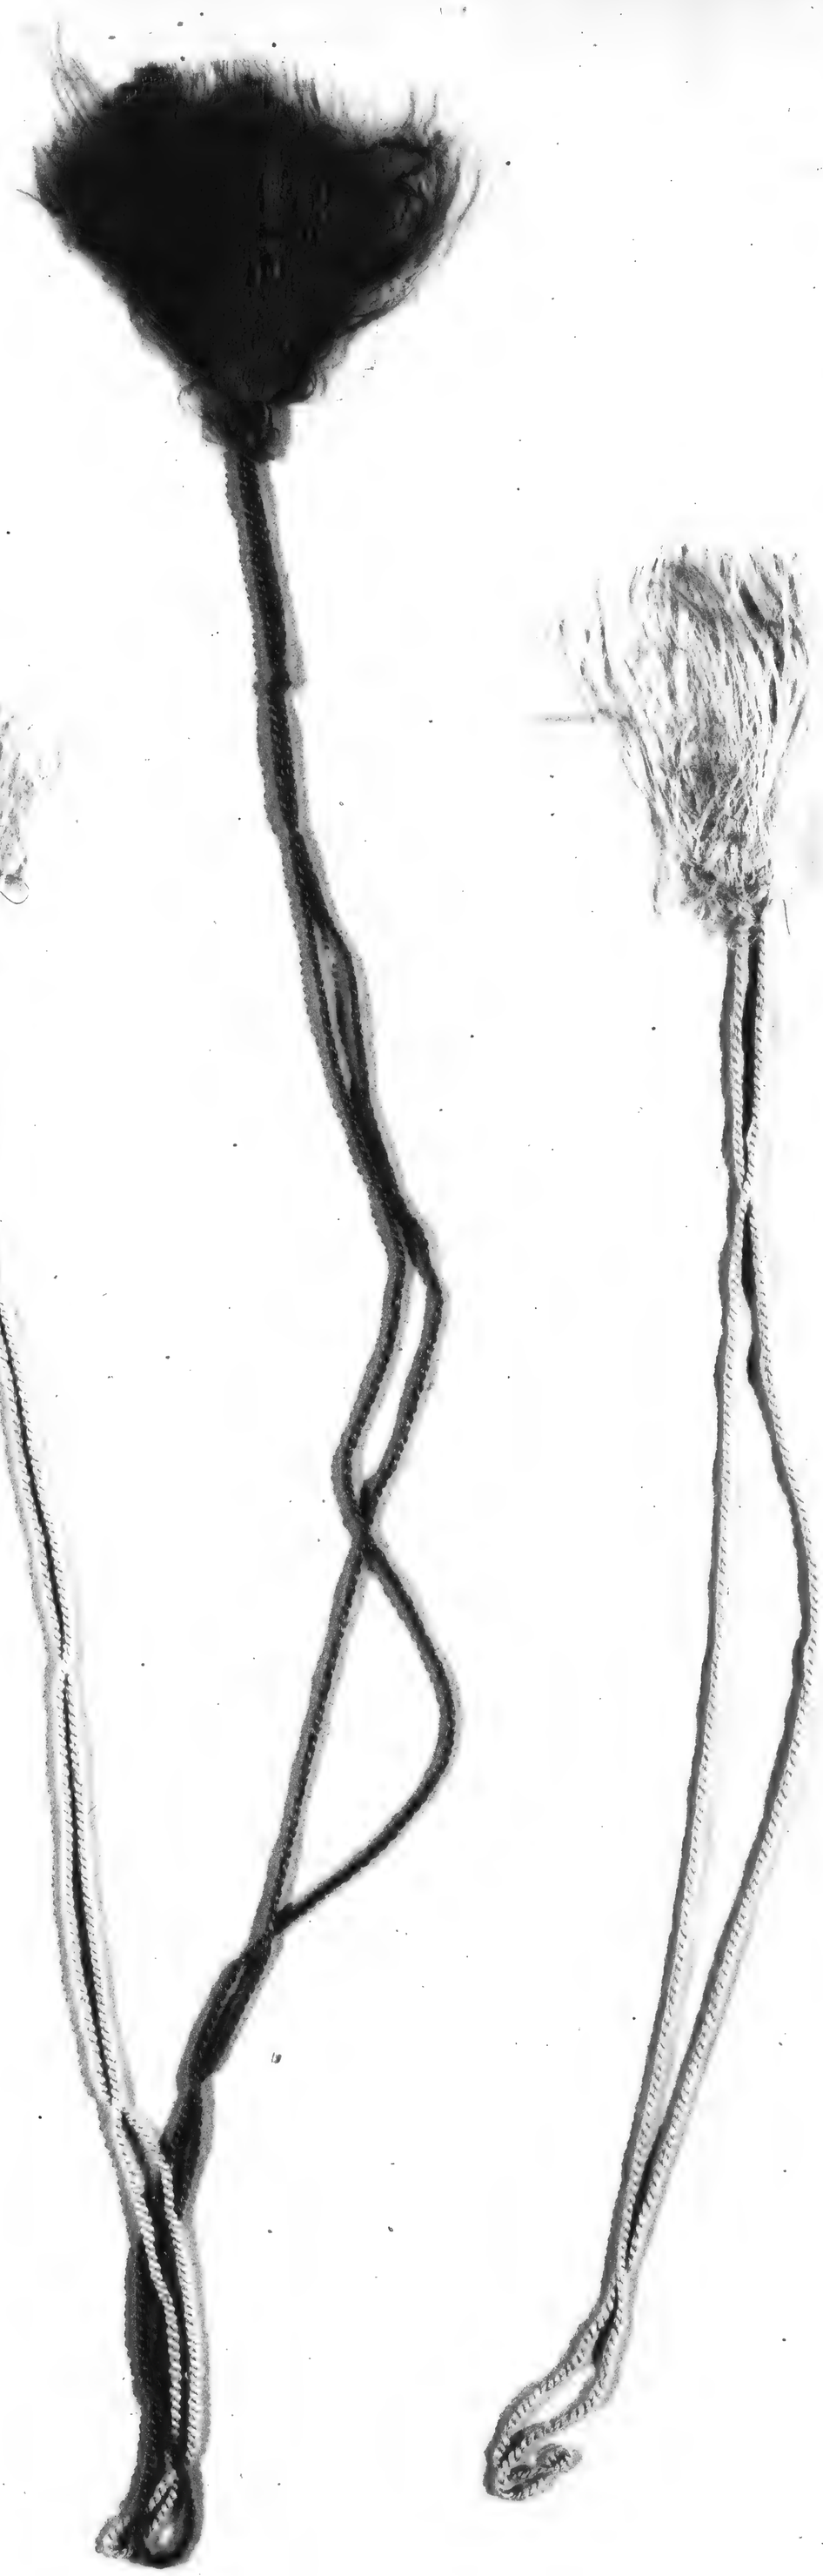
Flushi... more, o... tion, af... then th... for ki... Baysid... pass i... may ... or ho... brief. ... the ... follo... ic p... pea... fin...

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE



BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

END OF VOLUME

VOLUME 27

BSO Pops

1909 - 1910

Shipman's Scrap Book
FOR DUPLICATE ORDER NUMBER 12
ASA L. SHIPMAN'S SONS
NEW YORK

HILL, SMITH & CO.
STATIONERS AND BLANK BOOK MANUFACTURERS
8 MILK STREET,
BOSTON.
Job No. D1662
Duplicate this book by sending the above number.

Return
to Symphony Hall
Boston

Season

1909-1910.

THE BOSTON HERALD,
WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 1, 1909.

ENGAGES NEW FIRST HORN.

Symphony Secures Georg Wendler—Now Has Two Best in Country.

Mr. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, announces that Mr. Fiedler has engaged a new first horn for the orchestra to take the place of Mr. Schmid, who retired last spring. His name is Georg Wendler and he comes from Hamburg.

With Mr. Wendler and Mr. Max Hess the orchestra will now have two of the best horns in the country. The problem of getting a good player of this most difficult instrument is one of the hardest that faces the conductor and management of an orchestra, because in the whole world there are probably not more than a dozen men fit to hold such a place and few of these are available. Mr. Wendler will be the only new member of the orchestra, although in addition to Mr. Schmid, Mr. Scheurer, who shared the first desk of the viola section with Mr. Ferir, also retired at the end of last season. His place, however, will be taken by Mr. Rennert, a most talented viola player, who, since he came to America in the second year of Dr. Muck's regime, has been in the second violin section.

The auction sales of seats for the season will take place in the last week of this month. The $18 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold on Monday, the 27th, and the $10 seats on Tuesday, the 28th. The $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday, the 30th, and the $10 seats on Friday, October 1.

The first public rehearsal will be given on Friday afternoon, Oct. 8, with the first concert the following evening, and Mme. Louis Homer of the Metropolitan Opera Company will be the soloist.

BOSTON JOURNAL-
-WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 1, 1909.

MME. HOMER FIRST SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Will Sing at Opening Rehearsal on Oct. 8 and Concert on Oct. 9.

WENDLER ENGAGED AS NEW FIRST HORN

Comes From Hamburg to Fill the Place of Schmid—Auction Sale of Seats Is Held This Month.

Mme. Louise Homer, the celebrated Boston contralto, is to be the first soloist of the next Symphony season. She will sing at the opening rehearsal on Friday afternoon, Oct. 8, and at the first concert on the following Saturday evening, Oct. 9.

The auction sales of seats for the next Symphony season will take place in the last week of this month. The $18 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold on Monday, the 27th, and the $10 seats on Tuesday, the 28th. The $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday, the 30th, and the $10 seats on Friday, Oct. 1.

Manager Ellis announces that Mr. Fiedler has engaged a new first horn to take the place of Mr. Schmid, who retired last spring. The new player is Georg Wendler, and he comes from Hamburg. With Mr. Wendler and Max Hess, the orchestra will now have two of the best horns in the country. The problem of getting a good player of this most difficult instrument is one of the hardest that faces the conductor and management of an orchestra, because in the whole world there are probably not more than a dozen men fit to hold such a place, and few of these are available. Mr. Wendler will be the only new member of the orchestra, although, in addition to Mr. Schmid, Mr. Scheurer, who shared the first desk of the viola section with Mr. Ferir, also retired at the end of last season. His place, however, will be taken by Mr. Rennert, a most talented viola player who, since he came to America in the second year of Dr. Muck's regime, has been in the second violin section.

MME. LOUISE HOMER TO BE FIRST SOLOIST OF SYMPHONY SEASON

COPYRIGHT A. DUPONT, 1909

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,
SEPTEMBER 1, 1909

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Another Symphony Season

The members of the Symphony Orchestra are beginning to return to town as their various engagements and vacations come to an end. The men who have been in Newport are expected back next week, and the week after will bring back the twenty men who have been playing during the summer at Bar Harbor under the leadership of Mr. Strube.

There will be but one new face in the orchestra this season, Mr. Fiedler having engaged George Wendler of Hamburg as alternate first horn to take the place of Mr. Schmid, who retired at the end of last season and has returned to Vienna. It is expected that Mr. Wendler will be a most desirable acquisition and that with him and his colleague, Max Hess, the orchestra will have two first horns of best quality. The problem of filling this position is one of the most difficult that the management and conductor of a large orchestra has to deal with. In the storm and stress of modern music the musical life of a player of a first horn is comparatively short. Time was when a man's lips would last for twenty-five or thirty years, but modern composers are so exacting in their demands that a horn player may consider himself fortunate if he can only hold the position at the head of a quartet for ten years. Not only do his lips give out much sooner than in the old days, but what is equally important to the player of the horn, his "nerve" is likely to fail him, and then the case is hopeless. In the United States today there are not a half dozen horn players of first quality. In fact, there are probably not more than four who could be named off hand as being absolutely sure men and artists as well. In the whole of Germany and Austria, whence come the best players of brass instruments, it is a question whether there are twelve men of very first quality, artists of highest rank.

Mr. Scheurer, who for the past two years has shared the first desk of the viola section with Mr. Ferir, has retired from the Orchestra, and his place will be taken by Mr. Rennert, who during the second year of Dr. Muck's conductorship was in the second violins, but last year was away until the very end of the season on account of a severe illness. Unlike most viola players, Mr. Rennert did not take up that instrument after having learned the violin, but like Mr. Ferir and several others of that section, he started as a boy with the viola, and was leading viola of the Leipsic Philharmonic Orchestra when he was engaged by Dr. Muck to come to this country as second violin, with the promise that as soon as a vacancy occurred he would be put into the viola section. The auction sales of seats for the new season will take place the last week of this month. The $18 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold on Monday, the 27th, and the $10 seats on Tuesday, the 28th. The $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday, the 30th, and the $10 seats on Friday, October 1.

The first public rehearsal will be given on Friday afternoon, Oct. 8, with the first concert the following evening, and Mme. Louise Homer of the Metropolitan Opera Company will be the soloist.

A Tenor Discovered

JOURNAL—
SEPTEMBER 4, 1909.

PLANS FOR COMING SYMPHONY SEASON

The coming season, the twenty-ninth in its history, will be the busiest one the Boston Symphony Orchestra has ever had. At least 111 concerts will be given and the probabilities are that Mr. Ellis, the manager, will add to this heavy schedule two and possibly three more. Heretofore the largest number of concerts ever given in one season has been 106.

Boston, of course, will have its twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts, and Cambridge will have its quota of eight concerts. The usual concerts will be given in Providence, Worcester, Springfield, Hartford, Waterbury and Bridgeport and in addition to these, three concerts are to be given in New Bedford and one in Brockton.

The usual five monthly trips will be made to New York, Philadelphia, Washington and Brooklyn and the regular trip to the West will take place in the first week of February. The cities to be visited are Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Erie, Rochester, Syracuse and possibly Albany.

Mr. Fiedler sails from Bremen on the 21st and is due to reach Boston on the 28th. He is bringing over a number of new works which will be heard in America for the first time, and he reports that this year's crop of novelties is of much higher quality than usual. He also purposes making a number of very interesting revivals and this season, as last, he will close the concerts with a program of Beethoven's ninth symphony.

Rachmaninoff, generally considered the foremost of living Russian composers and said to be a pianist of very unusual merit, will be among the soloists. Another interesting artist who will appear with the orchestra here is Tilly Koenen, the Dutch mezzosoprano, who is said to be the counterpart of Dr. Wuellner as an interpreter and to have what Dr. Wuellner has not, a voice of unusual power and beauty. Another artist who will appear with the orchestra is the great pianist, Ferruccio Busoni.

TRAVELER,
WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 8.

RACHMANINOFF, WHO WILL APPEAR WITH SYMPHONY.

RACHMANINOFF, RUSS PIANIST, COMING HERE

Threefold in His Genius, Being Eminent as Composer, Player and Conductor.

The most interesting personality among visiting musicians who will be in America this winter is Serge Rachmaninoff, the greatest of living Russian composers and a pianist who has won great fame in Europe.

His first appearances in the larger cities of the East will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and for his debut in this city on Friday afternoon, Oct. 29, and Saturday evening, Oct. 30, Mr. Fiedler has arranged a most interesting and novel programme.

Rachmaninoff is no less famous as a conductor than he is as a pianist and composer, and it is planned to have him appear in Boston in this threefold capacity. Two of his works will be on the programme, his symphonic poem "The Rocks," and his second concerto for piano. He will conduct his own symphonic poem and play his own concerto.

Rachmaninoff, who is only 35 years old, was famous as a pianist before he was heard of as a composer, and it is only in comparatively recent years through his work at the Imperial Opera in Moscow and the Imperial Symphony concerts in St. Petersburg as well as some conducting as "guest" in Germany that his extraordinary talent as a conductor has become generally known. Three years ago he withdrew from all his engagements as a conductor in order to settle in Dresden and devote his time to composition.

His first fame as composer came from his prelude in C minor for piano, which his teacher, Siloti, brought to this country 10 years ago and which is still one of the most popular pieces in the repertory of concert pianists. Since then he has written successful operas and symphonies and over 100 songs.

HERALD,
SEPTEMBER 8, 1909.

RUSSIAN COMPOSER COMING.

Serge Rachmaninoff to Conduct His Symphonic Poem Here.

A bold innovation is promised for the fourth of the Symphony rehearsals and concerts on Oct. 29 and 30, respectively. The soloist on this program will be Serge Rachmaninoff, the greatest of living Russian composers, and a pianist who is said to be in the very front rank. Rachmaninoff is coming to America for the first time this season and the honor of introducing him to the principal cities has been given to the Boston Symphony orchestra.

In Boston he is to appear in the three-fold capacity of composer, pianist and conductor. Mr. Fiedler has placed two of his works on the program, his symphonic poem, "The Rocks," and his second concerto for the piano. It is the plan now that Rachmaninoff will conduct his symphonic poem and, of course, he will play his own concerto. Not since Saint-Saens was in America two years ago has a musical event of equal interest taken place.

SERGE RACHMANINOFF.

Rachmaninoff is one of the youngest of famous composers, having been born in 1873. As a small child he began his musical education in the St. Petersburg Conservatory and afterward finished it in Moscow. The first work of his which brought him fame was his popular prelude in C minor for piano. It was brought to this country 10 years ago by his teacher, Alexander Siloti, and soon became a rival of Paderewski's minuet.

Since then he has written two symphonies, three symphonic poems, three operas, many works for the piano and about 100 songs. He has been conductor of the Imperial Opera in Moscow and is a favorite conductor of concerts in Russia. His home is in Dresden.

GLOBE-
SEPTEMBER 8, 1909

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Rachmaninoff, Celebrated Russian Musician, to Make Debut Here at Concert in October.

Mr Ellis, manager of the Symphony orchestra, made the interesting announcement yesterday that at the public rehearsal and concert Oct 29 and 30, respectively, Serge Rachmaninoff, the greatest of living Russian composers, will make his debut in Boston, in the threefold capacity of composer, conductor and pianist, which is an innovation in the symphony concerts.

Several times composers have played or conducted their own works, but never has a musician occupied so prominent a place on the program as that which has been given to the distinguished Russian visitor.

He will play his second concerto for the pianoforte and the work he will conduct will probably be his symphonic poem "The Rocks." Rachmaninoff has gained much renown in all three fields for a man of 35.

For 15 years he has been one of the most distinguished pianists in Europe. He has made a great success as conductor of the opera in Moscow and of the Imperial concerts in St Petersburg. As a composer he has long been recognized as the leader of the younger men and the death last year of Rimsky-Korsakoff has placed him as leader of all his countrymen in composition.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR,
SEPTEMBER 9, 1909.

SERGE Rachmaninoff comes here from Dresden. He will be called a Russian composer, and when his compositions are heard there will be the usual things said about their native melancholy; but Russia is the home of this musician no longer. Convinced that music is a world-wide art which prospers best when it shakes off geographical trammels, he has made his home where Slavic influences could not beset him, and where his art could not be numbed by cold winters nor saddened by unrighteous social conditions. To him nationality in music is a thing of no importance, therefore instead of staying in his own country he has gone to live close to the men who are producing great musical works in Germany, and forgetful of his native folk tunes and dance rhythms he has made these Germans his standard.

It is not easy to predict in which of the three professions of Rachmaninoff, composer, conductor and pianist, Bostonians will decide that he excels. It is possible that he will make the audiences like his work as soloist in his piano concerto better than they like the music itself; but if they do not happen to like his other number on the program, the symphonic poem, "The Rocks," of course he will not be able to make them like his conducting of it.

The concert at which he appears will be the most interesting of the early Symphony season, and this Germanizing Russian of the larger ambition will get a victory out of his triple test if he does no more than prove himself a good pianist.

SERGE RACHMANINOFF.
He will appear in Boston as soloist in his own piano concerto and as conductor of his own symphonic poem.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 11, 1909.

THE SYMPHONY LIST.

WHEN Mr. Fiedler went home to Germany last May he at once began a search for new works to perform at the Symphony concerts of 1909-10. Summer orchestral festivals were a field for practical study, but of course much had to be decided upon from reading newly published music in the score. And while Mr. Fiedler was choosing the novelties for his second year in Boston he had to attend to that other task, just as important, the selection of old music. The result of his summer's labor here follows in a list which comprises only that music upon which the conductor has definitely made up his mind, the titles marked with a star being of works new to Boston:

Bach, Brandenburger Konzert No. 3, for strings; Bantock, comedy overture, *"The Pierrot of the Minute"; Beethoven, Grosse Quartettfuge for strings; Beethoven, symphonies Nos. 1, 2, 4, 6, 9; Berlioz, scene d'amour and scherzo, "Fee Mab"; Berlioz, overture, *"Rob Roy"; Boehe, *Epilogue to a Tragedy; Bruckner, symphony No. 7; Brahms, symphony No. 4; Brahms, Tragic Overture; Brahms, concerto for violin and 'cello; Charpentier, "Impression d'Italie"; Cherubini, overture, "Abenceragen"; Debussy, *"Petite Suite"; Frederic Delius, *"Paris"; Frederic Delius, *"Appalachia"; Frederic Delius, *"In a Summer Garden"; Frederick Delius, *"Brigg Fair"; Elgar, variations; Elgar, *"The Wand of Youth" suite; Cesar Franck, symphony; Goldmark, symphony, "Rustic Wedding"; Glazounoff, *"Au Moyen Age" suite; Glazounoff, *duo, "Le Chant du Destin"; Handel, concerto D-major for strings; Haydn, symphony E-flat major; Humperdinck, "In a Moorish Cafe"; Liszt, symphony, "Faust"; Liszt, symphonic poem, "Tasso"; Loeffler, Vilanelle du Diable; Loeffler, "Mort du Tintagiles"; Mozart, symphonies E-flat major, G-minor, C-major; Rachmaninoff, symphonic poem, "Die Felsen"; Reger, *Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy, opus 108; Reger, variations; Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Capriccio Espagnol"; Sibelius, symphony D-major, No. 2; Sibelius, *"En Saga," symphonic poem; Sibelius, *"Swahnevit," suite, op. 54; Sibelius, *"Night Ride and Sunrise," symphonic poem, op. 55; Sibelius, *"The Swan of Tuonela"; Sinding, *Rondo Infinito; Scriabine, *Reverie; Saint-Saens, "Rouet d'Omphale"; Saint-Saens, Danse Macabre; Schumann, symphony B-flat major; Schumann, overture, "Genoveva"; Schumann, overture, "Manfred"; Strauss, *"Macbeth"; Strauss, Don Quixote; Strauss, *Dance from "Salome"; Strauss, Sinfonia Domestica; Strauss, *suite for wood-wind; Strauss, "Thus Spake Zarathustra"; Strauss, "Thus Spake Zarathustra"; Tschaikowsky, symphony, "Manfred"; Tschaikowsky, serenade for strings, op. 48; Tschaikowsky, overture, "Romeo and Juliet"; Tschaikowsky, "Francesca da Rimini," symphonic poem; Wagner, overture, "Faust."

Considering that there are 21 novelties in this list it seems probable that not many more are to be added, since they already number five more than were performed last season. One of the most important pieces would seem to be the symphonic prologue of Reger. The "Rob Roy" overture of Berlioz has been little played anywhere because it was discovered only last year. The wood-wind suite of Strauss is an early work and the "Macbeth" is the first tone poem ever written by the great German.

The Domestic Symphony of Strauss, which brought praise to Dr. Muck when he produced it in Boston, and the "Zarathustra," which brought praise to Mr. Fiedler last winter, will probably be placed in the heavier programs of the mid-season. Mozart canonically appears with symphonies which universal criticism regards as his greatest. Beethoven's 3, 5, 7, and 8 are to stand in abeyance for a year. It will be interesting to hear what manner of program music Mr. Fiedler deems the Pastoral 6 to be. The No. 9, happily, is to be used again for the closing concert of the season.

MME. LOUISE HOMER.
Contralto who will be the soloist at the first rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra, Oct. 8 and 9, and who will appear as Laura in "Gioconda" at the opening night of the Boston Opera House, Nov. 8.

TRAVELER,
SEPTEMBER 11, 1909.

NEW MUSIC IN SYMPHONY'S CONCERT LIST

Director Fiedler Maps Out Extensive Programme for the Coming Season.

SEVERAL NOVELTIES.

Mr. Fiedler has mapped out for the Symphony Orchestra one of the most interesting seasons it has ever had. During May and June, after his return to Germany, he devoted practically all his time to searching out new works for the performance during the coming season. He attended several of the orchestral festivals there when novelties were performed and read scores by the dozen. The result is that he is able to offer as comprehensive a list of works new to Boston as any of his predecessors ever did, and some of them are of prime importance.

In the list of novelties appear certain works that he announced for last season but was unable to reach. The first of these is the last orchestral work of Max Reger, "A Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy," Op. 108. A year ago Reger told Mr. Fiedler that he wanted him to have the first performance of this work in America.

Among names new to Boston audiences are those of Frederic Delius, Granville-Bantock and Scriabine.

Rachmaninoff, who will be one of the most interesting visitors this year, will be represented by his symhponic poem "Die Felsen" which he himself is expected to conduct at the concert when he will be soloist here.

Works new to Boston by other composers include Berlioz's overture "Rob Roy," the manuscript of which was discovered only recently, and "Epilogue to a Tragedy," by Ernst Boehe; Elgar's suite, "The Wand of Youth"; two works by Glazounoff, a suite entitled "Au moyen age" and a duo "The Song of Destiny"; a number of things by Sibelius which are unknown to Boston; Strauss' first symphonic tone poem, "Macbeth," his Dance from "Salome" and his suite for wood-wind instruments; and some new works by American composers to be announced.

DAILY ADVERTISER
SEPTEMBER 11, 1909

MUSICAL MATTERS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Fiedler has mapped out for the Symphony orchestra one of the most interesting seasons it has ever had. In the list of novelties appears the last orchestral work of Max Reger, "A Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy," Opus 108. Among names new to Boston audiences are those of Frederic Dolius, Granville-Bantock and Seriabine.

Rachmaninoff, who will be one of the most interesting visitors this year, will be represented by his symphonic poem "Die Felsen," which he himself is expected to conduct at the concert when he will be soloist here.

Works new to Boston by other composers include Berlioz's overture "Rob Roy," and "Epilogue to a Tragedy" by Ernst Boehe; Elgar's suite "The Wand of Youth"; two works by Glazounoff, a suite entitled "Au moyen age" and a duo, "The Song of Destiny"; a number of things by Sibelius, which are unknown to Boston; Strauss' first symphonic tone poem "Macbeth," his "Dance from Salome" and his suite for wood-wind instruments; and some new works by American composers to be announced.

Other works Mr. Fiedler purposes to play are the first, second, fourth, sixth and ninth symphonies of Beethoven; Bruckner's seventh symphony; Brahms' fourth; Elgar's variations; Cesar Franck's symphony; Goldmark's symphony "Rustic Weddings"; Liszt's "Faust" symphony; Mozart's symphonies in E-flat, G-minor and C-major; Saint-Saens' "Danse macabre"; Schumann's symphony in B-flat major; Strauss' "Sinfonia Domestica" and "Thus spake Zarathustra" and Tschaikowsky's "Manfred," "Romeo and Juliet" and "Francesco da Rimini."

JOURNAL-
SEPTEMBER 11, 1909.

INTERESTING SYMPHONY SEASON BEING OUTLINED

Mr. Fiedler has mapped out for the Symphony Orchestra one of the most interesting seasons it has ever had. In the list of novelties appear certain works that he announced for last season, but was unable to reach. The first of these to be played is the latest orchestral work of Max Reger, "Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy." It has been placed on the third program.

Among names new to Boston audiences are those of Frederic Delius, Granville-Bantock and Scriabine. Delius is a Yorkshireman of German parentage. His works are said to be not only melodious, but most skilfully made, and he is also said to be a master of orchestration. Granville-Bantock is another English composer who has been attracting much attention in the last few years. Scriabine belongs to the younger school of Russian composers, of which the leader is Rachmaninoff. He has been in this country a guest of the Russian Symphony Orchestra of New York, which has played some of his works. He is regarded as ultra-romantic and thoroughly nationalistic.

Rachmaninoff, who will be one of the most interesting visitors this year, will be represented by his symphonic poem, "Die Felsen," which he himself is expected to conduct at the concert when he will be soloist here.

The list of orchestral novelties already decided upon for performance is as follows: Berlioz's overture, "Rob Roy"; Boehe's "Epilogue to a Tragedy"; Debussy's "Petite Suite"; Delius' "Paris," "Appalachia," "In a Summer Garden" and "Brigg Fair"; Elgar's "Wand of Youth"; Glazounoff's suite, "Aumoyen age," and duo, "Le Chant du Destin"; Reger's "Prologue to a Tragedy"; two symphonic poems and two other works by Sibelius that Boston has never heard before; Sinding's "Rondo Infinito"; Scriabine's "Reverie"; Strauss' first symphonic poem, "Macbeth," besides a dance from "Salome" and a suite for wood wind.

The other works now listed for performance are the following:

Bach—Brandenburger Konzert No. 3, for strings. Bantock—Comedy overture, "The Pierrot of the Minutes." Beethoven—Grosse quartettfuge for strings and symphonies Nos. 1, 2, 4, 6 and 9. Berlioz—Scene de'amour and Scherzo, "Fee Mab." Bruckner—Symphony No. 7. Brahms—Symphony No. 4; tragic overture; concerto for violin and 'cello. Charpentier—Impression d'Italie. Cherubini—Overture, "Abenceragen." Elgar—Variations. Cesar Franck—Symphony. Goldmark—Symphony, "Rustic Wedding." Handel—Concerto, D major, for strings; Haydn—Symphony, E-flat major. Humperdinck—"In a Moorish Cafe." Liszt—Symphony, "Faust;" symphonic poem, "Tasso." Loeffler—"Vilanelle du Diable;" "Mort du Tintagiles." Mozart—Symphonies, E-flat major, G minor, C major. Reger—"Prologue to a Tragedy," opus 108; variations. Rimsky-Korsakoff—Capriccio espagnol. Sibelius—Symphony, D major, No. 2. Saint-Saens—Rouet d'Omphale; Danse macabre. Schumann—Symphony, B-flat major; overture, "Genoveva;" overture, "Manfred." Strauss—"Don Quixote;" Sinfonia Domestica; "Thus Spake Zarathustra." Tschaikowsky—Symphony, "Manfred;" serenade, for strings, op. 48; overture, "Romeo and Juliet;" "Francesco da Rimini," symphonic poem. Wagner—Overture, "Faust."

[4]

TRANSCRIPT,
SEPTEMBER 11, 1909

MUSICAL NEWS

MR. FIEDLER'S FORTHCOMING PROGRAMMES

The Music, New and Old, Familiar and Unfamiliar, That He Announces for the Symphony Concerts—Romantic, Modern and Ultra-Modern Compositions in Plenty—Much More of Strauss and a New Overture by Reger—Early Debussy and Newly Discovered Berlioz—A Hearing for Some of the Younger Russians—Four New Pieces by Sibelius, and as Many to Make Delius Known—Bantock and Elgar for the Other Englishmen—The Programmes for the Worcester Festival—Sousa's Concert

The Symphony Orchestra is pursuing a new policy this year. Instead of one announcement of its plans for the new season, it is dribbling out details of it in semi-weekly instalments. One day it is the engagement of a new horn player or an increase in the number of its concerts in New England cities; another it is the appearance of Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer, conductor and pianist at one pair of concerts, and now it is a list of the pieces, new and old, novel or familiar classic, or semi-classic, that Mr. Fiedler purposes to include in his programmes in the course of the season. The list is long, diversified and generally interesting, and indicates clearly that for the final year of his stay in Boston he has followed eagerly his own romantic, modern and ultra-modern tendencies.

Last winter, from Strauss, Mr. Fiedler revived notably the tone-poems, "Death and Transfiguration," "A Hero's Life" and "Thus Spake Zarathustra." Next winter, he purposes to repeat "Zarathustra," to revive "Don Quixote," unheard in Boston since Mr. Gericke's time, and "The Symphonia Domestica," first performed here under Dr. Muck, and to make, besides, three ventures of his own. One is Salome's dance, an easily detachable fragment of the like-named music-drama, significant as absolute music, and the only part of the opera Boston is likely to hear until it joins the rest of the intelligent world and reclaims its operatic liberty. Another is a serenade for wind instruments that Strauss wrote in 1882, before he was twenty-one when he was training his powers. The third is the only one of Strauss's tone-poems that has not at one time or another been performed in Boston—"Macbeth," the second of the series, standing between "Don Juan" and "Death and Transfiguration." "Strauss makes no attempt to cover the whole ground of Shakspeare's drama," writes Mr. Newman of the piece. "No other character is introduced but Lady Macbeth—and she is really kept in the background of the picture—and absolutely nothing "happens." The whole drama is enacted in the soul of Macbeth; apart from the comparatively few measures that depict his wife, the score is entirely concerned with the internal conflict of the three main elements of his character—his ambitious pride, his irresolution and his love for Lady Macbeth."

From Reger, the other conspicuous, individual and innovating German, Mr. Fiedler has a piece that is wholly new here and another that already has been warmly welcomed. The new piece is Reger's most recent composition for orchestra, the long and elaborate "Symphonic Prologue to a Tragic Play," performed occasionally in Germany last spring, unheard as yet in America, and to be played at the third pair of our concerts. The piece to be revived is the imaginative variations and the thrilling fugue upon a theme of Hiller that Dr. Muck brought to hearing toward the end of his conductorship. The lesser living German composers have apparently yielded little that was new and interesting, and the only novel music from their hands on Mr. Fiedler's list is an "Epilogue to a Tragedy" by Boehe, the young disciple of Strauss at Munich, whose tone-picture, "Taormina," and one of whose tone-poems about Odysseus have been played in time past at the Symphony Concerts. Last year to pass to romantic and familiar German music—Mr. Fiedler practically exhausted concert pieces from Wagner, and all that remains for him to undertake now is the "Faust" overture. From the Wagnerian imitators, he purposes to revive Humperdinck's "Moorish Rhapsody"; and one symphony of Bruckner, the seventh; while his German classics comprise one of Bach's Brandenburg Concertos for strings; the first, second, fourth, sixth and ninth symphonies of Beethoven—the choral symphony to be performed at the final pair of concerts with the choir of the Cecilia again assisting; the orchestral version of Beethoven's fugue for string quartet; Brahms's "Tragic Overture," fourth symphony and double concerto for violin and violoncello and orchestra, unheard here since the time of Mr. Gericke, Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Schroeder; Goldmark's pretty little symphony, "The Rustic Wedding," so long neglected that it will seem almost new; a concerto by Händel for strings; Liszt's glowing "Faust" symphony—with or without the choral close does not appear—and "Tasso"; three symphonies of Mozart and one of Haydn, and Schumann's overtures to "Manfred" and "Genoveva" and his symphony in B-flat.

So much for the Germans. The French composers have yielded Mr. Fiedler less novel spoil. A year or more ago Henri Büsser, one of the conductors of the Opéra in Paris, arranged for orchestra a "Petite Suite" that Debussy had written as long ago as 1889 as a piano duet. It was played by one of the Parisian orchestras and Mr. Fiedler intends to repeat it here. D'Indy the conductor ignores, though his "Souvenirs" is still unknown, except by report, in Boston. On the other hand, Mr. Fiedler will revive César Franck's nobly imaginative symphony; Charpentier's warmly colored "Italian Impressions," and Saint-Saëns' symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," and his "Danse Macabre." From Berlioz's symphony, "Romeo and Juliet," he will take the "love scene" and the scherzo of "Queen Mab," and he will play for the first time here the recently discovered romantic overture that Berlioz wrote when he was full of admiration for Scott, and called "Rob Roy."

For romantic music, the Russians stand Mr. Fiedler in good stead. From Tschaikowsky he will take the alternately sombre and lurid symphony upon Byron's "Manfred," the tone-poem, "Francesca da Rimini," the overture-fantasia to "Romeo and Juliet" and a serenade for strings. Rimsky-Korsakoff gives him the gorgeous piece of orchestral bravura, "The Spanish Caprice;" and Glazounoff, the suite from the ballet "In the Middle Ages" and "A Song of Destiny," both new to the repertory of the orchestra. Mr. Fiedler, too, is discovering the new generation of Russian composers, the neo-Russians, as the Parisian experts call them. One is Rachmaninoff, whose visit to the orchestra will bring one of his concertos for piano and his tone-poem, "The Cliffs." The other is Scriabine, the rhapsodical dreamer, who writes symphonies of the universe, and also little pieces, like the "Revery," Mr. Fiedler has chosen. Across the Russian border, in Finland, the conductor has already testified to his liking for Sibelius's music and next winter he will play for the first times here two of his tone-poems, "A Saga," and "Night Ride and Sunrise," his legend of "The Swan of Tuonela," his suite, "Swahnevit," likewise new, and his second symphony, the more formal and "classic" of the three that he has written. From another composer of the North, Sinding, Mr. Fiedler takes a "Rondo Infinito."

At last, too, we in Boston are to hear more of the orchestral music of the "new" Englishmen that hitherto only Elgar has represented on our programmes. He will have his inning as an established composer, with the "Enigma" variations, probably his most satisfying orchestral piece, and a little suite, played last winter in London, "The Wand of Youth," a revision and rescoring of some very youthful pieces written originally for private theatricals. More important, however, is Mr. Fiedler's discovery and evident admiration for Frederick Delius, and he announces no less than four of his pieces for next winter for their first performances in America; "Appalachia," fourteen orchestral variations with a choral close, upon a Negro melody, that the composer heard in Florida— atmospheric music that reflects the sensations of virgin forests and sleeping swamps; "Brigg Fair," a pastoral rhapsody for orchestra upon a folk-tune of the English fen-country; "In a Summer Garden," a rhapsody in its way in tone-picturing; and "Paris," a tone-poem of large dimensions that embodies eloquently Mr. Delius's sensations as he looks upon the city and its eager life by night. After Delius, Bantock, and from his music which has oftener been choral than purely orchestral, Mr. Fiedler has chosen his delicately fanciful overture based lightly upon Ernest Dowson's verses of the weary and longing Pierrot and the unattainable moon-maiden—an atmospheric, dream-like, faintly melancholy piece, of unusual charm and beauty. As for the American composers, Mr. Fiedler can choose better here than he can in Germany; but already he has decided to revive Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," unheard for some years, and also his "Devil's Round." In all, a list that promises a remarkable variety and novelty of interest through the six months of the concerts; that adjusts the old to the new; and that is agreeably open-minded to almost all the ultra-modern composers except the curiously neglected d'Indy.

TRAVELER,
SEPTEMBER 16, 1909.

IT will be of interest to the many admirers of Mme. Schumann-Heink and to the many friends of Frederick S. Converse of Boston, the composer, to know that Mme. Schumann-Heink will be here for the first time in a work which he has written especially for her. It is a setting of a German poem for contralto and orchestra, and it is to be heard for the first time at her appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in December.

It is particularly appropriate that this work should have its first performance in Boston, which has been such a loyal friend of the artist, and is the home of the composer.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE
SEPTEMBER 12, 1909

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Mr Fiedler's Plans for Symphony Season.

Elaborate Production of "Aida" at New Opera House.

Sousa's Band Tonight at Boston Theatre.

In the list of novelties announced by Conductor Fiedler for the Symphony concerts this season are several works which he intended to present last year, but was unable to reach. The first of these is the last orchestral work of Max Reger, "Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy," Opus 108. A year ago Reger told Mr Fiedler that he wanted him to have the first performance of this work in America.

Various delays occurred, and the score was not available until the end of the season, and Mr Fiedler thought it best to postpone its performance until this year. He has placed it on the third program.

Among names new to Boston audiences are those of Frederic Delius, Granville-Bantock and Scriabine. Last year Mr Fiedler had expected to do one or two works by Delius, but did not get around to them, and this year he has placed on his prospectus no less than four by this composer.

Delius is a Yorkshireman of German parentage. He cannot be said to belong to the advanced school of musicians, for he is not in sympathy with Strauss, Reger or Debussy, and maintains that Wagner was the last of the really great composers.

Granville-Bantock is another English composer who has been attracting much attention in the last few years.

Scriabine belongs to the younger school of Russian composers, of which the leader is Rachmaninoff. He has been in this country a guest of the Russian Symphony orchestra of New York, which organization has played some of his works. He is regarded as ultra-romantic and thoroughly nationalistic.

Rachmaninoff, the Russian Artist.

Rachmaninoff, who will be one of the most interesting visitors this year, will be represented by his symphonic poem, "Die Felsen," which he is expected to conduct at the concert when he will be soloist here.

Works new to Boston by other composers include Berlioz' overture, "Rob Roy," the manuscript of which was discovered only recently; "Epilogue to a Tragedy," by Ernst Boehe; Elgar's suite, "The Wand of Youth"; two works by Glazounoff, a suite entitled "Au Moyen Age," and a duo, "The Song of Destiny"; a number of pieces by Sibelius; Strauss' first symphonic tone poem, "Macbeth," his dance from "Salome" and his suite for wood-wind instruments, and some new works by American composers to be announced.

Other works Mr Fiedler purposes to play are the first, second, fourth, sixth and ninth symphonies of Beethoven; Bruckner's seventh symphony; Brahm's fourth; Elgar's variations; Cesar Franck's symphony; Goldmark's symphony; "Rustic Wedding"; Liszt's "Faust" symphony; Mozart's symphonies in E-flat, G-minor and C-major; Saint-Saens' "Danse Macabre"; Schumann's symphony in B-flat major; Strauss' "Sinifonia Domestica" and "Thus Spake Zarathustra' and Tschaikowsky's "Manfred," "Romeo and Juliet" and "Francesco da Rimini."

During May and June, after Mr Fiedler's return to Germany, he devoted practically all his time to searching out new works for the performance during the coming season. He attended several of the orchestral festivals there when novelties were performed and read scores by the dozen. The result is that he is able to offer as comprehensive a list of works new to Boston as any of his predecessors ever did, and some of them are of prime importance.

SUNDAY POST,
SEPTEMBER 12, 1909

MR. FIEDLER'S PLANS FOR COMING SEASON

Mr. Fiedler has mapped out for the Symphony Orchestra one of the most interesting seasons it has ever had. During May and June, after his return to Germany, he devoted practically all his time to searching out new works for the performances during the coming season. He attended several of the orchestral festivals there when novelties were performed and read scores by the dozen. The result is that he is able to offer as comprehensive a list of works new to Boston as any of his predecessors ever did, and some of them are of prime importance.

In the list of novelties appear certain works that he announced for last season, but which he was unable to reach. The first of these is the last orchestral work of Max Reger, "Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy," Opus 108. A year ago Reger told Mr. Fiedler that he wanted him to give the first performance of this work in America. It was to have been published in November, but various delays occurred, and the score was not available until the end of the season and Mr. Fiedler thought it best to postpone its performance until this year. He has placed it on the third programme.

Among names new to Boston audiences are those of Frederic Delius, Granville-Bantock and Scriabine. Delius is a Yorkshireman of German parentage. He cannot be said to belong to the advanced school of musicians, for he is not in sympathy with Strauss, Reger or Debussy and maintains that Wagner was the last of the really great composers. His works are said to be not only melodious, but most skilfully made, and he is also said to be a master of orchestration.

Granville-Bantock is another English composer who has been attracting much attention in the last few years.

Scriabine belongs to the younger school of Russian composers of which the leader is Rachmaninoff. He has been in this country, a guest of the Russian Symphony Orchestra of New York. He is regarded as ultra-romantic and thoroughly nationalistic.

Rachmaninoff, who will be one of the most interesting visitors this year, will be represented by his symphonic poem "Die Felsen," which he himself is expected to conduct at the concert when he will be soloist here.

Works new to Boston by other composers include Berlioz's overture, "Rob Roy," the manuscript of which was discovered only recently; "Epilogue to a Tragedy," by Ernst Boehe; Elgar's suite, "The Wand of Youth"; two works by Glazounoff, a suite entitled "Au Moyen Age" and a duo, "The Song of Destiny"; a number of things by Sibelius, which are unknown to Boston; Strauss' first symphonic tone poem, "Macbeth," his dance from "Salome" and his suite for wood-wind instruments, and some new works by American composers to be announced.

Other works Mr. Fiedler purposes to play are the first, second, fourth, sixth and ninth symphonies of Beethoven; Bruckner's seventh symphony, Brahms' fourth, Elgar's Variations, Cesar Franck's Symphony, Goldmark's symphony, "Rustic Wedding"; Liszt's "Faust" symphony; Mozart's symphonies in E-flat, G-minor and C-major; Saint-Saens' "Danse Macabre"; Schumann's symphony in B-flat major; Strauss' "Sinfonia Domestica" and "Thus Spake Zarathustra," and Tschaikowsky's "Manfred," "Romeo and Juliet" and "Francesco da Rimini."

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR,
SEPTEMBER 13, 1909.

AMERICAN PIANIST RETURNS.

Olga Samaroff was born at San Antonio, Tex., when her father, Carlos Hickenlooper, was stationed there in the quartermaster's department of the United States army. When a girl she showed a liking for music which made her parents think she would be like her grandmother, who was once a concert pianist in Germany. They sent her to study in a convent in Paris, where musically she was taken in charge by Marmontel, the elder; she was also given some lessons by Widor. She became proficient enough to pass the examinations for the Conservatoire and she was the first American woman ever admitted to the piano classes of that institution. Her teacher there was Delaborde. In 1900 she returned to America and studied for one summer in Washington with Ernest Hutcheson, but it was not long before she sought European instruction again, this time from Jedlicska in Berlin.

It did not suit the genius of this young woman whose grandmother had played in concerts to spend all her life in study and never to be heard in public. In January, 1905, she was in New York, where recitals were being given by persons who could play no better than herself. There was Carnegie Hall, just the place where she would like to be heard; why should she not engage it and give a concert of her own? Without a manager to take the responsibility of the expenses, she hired the hall, hired, too, Walter Damrosch's orchestra, and asked the New York public to come and hear her play.

Since then she has had no trouble finding a manager to provide a hall for her. In the spring of 1905 she appeared in Boston with the Boston Symphony Quartet and for the next two years she went to every part of America visited by Mr. Ellis in concerts. Last season she played in London, Paris, Munich, Vienna and the other cities of Europe, where people are willing to pay high to hear a pianist.

Madame Samaroff came to America in July and has spent the summer in New Hampshire. Her reappearance in Boston will be one of the earlier events of the music season.

MME. OLGA SAMAROFF.
Pianist.

HERALD,
SEPTEMBER 17, 1909.

SYMPHONY PLAYERS BACK.

First Work of Season for Orchestra Will Be at Worcester Festival.

That section of the Symphony orchestra which has been playing at the Swimming Pool at Bar Harbor during the summer, under the leadership of Gustav Strube, has returned to town, the season having ended. As in previous years, there were 20 men there, and the season lasted for eight weeks. This year was by all odds the most successful the men have had, the Swimming Pool being crowded every day for the concerts.

With the exception of two or three members of the orchestra who have not yet returned from Europe, practically all the members are now in town. The first work of the orchestra will be the Worcester festival in the week beginning Monday, Sept. 27, the day of the first auction sale at Symphony Hall.

[5]

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, SEPTEMBER 17, 1909.

IT IS the policy of C. A. Ellis never to make his concert arrangements in an economizing spirit. He never plans tours for any artists but those of high rank; he never associates a first-class performer with a performer of small gifts, that the one may bring a paying audience and that the other may save expense. The first of his Symphony Hall concerts, outside of those by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be a recital by Miss Geraldine Farrar and Mme. Olga Samaroff. Mr. Ellis announces that Miss Farrar and Mme. Samaroff will presently make a tour of seven American cities, and it is in the progress of this tour that they will come to Boston. The appearance of these two artists together is not wholly attributable to the generous policy of their manager, because some years ago, when they knew each other as students in Berlin, they planned on going at some future time on just such a series of concerts as Mr. Ellis has arranged for them.

* * *

ADVERTISER,
SEPTEMBER 18, 1909

MUSICAL MATTERS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is making more than usually extensive plans for the coming season, which is its twenty-ninth. Mr. Ellis, its manager, has so far arranged a total of 111 concerts, and it is expected that at least two more will be added to this number. These concerts will be given between October 8th, when the first public rehearsal of the Boston series takes place, and April 30th, when the last concert of the Boston series is played.

The orchestra will give its usual 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts in Boston, its 10 in New York, eight Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, four in Providence, three in Worcester, Hartford and New Bedford, while other cities in New England to be visited are Brockton, Springfield, Waterbury and Bridgeport. The usual Western trip will be made in the week of January 30th, when concerts will be given on successive evenings in Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Erie, Rochester and Syracuse. Mr. Max Fiedler will again be the conductor.

GERALDINE FARRAR, SOLOIST WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MELROSE GIRL TO SING IN SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Geraldine Farrar Will Be Soloist at Two Concerts, on November 5 and 6, Before Entering on Grand Opera Season in New York.

Miss Geraldine Farrar—"Deeney" Farrar, as she is still known in Melrose, her native place—is to reap new honors here soon when she appears as soloist at the Symphony concerts. She will sing at these concerts on Friday afternoon, Nov. 5, and Saturday evening, Nov. 6.

It will be an unusually interesting event, for the reason that it was just ten years ago that Miss Farrar left Melrose to make a serious start in her musical education abroad. Five years before, in 1894, she had made her first appearance as an amateur in an operetta produced in Melrose. But after Melba heard her sing one day at the Boston Theater and encouraged her to try for grand opera, amateur work was cast aside. Melba at that time was under the management of C. A. Ellis, who now, as manager of the Symphony Orchestra, presents the immensely popular prima donna to the patrons of the famous Symphony Orchestra.

Miss Farrar returns to America this month to do some festival work and later to give a series of concerts in conjunction with Madame Samaroff under the management of Mr. Ellis.

She writes Mr. Ellis that she has spent the summer "hard at work resting" and that she is in better health than she has been in several years. All of Miss Farrar's concert work must be done by the middle of November for on that date the opera begins in New York, and that will occupy all her time.

SYMPHONY WILL HAVE BUSY SEASON

The twenty-ninth session of the Symphony Orchestra opens on Friday afternoon, Oct. 8.

Boston will have its usual allotment of twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts on consecutive Friday afternoons and Satutrday evenings, respectively, excepting on the following dates: Nov. 12 and 13, Dec. 10 and 11, Jan. 14 and 15, Feb. 4, 5, 25 and 26, and March 25 and 26. The final public rehearsal will be given on Friday afternoon, April 29, and the final concert on the following evening. Of the concerts to be given outside of Boston Cambridge will have its usual eight.

As has been the rule almost since the foundation of the orchestra the seats for the Boston concerts will be sold at auction. On Monday, Sept. 27, the $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold; on Tuesday, Sept. 28, the $10 seats for the rehearsals; on Thursday, Sept. 30, the $18 seats for the concerts, and on Friday, Oct. 1, the $10 seats for the concerts. The usual rules will prevail that bids will be accepted for seats in the regular order only and not for choice, and not more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be immediately resold.

Mr. Fiedler, who unquestionably became a great favorite last year, has proved himself especially noteworthy in the making of programs and he has planned a scheme of concerts which should appeal to all classes of music lovers. Moreover, the United States is to be the battleground during the coming winter of an uncommon number of artists of highest grade and in the list of soloists will be found the most representative of these.

Among the singers are noted the names of Mme. Marcella Sembrich, Miss Geraldine Farrar, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mme. Louise Homer and Mme. Tilly Koenen. In the pinists are found Mme. Terresa Carreno, Mme. Olga Samaroff, Ferruccio Busoni and Serge Rachmaninoff. The violinists include Fritz Kreisler, Mischa Elman, Willy Hess and Sylvain Noack. Heinrich Warnke, 'cello soloist of the orchestra, will also be prominent. This season, as last, the final concert will be devoted principally to Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, when the orchestra will again have the valued assistance of the Cecelia Society and a quartet of whom it is possible now to announce Mme. Hissem de Moss, soprano.

The programs of the first five concerts are as follows:

I.—Oct. 8-9.
Overture, "Die Weithe des Hauses"..Beethoven
Aria.
Symphony No. 2, D major.....Brahms
Songs.
"Don Juan," symphonic poem.....Strauss
Soloist, Louise Homer.

II.—Oct. 15-16.
Symphonic prologue to a tragedy, op. 108 (first time).....Max Reger
Concerto for violin.....Joachim
Symphony No. 8, F major.....Beethoven
Soloist, Willy Hess.

III.—Oct. 22-23.
Comedy overture, "The Pierrot of the Minute" (first time)...Granville Bantock
Symphony No. 4, F minor.....Tschaikowsky
Selections from "Peer Gynt".....Grieg

IV.—Oct. 29-30.
Overture, "Fidelio," E major.....Beethoven
Symphonic poem.....Rachmaninoff
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in C minor, op. 18.....Rachmaninoff
Till Eulenspiegel.....Strauss
Soloist—Serge Rachmaninoff.

V.—Nov. 5-6.
Symphony No. 2, op. 57.....d'Indy
Aria.
Reve d'enfant (first time).....Tschaikowsky
Songs.
Overture, "The Bartered Bride".....Smetana
Soloist, Geraldine Farrar.

SERGE RACHMANINOFF

MAX FIEDLER
PHOTO BY GA[illegible]

EVENING RECORD,
SEPTEMBER 18, 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is making more than usually extensive plans for the coming season, which is its twenty-ninth. Mr. Ellis, its manager, has so far arranged a total of 111 concerts, and it is expected that at least two more will be added to this number. These concerts will be given between October 8th, when the first public rehearsal of the Boston series takes place, and April 30th, when the last concert of the Boston series is played.

The orchestra will give its usual 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts in Boston, its 10 in New York, eight Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, four in Providence, three in Worcester, Hartford and New Bedford, while other cities in New England to be visited are Brockton, Springfield, Waterbury and Bridgeport. The usual Western trip will be made in the week of January 30th, when concerts will be given on successive evenings in Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Erie, Rochester and Syracuse. Mr. Max Fiedler will again be the conductor.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST
SEPTEMBER 19, 1909

Symphony Programmes Teem With Interesting Novelties

The coming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opens with the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon, Oct. 8, and the concert on the following evening, will be the 29th in its history, and from the plans that have been made it is safe to say that it will be one of the most brilliant it has ever had. A list of soloists more than ordinarily representative of all that is best in the art of music is announced, Mr. Fiedler is bringing over with him an unusually interesting lot of new works and the orchestra itself returns to its work practically intact.

Mr. Fiedler is sailing from Liverpool on the Mauretania on the 25th of this month and is due to arrive in Boston the first of October. He has called his first rehearsal for Monday, Oct. 4. The season promises to be the busiest one the orchestra has ever had, for it will give a greater number of concerts than it ever has in the past. In former years the maximum number of concerts was 106, but this year the total number, exclusive of the two pension fund concerts, will be 113 or 114. This increase, of course, has not affected the Boston season, but it has made necessary the revision of the entire out-of-town schedule. Boston will have its usual allotment of 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts on consecutive Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, respectively, excepting on the following dates: Nov. 12 and 13, Dec. 10 and 11, Jan. 14 and 15, Feb. 4 and 5, and 25 and 26, and March 25 and 26. The final public rehearsal will be given on Friday afternoon, April 29, and the final concert on the following evening, Saturday, April 30.

Of the concerts to be given outside of Boston, Cambridge will have its usual eight and New York its double series of five each, while the customary series of five each will be given in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. Providence this year has its quota of concerts increased from three to four. Worcester will have three concerts; likewise Hartford and New Bedford, for the first time, will have a series of three concerts. Other cities in New England to be visited are Springfield, Bridgeport, Waterbury and Brockton. The usual Western trip will be taken on the week beginning Jan. 30, and the orchestra will give concerts on successive evenings in Buffalo, Cleveland, Detroit, Erie, Rochester and Syracuse.

The dates of the public auction sale of the seats for the Boston concerts are as follows: Monday, Sept. 27, $18 seats for rehearsals; Tuesday, Sept. 28, $10 seats for the rehearsals; Thursday, Sept. 30, $18 seats for the concerts; Friday, Oct. 1, $10 seats for the concerts. The sales will all begin at 10 o'clock in the morning. The usual rules will prevail. Bids will be accepted for seats in the regular order only and not for the choice; and not more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open for competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

The only new face in the orchestra this year will be a new first horn, Georg Wendler, who comes from Germany, having been engaged last summer by Mr. Fiedler to take the place of Mr. Schmidt, who retired from the orchestra. Mr. Scheurer, who sat at the first desk of the violin section with Mr. Ferir, also has retired from the orchestra and his place will be taken by Mr. Rennert, who came to this country two years ago engaged by Dr. Muck, and has been in the violin section since then, although in Germany he was a viola player of note. Professor Willy Hess will, of course, be the concertmaster, and with him at the first desk will again be Mr. Noack, while the other leaders will be the same—Mr. Warnke of the 'cellists, Mr. Ferir of the violins, Mr. Barleben of the second violins and Mr. Keller of the double basses. Mr. Max Hess remains at the head of the first quartet of horns.

The list of soloists this year is especially strong both in singers and instrumentalists, and the programmes promise much. The names of the singers who have been engaged are Mme. Marcella Sembrich, Miss Geraldine Farrar, Mme. Louise Homer, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mme. Tilly Koenen and Mme. Hissem de Moss.

Mme. Sembrich's appearance in the spring will have about it a more than ordinary sentimental interest, for it will probably be the last time she will ever sing in Boston.

Miss Farrar, who bids fair to take the place in the affections of the public which Mme. Sembrich has held so long, will sing in Boston for the first time with the Symphony Orchestra.

More than ordinary interest attaches to Mme. Schumann-Heink's appearance here, because she expects to sing for the first time anywhere a scena for contralto and orchestra, written at her request by Frederick S. Converse of this city.

Madame Louise Homer needs no introduction to the Boston Symphony public.

Madame Hissem de Moss, one of the best of American sopranos, has been specially engaged as the soprano in the quartet for the Ninth Symphony, with which work Mr. Fiedler purposes to again close the season.

Madame Tilly Koenen is entirely a new comer, but the success which she has been enjoying the last few years on the continent and more recently in England seems to augur well for her season in America.

The pianists that have been engaged are Madame Terresa Carreno, Madame Olga Samaroff, Serge Rachmaninoff and Ferruccio Busoni. Rachmaninoff will be presented in the three-fold capacity of composer, conductor and pianist. Although he is not yet 36 years old, he seems to hold undisputed rank as the greatest of living Russian composers. Even before he became a composer he was a celebrated pianist in Russia and Germany, and it is primarily in this capacity that he comes to America. On the programme in which he will appear it is purposed to place his symphonic poem, "The Cliffs," and his second concerto for pianoforte.

In Carreno and Samaroff the orchestra have two of the greatest women pianists of their generations.

Ferruccio Busoni will be heard for the first time in several years. It is not necessary at this late day to emphasize the fact that he is one of the greatest of living pianists, a man of enormous technique and of unusual musical gifts.

Equally brilliant is the list of violinists. The visiting artists will be Fritz Kreisler and Mischa Elman.

The orchestra will be represented among the soloists by Willy Hess, the concert-master, and Sylvian Noack, the second concert-master. Mr. Hess' artistry has many admirers. Mr. Noack has yet to be heard as a soloist, although this will be his second year with the orchestra, but those who heard him play on short notice the tremendously difficult solo passages in Richard Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben" realized that in him the orchestra has another great artist.

Heinrich Warnke, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, is also included in the list of soloists, and at the performance of the Ninth Symphony next April the orchestra will again have the valued assistance of the Cecelia Society.

The following is the programme for the first concert:

Beethoven, overture, "Die Weihe des Hauses"; aria; Brahms' symphony No. 2; D-major; songs; Strauss, "Don Juan," symphonic poem; soloist, Louise Homer.

[6]

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,
SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 1909

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

PRESENT PLANS FOR THE NEW SEASON

The Official Prospectus for the Twenty-Ninth Series—The Concerts in Boston and Elsewhere—Few Changes in the Orchestra—A Notable List of Assisting Singers, Pianists and Violinists—The Programmes for the First Five Concerts—Other Details

The twenty-ninth season of the Symphony Orchestra which opens on Friday afternoon, Oct. 8, will show a minimum of changes in the personnel of the band and the only new member this year will be Georg Wendler, who succeeds Mr. Schmidt as alternate first horn, Mr. Max Hess being at the head of the other quartet. Mr. Scheurer who shared the first desk of the violas with Mr. Ferir, has left the orchestra and his place will be taken by Mr. Rennert, who for the past two years has been in the second violin section, although he was a viola player of note in Europe before he came to Boston in Dr. Muck's second year. Max Fiedler, of course, will again be the conductor.

The only change in the policy of the orchestra—and this does not affect its Boston season—will be a decided increase in the number of concerts it will give. Heretofore the maximum number of concerts has been 106, but this year it is intended to give 114 and while this increase seems not to be large, as a matter of fact to get in these extra concerts, which was absolutely necessary for the welfare of the orchestra, the management has been compelled to rearrange almost the entire schedule. Boston will have its usual allotment of twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts on consecutive Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings respectively, excepting on the following dates: Nov. 12 and 13, Dec. 10 and 11, Jan. 14 and 15, Feb. 4 and 5, and 25 and 26, and March 25 and 26. The final public rehearsal falls on Friday afternoon, April 29, and the final concert on the following evening, Saturday, April 30.

Of the concerts to be given outside of Boston, Cambridge will have its usual eight and New York its series of six, while the customary series of five concerts will be given in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. Providence this year has its quota of concerts increased from three to four, the patronage given to the orchestra there in the past two years having warranted the increase. Worcester will have three concerts, and Hartford and New Bedford for the first time will have a series of three concerts. Other cities in New England to be visited are Springfield, Bridgeport, Waterbury and Brockton. The usual western trip will be made on the week beginning Jan. 30, and this year the orchestra will give concerts on successive evenings in Buffalo, Cleveland, Detroit, Erie, Rochester and Syracuse. There will also be during the course of the season the usual two concerts for the benefit of the pension fund.

As has been the rule almost since the foundation of the orchestra the seats for the Boston concerts will be sold by auction. On Monday, Sept. 27, the $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold; on Tuesday, Sept. 28, the $10 seats for the rehearsals; on Thursday, Sept. 30, the $18 seats for the concerts and on Friday, Oct. 1, the $10 seats for the concerts. The usual rules will prevail that bids will be accepted for seats in the regular order only and not for the choice, while not more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be immediately resold.

The plans for the season from the musical point of view, which, after all, is that which interests the public most, are extensive and the concerts should more than maintain the high standard of interest which has characterized them in the past few years. Mr. Fiedler, who unquestionably was warmly liked last year, has proved himself especially skilful in the making of programmes and he has planned out a scheme of concerts of wide appeal to all classes of music lovers. Moreover, the United States is to be the battle ground during the coming winter of an uncommon number of artists of highest grade and in the list of soloists will be found the most representative of these. Among the singers are Madame Sembrich, Miss Farrar, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mme. Homer and Mme. Tilly Koenen. The pianists are Mme. Carreño, Mme. Samaroff, Mr. Busoni and Mr. Rachmaninoff. The violinists include Fritz Kreisler, Mischa Elman, Willy Hess and Sylvain Noack, while the 'cellist is Heinrich Warnke. This year, as last, the final concert will be devoted principally to Beethoven's Ninth Symphony when the orchestra will again have the valued assistance of the Cecilia Society and a quartet of whom it is possible now to announce Mme. Hissem de Moss, soprano. In this list are two visiting artists who have never been heard in Boston—Tilly Koenen and Serge Rachmaninoff, while Mr. Sylvain Noack, the second concert master of the orchestra will make his début as a soloist here, a number of things conspiring last year to prevent his earlier appearance.

Tilly Koenen is a name which was practically unknown even among musical people until the last two or three years when she began to attract much attention in Europe by her skill as an interpreter of songs and today over there she has a following as loyal and as admiring as that Dr. Wüllner has created. There is, however, this difference between Koenen and Wüllner—Koenen is said to have a voice of unusual beauty and to be a skilled singer. She is a Dutch woman, the greater part of whose career has been spent in Germany. The other newcomer is Serge Rachmaninoff, whose name is familiar by his Prelude in G-sharp minor which for a few years vied in popularity among amateur pianists with the famous "Minuet" of Paderewski. It was first played here ten years ago by Rachmaninoff's teacher, Alexander Sidoti and it stamped the composer as a man of talent. Rachmaninoff comes to America primarily as a pianist and it was as a pianist that he won his first fame in Europe. Russian born, bred and educated, he is not yet thirty-six years old. His early training he received in the conservatory in St. Petersburg. Later he went to the Moscow Conservatory which has turned out so many men of talent and there he took highest honors both with the piano and composition. For several years he devoted his life to the career of a wandering virtuoso and played with much success throughout Russia and Germany. Then he became a conductor; first of the Imperial Opera in Moscow and later of the Imperial Symphony concerts in St. Petersburg, but three years ago he resigned both of these places and moved to Dresden where he now lives, his intention being to devote his time entirely to composition. As a composer he has written operas, symphonies and other orchestral pieces, chamber music, much piano music and over one hundred songs. His debuts in Boston, New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra; and his appearance here with the orchestra will be his début in America. It is expected that he will play here his second concerto for piano and on the same programme will be his symphonic poem, "The Cliffs," which he will probably conduct himself.

Seldom has the orchestra offered such a list of eminent singers as it does for this year. Mme. Sembrich is coming to America for her farewell tour. A year ago she retired from the opera and this year in the course of eight months she expects to bid farewell to her many admirers in all parts of the country. It has been several years since she was heard with the orchestra and her appearance here with it will probably mark the last time she sings in Boston. Miss Farrar will sing at a pair of concerts in November and never before has Boston had an opportunity to hear her with its orchestra, although she has appeared with it in other cities. Efforts in the last two or three years were made several times to secure her, but her work at the Metropolitan Opera House made it impossible for her to come. Mme. Louise Homer will be the soloist on the first programme to be given on Friday afternoon, Oct. 8, and Saturday evening, Oct. 9.

The list of pianists is equally interesting. Mme. Carreño was here two years ago and demonstrated then that she had lost not a whit of the old fiery temperament that placed her in a class by herself and not a whit of the skilful technique which has made her one of the best pianists of the past quarter of a century. Mme. Samaroff last appeared in this city two years ago. She has gone through a hard campaign in Europe and has won praise in Paris, Vienna, Munich and in London and other cities of musical importance. Moreover, she has done a great deal of hard work in the way of study and those who have heard her recently report that she has advanced accordingly. The only masculine pianist beside Rachmaninoff will be Ferruccio Busoni, who returns after long absence, whose masterful technique has grown with the years, and whose qualities of mind and temperament have ripened him into a pianist of the first rank.

Of the four violinists announced, only Mr. Noack is an unknown quantity. Yet during the absence of Mr. Hess last spring, when Mr. Noack was called upon suddenly at a Pension Fund concert to play the difficult solo parts in Strauss's "Heldenleben," he acquitted himself with so much credit that it was evident that in him the orchestra had found an artist worthy to sit beside its concert master. Mr. Kreisler long since won his place in Boston, while Mischa Elman made last year the sensation that was promised, and his return to America this season is due chiefly to a series of engagements offered him by the Symphony Orchestra. Willy Hess, the concert master of the orchestra, has chosen Joachim's Hungarian Concerto for his appearance as a soloist, and it is probably the most difficult in the repertory of violinists. In it he made his début here five years ago.

The compositions, new and old, familiar and unfamiliar, Mr. Fiedler purposes to perform during the season have already been published, and it is worth while simply to call attention to some of the most interesting items. For example, there are four pieces by Delius, the English composer whose music has seldom been heard in Boston and of which much may be expected. Richard Strauss will be represented by his "Macbeth," the only one of his tone-poems still unknown here, and by the dance from "Salome," as well as by other of his familiar pieces. From Sibelius, whose music has made a deep impression wherever played, Mr. Fiedler has his Second Symphony, which had its first performance here under Mr. Gericke—a suite and three symphonic poems. Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" will be played for the first time in several years. The classics will be well represented with five symphonies by Beethoven, including the Ninth, Bach's Third Brandenburger Concerto for Strings, Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, Brahms's Fourth, Händel's Concerto in D-Major for Strings, Haydn's Symphony in E-flat, three Symphonies by Mozart, Schumann's B-flat Symphony and two symphonic poems by Saint-Saëns "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" and the Danse Macabre. The following are Dr. Fiedler's programmes for the first five concerts:

October 8–9

Beethoven...Overture, "Die Weihe des Hauses"
Aria.
Brahms.....Symphony No. 2, D-major
Songs.
Strauss..... "Don Juan"
Soloist: Louise Homer.

October 15–16

Reger.Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy, Opus 108 (First time.)
Joachim.....Concerto for violin
Beethoven.....Symphony No. 8, F-major
Soloist: Willy Hess.

October 22–23

Bantock..Overture, "The Pierrot of the Minute" (First time.)
Tschaikowsky.....Symphony No. 4, F-minor
Grieg.....Selections from "Peer Gynt"

October 29–30

Beethoven.....Overture, "Fidelio"
Rachmaninoff.....Symphonic poem, "The Cliffs"
Rachmaninoff.....Concerto for pianoforte No. 2
Strauss ..... "Till Eulenspiegel"
Soloist: Mr. Rachmaninoff.

November 5–6

D'Indy.....Symphony No. 2....
Aria.
Tschaikowsky..... Reve d'enfant
(First time.)
Songs.
Smetana.....Overture, "The Bartered Bride"
Soloist: Geraldine Farrar.

TRANSCRIPT, SEPTEMBER 20, 1909

Notes of the Day

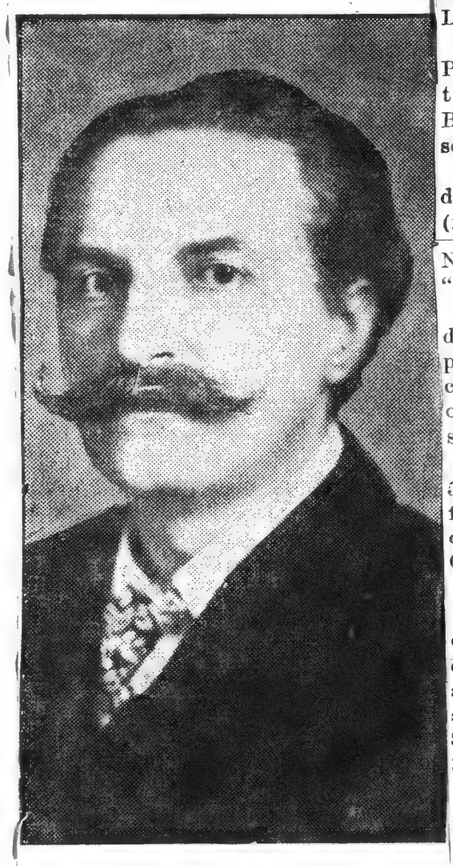
The circular that the management of the Symphony Concerts is sending to subscribers to them is much more ornate and explicit this autumn than it has been in previous years. Twelve vignettes of the "assisting artists" adorn it, and one page bears the list of the pieces that Mr. Fiedler has chosen for performance in the forthcoming series of concerts, as they were announced in the newspapers a week ago. Of the orchestra itself, the policy that has guided it and the results maintained the circular says truly: "Commercial considerations have never been permitted to interfere with, or to obstruct, its artistic progress. It has existed as nearly for art's sake alone as is possible in such a great organization. The result of this wise policy is an orchestra which is famous in all countries where the art of music is practised, which is accepted as a model to be followed by others, whose concerts are eagerly sought by all cities, and which has given invaluable aid in increasing the fame of its home city."

It is good to see Mr. d'Indy's name reappearing on one of the four programmes that Mr. Fiedler has already arranged definitely. The conductor is admirably open-minded toward the newer Parisian composers; Mr. d'Indy is one of the most eminent of them; while most of his music needs hearing and rehearing for the understanding of the grave thought that shapes its substance and the austere and deep imagination that gives it beauty. Mr. Fiedler's choice is the composer's second symphony, at once the most subtle, exalted and impressive of all Mr. d'Indy's orchestral pieces. It was last heard here, with the composer conducting, in December of 1905, while Mr. Gericke had tried it in the previous winter. Of all Mr. d'Indy's larger orchestral pieces only the "Souvenirs," written to his wife's memory, remains to be played in Boston.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR,
SEPTEMBER 18, 1909.

MR. FIELDER will sail from Liverpool on the Mauretania on next Saturday, Sept. 25, and is due to arrive in Boston Oct. 1. He has called his first rehearsal for Monday, Oct. 4. The season will be the busiest one the orchestra has ever had; in former years the maximum number of concerts was 106, but this year the total number, exclusive of two pension fund concerts, will be 11[illegible]

Beginning Oct. 8 there will be a concert in Boston every Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, with a skip of one Friday and Saturday in each month until April 30. Then there are eight Cambridge concerts on Thursday evenings; the concerts in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington given each month from November to March; those in the New England cities of Providence, New Bedford,



PROF. WILLY HESS.
Concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; soloist at the second Symphony concert.

Brockton, Worcester, Springfield, Hartford, Bridgeport and Waterbury; and those of the western tour in midwinter in Syracuse, Rochester, Buffalo, Erie, Detroit and Cleveland.

For the Boston concerts 15 soloists are announced—six singers, four pianists, four violinists and one violoncellist. Besides Mme. Louise Homer and Miss Tilly Koenen, contraltos, who will appear at the first of the season, Mme. Schumann-Heink, returning to America after a year of much accomplishment in Germany, is to have a place in a concert well on in the calendar; a part of her program will be to give the first performance of a scena for contralto and orchestra which Frederick S. Converse has composed for her.

The year will be distinguished by the appearance of two great sopranos, one early in the season and one late. Miss Farrar, who has never sung with the orchestra in Boston, has put herself, for the few weeks that precede her engagement with the Metropolitan Opera Company, under the concert direction of C. A. Ellis; and he has included her among the soloists of the autumn. Mme. Sembrich, at the end of an eight months' tour of America, will come to Boston for an appearance with the Symphony Orchestra, which is said to be her last in this country. At the two final concerts, April 29 and 30, the orchestra and the Cecilia Society, as at the close of last season, will perform the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, and Mme. Hissem de Moss, an American singer, will take the soprano part in the quartet.

For pianists there will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, Mme. Teresa Carreno, Messrs. Rachmaninoff and Busoni. There will be four violin soloists, two from afar, Kreisler and Elman; and two out of the orchestra itself, Prof. Willy Hess and Sylvain Noack. Mr. Noack, who shares the front desk of the first violins with Professor Hess, has never done any solo work with the orchestra except the passages for principal violin in the "Hero's Life" of Strauss, which he played once last year when the concertmaster was absent. There remains Heinrich Warnke on the list; there will be one occasion when he will leave his place as principal 'cellist and go to the front of the platform in a solo number.

The only new face in the orchestra this year will be a new first horn, Geo. Wendler, who has been called from Germany upon recommendation of Mr. Fiedler to take the place of Mr. Schmidt who last summer retired from the orchestra. Mr. Scheurer, who sat at the first desk of the viola section with Mr. Ferir, also has retired from the orchestra and his place will be taken by Mr. Rennert, whom Dr. Muck called to Boston two years ago. The delicate question as to who will be the principal horn player, Max Hess or the newcomer, Mr. Wendler, has been given a conservative settlement; Mr. Hess will remain at the head of the first quartet of horns.

* * *

Here follow the programs of the first five Symphony concerts:

Oct. 8-9—Beethoven, overture, "Die Weihe des Hauses"; aria; Brahms, Symphony No. 2, D-major; songs; Strauss, "Don Juan," symphonic poem; soloist, Louise Homer.

Oct. 15-16—Max Reger, Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy, Opus 10 (first time); Joachim, concerto for violin; Beethoven, Symphony No. 8, F-major; soloist, Willy Hess.

Oct. 22-23—Granville Bantock, overture, "The Pierrot of the Minute" (first time); Tschaikowsky, Symphony No. 4, F-minor; Grieg, selections from "Peer Gynt."

Oct. 29-30—Beethoven, overture, "Fidelio," E-major; Rachmaninoff, symphonic poem, "The Cliffs"; Rachmaninoff, concerto for pianoforte No. 2, in C-minor, opus 18; Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel"; soloist, Serge Rachmaninoff.

Nov. 5-6—D'Indy, Symphony No. 2, op. 57; aria; Tschaikowsky, "Reve d'Enfant" (first time); songs; Smetana, overture, "The Bartered Bride"; soloist, Geraldine Farrar.

* * *

The dates of the public auction sale of the seats for the rehearsals and concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are as follows: Monday, Sept. 27, $18 seats for rehearsals; Tuesday, Sept. 28, $10 seats for rehearsals; Thursday, Sept. 30, $18 seats for concerts; Friday, Oct. 1, $10 seats for concerts. The sale will all begin at 10 o'clock in the morning. The usual rules will prevail. Bid will be accepted for seats in the regular order only and not for the choice; and not more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as fast as they are sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and any that are not paid for on delivery will be put up again at auction.

* * *

[7]

TIGHT BINDING

BOSTON TRAVELER, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 1909.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLANS FOR THE SEASON

Distinguished Soloists to Add Lustre to Already Brilliant Collection of Musical Artists.

The 29th season of the Symphony Orchestra, which opens on Friday afternoon, Oct. 8, will show a minimum of changes in the personnel of the band and the only new member this year will be George Wendler, who succeeds Mr. Schmidt as alternate first horn, Mr. Max Hess being at the head of the other quartette. Mr. Scherer, who shared the first desk of the violas with Mr. Ferir, has left the orchestra, and his place will be taken by Mr. Rennert, who for the past two years has been in the second violin section, although he was a viola player of note in Europe before he came to Boston in Dr. Muck's second year. Max Fiedler of course, will again be the conductor.

The only change in the policy of the orchestra, and this does not affect its Boston season, will be a decided increase in the number of the concerts it will give. Heretofore the maximum number of concerts has been 106, but this year it is intended to give 114, and while this increase seems not to be large, as a matter of fact to get in these extra concerts, which was absolutely necessary for the welfare of the orchestra, the management has been compelled to rearrange almost the entire schedule.

Boston will have its usual allotment of 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts on consecutive Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings respectively, excepting on the following dates: Nov. 12 and 13, Dec. 10 and 11, Jan. 14 and 15, Feb. 4 and 5 and 25 and 26, and March 25 and 26. The final public rehearsal will be given on Friday afternoon, April 29, and the final concert on the following evening, Saturday, April 30.

Cambridge Concerts.

Of the concerts to be given outside of Boston, Cambridge will have its usual eight and New York its double series of five each, while the customary series of five concerts will be given in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. Providence this year has its quota of concerts increased from three to four, the patronage given to the orchestra there in the past two years having warranted the increase. Worcester will have three concerts, likewise Hartford, and New Bedford for the first time will have a series of three concerts. Other cities in New England to be visited are Springfield, Bridgeport, Waterbury and Brockton. The usual western trip will be made on the week beginning Jan. 30, and this year the orchestra will give concerts on successive evenings in Buffalo, Cleveland, Detroit, Erie, Rochester and Syracuse. There will also be during the course of the season the usual two concerts for the benefit of the pension fund.

As has been the rule almost since the foundation of the orchestra, the seats for the Boston concerts will be sold at auction. On Monday, Sept. 27, the $18 seats for the rehearsals will be sold; on Tuesday, Sept. 28, the $10 seats for the rehearsals; on Thursday, Sept. 30, the $18 seats for the concerts will be sold, and on Friday, Oct. 1, the $10 seats for the concerts. The usual rules will prevail that bids will be accepted for seats in the regular order only and not for choice, and not more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

Noted Singers to Appear.

Among the singers noted are the names of Madame Marcella Sembrich, Miss Geraldine Farrar, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mme. Louise Homer and Mme. Tilly Koenen. In the pianists are found Mme. Terressa Carreno, Mme. Olga Samaroff, Ferruccio Busoni and Serge Rachmaninoff. The violinists include Fritz Kreisler, Mischa Elman, Willy Hess and Sylvain Noack, while the 'cellists are represented by Heinrich Warnke, 'cello soloist of the orchestra. This year, as last, the final concert will be devoted principally to Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, when the orchestra will again have the valued assistance of the Cecelia Society and a quartette, of whom it is possible now to announce Mme. Hissem de Moss, soprano.

Artists Who Will Tour with Boston Symphony Orchestra This Season

GERALDINE FARRAR.

MME. MARCELLA SEMBRICH.

LOUISE HOMER.
MAX FIEDLER.

FAMOUS SOLOISTS OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SEASON.

Photo Copyright Dupont N.Y.

SCHUMANN HEINK—CONTRALTO.

TERESA CARRENO, PIANIST.

FERRUCCIO BUSONI, PIANIST.

MARCELLA SEMBRICH, SOPRANO.

GERALDINE FARRAR SOPRANO.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—SEPTEMBER 19, 1909.

The annual prospectus of the Boston Symphony orchestra for 1909-1910 promises one of the best seasons of symphonic music that Boston has had since its organization. Not only is the list of soloists unusually strong, but the list of works, new and old, which are to be performed, seem to have a minimum of mediocrity in them. These facts, combined with Mr Fiedler's talent for making programs, make it evident that the 29th year of the orchestra will be from an artistic point of view one of the most important.

In the past 106 concerts in seven months has been the maximum, but this year Mr Ellis has found it possible to rearrange the schedule of concerts outside of Boston so as to increase the number of engagements to 113 or 114. Boston will have its usual allotment of 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings respectively, beginning Oct 8-9 and closing April 29-30.

Mme Sembrich's appearance in the spring will have about it a more than ordinary sentimental interest, for it will probably be the last time she will ever sing in Boston. Last year she bade farewell to opera, and with this year's tour in America and one season more of concert performances on the continent of Europe her public career will be definitely closed. Mr Fiedler will undoubtedly arrange a specially appropriate program for this occasion.

Miss Farrar will sing in Boston for the first time with the Symphony orchestra. She has sung with the orchestra in one or two cities elsewhere, but it has never been possible to arrange for her appearance at a Symphony concert here. This year, fortunately, she is to give a series of concerts under the management of Mr Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, and by this means it has been found possible to include her name in the list of soloists.

Mme Schumann-Heink is again in this country after a sensationally successful year in Germany, where, as so often has been the case with artists, they discovered the greatness which America had recognized for many years. She expects to sing for the first time anywhere a scena for contralto and orchestra written at her request by Frederick S. Converse of this city.

Mme Louise Homer, who may almost be regarded as a home product of Boston, needs no introduction to the Boston Symphony public, and Mme Hissem de Moss, one of the best of American sopranos, has been engaged to appear with the Cecilia society as the soprano in the quartet for Beethoven's ninth symphony, with which work Mr Fiedler proposes to close the season.

Mme Tilly Koenen, a new-comer, is a mezzo-soprano who is said to be as effective in the field of song as Dr Wullner. She is described as the possessor of a voice of great beauty and of being a mistress of the art of singing.

Rachmaninoff will be presented in the three-fold capacity of composer, conductor and pianist. His debuts in New York, Boston, Philadelphia and Baltimore will be at Boston symphony concerts and he is coming to America for the first time. Although he is not yet 36 years old he seems to hold undisputed rank as the greatest of living Russian composers.

His program will probably include his symphonic poem, "The Cliffs," and his second concerto for pianoforte. He has won a place for himself as conductor in Moscow and St Petersburg and it is expected that he will conduct his symphonic poem as well as play his concerto

In Carreno and Samaroff the orchestra has two of the greatest women pianists of their generations. Carreno, although her hair is white and she is a grandmother, showed two years ago that she had lost none of the youthful fire and none of the facile technique and tremendous power that had long since placed her in a class by herself.

Mme Samaroff returns to America this year after a year abroad, where she won enviable success in London, Paris, Vienna, Munich and other cities of musical importance.

Ferruccio Busoni will be heard for the first time in several years. It is not necessary to emphasize the fact that he is one of the greatest of living pianists, a man of enormous technique and of unusual gifts.

Equally brilliant is the list of violinists. The visiting artists will be Fritz Kreisler and Mischa Elman. Kreisler returns to America after a year's absence, in which Europe awakened to the fact that he is one of the greatest violinists the world has ever known.

The return of Mischa Elman cannot help but arouse interest, for this youth made a profound sensation at his various appearances in Boston last winter.

The orchestra will be represented in the violinists by Willy Hess, the concert master, and Sylvain Noack, the second concert-master. Mr Hess' artistry needs no advertisement in Boston, where he has so many admirers. Mr Noack has yet to be heard as a soloist, although this will be his second year with the orchestra. Mr Warnke, 'cellist, will complete the trio of soloists from the ranks of the Symphony men.

After the many changes in its personnel in the last few years, the orchestra is once more in a stable condition, and this year in its membership there will be but one new musician, Georg Wendler, who has been engaged as the first horn, to take the place of Mr Schmid, who retired last spring.

Mr Scheurer, who for the past two years has shared the first desk in the viola section with Mr Ferir, also has retired from the orchestra, but his place will be taken by Mr Rennert, who for the last two years has been in the second violin section. Mr Rennert, before he came to America, was exclusively a viola player, and he has been waiting for this opportunity to get into the viola section.

OLGA SAMAROFF. PIANIST.

TILLY KOENEN, MEZZO-SOPRANO.

SERGE RACHMANINOFF COMPOSER PIANIST.

[8]

ARTISTS WHO WILL TAKE LEADING PARTS IN THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLANS BIG SCHEDULE

Gives 111 Concerts at Least This Season; Sembrich to Sing Perhaps the Last Time Here.

The annual auction sale of seats for the coming season of Symphony concerts will be held in Symphony Hall on Monday, Tuesday and Thursday, Sept. 27, 28 and 30, and on Friday, Oct. 1. On the first day the $18 seats for the public rehearsals will be sold, on the second the $10 seats for the rehearsals, on the third the $18 seats for the concerts will be sold and on the fourth the $10 seats.

The usual rules will prevail, bids being accepted for seats in the regular order only and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid.

The season of 1909 and 1910 of the Symphony orchestra, which will be its 29th, promises to be in every respect one of the best in its history. An unusually attractive list of soloists is announced, artists who are representative of the best musical talent that will be in the country during the winter. If there is one noticeable thing about this list it is that more singers than usual are included in it.

The orchestra is practically unchanged from last year, for it will contain but one new member, Georg Wendler, who has succeeded Mr. Schmid as first horn, and will be the colleague of Max Hess, who, of course, remains. Mr. Scheurer, who shared the first desk of the viola section with Mr. Ferir, has retired from the orchestra, but his place will be taken by Mr. Rennert, who was one of the recruits brought over from Europe in the second year of Dr. Muck's engagement, and although he was a viola player of note in Germany, he has been in the second violin section waiting for an opportunity to get among the violas.

Prof. Willy Hess will, of course, be concert master, and with him at the first desk will be Sylvain Noack, who will be heard this year for the first time as a soloist. The leader of the 'cellos will again be Heinrich Warnke, with Mr. Ferir at the head of the violas, Mr. Barleben at the head of the second violin section and Mr. Keller at the head of the double basses. Messrs. Longy, Grisez, Andre Maquarre and Sadony are the leaders in the wood wind section.

While it does not affect the Boston season, it is a matter of interest to know that the orchestra is to give a larger number of concerts during the coming season than ever before in its history. In the past the greatest number of concerts has been 106, which was in the last year of Mr. Gericke's administration. This year already 111 have been booked, and at least two will be added to this number.

Concerts Out of Town.

Of the out-of-town concerts, the usual eight will be given in Cambridge, the two series of five each in New York, and the series of five in each of the cities visited on the regular monthly trip—Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn. Providence is to have four concerts instead of three; and three concerts are to be given in New Bedford, which city the orchestra has not visited for a number of years. Worcester will have its three concerts, likewise Hartford, but Springfield this year will have but one.

Other cities to be visited in New England are Brockton, Bridgeport and Waterbury. In the regular western trip beginning the last week of January, concerts will be given in Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Erie, Rochester and Syracuse. The usual two pension fund concerts will be given also during the season.

The list of soloists comprises the following artists: Mesdames Marcella Sembrich, Geraldine Farrar, Schumann-Heink, Louise Homer, Tilly Koenen, Hissem de Moss, Teresa Carreno and Olga Samaroff, and Messrs. Farruccio Busoni, Mischa Elman, Fritz Kreisler, Serge Rachmaninoff, Willy Hess, Sylvain Noack and Heinrich Warnke. Others will be added to this list, because Mr. Fiedler this year, as last, purposes to end the season with a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. In this the orchestra will again have the valuable aid of the Cecelia Society and Mme. Hissem de Moss will be the soprano of the quartet. The names of the others are yet to be announced.

Sembrich for Last Time.

Mme. Sembrich's appearance in the spring will have about it a more than ordinary sentimental interest, for it will probably be the last time she will ever sing in Boston. Miss Farrar, who bids fair to take the place in the affections of the public which Mme. Sembrich has held so long, will sing in Boston for the first time with the Symphony orchestra.

Mme. Schumann-Heink is again in this country after a year in Germany, where, as so often has been the case with artists, they discovered the greatness which America had recognized for many years. More than ordinary interest attaches to her appearance here because she expects to sing for the first time anywhere a Scena for contralto and orchestra written at her request by Frederick S. Converse of this city.

Mme. Louise Homer, who may almost be regarded as a home product of Boston, needs no introduction to the Boston Symphony public. Mme. Tilly Koenen is entirely a new comer, but the success which she has been enjoying the last few years on the continent, and more recently in England, seems to augur well for her season in America. She is a mezzo-soprano.

The pianists that have been engaged are Mme. Teresa Carreno, Mme. Olga Samaroff, Serge Rachmaninoff and Ferruccio Busoni. Rachmaninoff will be presented in the three-fold capacity of composer, conductor and pianist. Rachmaninoff is one of the very interesting personalities who are to visit America this winter. He was born March 20, 1873, in the government of Novgorod, Russia. In 1904 the management of the Imperial Theatre in Moscow appointed him first conductor of Russian operas. This post he held for two years with much success, and then he resigned in order to devote himself to composition. His first great success as a composer was with his prelude in C sharp minor, which enjoyed a great popularity in this country after it was introduced by Siloti 10 years ago. His most important piano compositions comprise two concertos, the first in F sharp minor, the second in C minor (this latter he will play in Boston), and two suites for two pianos and a sonata in D minor. His best known works of chamber music are his sonata op. 19 and his trio in memory of Tschaikowsky. He has had three operas produced, "Aleko," in one act; "Der geigige Ritter," in one act, and "Francesco da Rimini," in three acts. All these have been produced in Moscow. His four large orchestral compositions are the symphonic poem "Die Felsen," op. 7, after a poem by Lermentoff; a "Gypsy Caprice" and two symphonies. It is expected that at his appearance in Boston he will not only play his second piano concerto, but will conduct the performance of his symphonic poem "Die Felsen."

Pianists and Violinists.

In Carreno and Samaroff the orchestra have two of the greatest women pianists of their generations. Ferruccio Busoni will be heard for the first time in several years. He is one of the greatest of living pianists, a man of enormous technique and of unusual gifts.

Equally brilliant is the list of violinists. The visiting artists will be Fritz Kreisler and Mischa Elman. Kreisler returns to America after a year's absence. The return of Mischa Elman cannot help but arouse interest, for this youth made a profound sensation at his various appearances in Boston last winter.

The orchestra will be represented by Willy Hess, the concert master, and Sylvain Noack, the second concert master. Mr. Noack has yet to be heard as a soloist, although this will be his second year with the orchestra.

The following are Mr. Fiedler's programs for the first five concerts:

I. OCTOBER 8-9.

Overture, Die Weihe des Hauses"..... Beethoven
Aria.
Symphony No. 2 (D major).....Brahms
Songs.
"Don Juan," symphonic poem.....Strauss
Soloist Louise Homer.

II. OCTOBER 15-16.

Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy, (Opus 108).....Max Reger
(First time.)
Concerto for violin .....Joachim
Symphony No. 8 (F major).... Beethoven
Soloist Willy Hess.

III. OCTOBER 22-23.

Comedy overture, "The Pierrot of the Minute" .....Granville Bantock
(First time.)
Symphony No. 4 (F minor)..Tschaikowsky
Selections from "Peer Gynt".....Grieg

IV. OCTOBER 29-30.

Overture, "Fidelio" (E major)...Beethoven
Symphonic poem .....Rachmaninoff
Concerto for pianoforte No. 2 (in C minor: Opus 18).....Rachmaninoff
Till Eulenspiegel..... Strauss
Soloist Serge Rachmaninoff.

V. NOVEMBER 5-6.

Symphony No. 2 (Op. 57).....d'Indy
Aria.
Reve d'enfant..... Tschaikowsky
(First time.)
Songs.
Overture, "The Bartered Bride"..Smetana
Soloist Geraldine Farrar.

TRANSCRIPT,
SEPTEMBER 21, 1909

Contrary to the usual custom of the German conductors of the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler will return to Boston through England. He will sail from Fishguard by the Mauretania next Saturday; and he is expected in Boston on the following Friday. The rehearsals of the orchestra begin on Monday, Oct. 4, and its first concert falls on the following Wednesday in Sanders Theatre at Harvard, as a part of the inauguration of President Lowell.

On the program for the inauguration of the president of Harvard University, a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater, Wednesday, Oct. 6, in the evening. Other music for inauguration week will be furnished by the Harvard alumni chorus.

MME. TERESA CARRENO.
One of the four pianists who will appear with the Symphony Orchestra in the course of the season.

MONITOR,
SEPTEMBER 21, 1909.

MME. MARCELLA SEMBRICH.
One of the engagements of her American tour soon to begin is with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

TRAVELER, MONDAY,
SEPTEMBER 20, 1909

TILLY KOENEN, who is one of the new soloists that will be with the Symphony Orchestra at its concerts in Boston this year, brings to America an extraordinary reputation, and it is expected that she will make as deep an impression on the musical public as Dr. Wullner did last year.

Miss Koenen is the daughter of a Dutch general of cavalry, and she was born in Java. Up to her 15th year she studied the piano, when her mother's influence guided her to take up the study of the voice at the Amsterdam Conservatory, and soon her extraordinary talent was recognized by Cornelia Van Zanten, now one of the best-known vocal teachers in Berlin. Mme. Van Zanten devoted her entire time to the development of Miss Koenen's voice, and for seven years this Dutch singer has had the most brilliant career. She not only is said to have a voice of extraordinary beauty, and to be quite a mistress in the art of singing, but she is said also to be as extraordinarily gifted in the interpretation of songs, and it is as a singer of songs that she expects to do most of her work in America, but with the orchestra she is to sing concert arias. Unless all signs fail, she promises to be one of the very interesting features of the season.

TILLY KOENEN.

BOSTON JOURNAL,
SEPTEMBER 22, 1909.

Olga Samaroff, Symphony Concert Pianist

HUB MAY LAY CLAIM TO ONE SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Boston may almost claim as its own Olga Samaroff, the pianist, who is to be one of the soloists at the Symphony concerts this season, for it is here she spends as much of her time as she can when in America, and here she is very popular with the music-loving public.

Madame Samaroff spent the past summer near Rye Beach, N. H., where she has been able to work as much as she liked without fear of disturbing the neighbors. As a matter of fact, when it became known that she did much of her practising in the evening, people began to beat a path to her rather out-of-the-way door.

Besides her Boston engagement, Madame Samaroff is to play in several other cities this season.

TRANSCRIPT,
SEPTEMBER 23, 1909

MUSICAL NEWS

Reger's Newest Orchestral Piece as London Lately Heard It—The Curious Sayings of Mr. Gatti-Casazza—"Arranged" Debussy—Mr. Paderewski Composing—Miss Garden and "Electra"

Reger's "Symphonic Prologue to "A Tragic Play," his newest composition for orchestra and the first important new piece that Mr. Fiedler has on his programmes for the Symphony Concerts here, was played in London last week by the Queen's Hall Orchestra under Mr. Wood. Evidently the reviewers, who are none too open-minded toward Reger, found the Prologue interesting. The Times, for example, says of it: "Like most of the composer's larger pieces, it is clear in design, being, in fact, in strict symphonic form with an introduction. The themes, too, are clear and distinctive, one of the most prominent being a unison phrase which ends when it is first given out in a group of three emphatic semiims. But although the themes are distinctive and preserve their character throughout the elaborate development section, where they crowd on each other and are combined with extraordinary contrapuntal skill, they have this disadvantage, that after they have once been stated they do not seem to gain anything in interest or beauty. The working-out section is also very long, like that of the exposition, and seems all the longer from the composer's habit of constantly breaking off the phrases clean and abruptly taking up another subject in a different pace and a different tonality. Some of the climaxes, in building up which Reger, as usual, shows great skill, are spoiled by these abrupt and sometimes brutal transitions, and much of the continuity of the work is in consequence lost. The orchestra played it remarkably well, and the six horns in particular managed to make some strikingly beautiful effects."

The reviewer of the Morning Post is more concerned with the expressive and the imaginative aspects of the music. "No particular tragedy," he writes, "is named as forming the basis of the work, but it is clear that it is some great tragedy, one possibly not yet written, for the composition is on massive lines. A large orchestra is employed, and all its resources are utilized for the production of effects. These are but rarely dynamic; the stout texture of the Prologue is secured by division of the forces into many parts. The plan brings about the seething sound that befits an illustration of a tragedy, and it is in the way in which correct atmosphere is secured that the value of the work lies. It is dark-hued and sombre, but there are high lights in the darkness worked in with a wonderful command of the material used, and as such it is a remarkable effort. Its effect is, however, too depressing for frequent repetition, though as a piece of constructive work it is monumental."

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR,
SEPTEMBER 23, 1909.

MUSICAL EVENTS

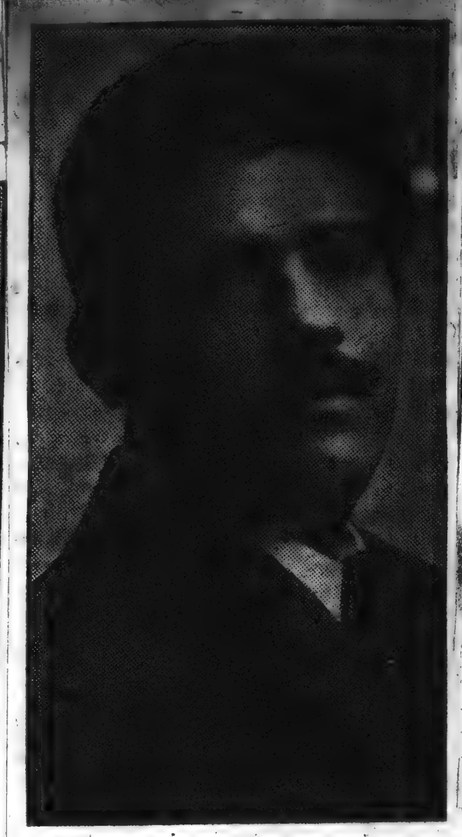
MISCHA ELMAN.
A midseason soloist to play with the Symphony Orchestra in Boston and on southern trip.

THE soloists who appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the cities visited once a month during the season are taken from the departments of piano, violin and voice in about the same proportions as are the soloists of the home concerts. In New York the pianists will be Samaroff and Rachmaninoff; the violinists, Mischa Elman and Willy Hess; the singers, Gilibert, Schumann-Heink and Sembrich. The Philadelphia and Baltimore concerts will have the same list without Gilibert and Professor Hess. On the Brooklyn list, which is smaller by three names than that of New York, are Samaroff, Elman, Willy Hess and Gilibert. The four soloists of the Washington concerts are Samaroff, Mischa Elman, Willy Hess and Corinne Rider-Kelsey.

As has already been announced, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a special concert in Sanders Theater, Harvard University, on Wednesday evening, Oct. 6. This concert will be a part of the formal ceremonies attending the installation of President Lowell and no tickets will be sold. Mr. Fiedler has prepared and sent to Mr. Ellis a program on which with scholastic significance stand the names of the great three whose names begin with "B." Likewise, scholastically stands at the head of the program the Brahms overture of "Gaudeamus" associations:

Brahms—Academic Festival Overture.
Bach—Suite for orchestra in D-major.
Beethoven — Symphony in C-minor, No. 5.

* * *



FRITZ KREISLER.
[illegible] will play late in the season with the [illegible] Orchestra in Boston.

JOURNAL—
THE BOSTON JOURNAL

SYMPHONY AT HARVARD

At the special concert in Sanders Theater on Wednesday evening, Oct. 6, in connection with the installation of Dr. Lowell as president of Harvard the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Max Fiedler, will make its first appearance of the season, and will offer the following program:

Brahms.....Academic festival overture
Bach.....Suite for orchestra in D major
Beethoven.....Symphony in C minor No. 5

ADVERTISER,
SEPTEMBER 23, 1909

MUSIC NOTES.

As has already been announced, the Boston Symphony orchestra will give a special concert in Sanders theatre, Harvard university, on Wednesday evening, Oct. 6. This concert is a part of the formal ceremonies attending the installation of the new president of the university and no tickets will be sold, admittance being by invitation only. Yesterday C. A. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, received from Mr. Fiedler the programme of the concert. It is:

Brahms—Academic Festival Overture.
Bach—Suite for Orchestra in D major.
Beethoven—Symphony in C minor, No. 5.

A partial list of soloists which have been engaged for the more important outside concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra is: New York, Sembrich, Schumann-Heink, Samaroff, Gilibert, Rachmaninoff, Mischa Elman and Willy Hess; Philadelphia, Sembrich, Schumann-Heink, Rachmaninoff and Mischa Elman; Baltimore, Sembrich, Schumann-Heink, Rachmaninoff and Mischa Elman; Washington, Rider-Kelsey, Samaroff, Mischa Elman and Willy Hess; Brooklyn, Gilibert, Samaroff, Mischa Elman and Willy Hess.

RECORD,
SEPTEMBER 23, 1909

MUSIC NOTES.

As has already been announced, the Boston Symphony orchestra will give a special concert in Sanders theatre, Harvard university, on Wednesday evening, Oct. 6. This concert is a part of the formal ceremonies attending the installation of the new president of the university and no tickets will be sold, admittance being by invitation only. Yesterday C. A. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, received from Mr. Fiedler the programme of the concert. It is:

Brahms—Academic Festival Overture.
Bach—Suite for Orchestra in D major.
Beethoven—Symphony in C minor, No. 5.

A partial list of soloists which have been engaged for the more important outside concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra is: New York, Sembrich, Schumann-Heink, Samaroff, Gilibert, Rachmaninoff, Mischa Elman and Willy Hess; Philadelphia, Sembrich, Schumann-Heink, Rachmaninoff and Mischa Elman; Baltimore, Sembrich, Schumann-Heink, Rachmaninoff and Mischa Elman; Washington, Rider-Kelsey, Samaroff, Mischa Elman and Willy Hess; Brooklyn, Gilibert, Samaroff, Mischa Elman and Willy Hess.

POST,
SEPTEMBER 23, 1909

HARVARD TO HEAR SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, on Wednesday evening, Oct. 6, will be a part of the formal ceremonies attending the installation of the new president of the university and no tickets will be sold.

GLOBE—
SEPTEMBER 23, 1909.

The special concert in Sanders theatre Wednesday evening, Oct 6, by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be a part of the ceremonies attending the installation of the new president and no tickets will be sold. The program will be as follows: Brahm, "Academic Festival," overture; Bach, suite in orchestra, D major, and Beethoven's fifth symphony.

At Symphony hall next Monday morning at 10 o'clock the annual auction sale of season tickets will open for the Symphony concerts.

TRAVELER,
SEPTEMBER 25, 1909

Auction Sale of Symphony Seats Begins on Monday

MONDAY brings the first concrete sign of what promises to be the busiest musical season Boston has ever known—the opening of the auction sales of the seats for the Symphony concerts.

The sale will begin at 10 o'clock promptly and, with an hour's pause for luncheon, will continue until all the $18 seats for the 24-hour public rehearsals have been sold. On Tuesday morning at the same hour the $10 seats for the rehearsals will be auctioned off. This is the shortest of the four sales because the second balcony, 505 seats, is held in reserve for the loyal supporters of the orchestra who spend hours each week in Huntington avenue waiting for the doors to open. These seats are sold for 25 cents each. There are no tickets of admission, those wishing them paying their money as they enter the hall. In only this manner devised by the late Frederic Comeee has it been possible to thwart ticket speculators, for the seats might easily bring a dollar and on special occasions even more, for they are really among the best in the house.

After a lapse of a day, on Thursday morning, the $18 seats for the 24 Saturday evening concerts will be sold, and Friday the $10 seats for the concerts will be offered for sale. It should be remembered that for the concerts there are no reservations. All the seats in the hall are put up for sale.

Mr. Fiedler sails from Liverpool today on the Mauretania, and will probably reach Boston some time next Friday.

The first concert of the season will be that in Sanders Theatre on the evening of Oct. 6. This will be a part of the ceremonies attending the installation of President Lowell, and only invited guests will be present.

SEPTEMBER 25, 1909.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

ON Monday morning at 10 o'clock, when the sale of tickets for the Symphony season begins, there will be put up at auction the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals; and on Tuesday morning at the same hour will be offered the $10 seats for the Friday rehearsals. The sale of $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts begins on Thursday morning at 10 o'clock and the sale of the $10 seats Friday morning at the same hour. The sales will continue each day until all the seats are disposed of, and even with the hour's pause for luncheon the auctions will probably last every day, except Tuesday, until late in the afternoon. The Tuesday sale is the shortest because the 505 seats in the second balcony are withheld for those who on rehearsal days stand in line to buy the 25-cent admissions. Thus is continued the policy of providing for students and others who wish to hear the orchestra at a small price.

The managers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra explain that bidders are expected to name the amount they are willing to pay more than the "upset" prices just noted above. The seats are sold only in the order in which they appear on a chart shown at the time of the auction; no more than four seats are sold on one bid.

In the old Music Hall days of the orchestra the prices of season tickets for the 24 rehearsals or for the 24 concerts were $7.50 and $12, with 25 cents admission for the rehearsals and 50 cents admission for the concerts. As the performances of the orchestra increased in popularity the old stand-in-line method of buying season tickets began to prove inconvenient, for often the line formed two days before the sale opened and a large proportion of the tickets fell into the hands of speculators. Somebody devised the auction scheme, which won such favor that for many seasons every seat in Music Hall was bought at the autumn sales. The original "upset" prices were maintained until the fall of 1906, when the price of the $7.50 seats was raised to $10 and that of the $12 seats to $18. The prime reason for this move was to lessen the auctioneering; for as a rule none of the $12 seats brought less than a $6 premium and none of the $7.50 seats brought a premium of less than $2.50, so that the raising of the price merely meant so much time saved by cutting out the early bids.

The auctions of late years have been less exciting than they formerly were because many patrons of the orchestra instead of buying their tickets in person give their orders for seats to commissioners. By so doing they save themselve trouble but they do not always save money. At every sale there are bargains in odd seats and odd pairs of seats which the commissioners, having specific orders as to location, refuse; and if purchasers were themselves present at the auction they could probably buy just as desirable seats as those ordered and could buy them at much smaller premiums than the commissioners pay.

Mr. Fiedler sails from Liverpool today on the Mauretania and will probably reach Boston Oct. 1.

The first concert of the season will be that in Sanders Theater on the evening of Oct. 6. This will be a part of the ceremony attending the installation of President Lowell, and only invited guests will be present.

On Wednesday, Sept. 29, the orchestra will go to Worcester to take part in the three days' music festival to be given in Mechanics Hall by the Worcester County Musical Association. The choral work of the festival, the "Elijah" of the opening night and the Liszt mass and the Berlioz "Te Deum" of the second night, will be given under the direction of Dr. Arthur Mees of New York; the instrumental programs of the two matinees and of the last evening will be conducted by Gustav Strube.

* * *

TRANSCRIPT, SEPTEMBER 25, 1909

MUSICAL NEWS

The Auctions for the Symphony Concerts —A Change in Local Habit—The Programmes of the Worcester Festival and the Singers Engaged for It

The annual sale by auction of the seats for the Symphony Concerts begins on Monday morning in Symphony Hall, at ten o'clock, and continues with an interval for luncheon through the day. On Monday, the seats at $18 for the twenty-four afternoon concerts on Fridays from October through April will be sold. On Tuesday, at the same place and the same hour, the sale will cover the seats at $10 for the afternoon concerts. Thursday, again at ten and in Symphony Hall, brings the sale of the seats at $18 for the twenty-four concerts of Saturday evenings, and on Friday, the seats at $10 for the evening concerts will be sold. The conditions of all four sales are the familiar conditions of many previous years. The prices named are upset prices and bidding begins at them. Bids must be made for the seats in the order of sale, and not for the general choice. No more than four seats are sold upon any one bid, and the whole price must be paid on the spot or the seats will be sold.

The circular from the management notes interestingly a change in local habit at the auctions: "Each year," it says, "more and more of the regular subscribers have been putting their orders for seats in the hands of commissioners. In the early days of the auctions, practically everybody was on hand to bid for seats, and the competition was often exciting and always entertaining. Now, with a few commissioners laden with orders, the sales are likely to be a bit humdrum, for there are rarely individual contests for certain seats. While the patrons who thus give their orders are saving themselves trouble by so doing, it is not always true that they are saving money. At every sale there are 'bargains' in odd seats and odd pairs of seats which commissioners, having specific orders as to position, are unable to buy; whereas if the purchaser were on the ground himself, he might very probably get just as desirable seats as those ordered, and for much less money."

RECORD, SEPTEMBER 25, 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of the Symphony orchestra, is now on the high seas on his way to New York, having sailed today from Liverpool by the Mauretania. The first rehearsal has been called Oct. 4, and the first concert of the season, in which the entire orchestra will take part, will be in Sanders theatre on Oct. 6. This will be a part of the ceremonies attending the installation of Pres. Lowell, and only invited guests will be present. That part of the orchestra which is to be at the Worcester Festival next week holds its first rehearsal in Symphony hall this afternoon under the leadership of Mr. Gustav Strube, who this year succeeds Franz Kneisel as conductor of instrumental works at the festival.

The real beginning of the Symphony season comes Monday morning, when the first of the annual auction sales take place in Symphony hall beginning at 10 a.m. As has always been the rule in the past, the first sale will be devoted to the $18 seats of the 24 public rehearsals, and the sale will continue with an hour's pause for luncheon until all these seats have been disposed of.

At the same hour on Tuesday the $10 seats for the public rehearsals will be auctioned off. It should be remembered by those desiring to purchase these seats that this is the shortest sale of the four, and is over as a rule shortly after noon because the 505 seats in the second balcony are held out for paid admissions on the day of the rehearsal.

TRAVELER, MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 1909.

GERALDINE FARRAR

FOR the first time, this year, Geraldine Farrar is to appear in Boston as a soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Miss Farrar is unquestionably today the singer who enjoys the greatest popularity with the Boston public, and justly so, for not only is she to all intents and purposes a Boston girl, but her voice, her beauty and talent have, so to say, pitchforked her into the very front rank of the artists of her time, although she is still only in her mid-twenties. Miss Farrar has sung elsewhere with the orchestra, but it has never been possible until this year to arrange her appearance here at a Symphony concert. The date of her appearance is early in November.

ADVERTISER, SEPTEMBER 25, 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of the Symphony orchestra, is now on the high seas on his way to New York, having sailed today from Liverpool by the Mauretania. The first rehearsal has been called Oct. 4, and the first concert of the season, in which the entire orchestra will take part, will be in Sanders theatre on Oct. 6. This will be a part of the ceremonies attending the installation of Pres. Lowell, and only invited guests will be present. That part of the orchestra which is to be at the Worcester Festival next week holds its first rehearsal in Symphony hall this afternoon under the leadership of Mr. Gustav Strube, who this year succeeds Franz Kneisel as conductor of instrumental works at the festival.

The real beginning of the Symphony season comes Monday morning, when the first of the annual auction sales take place in Symphony hall beginning at 10 a.m. As has always been the rule in the past, the first sale will be devoted to the $18 seats of the 24 public rehearsals, and the sale will continue with an hour's pause for luncheon until all these seats have been disposed of.

At the same hour on Tuesday the $10 seats for the public rehearsals will be auctioned off. It should be remembered by those desiring to purchase these seats that this is the shortest sale of the four, and is over as a rule shortly after noon because the 505 seats in the second balcony are held out for paid admissions on the day of the rehearsal.

JOURNAL— SEPTEMBER 25, 1909.

SYMPHONY SALE BEGINS MONDAY

Monday brings the first concrete sign of what promises to be the busiest musical season Boston has ever known—the opening of the auction sale of the seats for the Symphony concerts.

The sale will begin at 10 o'clock promptly and, with an hour's pause for luncheon, will continue until all the $18 seats for the twenty-four public rehearsals have been sold. On Tuesday morning at the same hour the $10 seats for the rehearsals will be auctioned off. This is the shortest of the four sales because the second balcony, 505 seats, is held in reserve for the loyal supporters of the orchestra who wait outside every Friday afternoon, rain or shine, for the doors to open. These seats are sold for 25 cents each. There are no tickets of admission, those wishing them paying their money as they enter the hall. In only this manner, devised by the late Frederic Comee, has it been possible to thwart ticket speculators, for the seats might easily bring a dollar, and on special occasions even more, for they are really among the best in the house.

After a lapse of a day, on Thursday morning the $18 seats for the twenty-four Saturday evening concerts will be sold, and Friday the $10 seats for the concerts will be offered for sale. It should be remembered that for the concerts there are no reservations. All the seats in the hall are put up for sale.

As new patrons come in each year, many of them strangers in the city, there is always more or less confusion about the method of selling, many not understanding it. In every case the amount bid is added to the "upset" price of the seat which is up for sale. No more than four are sold on one bid and the seats are sold in the order that they appear on the chart, there being no bidding for choice.

Mr. Fiedler sails from Liverpool today. The Symphony season will open Friday afternoon and Saturday night, Oct. 8 and 9, with Miss Homer as soloist.

BOSTON HERALD, MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 1909.

SYMPHONY AUCTION TODAY.

Seats Must Be Taken in Regular Order Only and but Four to a Bid.

The first of the annual auction sales of the Boston Symphony orchestra will begin this morning in Symphony Hall at 10 o'clock precisely. The seats to be sold today are the $18 seats for the 24 public rehearsals which will be given on consecutive Friday afternoons from Oct. 8 to April 29, omitting Nov. 12, Dec. 10, Jan. 14, Feb. 4, Feb. 25 and March 25. These seats comprise the whole of the floor of the hall to the row "KK" and the sides of the first balcony and the first four rows at the end of the balcony.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

The soloists announced for these concerts are: Geraldine Farrar, soprano; Louise Homer, contralto; Tilly Koenen, contralto; Mary Hissem de Moss, soprano; Marcella Sembrich, soprano; Ernestine Schumann-Heink, contralto; Teresa Carreno, pianist; Olga Samaroff, pianist; Ferruccio Busoni, pianist; Mischa Elman, violinist; Willy Hess, violinist; Fritz Kreisler, violinst; Sylvain Noack, violinist; Serge Rachmaninoff, pianist and conductor, and Heinrich Warnke, 'cellist. The assistance of the Cecilia Society will be had for the performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at the end of the season.

SUNDAY GLOBE, SEPTEMBER 26, 1909.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Auction Sales for the Symphony Concerts.

Ninety-Fifth Year of the Handel and Haydn Society.

Recitals and Festivals of the Winter Season.

Mr Fiedler, the conductor of the Symphony orchestra, is now on the high seas on his way to New York, having sailed from Liverpool yesterday by the Mauretania. The first rehearsal has been called for Monday morning, Oct 4, and the first concert of the season, in which the entire orchestra will take part, will be in Sanders' theatre Wednesday evening, Oct 6. This will be a part of the ceremonies attending the installation of Pres Lowell, and only invited guests will be present.

The real beginning of the Symphony season comes tomorrow morning, when the first of the annual auction sales takes place in Symphony hall beginning at 10 o'clock. This method is admitted by the management as not being altogether satisfactory, but as yet no one has been able to devise a plan which would work better for both the orchestra and patrons.

It is a relic of the old days in Music hall, and grew out of the peculiar conditions which prevailed 25 years ago. When the orchestra was organized it was the plan of its founder to have the prices of admission on the same plan as is the rule in continental cities.

To this end the house was divided into two sections and the prices of season tickets for public rehearsals or concerts were made $7.50 and $12. Admission to the public rehearsals was placed at 25 cents and to concerts at 50 cents.

Early Auction Sales Successful.

As the concerts grew in popularity, the annual struggle to secure season tickets and choice seats became intolerable, and speculators made comfortable little fortunes by selling choice seats at a premium. To remove this evil in the mid-eighties some of the patrons suggested that a certain number of the choicer seats be sold at auction, the buyers paying a premium over the regular season ticket price.

This was tried and succeeded so well that soon all the seats in the old Music hall were sold in this manner.

When the orchestra moved to Symphony hall in 1900 no changes were made in the prices, although there were no admissions sold for the concerts because the arrangement of the new hall provided no standing room. No increase was made in these "upset" prices until the fall of 1906, when the management after much consideration decided to make the price of the $7.50 seats $10 and the price of the $12 seats $18. The reason for this was an effort to shorten and simplify the auction sales.

It had been found that practically none of the 12 seats brought less than a $6 premium, and that in the preceding year none of the $7.50 seats had brought a premium of less than $2.50; so the raising of the price merely meant so much time saved by cutting out the early bids. The change seems to have worked very generally to the satisfaction of the patrons.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR SEPTEMBER 27, 1909.

REHEARSAL SEATS BRING HIGH PRICES

The largest attendance in many years and one of the highest premiums ever paid marked the opening sale of the $18 seats for the afternoon public rehearsals of the Symphony concerts today at Symphony hall. The entire orchestra floor back to the cross aisle was disposed of this morning. The average price paid was $36, which is about 10 per cent higher than in 1908. The highest premium bid this morning was that for four seats in row G, each selling for $91 premium.

This afternoon the $18 balcony seats are being auctioned off. On Tuesday occurs the selling of the $10 seats.

[11]

BOSTON SUNDAY POST,
SEPTEMBER 26, 1909

Brilliancy Marks Both the Soloists and Programmes

The auction sale of seats for the Symphony concerts, season 1909-10, opens tomorrow morning in Symphony Hall. It has been several seasons since the prospective programmes have advanced so many delectable offerings. There are those who thrill at the notion of fierce auctional conflict, but mistrust their "staying powers." There will be an hour's intermission for luncheon.

Tomorrow morning the $18 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals will be sold. On Tuesday morning the $12 seats for the same occasions will be disposed of, and this is the shortest sale of the four because of the 505 seats in the upper gallery reserved for the "rush." The $18 seats for Saturday evenings will be sold on Thursday, and the $12 seats for the same concerts on Friday.

For the benefit of strangers and new patrons the management again emphasizes the fact that the price bid is added to the "upset" price of the seat for sale. Thus, $10 bid upon a $10 seat brings the price of that seat to $20. No more than four seats are sold at one bid, and the seats are disposed of in regular succession as indicated on the chart displayed. There is no bidding for choice.

In recent years one very decided change has been noted in the conducting of these auction sales. With the passing of each season more of the regular patrons have been putting their orders for seats into the hands of commissioners. In the early days almost everyone bid personally for the seats. The auctions were often exciting, invariably interesting. Now, with a few commissioners laden with orders, the sales have lost much of the former zest, the obstinate bidding for certain seats. Yet each year has made it apparent that those who personally attend these auctions are likely to fare better than the purchasers who bid through third parties, as, at every sale, there are sure to be bargains in odd seats and odd pairs of seats which commissioners, having specific orders to obey, are unable to buy.

Modernism

As long as humanity exists on this globe a majority will bewail times past and resort to the easy supposition that nothing under the sun worth doing is being done in the greatest of all ages—today. Yet last spring the art critics of Paris exhausted themselves in eulogies upon certain pictures in the Salon; Rodin is sculping, incidentally revealing new and tremendous aspects of nature as the quick years fly by; H. G. Wells has written "Tono-Bungay"; Strauss and more than one or two others are penning immortal strains, not yesterday or tomorrow, but now.

Reger's "Overture and Imaginary Tragedy" will be heard at the second concert of the season. Strauss' "Macbeth," for which Boston has waited overlong, is not one of the late works of that composer, but, presuming upon recent acquaintance, we hazard the statement that this youthful work will be found to contain sky rockets of genius and the great spirit of tragedy. And, to some, the strange conclusion may not be without parallel to the knocking at the gate, and De Quincey's rhapsody, "The Dance of Salome," is perfectly appropriate and commendable in the concert room. It is a unit, complete in itself, a masterpiece of workmanship, a summary and apotheosis of the greatest opera since "Tristan and Isolde." The suite for wood-wind is said to reveal the young composer as a modern Mozart. It has been played by the Longy Club.

Four new works by Jean Sibelius, and his second symphony, will be performed this season. Sibelius, in his first symphony, proclaimed one of the most virile personalities in the musical world of today. The fact that the composer is becoming increasingly addicted to strong drink need not mar our enjoyment and profit in those of his works which move with the stride of the early gods. There will be the tone-poem, "The Cliffs," by the composer-pianist—or is it the pianist-composer?—Rachmaninoff, the monumental second symphony of D'Indy, and the superb tone poems of Charles Martin Loeffler, the "Villanelle du Diable," after Rollinat, "Le Mort de Tintagile," after Maeterlinck. The list is much longer, but hearing is liable to prove more sustaining than passing comment.

English Musicmakers

In the Musician of October, 1907, Earnest Newman, one of the two or three who write musical criticism today, gave vent to prophecy. He said: "The stock joke that the English are an unmusical nation sometimes riles those who know anything about the real state of affairs over here. There is plenty of music in the race, but unfavorable social conditions will not allow more than a fraction of it to come to the front, while the dearth of English papers devoted to music causes the majority of people to remain ignorant of even the few men who have made their mark. Still we are moving. It seems only yesterday that we used to get angry with our academics, and treat them as being actually alive, and pit our younger men against them. Now no one except their personal friends takes any interest at all in the music of the academics. Elgar is no longer a promising man, but one who has arrived. A new generation has sprung up, that goes at its music with a magnificent, unholy ardor. From this younger crew, composed of men between the ages of 20 and 30, I think something first-rate ought to come. Midway between Elgar and this group of fledglings stands Granville Bantock. Elgar's junior by some 12 or 13 years, he is yet more mature than the men of the newest harvest. He has passed through all the diseases that afflict the young composer, has learnt wisdom and come to an understanding of himself; and now, at the age of 36, with an exceptional mastery of technic, he represents, to my thinking, one of the strongest factors in our new musical life. English audiences do not yet know his music as they should do. I myself have had exceptional opportunities of becoming acquainted with it; and unless I am very much mistaken, the significance of his work will become much more apparent as time goes on."

Granville Bantock

Among the other gratifying innovations of the coming season, Mr. Fiedler will give opportunity for his audiences to become acquainted with the music of this same Bantock, and one or two of his colleagues, namely, Fritz Delius. The others need not detain us at this time of writing.

SOLOISTS, KNOWN AND UNKNOWN IN BOSTON, TO APPEAR WITH THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Granville Bantock, the son of an English surgeon, was prevented by ill health from joining the Indian civil service. He spent two years in the study of civil engineering, but gradually, inevitably, evolved into a composer. He took lessons in harmony and counterpoint; produced a requiem mass, a symphony, songs. Said Mr. Newman: "They must have been atrocious beyond description, for they won him the MacFarren scholarship, tenable for three years." In those three years Bantock became more or less acquainted with the organ, the piano, the fiddle and the kettledrums. This knowledge stood him in good stead through a struggling period, when he barnstormed, as musical director, with various burlesque companies, and incidentally visited the United States with one of the Gaiety contingents. He is now, we infer, comparatively prosperous. He resides in Birmingham, the home of his friend and mentor, Mr. Newman, and he is active there as a conductor and supervisor of musical education, in addition to his constant labors with his muse. In the course of his development, Bantock appears to have become less English, increasingly exotic, and oriental in his style and imagination. His is the dramatic cantata, "The Fire Worshippers," after Moore's "Lalla Rookh"; the lyrical settings of Browning's "Ferishtah's Fancies"—somewhat lush and Wagnerian lyrics, which are not unknown in Boston. There is the "Witch of Atlas," after Shelley, and these are but a few of many warmly discussed compositions. The orchestral overture, "The Pierrot of the Minute," which Mr. Fiedler will interpret for the first time in America at the second concert of the season, is inspired by one of Ernest Dowson's enchanted poems.

Fritz Delius

Fritz Delius is a "modern of moderns," and if anything, more of an innovator than his compatriot. While Boston has been in darkest ignorance of him he has been setting musical and critical Europe by the ears. In spite of his name he is an Englishman as far as birth goes, born in Westphalia. He must now be in the neighborhood of his 45th year. In his youth he managed an orange grove in Florida, and commenced at this time the serious study of music. Later, in Europe, he worked with Jadasshon and Reinecke, who no doubt did what they could to educate away his ideas. But Delius survived and lived to excite the keen admiration of so acute a critic as John F. Runciman, who after a period of consideration was not backward in expressing his convictions. Delius has been generally named an "impressionist," and such doubtless he is in many respects, but it would be pleasant if more of the "impressionists" could write such transparent scores as Delius. A superficial glance at one or two of these partitions at least serves to establish perception of a technic which is astounding alike in the handing of the musical material and attainment of color, which, at least on paper, seems little short of marvelous. Certainly the records of the man and his compositions point to a nature rarely imaginative and uncommonly susceptible to artistic impressions. Thus, we shall hear his "Appalachia," a set of very free variations upon a slave melody of the lower Mississippi Valley, scored for a very comprehensive modern orchestra and mixed chorus, conceived to portray various scenes and moods of nature in the glowing South. The opening suggests—or is intended to suggest—"the all-pervading stillness at nightfall which is only broken by the mysterious call of the whippoorwill, the croaking of frog or the melancholy song of the negro as he sits before his hut." "Paris" is "A Night Piece," a dreamer's impression of the city of magic. The pieces "In a Summer Garden" and "Brigg Fair" are intimated by their titles. This man has written three operas, of which one, "The Garden of Paradise," aroused a chosen few to the depths of their beings; a piano concerto, has set poems by Nietzsche and Walt Whitman, has given birth to a symphonic poem, "Life's Dance," and many other equally individual conceptions. He is said to have developed slowly as a composer, but even the list of works here quoted can hardly be considered insignificant.

SUNDAY HERALD,
SEPTEMBER 26, 1909.

Auction Sales Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Tomorrow will be the opening of the auction sales of the seats for the Symphony concerts.

The sale will begin at 10 o'clock promptly and, with an hour's pause for luncheon, will continue until all the $18 seats for the 24 public rehearsals have been sold. On Tuesday morning at the same hour the $10 seats for the rehearsals will be auctioned. This is the shortest of the four sales because the second balcony, 505 seats, is held in reserve for the supporters who spend hours each week in Huntington avenue waiting for the doors to open. These seats are sold for 25 cents each. There are no tickets of admission, those wishing them paying their money as they enter the hall. In only this manner has it been possible to thwart ticket speculators, for the seats might easily bring $1 and on special occasions even more, for they are among the best in the house. After a lapse of a day, on Thursday morning the $18 seats for the 24 Saturday evening concerts will be sold, and Friday the $10 seats for the concerts will be offered for sale. There are no reservations for the concerts. All the seats in the hall are put up for sale.

As new patrons come in each year there is always more or less confusion about the method of selling. In every case the amount bid is added to the "upset" price of the seat which is up for sale. No more than four are sold on one bid and the seats are sold in the order that they appear on the chart, there being no bidding for choice.

These auction sales are a relic of the early days in the old Music Hall. Originally the prices of season tickets for the 24 rehearsals or 24 concerts were $7.50 and $12, with 25 cents admission for the rehearsals and 50 cents admission for the concerts. Even in those simple days the prices were low, and as the cost of maintaining the orchestra began to increase, the annual deficit increased in like ratio, for from the beginning Music Hall was crowded twice a week, yet no move was made by the management to increase the prices and the impulse came from the patrons of the concerts themselves.

The inconvenience of securing season tickets became almost intolerable, for the line sometimes formed two days before the opening of the sale. Moreover, as the value of the concerts was out of proportion to the prices charged, and as the application for seats was larger than the supply, the speculators began to reap. It was then at the request of some of the patrons that a limited number of the choicest seats was sold in this way, but the plan gained so in favor that several years before the orchestra moved to Symphony Hall every seat in the house was sold by auction.

Through all these years the original "upset" price was maintained until the fall of 1906, when the price of the $7.50 seats was raised to $10 and that of the $12 seats to $18. The prime reason for this move was to shorten and simplify the auction sales. It had been found that practically none of the $12 seats brought less than a $6 premium, and that none of the $7.50 seats had brought a premium of less than $2.50, so that the raising of the price merely meant so much time saved by cutting out the early bids.

In recent years, however, one decided change has been noted in the conducting of the auction sales. Each year more of the regular patrons have been putting their orders for seats into the hands of commissioners.

Mr. Fiedler will probably reach Boston next Friday.

The first concert of the season will be that in Sanders Theatre on the evening of Oct. 6. This will be a part of the ceremonies attending the installation of President Lowell, and only invited guests will be present.

The orchestra this week will be in Worcester at the annual music festival of that city. Mr. Gustav Strube of the orchestra is conducting this year for the first time the instrumental works.

EVENING RECORD, MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 1909

MISS FARRAR NEAR HOME AFTER THE CURE

MISS GERALDINE FARRAR,
From her most recent photograph.

London, Sept. 27.—Miss Geraldine Farrar is due to arrive in New York on Tuesday next. She is looking forward to singing in Boston, as she will as soloist for the Boston Symphony orchestra this year. She has devoted herself faithfully to taking the cure in Germany, France and Switzerland this summer.

TRAVELER, MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 1909.

CHOICE SEATS FOR SYMPHONY CONCERT SOLD

This morning at Symphony Hall about 200 persons attended the auction sale for the rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will shortly open its 29th season. The bidding was spirited and higher premiums were paid for seats in the first three rows than was paid last year.

Bids for seats from rows A to KK, and for the sides of the first balcony, being for premiums over the regular $18 per seat. Only four seats were sold on one bid. The bidding started on seat 1, A row, and $5 premium was the first bid. This seat was finally sold for $8. The highest premium in this row was $8.50 for seat 16. Last year the highest premium was $19.50.

In B row premiums were higher than last year. Seats 15 and 19, on the centre aisle, brought $24 each. In C row, seats on the centre aisle brought premiums of $27.50 each, and seat 19 on the centre aisle brought $35. Seat 19 in D row on the centre aisle, went for $39, the highest premium for the row. At noontime the first three rows had been disposed of.

Today's highest bid was $73 for two seats in G centre aisle or $33.50 more than that paid for the same seats last year. Last year $80 was the record price. Lots of three and two seats in the centre aisle of I sold for $61 and $60.

The bidding was done almost exclusively by ticket brokers, who secured 60 per cent. of the seats. The premiums paid were 30 per cent. higher than those of last year.

In F row seats 8 and 9 on the right centre aisle brought $41 each. For 19 in the centre aisle $46 was received. In aisle J bids of $52 and $51 were the highest. The sale took a recess from 1 to 2 P. M.

[12]

RECORD, MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 1909

SYMPHONY SEATS HIGHER

Marked Up Even Over 1908 Prices

The rehearsal seats sold at auction for the 29th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall brought up to noon nearly always higher prices than 1908.

The bids were for premiums over the regular $18 price per seat. Not more than four seats could be sold on one bid.

Several choice seats in rows L, M, P, Q

MAX FIEDLER,
Director of symphony orchestra who begins his second year soon.

and R on the centre aisle were reserved for members of the orchestra.

Seat 1 in A row started at $5 premium, and was finally sold for $8. The highest premium in A row was $8.50 for seat 16 on the centre aisle.

In B row premiums ruled higher than last year. Seats 15 to 19, inclusive, two of which are on the centre aisle, brought $24 each, compared with $22.50 last year.

In C row, seats on the centre aisle brought $27.50 premium each, and seat 19 on the centre aisle sold for $35 premium. The high premium last year was $22.50.

Seat 19 in D on the centre aisle went for $39, the high premium for the row. Seat 21 went for $28.

Up to 11 a.m., the first three rows had been disposed of.

In F row seats 8 and 9 on the right centre aisle brought $41 premium each. For 19 on the centre aisle $46 was received, the high premium of the row, compared with a high premium last year of $43.50. Seats on the left centre aisle brought $36.

$73 IN ROW G.

Seat 9 on G right centre aisle brought $39. The next two seats went for $35 each. For two seats on the centre aisle in G $73 was the high premium, or $33.50 more than for one of the centre aisle seats last year.

In H a high price of $51 each was reached for two seats on the centre aisle, compared with $50 each, last year.

In I a seat on the right centre aisle brought $36; seats on the centre aisle went for $60 and $61 each. The high price last year was $2.50.

For two seats on the right centre aisle in J. $37 each was paid. For 17 and 18 on the sentre aisle, $51 each was the high bid; $52 was paid for a single seat the second in from the centre aisle.

POST, MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 27,

SYMPHONY SEAT AUCTION TODAY

Tickets Must Be Paid for Soon as Bought

The first of the annual auction sales of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin this morning in Symphony Hall promptly at 10 o'clock. The seats to be sold today are the $18 seats for the 24 public rehearsals which will be given on consecutive Friday afternoons from Oct. 8 to April 29, omitting Nov. 12, Dec. 10, Jan. 14, Feb. 4, Feb. 25 and March 25. These seats comprise the whole of the floor of the hall to the row "KK," and the sides of the first balcony and the first four rows at the end of the balcony.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

The soloists announced for these concerts are: Geraldine Farrar, soprano; Louise Homer, contralto; Tilly Koenen, contralto; Mary Hissem de Moss, soprano; Marcella Sembrich, soprano; Ernestine Schumann-Heink, contralto; Teresa Carreno, pianist; Olga Samaroff, pianist; Ferruccio Busoni, pianist; Mischa Elman, violinist; Willy Hess, violinist; Fritz Kreisler, violinist; Sylvain Noack, violinist; Serge Rachmaninoff, pianist and conductor, and Heinrich Warnke, 'cellist. The assistance of the Cecilia Society will be had for the performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at the end of the season.

BOSTON GLOBE—
SEPTEMBER 27, 1909

Symphony Auction Sale Today.

The first of the annual auction sales of the Boston symphony orchestra will begin this morning in Symphony hall at 10 o'clock. The seats to be sold today are the $18 seats for the 24 public rehearsals which will be given Friday afternoons. They comprise the whole of the floor of the hall to the row "K K," and the sides of the first balcony and the first four rows at the end of the balcony. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

ADVERTISER,
SEPTEMBER 28, 1909

PREMIUMS RUN HIGHER THAN LAST YEAR

Extreme Paid Yesterday at Auction of Seats for Symphony Friday Rehearsals Was $73—Bidding Not as Lively as Before, However.

The sale of seats for the Friday rehearsals of the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday was marked by less spirited bidding, but better premiums, on the average, than last year.

The attendance was about the same as usual, but more women were present than is usually the case.

The highest premium paid at the opening sale was $73, as against the high mark of $71 last year.

The bids were for premiums over the regular $18 price per seat. Not more than four seats could be sold on one bid.

Several choice seats in rows L, M, P, Q and R on the centre aisle were reserved for members of the orchestra.

Seat 1 in A row started at $5 premium, and was finally sold for $8. The highest premium in A row was $8.50 for seat 16 on the centre aisle.

In B row premiums ruled higher than last year. Seats 15 to 19, inclusive, two of which are on the centre aisle, brought $24 each, compared with $22.50 last year.

In C row, seats on the centre aisle brought $27.50 premium each, and seat 19 on the centre aisle sold for $35 premium. The high premium last year was $22.50.

Seat 19 in D on the centre aisle went for $39, the high premium for the row. Seat 21 went for $28.

Up to 11 a.m., the first three rows had been disposed of.

In F row seats 8 and 9 on the right centre aisle brought $41 premium each. For 19 on the centre aisle $46 was received, the high premium of the row, compared with a high premium last year of $43.50. Seats on the left centre aisle brought $36.

Seat 9 on G right centre aisle brought $39. The next two seats went for $35 each. For two seats on the centre aisle in G $73 was the high premium, or $33.50 more than for one of the centre aisle seats last year.

In H a high price of $51 each was reached for two seats on the centre aisle, compared with $50 each last year.

In I a seat on the right centre aisle brought $36; seats on the centre aisle went for $60 and $61 each. The high price last year was $42.50.

For two seats on the right centre aisle in J. $37 each was paid. For 17 and 18 on the J $37 each was paid. For 17 and 18 on the was paid for a single seat the second in from the centre aisle.

BOSTON SYMPHONY
AUCTION SALE TODAY

The first of the annual auction sales of the Boston Symphony orchestra will begin today in Symphony hall at 10 a.m. precisely. The seats to be sold today are the $18 seats for the 24 public rehearsals which will be given on consecutive Friday afternoons from Oct. 8 to April 29, omitting Nov. 12, Dec. 10, Jan. 14, Feb. 4, Feb. 25 and March 25. These seats comprise the whole of the floor of the hall to the row "KK," and the sides of the first balcony, and the first four rows at the end of the balcony.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

The soloists announced for these concerts are: Geraldine Farrar, soprano; Louise Homer, contralto; Tilly Koenen, contralto; Mary Hissem de Moss, soprano; Marcella Sembrich, soprano; Ernestine Schumann-Heink, contralto; Teresa Carreno, pianist; Olga Samaroff, pianist; Ferruccio Busoni, pianist; Mischa Elman, violinist; Willy Hess, violinist; Fritz Kreisler, violinist; Sylvain Noack, violinist; Serge Rachmaninoff, pianist and conductor, and Heinrich Warnke, 'cellist. The assistance of the Cecilia Society will be had for the

BOSTON JOURNAL,
SEPTEMBER 28, 1909.

RECORD PRICES FOR SYMPHONY SEATS

Ninety-Eight Dollars Premium Paid on $18 Tickets at Auction Yesterday.

Spirited bidding with new high records marked the auction of seats for the rehearsals of the twenty-ninth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, held at Symphony Hall, Huntington avenue, yesterday. That the seats sold will show an increase of at least 10 per cent. over sales of last year was declared by the managers.

The sale of seats began in the morning and at noon intermission all up to the cross section were sold. Ninety-eight dollars was the highest price recorded for the day. The seats bringing this premium over the regular price of $18 were in the balcony, first row front and near the center. The record high for the day came just before the closing of the day's sale, which cleaned up all the $18 seats.

Today the $10 seats for rehearsals will be sold at auction, and on Thursday the sale of $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will take place, while on Friday the sale of the $10 seats for the Saturday concerts will complete the business.

Brokers were in evidence as usual, a Back Bay broker, representing many of the people who are still at their summer residences, being among the heaviest buyers. Walter C. Jackson was the auctioneer up to the intermission, and Auctioneer Leonard took the platform in the afternoon.

BOSTON GLOBE—
SEPTEMBER 28, 1909.

HIGHEST PREMIUM $73.

Ticket Agents Gather Choice Seats at Auction for Friday Afternoon Symphony Rehearsals.

Ticket agents secured most of the seats for the Friday afternoon symphony rehearsals of this season at yesterday's auction sale in Symphony hall, which was, as usual, conducted by auctioneer Jackson. There was comparatively little bidding by individuals, and rarely did they secure the seats they desired. On the other hand, there was little bidding by the ticket agents against each other. The highest premium paid for seats was $73 per seat, to be added to the regular $18 per seat; this was for a block of four in the middle of row G.

At no time during the morning was the attendance up to that of last year, and the crowd was made up, as usual, mainly of women.

On the whole, the premiums obtained ranged about with those of last year. The best premiums were about $2 higher than for the same seats last year. Row A started with a premium of $8; the highest premium in this front row was $20. The second row opened with a premium of $16, and the highest in the row was $24. Row C saw the high water mark of $30 and row D reached a premium of $30 also.

The highest premium coming in row G constituted a surprise, for it is unusual to see such high premiums offered for seats so far forward.

In row H a premium of $57 was reached, and in row I $61 was given as a premium for each of two central seats.

Up to the noon recess, row Q had been reached. Through rows H, I, J, K, L, M, N, O, and P, the premiums range from $50 to $61, and after this the pric tapered off steadily through row aft row to the back of the house.

BOSTON POST,
SEPTEMBER 28, 1909

HIGH BIDS FOR SYMPHONY

Prices 15 Per Cent Higher Than Last Year

Yesterday, in Symphony Hall, the opening auction sale of seats for the coming season resulted in vigorous and obstinate bidding which brought the average price of $18 seats for Friday afternoons up 10 or 15 per cent higher than last year. A quiet, but very attentive and businesslike audience assembled in good time for the first bid. From that time on, until 5:30 o'clock, when exhausted officials sat down to count the spoils, Boston capital fought a fight that made spectators rub up and take notice.

Mrs. John L. Gardner's seats on the right of the first balcony, which usually indicate the high-water mark of Symphonic sentiment, brought $116 each. The cheapest seats were those first sold: the first row of the floor. Prices advanced by leaps and bounds. Certain people had determined to get certain seats; other certain people had decided that the seats should be theirs. Seventy-five dollars was bid for four seats in G, and this was but little more than the average for the rest of that section.

Those who attended came with money to bid, in contrast to former occasions, when many have attended to look on or encourage timorous friends. Professional ticket agents had evidently received orders more emphatic than usual to get indicated seats at any price. When the auctioneer came to those seats there was skyrocketing, and no quarter was given. An idea of the general proceedings may be gained from this record of the opening bids for the first row on the left of the first balcony: $25, $36, $46, $84, $61, $63, $79, $81, etc., figures added to the $18 premium. It has been four or five seasons since Boston has permitted itself such a demonstration on these solemn occasions.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
SEPTEMBER 28, 1909.

BIG PRICES MARK SYMPHONY SALE

High bidding and strong competition marked this morning's sale of the $10 tickets for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The average price paid was somewhat over $15.

Some seats in the last row of the first balcony brought as high as $26.50 each. The cheapest single seat in the orchestra was sold for $20.50, and $19.50 was the smallest sum paid for a single seat in the balcony. The average price paid was 30 per cent increase over the average of last year's prices.

TRAVELER,
SEPTEMBER 28, 1909.

CROWD EAGER AT SYMPHONY CONCERT SALE

A goodly crowd again gathered at Symphony Hall this morning, when the seats for the rehearsals of the Symphony Orchestra, for Friday afternoons, were placed on sale. The seats that were auctioned were limited to that part of the ball under the balconies, and the first seat sold was in KK row, No. 1. The bidding on this seat started at $10 above the premium price, which is $10 for all seats in this part of the hall, and gradually crept up to $26, the price for which it was finally knocked down.

The bidding for every seat in this row was spirited, the bids coming promptly, and seeming to remain among a certain circle, who vied with each other in the action of their bids on the seats they desired. The highest price paid for seats in this row was for a block of four seats, 10, 11, 12 and 13, for which $26.50 was paid. The lowest price recorded in this row was $20. The prices averaged far in advance of those secured last year.

BOSTON GLOBE
SEPTEMBER 29, 1909.

BEST PREMIUM IS $16.50.

Auction of Seats for Symphony Orchestra Matinee Rehearsals Results in Prices Above Last Year.

At yesterday's auction sale of $10 season seats for the Friday matinee rehearsals of the Symphony orchestra for the coming season the best price obtained was $26.50 each for seven seats on the floor. The lowest price was $18 for one of the farthest seats in the first balcony. The respective premiums for the two extremes in price was thus $16.50 and $8.

The premiums yesterday averaged somewhat higher than last year. Speculators were not conspicuously in evidence, the class of seats sold being those for which patrons usually bid in for themselves.

Next Thursday morning at 10 the public auction of the $18 regular Saturday concert seats will begin, and on Friday morning, at the same hour, the $10 regular concert seats will be disposed of.

BOSTON JOURNAL—
SEPTEMBER 29, 1909.

TOP PREMIUM $26.50 ON SYMPHONY SEAT

Higher bidding and more public interest than has been the case in years past were the notable features of the auction sale yesterday of the $10 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In all, 412 of these seats were disposed of, the best premiums secured being $26.50, the price paid in ten instances, and the lowest being $8, which was paid for the last seat in the balcony.

[13]

THE BOSTON HERALD,
SEPTEMBER 28, 1909.

SELLING SEATS AT AUCTION FOR SYMPHONY CONCERTS

SEPTEMBER 29, 1909.
THE BOSTON HERALD,

BEST PREMIUMS PAID FOR BALCONY SEATS

Symphony Orchestra Auction Sale Shows a Small Advance in Prices Paid Over Those of Last Year.

Bidding, on the whole, at the auction of $18 seats for the 24 public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday was between 10 and 15 per cent. higher than it was at the corresponding sale of last year. The highest premium offered during the day was $98. This sum, plus the regular price, which was $18, was given for each of the seats 15 and 16, A, in the first balcony.

Bidding was liveliest at 4 o'clock, when the balcony seats were put on sale. These seats, particularly those at the side, have been growing in favor for the last few years. In section A, left balcony, seats from 15 to 24, averaged over $70 a piece. Three of them, 22, 23, 24, went for $80 a piece.

The outlook seemed dull while the first few rows were checked off upon the large screen which has been set up on the stage at Symphony Hall. There were not very many people in the hall. The majority were women, and many had apparently dropped in merely to see how high or low prices were going. The opening sale in row A was made with a premium of $8, which was 50 cents lower than the first premium offered last year.

When row G went on sale opposing buyers offered more resistance and the scene began to have a livelier tone. At this time the crowd increased, and most of them seemed to be there for business. Though, as usual, the regular ticket brokers purchased many of the seats, and nearly all of those seats sold at a high premium, there seemed to be a greater desire this year among music lovers to buy seats for themselves.

The high premium of $73 each for four seats in the central section of row G came as a surprise, since such high premiums are not usually offered until the sale moves on to rows L, M, N, O, P or Q. In row M the opening premium was $30, against $27 of last year. The first premium for row O was $24, and the best premium secured was $50, $5 more than the corresponding premium of last year. In row Q the highest premium was $50, against $71 of last year.

Mere chance yesterday had its fling as usual. Some seats which were sold at unusually high premiums last year sold at average prices. There were several very good bargains. On the other hand, some seats which in seasons past have received little attention were the subject of animated competition.

Today, beginning at 10 o'clock in the morning and lasting until the scheduled number of seats are sold, with an hour's pause for lunch, the $10 seats for the rehearsals will be auctioned. On Thursday, at the same time, the $18 seats for the 24 Saturday evening concerts will be sold, and on Friday the $10 seats for the concerts will be offered for sale. Walter Jackson was the auctioneer, as he has been on previous years.

THE BOSTON HERALD,

REHEARSAL SEATS BRING HIGH BONUS

Premium of $26.50 Paid on $10 Seat at Boston Symphony Orchestra Sale—Lively Bidding for 412 Good Seats.

At the sale of $10 seats yesterday for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the coming season premiums remained high. Yesterday's receipts were larger than those of last year.

The highest premium offered was $26.50 for seats on the floor. Several seats in the first of the $10 row brought the same price.

Many music lovers who are planning to attend the rehearsals did not go to the sale or buy through ticket brokers. They are the ones who expect to stand for an hour or two on the Symphony Hall steps Friday afternoons in the rush line. For 25 cents the first 500 will be admitted to the second balcony, which is reserved for this purpose.

The attendance yesterday was good, and there was more individual bidding than there was on the day before. The ticket brokers for the most part remained in the background, only entering the competition occasionally.

The sale closed at 12:30 o'clock. Only 412 seats were offered, including 254 upon the floor and 158 first balcony seats. Tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock the $18 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be offered for sale, and on Friday the $10 seats will be sold.

ADVERTISER,
SEPTEMBER 29, 1909

HIGHER AVERAGE PAID FOR SYMPHONY SEATS

Public Rehearsal $10 Tickets for Friday Bring Premium of From $26.50 to $9—Many Women Buy Single Seats.

Better average prices than last year were paid at yesterday's sale in Symphony hall of the lower priced, or $10, seats for the public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony orchestra, on Friday afternoons the coming musical season. The attendance was about as it was at the opening sale on Monday. The bidding, however, took on a more personal or individual character, and the ticket brokers did not buy so many tickets as was the case on Monday.

Only 142 seats in all were offered yesterday, to complete the sale of all the reserved seats for the Friday performances. These included 254 seats in the floor, beginning with Row KK and extending back to Row SS, the last one in the hall, under the first balcony, together with 158 first balcony seats in the rear, from Row E to Row I, both inclusive. For rehearsals the entire second balcony is never reserved, but is kept open until the day of each Friday rehearsal, when exactly 505 persons are permitted to occupy these seats on payment of a quarter of a dollar in lieu of tickets.

The highest premium paid yesterday for floor seats was $26.50 for places in Row KK and also in Row LL on the floor, and this proved to be the top price also for seats in the balcony in Row E, the first of the $10 row. On the floor seats in Row RR went as high as $16 premium, while a year ago $11 was the highest figure in the same row. The lowest premium for floor seats yesterday was $9. All through the sale the rear rows of the hall many buyers, especially women, took only a single seat.

Bidding lacked any great animation until the sales of balcony seats began, and then the brokers and some others sat up to take notice.

The sale lasted about two hours and a half. The seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold tomorrow and Friday, the $18 seats on the first day and the $10 seats on Friday.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,
SEPTEMBER 30, 1909

PREMIUMS MORE REASONABLE

Not Such High Prices Paid for Saturday Evening Concerts of Boston Symphony Orchestra as for Friday Rehearsals

At today's sale in Symphony Hall of the $18 tickets for the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one could purchase good places on the floor at prices far less than were paid for the same seats at the auction sale for the Friday public rehearsals. This is usually the condition at these sales, each year, and patrons can enjoy the evening concerts at a much less expense than others pay for the privilege of attending the Friday performances. Today, for instance, really good seats in rows D, E and F could be had for only $2 premium. The top price in row D was $9.50, while in the next row, E, it reached $39 premium, the highest figure of the forenoon. Rivalry between two women bidders caused this high price to be reached. The left end seats in this same row sold for $5 premium.

For $3 premium one could buy very good places in row G, only seven rows from the stage, and $16.50 was the maximum in this same row. When row I was reached, a premium of $23 was obtained, and in row K as high as $30 was paid, while in row O the highest price was $32, as against $7.50 for the beginning of the row. In each instance the highest prices paid were for the aisle seats in the middle of the hall, and nearly always the bidding, if at all lively, was between two or more ticket brokers, all of whom bought many good seats. In row O the sale at $32 was directly after a sale of adjoining places at $7.50. Other seats in this row sold at $12, as against $16 for the same places at last year's sale, also at $25.50, which last year fetched $31, and at $23, as against $29.50 a year ago.

In Row N, which opened at $6.50, reached $27 and fell off to $8 at end of the row, there were sales at $19 of seats which a year ago brought a premium of $51; yet, in contrast to these sales, a broker paid a premium of $16.50 for places in Row B which sold last year for $4 and others bringing $7 last year went for around $10 this year. In Rows P, Q, R and thereabout, prices showed a range of from $6 to $31, with many seats going at around $15.

Relatively good seats in S and T could be had at lower premiums and good seats were knocked down by Walter Jackson the auctioneer, for about $10 and even lower. The bidding and buying showed a more general interest among those assembled within the hall than was the case at the sale of Friday rehearsal seats, when the ticket brokers filled so many commissions and were large purchasers. The sale of the lower-priced seats for Saturday evening, the face value of which is $10, will take place at the hall on Friday morning at ten o'clock.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR,
OCTOBER 1, 1909.

(Photo by Garo.)

MAX FIEDLER.

Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, who returns to Boston today after summer in Europe.

MAX Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who arrived at New York last night on the Mauretania from Europe, will come to Boston this afternoon and take up his quarters at Hemenway chambers. His first public appearance will be on Friday, Oct. 8, when he will lead the Symphony Orchestra in its first public rehearsal.

Mr. Fiedler this season has secured a list of soloists for his orchestra that comprises the most representative artists in America. He return has been awaited with interest by Bostonians of musical inclination, as it means the active commencement of the season in New England.

From 1894 until his acceptance of the position with the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler was conductor of the Hamburg Orchestra and has been conductor at the Hamburg Opera house. As "guest conductor" he has appeared in Berlin, St. Petersburg, London, Paris and New York.

BOSTON TRAVELER, OCTOBER 1, 1909.

MADAME OLGA SAMAROFF, who is now one of the most brilliant women pianists, is one of those announced to appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming season. She is to play with the orchestra not only in Boston, but in New York and several other places, and her many friends will be interested to see her growth since her year abroad. Her progress in her art has been constant and those who have heard her abroad say that she has decidedly "arrived" in the full sense of the word.

Madame Samaroff is one of the most popular pianists that come to this city. It was Boston that first realized her artistic worth and it is here that she spends most of her time when she is in America, and as a matter of fact, she really regards Boston as a sort of adopted home.

Her appearance with the orchestra will be in the early part of the season.

OLGA SAMAROFF.

[14]

BOSTON JOURNAL,
OCTOBER 2, 1909.

FARRAR-SAMAROFF CONCERT

The first of the notable special concerts of the season will be given in Symphony Hall on Saturday afternoon, Oct. 16, by Geraldine Farrar and Olga Samaroff.

These two artists are making a short tour together, under the management of C. A. Ellis. The concert should be of more than ordinary interest because these two artists will have the assistance of sixty men from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Gustav Strube. Miss Farrar is to sing one aria with the orchestra, "Bel Raggio," from Rossini's "Semiramide." She will also sing two groups of songs with piano. Mme. Samaroff will play for the first time in this country a fantasia for pianoforte and orchestra by Charles Marie Widor, who was once her master in Paris. She played this work at the Widor concert in London last spring with much success. The sale of seats for the concert will open at the box office of Symphony Hall next Friday morning. In the meantime mail orders may be sent to L. H. Mudgett at Symphony Hall.

SYMPHONY AT CAMBRIDGE

Following the custom established last year, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will, during the coming season, give eight concerts in Sanders Theater, Harvard University. The dates for these are Thursday evenings, Oct. 21, Nov. 18, Dec. 16, Jan. 20, Feb. 10, March 3, March 31 and Apr. 28. The concerts will begin at 8 o'clock.

For each concert a noted soloist has been engaged. The list comprises three singers, two pianists, two violinists and one violoncellist. The singers are Miss Laura Combs and Madame Hissem de Moss, sopranos, and Jonet Duff, contralto. The pianists are Madame Olga Samaroff and Heinrich Gebhard. The violinists are Mischa Elman and Sylvain Noack, and the 'cellist is Heinrich Warnke.

The subscribers to last season's series of concerts may renew their subscriptions and retain their old seats by making application to George H. Kent, University Book Store, Harvard Square, before Wednesday, Oct. 13 On Saturday, Oct. 16, all tickets which have been unclaimed by last year's subscribers will be placed on public sale.

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT

The first Symphony public rehearsal and concert of the season will be given in Symphony Hall on next Friday afternoon, Oct. 8, and Saturday evening, Oct. 9. The soloist will be Louise Homer, the contralto of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. The full program follows:

Beethoven—Overture, "Die Weihe des Hauses"
Brahms ..... Symphony No. 2
Saint-Saens ..... "La Fiancee du Timbalier"
Strauss ..... "Don Juan"
Songs with Orchestra—
Liszt ..... "Die Loreley"
Brahms ..... Sapphische Ode
Schubert ..... Die Allmacht
(Orchestrated by Frederick Stock.)

TRAVELER,
OCTOBER 2, 1909.

The first Symphony public rehearsal and concert of the season will be given in Symphony Hall on next Friday afternoon, Oct. 8, and Saturday evening, Oct. 9. The soloist will be Mme. Louise Homer, the contralto of the Metropolitan Opera House.

Following the custom established last year, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will, during the coming season, give eight concerts in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University. The dates for these are Thursday evenings, Oct. 21, Nov. 18, Dec. 16, Jan. 20, Feb. 10, March 3, March 31 and April 28.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR,
OCTOBER 2, 1909

FARRAR AND SAMAROFF.

The seven cities which Geraldine Farrar and Olga Samaroff will visit on the tour which the Ellis management has arranged for the beginning of the music season are Boston, Providence, Worcester, Buffalo, Detroit, Chicago and Milwaukee. For Miss Farrar this tour is preliminary to her engagement with the Metropolitan Opera Company; for Mme. Samaroff it is the beginning of a winter's work which will include between 60 and 70 appearances. The Boston concert will be given in Symphony Hall Saturday afternoon, Oct. 16. Miss Farrar is not one of those operatic singers who come equipped with only a piano for accompaniment; she will have the assistance of Gustav Strube and his band of Symphony men. This concert, by the way, will not be the occasion of Miss Farrar's first appearance in America after her long summer vacation; just before she comes here she is to sing at the Maine music festival.

Important numbers on the program of the concert of Oct. 16 will be the aria "Bel Raggio," from Rossini's "Semiramide," performed by Miss Farrar, and the Widor fantasia for piano and orchestra with Mme. Samaroff as pianist. The Boston performance of the fantasia will be the first in America. Of course not all the program will require the orchestra; Miss Farrar will sing groups of songs and Mme. Samaroff will play solo pieces for the piano.

The sale of seats for the concert will open at the box office of Symphony Hall on next Friday morning, Oct. 8. In the meantime mail orders may be sent to L. H. Mudgett, manager of Symphony hall.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The first of the eight Cambridge Symphony concerts will be given in Sanders theater, Harvard University, on Thursday evening, Oct. 21. The dates of the other seven concerts are Nov. 18, Dec. 16, Jan. 20, Feb. 10, March 3, March 31 and April 28.

In the solo list are the sopranos, Miss Laura Combs and Mme. Hissem de Moss; the contralto, Miss Janet Duff; the pianists, Olga Samaroff and Heinrich Gebhard; the 'cellist, Heinrich Warnke, and the violinists, Sylvain Noack and Mischa Elman.

All the concerts, as usual, fall on Thursday evenings, and the time of beginning is 8 o'clock. The programs will be made up of the most important works played at the Boston concerts. The subscribers to last season's series of concerts may reengage their seats of last year by making application to George H. Kent, University book store, Harvard square, before Wednesday, Oct. 13. On Saturday, Oct. 16, all tickets which have been unclaimed by last year's subscribers will be placed on public sale.

* * *

The American composers will not be as well represented this season on the Symphony programs as last year.

The two new symphonic poems of Charles Martin Loeffler, the Boston composer, will be the sole American productions used, although Mr. Fiedler says that he is ever ready to do everything to bring American composers before the public, and that with the greatest pleasure. He expects to find many American compositions awaiting his perusal today when he resumes his work.

"I rejoice in the enthusiasm shown toward the work for this season, and I believe that the program is better than last year's, because of the larger number of soloists, among whom are several never heard before in Boston," said Mr. Fiedler.

* * *

The orchestral numbers of the first Boston program, to be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will be the overture, "Consecration of the House," Beethoven; symphony No. 2, Brahms; "Kettle-Drummer's Betrothed," Saint-Saens; "Don Juan," Strauss. The soloist, Mme. Louise Homer of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will sing three songs; and these will have accompaniments adapted to orchestra by Frederick Stock. The first, Liszt's "Loreley," will call out all the brilliancy of her mezzo-soprano execution; the second, the "Sapphic Ode" of Brahms, will disclose the tonal wealth of her contralto; the third, Schubert's "Almighty," will show what her expression is in its moments of grandeur.

RECORD,
OCTOBER 2, 1909

MUSICAL MATTERS

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The first symphony public rehearsal and concert of the season will be given in Symphony hall on next Friday afternoon, Oct. 8, and Saturday evening, Oct. 9, respectively. The soloist will be Madame Louise Homer, the contralto of the Metropolitan Opera house, New York. The programme includes Beethoven's Overture, "Die Weihe des Hauses;" Brahms' Symphony No. 2; Saint-Saens; "La Fiancee du Timballer;" Strauss' "Don Juan."

Songs with orchestra—Liszt's "Die Loreley;" Brahms' Sapphische Ode; Schubert's Die Allmacht.

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Following the custom established last year, the Boston symphony orchestra will, during the coming season, give eight concerts in Sanders theatre, Harvard university. The dates for these are Thursday evenings, Oct. 21, Nov. 18, Dec. 16, Jan. 20, Feb. 10, March 3, March 31 and April 28. The concerts will begin at 8 o'clock.

FARRAR-SAMAROFF CONCERT.

The first of the large special concerts of the season will be given in Symphony hall on the afternoon of Oct. 16, by Geraldine Farrar of the Metropolitan Opera house, New York, and Olga Samaroff, the pianist.

These two artists are making a short tour together previous to the opening of the opera season in New York under the management of C. A. Ellis, of this city, and the concert in Boston is the first of seven similar ones.

TRANSCRIPT,
OCTOBER 2, 1909

MUSICAL NEWS

The First Symphony Concerts Next Week —The Arrangements for the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge—Miss Farrar and Mme. Samaroff in a Joint Concert

The first rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra season will take place in Symphony Hall on next Friday afternoon, Oct. 8, and Saturday evening, Oct. 9, respectively. The soloist will be Madame Louise Homer, the contralto of the Metropolitan Opera House. The following is the programme:

Beethoven: Overture, "The Dedication of the House."
Brahms: Symphony No. 2.
Saint-Saëns: "La Fiancée du Timballer."
Strauss: "Don Juan."
Songs with orchestra:
Liszt: "Die Loreley."
Brahms: Sapphische Ode (orchestrated by Frederick Stock).
Schubert: Die Allmacht (orchestrated by Frederick Stock).

/ / + / /

The Symphony Concerts in Cambridge

Following the custom established last year, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will, during the coming season, give eight concerts in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University. The dates for these are Thursday evenings, Oct. 21, Nov. 18, Dec. 16, Jan. 20, Feb. 10, March 3, March 31 and April 28. The concerts will begin at eight o'clock. The programmes will follow closely those of Boston and in effect Cambridge will get practically what Boston does. Mr. Fiedler was very well liked there last year and the prospects are that the usual crowded houses will be the rule. For each of the eight concerts a soloist of high quality has been provided. The list comprises three singers, two pianists, two violinists and one violoncellist. The singers are Miss Laura Combs and Madame Hissem de Moss, sopranos, and Janet Duff, contralto. The pianists are Mme. Olga Samaroff and Heinrich Gebhard. The violinists are Mischa Elman and Sylvain Noack, and the 'cellist is Heinrich Warnke. Laura Combs was comparatively unknown in Boston until she sang in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at the close of last season and she made such a favorable impression that she was engaged for the Cambridge season of 1909-1910. Mme. Hissem de Moss is well in the front ranks of American concert sopranos. She has already sung several times with the Symphony Orchestra, and has been engaged for a number of appearances with that organization this year besides her engagement in Cambridge.

Janet Duff is the contralto who for two or three years has been singing in Boston. Olga Samaroff needs no introduction to Cambridge audiences, and Mischa Elman will be heard in Cambridge for the first time. The violinist, Sylvain Noack, is the second concert master of the orchestra. The 'cellist will be Heinrich Warnke, the leader of that choir of the orchestra. The subscribers to last season's series of concerts may renew their subscriptions and retain their old seats by making application to George H. Kent, University Book Store, Harvard square, before Wednesday, Oct. 13. On Saturday, Oct. 16, all tickets which have been unclaimed by last year's subscribers will be placed on public sale.

/ / + / /

SUNDAY GLOBE,
OCTOBER 3, 1909.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Symphony Concerts Begin Friday.

Noted Artists to Appear Under Management of Mr Mudgett.

News and Gossip About the Coming Season.

Now that the auction sale of Symphony tickets is finished, and the results show that premiums have averaged about the same as usual, other announcements of the coming concert season will occupy a share in the attention of music lovers. The list of artists comprises many great names, and after the opening of the Symphony concerts there will be other claimants for the patronage of the public. But this week the home organization has first place.

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening bring, respectively, the first public rehearsal and first concert of the Symphony season. The soloist will be Mme Louise Homer, the popular contralto, and the program will be as follows:

Overture, Die Weihe des Hauses....Beethoven
Symphony No. 2.....Brahms
La Fiancee du Timbalier.....Saint-Saens
Don Juan.....Strauss
Songs with orchestra:
Die Loreley.....Liszt
Sapphische Ode.....Brahms
Orchestrated by Frederick Stock.
Die Allmacht.....Schubert
Orchestrated by Frederick Stock.
Soloist, Mme Homer.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST,
OCTOBER 3, 1909

* * * *

Eight concerts will be given in Cambridge this season by the Symphony Orchestra. The dates are Thursday evenings, Oct. 21, Nov. 18, Dec. 16, Jan. 20, Feb. 10, March 3, March 13, April 28. At each of these concerts a soloist will assist; Miss Laura Combs and Mme. Hissem de Moss, sopranos; Janet Duff, contralto; Olga Samaroff and Heinrich Gebhard, pianists; Mischa Elman and Sylvain Noack, of the orchestra, violinists; Heinrich Warnke, 'cellist. Subscribers to last season's concerts may renew their subscriptions and retain their old seats by making application to George H. Kent, University Book Store, Harvard Square, before Wednesday, Oct. 13. On Saturday, Oct. 16, all tickets which have been unclaimed by last year's subscribers will be placed on public sale.

* * * *

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening bring respectively the first public rehearsal and first concert of the Symphony season.

The soloist will be Madame Louise Homer, the popular contralto of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York.

The following is the programme:

Overture, "Die Weihe des Hauses"...Beethoven
Symphony No. 2.....Brahms
"La Fiancee du Timbalier".....Saint-Saens
"Don Juan".....Strauss
Songs with orchestra:
"Die Loreley".....Liszt
Sapphische Ode.....Brahms
Die Allmacht.....Schubert
Orchestrated by Frederick Stock.
Soloist, Madame Homer.

ADVERTISER,
OCTOBER 2, 1909

MUSICAL MATTERS

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The first symphony public rehearsal and concert of the season will be given in Symphony hall on next Friday afternoon, Oct. 8, and Saturday evening, Oct. 9, respectively. The soloist will be Madame Louise Homer, the contralto of the Metropolitan Opera house, New York. The programme includes Beethoven's Overture, "Die Weihe des Hauses;" Brahms' Symphony No. 2; Saint-Saens; "La Fiancee du Timbalier;" Strauss' "Don Juan."

Songs with orchestra—Liszt's "Die Loreley;" Brahms' Sapphische Ode; Schubert's Die Allmacht.

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Following the custom established last year, the Boston symphony orchestra will, during the coming season, give eight concerts in Sanders theatre, Harvard university. The dates for these are Thursday evenings, Oct. 21, Nov. 18, Dec. 16, Jan. 20, Feb. 10, March 3, March 31 and April 28. The concerts will begin at 8 o'clock.

[15]

TRANSCRIPT,
OCTOBER 4, 1909

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS AND THE OPERA

Clear Proof Now That There Is a Willing Public for Both in Boston—Mr. Campanini Explains at Last Why He Left Mr. Hammerstein and Adds an Experience or Two—The Coincidence of the Lassalles—Better Progress with the Boston Opera House — Mr. Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches" in London—Isadora Duncan's Return to Boston—"Lohengrin" at the Metropolitan

For a year at least the much-debated question of the effect of the Boston Opera upon the Symphony Concerts has been settled. For months conjecture and speculation have gone their busy and various way. Some prophets predicted generally that the keen interest in the opera and the large subscription to the first season at the new house would materially lessen the zest of the public for the Symphony Concerts and lower the premiums at the auction of the seats for them. An established opera in Boston was a new thing, reasoned these soothsayers, and a considerable part of the public would seize the new opportunity eagerly and keep its interest and its money for it. Other wise men predicted more specifically that the premiums for the tickets for the afternoon concerts of the orchestra would diminish. A considerable public, they averred, attended them more in deference to good form and to social pleasure and habit than from specific interest in them. To go to the opera house would be as pleasurable and as "correct" socially, while the performances there might promise more entertainment to such folk. Others, still, forsaw that the public of the cheaper seats at the Symphony Concerts on Saturday nights would forsake them. At last, these prophets suggested, opera was within the modest means of these auditors. They could hardly afford both the opera house and Symphony Hall, and they would choose the theatre. A few, whom the outcome has proved to be the wisest of all, believed that the opera would have no material effect upon the concerts. Clearly the management of the Symphony Orchestra felt this atmosphere of doubt and conjecture, saw the predicted perils and took wise precaution accordingly. It chose its "assisting artists" with sedulous regard for their quality and for the public interest in them; and it announced its concerts more widely and insistently that it has in years.

The tickets for the Symphony Concerts have been sold, and the sum of the fixed prices and the premiums is larger than it was in the sales of last year, when there was no competing opera house. The premiums for the seats for the afternoon concerts ran higher than they did last autumn; and more of the cheaper seats for the evening concerts were sold, and at better prices. At every turn the prophets were refuted, while by every sign, like the disposition of the purchasers at the sales and the orders to the ticket brokers, the public of the Symphony Concerts was unaffected by the opera, or, if affected at all, had become only the more numerous and generous. For the current musical year, presumably, interest in the opera house is at its highest. Never again can it and the performances within it be a new thing. Of course, the opera house will attract a wider public than orchestral concerts can ever win. Yet, as clearly, a considerable part of the public of the opera and of the Symphony Concerts will be identical. To go to the opera more or less regularly through the winter will lay many new expenditures upon it, of which the mere subscriptions may be the smallest part. It will tax, no less, its time and its energy. Yet this public, socially and artistically significant, has in no way abated its liking or its support for the Symphony Concerts. A less, but as essential a public has seemingly kept and even increased its interest in the concerts, and its willingness to prove its interest by its works. In a word, the establishment of an opera house in Boston has increased rather than diminished the audience for the Symphony Concerts. Unquestionably some have forsaken them, but more have stoood ready to take their places. Whatever the fortunes of the opera—and surely, whatever changes time and experience may counsel, it will remain a permanent institution—the fortunes of the Symphony Concerts seem secure. They have come through the first and the gravest test of competition with an opera not only unscathed and undiminished, but actually magnified. As Munich, for example—to make an apt German comparison—supports and attends its opera and its orchestral concerts in equal measure, so Boston promises to maintain its lyric theatre and its orchestra. And each, as in Munich again, will be the stronger, and give the more pleasure for the other.

H. T. P.

TRANSCRIPT,
OCTOBER 7, 1909

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

THE CONCERT AT HARVARD LAST NIGHT

The Symphony Orchestra Bears Notably Its Part in the Inaugural Ceremonies—Music That Reflected the Spirit of the Day—Mr. Anthony's Piano Recital, with a Little "Caprice" by Reger—Munich, Wagner and Scenery—Note and Comment of the Hour

When the Emperor Napoleon was holding one of his congresses of European potentates, he carried Talma, the most distinguished actor of his time, to the little German city in which the company was assembled, "to play before a parterre of kings." Last evening, as a part of the inaugural ceremonies for President Lowell at Harvard, Mr. Higginson sent the Symphony Orchestra, likewise, perhaps, the first orchestra of its time, to play before a parterre of professors. There were, indeed, others in the audience; but the benches of the theatre were sprinkled with the presidents of American universities, the delegates from foreign and the faculty of Harvard and its schools itself. The new president, with a group of the chief guests of the university about him, faced the orchestra for the first time from the place of honor in Sanders Theatre; across the aisle was the retiring president; and everywhere in the concert-room were men, whose distinctions, at each pause in the programme, their fellows named one to another. Audiences for orchestral concerts at Cambridge usually come to them in work-a-day garb. That of last night, since the concert was a part of the inauguration, wore an unusual and a becomingly ceremonious aspect. If only the managing committee had exacted academic dress, with all its diverse colors, the theatre would have been brilliant. As it was, the Symphony Orchestra, like Talma before it, had the most distinguished audience, in kind, of its existence.

Brahms, Bach and Beethoven made the programme—Brahms for the "Academic Festival Overture" that he wrote in acknowledgment of his degree from the University of Breslau, that he has filled with quotations from German student-songs, and that, the world over, is appropriate to high academic occasion; Bach for the Suite in D minor, music of ceremonious and courtly aspect, and at least in modern orchestral dress large of voice in its various moods; and Beethoven for the Symphony in C minor, the Fifth, of the might and majesty, the beauty and the power, the thought and the emotion that have won music its place among the great and the fine arts that universities honor and foster. Mr. Fiedler heeded the word "Festival" in Brahms's title to his overture; took the music at a pace that made it joyfully animated and not solemnly plodding, set his men to the warmest and brightest of their tonal coloring, and so kept the piece reflecting a mood and aspect of the day. Later in the evening it almost seemed, as well, fitting prelude to the students' own songs in the Stadium. The dignity of Bach—the dignity that is in even the lively Bourrée and the Gigue of the Suite in D minor—spoke in the performance of the music; but in both it was a dignity under which was deep feeling, and the deeper because it was so decorously ordered. Thus again piece and performance were of the occasion and its emotions. As for the power, the splendor, the passion of the music of the Fifth Symphony, and in singularly puissant and glowing performance, in it might have spoken—for it is old—all the spirit of the aspirations, the struggles, the great achievements of the Harvard of the past and—since the music is ever new and vital—all the life and the eagerness of the new Harvard that was beginning almost with the hour. Presumably the parterre of kings fired Talma, and, certainly, the parterre of professors—which was surely the more distinguished—kindled the Symphony Orchestra last night.

H. T. P.

Globe-Oct. 17, 1909

First Cambridge Symphony.

The first symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders theatre next Thursday evening, beginning at 8 o'clock. The soloist will be Miss Laura Combs, soprano, who made so favorable an impression in Boston last spring at the performance of the "Choral Symphony." The program is as follows: Beethoven, overture, "Coriolanus"; Haydn, aria, "With Verdure Clad"; Brahms, symphony in D major, No. 2; Bizet, aria, "Je dis que rien ne m'epouvante"; Strauss, tone-poem "Don Juan."

Transcript-Oct. 18, 09

News From Philadelphia—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opened its twenty-ninth year with a performance of Ponchielli's "La Gioconda" last Friday in Boston, will have its customary season of five concerts during the winter at the Academy of Music.

BOSTON HERALD,
OCTOBER 9, 1909

1000 IN LINE FOR SEATS.

Women, as Usual, Predominate at First Symphony Rehearsal.

The first rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra for a Friday concert brought out the usual rush of those who wished to secure gallery seats at 25 cents. Before the performance began fully 1000 people were in line and nearly half that number had gone away knowing that only the first 505 in line would receive tickets.

The first ones in line arrived at 9 o'clock and before noon there was probably the full quota of those who would receive seats on hand in line. Nevertheless, nearly as many more stood in line hoping against hope that some of those ahead would leave the line. The line extended up Huntington avenue to Gainsboro street and around the corner of that street.

People who arrived early in the forenoon sat comfortably down upon the broad steps to await the opening of the doors. Many brought books or magazines with which to while away the intervening hours and some brought simple luncheons.

No one in line is allowed to bring even a small camp-stool on which to sit out the time, for the management could not very well permit stools to be carried into the hall. Women predominated by far over men, in the long line yesterday, as is usually the case. Every one of the reserved seats throughout the hall for these rehearsals has been sold and it will not be possible for music lovers to purchase at the box office any seat for even a single performance.

MONITOR,
OCTOBER 9, 1909.

The eight Cambridge Symphony concerts will be given on Thursday evenings as follows: Oct. 21, Nov. 18, Dec. 16, Jan. 20, Feb. 10, March 3, March 31 and April 28.

The assisting solo artists will be Miss Laura Combs, soprano; Janet Duff, contralto; Mary Hissem de Moss, soprano; Olga Samaroff, pianist; Mischa Elman, violinist; Heinrich Gebhard, pianist; Sylvain Noack, violinist, and Heinrich Warnke, violoncellist.

* * *

* * *

One of the most important novelties of the coming season will be presented by Mr. Fiedler at the Symphony rehearsal of next Friday afternoon and at the concert of Saturday evening. It is Max Reger's "Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy," op. 108, which will have its first performance in this country. Mr. Fiedler announced this for last year, but was unable to get the score until late and he decided to defer the production until this fall. No work of Reger's so important as this "Prologue" has been performed in Boston since Dr. Muck gave the "Variations and Fugue" two years ago. With Reger will be heard Tschaikowsky in the Symphony No. 4, F minor, and Grieg in two selections from the Peer Gynt Suite, No. 1 and No. 2.

* * *

MONITOR,
OCTOBER 16, 1909.

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The first symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders theater on Thursday evening, Oct. 21, at 8 o'clock. The soloist will be Miss Laura Combs, who as soprano of the quartet in Beethoven's choral symphony was heard with the orchestra in Boston last spring. The two chief numbers of the first Boston concert of this season, the Second symphony of Brahms and the "Don Juan" of Strauss, are on the program, which in detail is as follows: Beethoven, Overture "Coriolanus"; Haydn, Aria "With Verdure Clad"; Brahms, Symphony in D major, No. 2; Bizet, Aria "Je dis que rien ne m'epouvante;" Strauss, Tone-poem "Don Juan."

* * *

At the symphony concerts of Friday afternoon, Oct. 22, and Saturday evening, Oct. 23, Mr. Fiedler will perform Beethoven's eighth symphony and Granville Bantock's comedy overture entitled "The Pierrot of the Minute." This work, by an English composer new to the symphony concerts, is based on some fantastic verses by the English poet, E. Dowsen. The verses deal with the love of Pierrot for the moon, and the overture is said to be written in as fantastic and sentimental a vein as the verses themselves.

The soloist at these concerts will be the concert master of the orchestra, Prof. Willy Hess. At the request of many of his friends he will play the work in which he first appeared as soloist with the orchestra in the fall of 1904, Joachim's Hungarian concerto.

[16]

BOSTON EVENING RECORD,
OCTOBER 9, 1909

SYMPHONY SEASON OPENS

A very good programme for the start. No novelties in it, but plenty of music that is unhackneyed and that even the veteran musician loves to hear. There was once a time, in the paleolithic age (when these concerts began,) that Mr. Henschel used the "Dedication of the House" overture as a sort of Grace before Music, and began every season with it. It was the first piece that the Boston symphony orchestra ever played. But it always suits well to begin a season with this, and we are sure that no more dignified number could be found to usher in a musical series.

Mr. Fiedler was enthusiastically greeted when he came out (as usual a little behind time) to begin the concert. Mr. Willy Hess was also cordially welcomed. The full hall, the character of the audience, and the remembered fact that the tickets brought higher prices than ever, were good evidences that our conductor is appreciated here.

The Beethoven overture was given with much dignity. It leaned a trifle to unnecessary slowness, but it was effective throughout. The trumpet passages (the longest that Beethoven ever wrote for this instrument) were in good contrast with the chief theme.

But Mme. Homer was at her very best in Schubert's "Die Allmacht" which she gave with superb power and expression. There was beautiful melody here, side by side with noble dramatic effect. Mr. Stock again furnished the orchestral accompaniment, which was very fitting and more in place than in the Brahms number. Mme. Homer's chief success was in this finale to the concert.

There was much applause all through the afternoon, in spite of the close atmosphere of the hall which militated against much enthusiasm; all through the concert there was Air without Variation, and hot at that.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—OCTOBER 10, 1909.

Cambridge Symphony Season.

The last day on which subscribers to last year's symphony concerts in Sanders theatre, Cambridge, may secure the seats they had then is Wednesday, Oct 13. Application must be made to George H. Kent, University book store, Harvard sq. The unclaimed seats will be offered for sale Saturday morning, Oct 16, at 8 o'clock.

There will be eight concerts on Thursday evenings, Oct 21, Nov 18, Dec 16, Jan 20, Feb 10, March 3 and 31 and April 28.

The assisting solo artists will be Miss Laura Coombs soprano, Janet Duff contralto, Mary Hissem de Moss soprano, Olga Samaroff pianist, Mischa Elman violinist, Heinrich Gebhard pianist, Sylvian Noack violinist and Heinrich Warnke 'cellist.

Second Symphony Program.

One of the most important novelties of the season will be played at this week's Symphony rehearsal and concert. It is Max Reger's latest contribution to symphonic literature, his "Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy," op 108, which will then have its first performance in this country. Mr Fiedler announced this for performance last year, but was unable to get the score until so late in the season that he decided to make it one of the chief novelties of 1909-1910.

The work has had a number of performances in Germany, and like all the music of this master, has excited an enormous amount of controversy among critics and laymen.

The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's fourth, which has not been played at a symphony concert here since Mr Gericke's last year. The final number will be selections from Grieg's "Peer Gynt," suites Nos. 1 and 2.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST
OCTOBER 17, 1909

CONCERTS

The programme of the third Symphony rehearsal and concert of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will consist of the Joachim concerto, soloist, Mr. Willy Hess; Granville Bantock's comedy overture, "The Pierrot of the Minute," to be given for the first time in America; Beethoven's 8th Symphony.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE
OCTOBER 17, 1909.

Third Symphony Program.

The soloist at the third rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra this week will be Prof Willy Hess, the concert master of the orchestra. At the request of many of his friends here, Prof Hess will play the Joachim Hungarian concerto. When Prof Hess made his debut with the orchestra in the fall of 1904 he played this concerto, and made a most profound sensation at the time.

The first number on the program will be a comedy overture by Granville Bantock, entitled "The Pierrot of the Minute." Granville Bantock is a new name on Symphony programs, and belongs to that group of younger Englishmen who have been winning much praise in the last few years. He is professor of music in the Manchester, Eng, conservatory, and is regarded as one of the best of the younger English composers. The final number will be Beethoven's eighth symphony.

BOSTON POST,
OCTOBER 9, 1909

Symphony Crowd Welcomes Fiedler

PHOTO BY POST PHOTOGRAPHER SHOWING PART OF THE WAITING LINE AT THE FIRST SYMPHONY REHEARSAL YESTERDAY AFTERNOON. WOMEN SAT FOR HOURS ON THE CURBSTONES WAITING FOR THE DOORS OF SYMPHONY HALL TO OPEN IN ORDER TO OBTAIN THE EARLIEST CHOICE OF "RUSH" SEATS.

BY OLIN DOWNES

The applause which greeted Max Fiedler when he appeared in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, for the first time this season, said more than volumes for the position which he gained last winter. And Mr. Fiedler's personality, his unmistakable sincerity, his wholehearted enthusiasm, have made their way as truly as his musicianship.

The hall was packed, and the majority of the sex which is commonly supposed to uphold standards of tact and courtesy came surmounted by voluminous headgear. What about the statement of the management toward the end of last season? Is this nuisance to continue?

The concert commenced with Beethoven's overture, "Dedication of the House." This is one of the poorest of the great man's orchestral works. The introduction is a string of platitudes worthy of Haydn when dull, suggesting instantaneously gilt furniture and rows of red liveried flunkeys. The explosive aforzandos of later pages, a basic passage for the lower strings, and the coda betray the forgery. There is more motion and genuine festivity toward the end. The performance was brilliant, and everybody was happy.

But the title of a piece is no excuse for its dulness. The Second Symphony of Brahms, instead of following, should have come first. It was not less glorious than the fine day outside. Indeed, every note of that joyous work comes direct from the prodigal lap of nature. Mountainous! Pastoral! There cannot be many who do not associate the lovely motif of the horns with green valleys, who can fail to be impressed by the dark and majestic chords of the brass—a towering cliff—which precede the radiant entrance of the violins with the second melody. Could the sweeping, golden climax of the finale have been conceived in any less a moment than that of a heart-shattering sunrise in the Alps? These inherent things were fully appreciated in an interpretation which did justice to the reflecting, contemplative mood of the slow movement as to the lilt of the pastoral that follows. And the slow movement was not, for a rarity, taken too slowly. In the first measures the horns slipped and there were slight angularities in this movement, doubtless owing to a first performance.

Louise Homer sang Saint-Saens' setting of verses by Hugo, "The Drummer's Betrothed," Liszt's "Die Loreley," Brahms' "Sapphische Ode," Shubert's "Allmacht," the last two songs with orchestral accompaniments by Frederick Stock of Chicago. Saint-Saens may be said to have written incidental music to a scene by Hugo. The orchestra is skillfully suggestive of the passing of the troops before the stricken woman who looks in vain for her drummer. It has a rarer virtue, reticence, making no attempt to achieve what is beyond the composer, while here and there it suddenly and successfully reveals emotion. Thus a full-voiced, intelligent contralto is given opportunity of creating a role, so to speak. Mme. Homer took advantage of these opportunities and she made her effect.

Stock's Setting Unsatisfactory

Liszt's song is unquestionably inflated, but it is rather gorgeous all the same. Instead of an earnest and simply credulous peasant, we have here a high-flown and impassioned actor, treading the boards, declaiming in costume and with a wealth of gesticulation the doings of the fate-ridden Loreley. This always interests an audience. Brahms' "Sapphic Ode" is a very artistic song, as originally constructed by the composer. The orchestration of Mr. Stock is an absurdity. Why in heaven's name an orchestra? If,

JOURNAL,
OCTOBER 9, 1909.

SYMPHONY OPENING DRAWS BIG CROWD

Women in Line Waiting for Tickets at 9 O'Clock, Five Hours Ahead.

MAX FIEDLER GETS A WARM GREETING

Mrs. Louise Homer, Soloist of the Day, Proves Particularly Charming.

At 9 o'clock yesterday morning a line, composed mostly of women, began to form around Symphony Hall, and that was the beginning of the musical season of 1909-10.

By the time the doors were thrown open the demand for the 505 "rush seats" for the Symphony matinee or rehearsal was considerably larger than the supply. So it can be said that the Symphony season—the 29th, by the way—started with the usual enthusiasm.

A little after 2.30 Max Fiedler made the first appearance of his second season here, and got a friendly greeting from the big audience. With this the customary kicking began over the hats. Last year's vigorous campaign did little good. The number of offenders against the unwritten law of unselfishness and also against the city ordinance has not perceptibly diminished. It was predicted by certain victims that the 1915 movement will effect the now despaired-of reform. Fortunately for some one, the biggest hat of all appeared on the stage—on the queenly head of Mrs. Louise Homer.

Season's First Soloist.

The first symphony of the season, Brahms' No. 2, full of sweetness and softness, was a good match for the afternoon. Mr. Fiedler conducted it with his characteristic zest and sympathy. He gave the same loving, intelligent care to the interpretation of Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture, which led the program, and to Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan." All these numbers were new on Mr. Fiedler's Boston programs. So, too, were the songs sung by Mrs. Homer, who had the honor of being the first soloist of the year, and who, though a Westerner by birth, has through her long and successful work here, come to be known as a Bostonian. In these song numbers there was further evidence, in the effective orchestral backgrounds of the rare skill and judgment of the conductor.

Mrs. Homer Charming.

Mrs. Homer, gowned in shimmering green and altogether looking fit to be painted by a Sargent or Abbey, proved anew her right to be regarded as one of the greatest contraltos of the day, especially in Hugo's tragic ballad, "The Drummer's Betrothed," set to music by Saint Saens, and in Schubert's powerful "Allmacht." Her other selections were Liszt's "Loreley" and Brahms' "Sapphic Ode," which she was pleased to sing in English.

The rehearsal, as a whole, gave much pleasure. The same program will be repeated at tonight's concert. Next week will see the first big novelty, Max Berger's "Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy."

MONITOR,
OCTOBER 15, 1909.

THE first announcements about Serge Rachmaninoff gave it that he would conduct his symphonic poem, "The Rocks" at the Symphony concerts of Oct. 29 and 30; now the work announced is the "Todteninsel," a symphonic picture after Boecklin's painting of the same name. The work is in manuscript and has never yet been performed in this country.

At one of the February concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, Ernest Hutcheson and Harold Randolph are to appear together in a performance of Mozart's E flat concerto for two pianos and orchestra. This work has not been on a Symphony concert program since 1883, when with Georg Henschel conducting it was played by Miss Obrion and Olga Radecki.

* * *

BOSTON GLOBE-
OCTOBER 16, 1909.

SEASON'S SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT

First Time in America of Reger's Prolog.

Brilliant Reading of New Work by Conductor Max Fiedler.

Although apparently offering two indisputably unequal works for the brunt of his symphony program yesterday afternoon, in making Tschaikowsky's familiar Fourth symphony succeed Reger's Symphonic Prolog to a Tragedy, which in this instance received its first performance in America, Mr Fiedler revealed and emphasized the relative value of both.

The two works spring from composers of different schools with different ideals, traditions and methods of workmanship—the one, the Slavic Tschaikowsky, to whom deep or strong seriousness is generally cast in the mold of morbid melancholy, and to whom light fancy or caprice must frequently shade into the grimly fantastic,—the other, the German Reger, whose tendency or final province has as yet defied analysis or prediction—the puzzle maker of music, the iconoclast, the technician for whom counterpoint is a plaything, the creator, the revolutionist.

Notwithstanding the divergence in character of the composers and their works, a similarity in the purpose and "program" of the two pieces may be discovered. Mr Reger is said to have given no hint of what tragedy his work is prolog to, or what such tragedy's existing or probable content may be. The fact that the prolog precedes a tragedy of some kind presupposes at least a presagement and exposition of the spirit of tragedy. A hearing discovers unmistakably personal elements embodied as musical themes, which are set to play and react one upon the other as a dramatist weaves his characters through the counter and allied relationships of his plot. By so much may Reger's prolog be said to possess high dramatic significance, as indeed, what strongly contrasted or stressful music does not?

Tschaikowsky frankly avers, in his correspondence with the widow, Nadejda von Meck, who was largely the inspiration for the work, and the one to whom it is dedicated, that the "program" of his symphony was an expression of the fixed and inexorable power of fate over man's life. It reminded his hearer of this fatalist belief by a threatening and bodeful theme with which the first movement begins, as proclaimed by brasses and bassoons, and repeated as a reminiscent warning during this movement and again in the last.

By way of conclusion Tschaikowsky does not leave his subject gloom-shrouded in this symphony as he does in his fifth, but gives him the alternative in the last moment of listening to a folk-tune of peasant and of learning from their rustic gayety which if crude is nevertheless spontaneous and sincere, that there is yet joy in the world.

In possessing a narrative of a combat of forces with powers within or without a man's life, the two works may then be said to contain an elemental similarity of purpose. It was in the essential differences in telling the narrative that comparison of the works was of interest.

Reger is positive, masterful, convincing, cumulative, monumental. He never indulges in truism nor platitude, in apologetic or inconsequential commonplace. He is consecutive, logical, incessant. The balance of power between the warring elements of his imagery as he has led it in the progress of this piece, remains to the end. There is no momentary or spasmodic dissolution of its force. The battle is on and Reger wages it gloriously with an opulence of contrapuntal device which employs his several choirs in a seething, surging mass of virile, impassioned tone, illumined by a wealth of color derived both from the marvelous blending of his orchestral tints and his unsatiated thirst for the last drop of blood in the momentary passion which drives him an onfaring roamer through tonality.

Climax building in itself is not so difficult for a well-equipped composer, but to recede from a climax and to keep the thread vital requires an impelling force from within which constitutes that keenest, most potent and transforming inspiration which human nerves, blood and intelligence can know.

ADVERTISER,
OCTOBER 9, 1909.

SYMPHONY SEASON OPENS WITH SPLENDID PROMISE

"DEDICATION OF THE HOUSE" FIRST NUMBER PLAYED

Programme of Music Everyone Loves to Hear—Mme. Homer in Songs—Afternoon of Applause.

By Louis C. Elson.

Programme.

Beethoven—"Dedication of the House." Overture.
Brahms—Symphony in D major. No. 2.
St. Saens—"The Drummer's Betrothed." Ballad.
Mme. Louise Homer.
Strauss—"Don Juan." Symphonic Poem.
Liszt—"Die Lorelei."
Brahms—Sapphic Ode.
Schubert—"Die Allmacht."
Mme. Louise Homer.

A very good programme for the start. No novelties in it, but plenty of music that is unhackneyed and that even the veteran musician loves to hear. There was once a time, in the paleolithic age (when these concerts began,) that Mr. Henschel used the "Dedication of the House" overture as a sort of Grace Before Music, and began every season with it. It was the first piece that the Boston symphony orchestra ever played. But it always suits well to begin a season with this, and we are sure that no more dignified number could be found to usher in a musical series.

Mr. Fiedler was enthusiastically greeted when he came out (as usual a little behind time) to begin the concert. Mr. Willy Hess was also cordially welcomed. The full hall, the character of the audience, and the remembered fact that the tickets brought higher prices than ever, were good evidences that our conductor is appreciated here.

Not very long ago a New York critic voiced the opinion that if Mr. Fiedler led our orchestra for a couple of months it would play like a beer-garden band. He is leading it for the second year, and the suggestions of Gambrinus are still very far distant. We wonder how much such swash-buckler criticism really affects an artist's position.

The Beethoven overture was given with much dignity. It leaned a trifle to unnecessary slowness, but it was effective throughout. The trumpet passages (the longest that Beethoven ever wrote for this instrument) were in good contrast with the chief theme.

What a popular work Brahms' second symphony is getting to be! There are still some who believe that Brahms is too phlegmatic to rank with the great masters, but to us the absolute surety with which he makes his effects reminds us strongly of Bach. Bach, too, was not over-emotional, but there was a sweet coolness in his melody and harmony in which one could bathe and be refreshed. Such work is the opposite, the antithesis, of the fevered efforts of the modern experimentalists, and will be appreciated more and more when the present sickness shall have run its course and we return to the belief that music should be symmetrical, beautiful and intellectual, as well as emotional.

At first the horns, in their important theme, were rather vague; but they amply redeemed themselves before the end. This is a horn symphony, in so far that these brass instruments have prominence in almost every movement. There was a vivid orchestral contrast on the programme. Strauss is the acme of orchestral splendor, Brahms the most conservative of scorers. It was pleasant to note, therefore, that content is more than tone-color, in music, for the Brahms' symphony was greater than "Don Juan" with all his instruments.

Everything is so naive and direct in the thematic material of the first three movements that it might almost seem a higher development of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony. The third movement, with its reed effects, is almost an eclogue, a bucolic. But the wonderful figure development that is omnipresent prevents the impression of simplicity, and the finale is more complex than the other movements. As above intimated, the horns were especially excellent, after the first half-dozen measures. We found an exaggeration of contrast in the third movement, which would have gained by a simpler reading. But the finale was most effectively read and became the true climax of the work, deservedly arousing the most enthusiasm. The triumphant end was especially magnificent.

"Don Juan" grows upon the auditor with repeated hearing, as most of Strauss's works do. It is a strange compound of Love, Liquor, Fury and Ennui. The oboe and the horn both had tangible themes and played them beautifully. Here violent contrasts were quite in place, and the sharply drawn difference between the crash of fury and the subsequent utter desolation, at the end, was something that Mr. Fiedler read gloriously, and this was abundantly appreciated by the audience. Our conductor has won his spurs in all his Strauss performances in Boston.

We were not much impressed with "The Drummer's Betrothed." Its dramatic points and contrasts are too obvious. At first there is a coquetry which reminds of Schumann's "Soldaten-braut," and which did not suit Mme. Homer's style very well. Of course there is much drumming, which was chiefly given to the kettle-drums as an organ-point. Equally of course, there was a March, (a miniature touch a la "Lenore" symphony) as the soldiers marched by. Of course there was sorrow, fainting, and general dissonance, when the singer does not find her lover in the procession.

Mme. Homer was best in the later, more intense, parts of the ballad, but at the best it was an unequal work, unequally sung. Carl Loewe might have made something out of the subject, but St. Saens merly presents a lot of routine work which many could manufacture to the palpable suggestions of the poem.

If anything were needed to emphasize the fact that Brahms is beautiful as well as intellectual, the Sapphic Ode would have done this. Short and simple as this work is, it is thoroughly original in its treatment of both melody and accompaniment, and it is as beautiful as a Greek statue. Mme. Homer did wisely to choose such a work as this, especially when it was provided with a good orchestral accompaniment, as in this case. The accompaniment to this and to the Schubert selection was made orchestral by Mr. Frederic Stock, who has proved his good musicianship in many ways. He has taken the position of Theodore Thomas, in which an ordinary man would have rattled around, and has filled it to everybody's satisfaction; he has given out a string quartette which is entirely beyond "Kapell-meister Musik"; and in the orchestration of these two masterpieces he has managed to adorn without distortion.

Yet we like the "Sapphic Ode" best in its original state, with piano accompaniment. Much of the syncopation sounds more effective as Brahms wrote it. Mme. Homer sang it rather too slowly, but otherwise finely. Liszt's "Loreley" was very finely sung. It is more vocal in its orchestral part than in the melody allotted to the singer. Heine has much music to answer for. His statement to a young lady (in two verses) that she was like a flower, has caused over 400 songs to be written, and this poem beginning:—

I know not what sorrow hangs o'er me
That makes me so sadly inclined is sung by all Germans on every jovial occasion, just as the Teuton generally sings "In tiefen Keller sitz sich hier" when he is on a mountain top! "Die Loreley" ranges from Silcher's simplicity to Liszt's symphonism.

RECORD, OCTOBER 16, 1909

THE SYMPHONY.

From Mr. Elson's review in the Advertiser.

Programme.

Max Reger—Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy.
Tschaikowsky—Symphony in F minor. No. 4.
Grieg—"Peer Gynt" Suite.

This time the programme was entirely orchestral, and we can again say that we do not find the absence of a soloist to make any perceptible gap in the list. To hear our great orchestral organization in three large and well-contrasted works is glory enough for one afternoon. Max Reger's work was heard for the first time in America. It is quite evident that Reger is to be reckoned with as one of the great influences of the present, even if we do not accord him the rank of a Brahms in fluency of development, or of a Strauss in orchestration. Spite of the giants, such men as Reger, Mahler, Hausegger and Weingartner, make their mark and mould their epoch in some degree.

"Prologue to a Tragedy"! At once one thinks of two other works on the same scheme—Brahms' "Tragic Overture" and Chadwick's "Melpomene." The latter is one of the greatest works of our native repertoire and may well stand comparison with the other works in this majestic field.

Thanks are due to Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra for the pains which they have taken with this work. And to think that it was first performed in Cologne in March of this year, and here we have it in Boston in October! Bravo, Mr. Fiedler!

We may close our review with a contribution to Musical History. The Hat War is over! The hall management has been routed—horse, foot and dragoons. The ladies have won the victory and are doubly Hattractive in consequence. They fought unitedly behind the "White Plume of Navarre," and mere man will continue to sit behind that plume at concerts, and dodge, and squirm, and ineffectually try to see the conductor.

HERALD, BOSTON,
OCTOBER 10, 1909.

SYMPHONY SEASON OPENS BRILLIANTLY

Familiar Works Enthusiastically Applauded; Mme. Homer Sings a Little Known Ballad of Saint-Saens.

WARM WELCOME FOR FIEDLER AT FIRST CONCERT

BY PHILIP HALE.

The 29th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Overture, "The Dedication of the House" ..... Beethoven
Symphony No. 2, D major ..... Brahms
"The Drummer's Bethrothed," ballad of Victor Hugo for voice and orchestra ..... Saint-Saens
"Don Juan," tone poem (after Lenau) ..... R. Strauss
Songs with orchestra:
a. "The Loreley" ..... Liszt
b. "Sapphic Ode" ..... Brahms
c. "The Almighty" ..... Schubert

The season opened brilliantly, although the compositions for the orchestra and for the singer, Mme. Louise Homer, were, with one exception (Saint-Saen's music to Victor Hugo's superb ballad), familiar. The ballad had been heard here only once with orchestra, nine years ago, when Mme. Brema declaimed it vigorously.

The audience was expectant and enthusiastic. There was applause for Mr. Hess when he took his seat, and Mr. Fiedler was welcomed back with a fervor that showed how highly he is esteemed as conductor and as man by the frequenters of these concerts.

It has long been a custom to speak charitably, some times even apologetically, of the orchestral performance at the first concert, when the players have had only a few rehearsals after the diversions or the scattered labors of the summer. No apology was needed last night, nor was there need of charity, for with the occasional exception of a lack of precision in chord attach in the middle movements of the symphony, the performance was technically brilliant as well as euphonious, spirited, glowing.

No doubt the revival of Beethoven's overture, "The Dedication of the House," reassured some who were startled by the list of novelties announced before the auction sale. They said to themselves that the old masters would not be wholly neglected. It is possible that some even rejoiced in the opportunity of hearing this inferior and tedious overture, for there are believers in the plenary inspiration of Bach, Beethoven, Mozart and Haydn.

Now that the overture has been taken from the shelf and dusted, may it be put back to remain there for many years! It was a piece for a special ceremony, and it might now serve for academic purposes, for the dedication of a university building, with a mock-modest speech from the benefactor, whose name will be preserved by brick and mortar, and with a gushing speech of thanks from the grateful president.

The mere fact that Beethoven admired Handel and wrote the main body of the overture "in the style of Handel" does not console us. Handel was an immortal melodist, and he composed some gigantic choruses; but Handel as a writer of instrumental fugues was not an inspired being.

The overture might well have been omitted, by reason of its inherent dulness and because its introduction lengthened the concert unreasonably. Any concert that lasts over an hour and three-quarters is too long; a concert that dismisses the audience after an hour and a half is in respect of duration ideal.

The second symphony is one of Brahms' most genial and spontaneous works. The first movement would be perfect in its beauty were it not for the Mendelssohnian theme. Mendelssohnian in the most sentimental manner of that master, and the sentimentalism is incongruous, for the word is seldom associated with the music of Brahms, whose emotion is deep, or sturdy, or tender, or shy and restrained, not whining, not saccharine.

The other movements are thoroughly delightful. The symphony has not the strength, the demoniacal intensity, the tragedy of the one in C minor, nor has it the defiant swing of the first movement of the third symphony, but it is a companion to the first, and far above the fourth.

It might be said that Mr. Fiedler in his reading of Brahms is inclined to fan the smouldering fire of that composer, whose passion seldom, if ever, blazes, on account perhaps of an innate discretion, a dislike of even the suspicion of sensationalism. There are whispers of Brahms that, repeated by Mr. Fiedler, become stentorian cries.

It is certain that the temperament of Mr. Fiedler is in full sympathy with that of Richard Strauss, so that the performance of "Don Juan" last night and Mme. Homer's singing of Saint-Saens' ballad and Listz's "Loreley" were the chief features of an excellent concert.

The tone poem itself does not lose in effect by repeated performances; on the contrary, with each it seems more vital, more vivid, magnificent in its amorous insolence and its defiance of conventionalities, an insolence and defiance that are to be compared only with a great episode in fiction, the behavior of Lovelace in the ballroom.

It matters not whether this Don Juan is Lenau's hero or the traditional rake belly Don of legend, opera and pantomime; the music is the expression of "Don Juanisme," of the pursuit after the ideal by the proud and reckless male, to whom all that is expected of heaven or feared of hell is as nought when weighed in the balance with the sensual gratification that at last is as Dead Sea fruit. The music is as dazzling, chivalric, audacious as the hero who was mourned by the women he had wronged.

Saint-Saens set picturesque music to Hugo's ballad. The expectation of the woman, her hopes and fears, her exultation in the return of her drummer, her superstition, the ominous words of the gypsy, the stir and crush of the crowd, the pomp of the procession—and then the cruel disappointment are expressed chiefly by the orchestra, and with good reason; for a voice, however dramatic, can hardly paint such a pageant and such a tragedy.

Mme. Homer, no doubt realizing this, wisely did not enter into vain competition with the orchestra so admirably treated by the composer; but there are poignant moments for the voice, and Mme. Homer was quick to recognize them with tragic intensity, so that the effect of the whole performance was irresistible. She distinguished finely between the mere narrator and the suffering woman.

She also gave a poetic reading of the familiar "Loreley." Mr. Stock has arranged Brahms' piano accompaniment to the "Sapphic Ode" for a small orchestra. His arrangement is modest, but the song is better with the piano. The violas and 'cellos too often deadened the rare beauty of the singer's lower tones. Yet the introduction of a piano in a symphony concert merely to accompany a singer is an intrusion, and the concert itself is suddenly turned into a disturbing song recital.

Mr. Stock also arranged an orchestral accompaniment for Schubert's "The Almighty," which, if it must be sung at all, should be sung by a man.

TRANSCRIPT, OCTOBER 14, 1909

Reger's New Piece at the Symphony Concerts

Tomorrow afternoon, at the Symphony Concert, Reger's newest orchestral piece, a "Symphonic Prologue to a Tragic Play," will be performed for the first time in America. A hard-worked reviewer of music once said that he distrusted all pieces, the "opus number" of which exceeded one hundred; a year ago and more the fertile Reger passed that figure in the enumeration of his compositions and the Prologue stands as "Opus 108" in the Peters edition of the music. The composer finished the piece last autumn; a few orchestras in Germany played it last winter; London heard it a month ago; and tomorrow Mr. Fiedler brings it to America. In its original estate, it was very long, and the full score fills no less than ninety-one pages, even thicker with notes than Reger's compositions usually are. Of his own motion, after the hearing of the music in actual performance, Reger himself made a considerable "cut" in it. Mr. Fiedler, in all probability, will make another, and thus the Prologue, which is exacting to hear, will fall within reasonable limits of time and attention. Reger has scored it for a full, but not a monstrous modern orchestra—he is content with six horns—but he conforms to current orchestral fashions in his incessant division of the instrumental choirs. Evidently his tragedy, of the identity of which, if it has a definite identity, he has never given a hint, seethes with emotion, and he would keep his orchestra seething accordingly.

Any sort of analysis of Reger's extremely intricate score is impossible without pages for the making of it, endless illustrations in musical type and an analytical faculty that must be tireless and fertile as is Reger's synthetic ability. In general outlines the music follows orthodox symphonic form, as is his custom, and the Prologue in its entirety is almost a symphony in little. The themes out of which the music springs emerge at moments clearly enough, but in the development, the combination and the general interplay of them Reger has plied his contrapuntal invention and skill, monstrously, almost satanically, and there are passages of "working-out" that make even Strauss's polyphony seem almost elemental. Reger is as fond as ever of his abrupt transitions, his snapping pauses, his sudden leaps into new tempi and new tonalities; his large climaxes fusing and swelling the voices that he has long divided. On the emotional side, the Prologue seems to have distinct atmosphere—restless, sombre, ominous, remote, superhuman, certainty of some grave, mighty and heroic tragedy, charged and surcharged with grim passions. The instrumental coloring is oftenest as dark as is the mood, but through both pierce often, swift and lurid high lights, like those of wintry twilights. Evidently Reger himself wrote the Prologue with abundant and excited feeling, be it of the actual composition or of the images and the emotions behind. He has strewn his score indeed, in a new fashion of his own, with excited parenthetical directions to conductor and orchestra, each of which ends with an exclamation point. "G nach F umstimmen!" or "Non troppo Allegro!" or "Nur die Hälfte Kontrabasse," or "Hörner seben stark hervortretend!" he shouts to the performers. It is easy, almost, to hear his shrill voice and to see his little pig-like eyes, cutting and gleaming through the semi-darkness of a rehearsal.

POST, SATURDAY,
OCTOBER 16, 1909

Max Reger's "Prologue" at Symphony Rehearsal

BY OLIN DOWNES

There was further proof of Mr. Fiedler's popularity yesterday at the second Symphony rehearsal of the season, when some hundreds of those who occupy the upper gallery on these occasions waited more than an hour on the steps outside in the rain.

Inside, Max Reger's "Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy" was played for the first time in America. This is a colossal work. If the machinery of construction is too apparent in Reger's smaller efforts, it only serves to fill immense outlines, portray great ideas, when he sits down to write tragic music, or, say, the "Variations on a Merry Theme by Ferdinand Hiller." Given a big canvas, and, as far as we have seen in Boston, he is a big man.

In the composition heard yesterday, despite themes and counter themes, he could be called an impressionist. The man who waits a dominant ninth on the air and sets a tune for the flute, with a Grecian outline, above it, is no more a free painter of moods, necessarily, than he who employs all the instruments ever invented, with a vociferous motif for each. The accomplishment is the thing, the means are the concern of the workman, not ours.

In this prologue are a number of short themes, of very positive character and quickly recognizable, which are treated and often combined with a limitless wealth of inspiration and counterpoint. There is—there might be perceived on closer acquaintance with a luxuriant forest of notes—the elements of overture form, and all that. Much music—most music—unfolds itself, feature by feature, to the ear, as a landscape might pass by a traveller in a vehicle. If this prologue were a classic overture it would have some such introduction as it has, a first theme, a sister theme, both themes putting out leaves and branches, perhaps intertwining, and finally flowering into an appropriate "coda."

Reger is concerned with one thing: the contemplation of tragedy. There is the portentous minor chord, the glooming phrase for the lower strings, the outcry of the brass—this, repeated, and from that time on it is as if the one was enwrapped in the age and the scene of some sublimely terrible Electra. This endures to the last note, elemental, overpowering, of unspeakable grandeur. Well has the composer made no definite peg upon which to hang ideas which are too tremendous to be confined to any one mould. Tragedy itself is there.

Afterwards one recalls vaguely the mighty brooding of the introduction, the striving, contending figure for the strings which opens the allegro, the theme that followed—the forerunner of solemn and majestic and mysterious harmonies that welled up from the very basis of creation, just before the return of the energetic theme—the Titanic outcries of the brass in the development, accompanied by drumbeats that knocked at the bottom of the heart, and finally, the unspeakably uplifting conclusion.

I think that it would be necessary to return to the Greek tragedians to parallel such art as this. The harmonies generally employed are Gregorian in their bare, dark mightiness. No hand today but Reger's would have had the strength to wield such emotions and such visions, hold them in a firm grasp, follow them so far away from anything personal or smaller than themselves. Memory of a single performance does not supply details sufficient to describe minutely the many wonders of workmanship and instrumentation which are so marvellously in consonance with the prevailing spirit. One defect may soon appear with better, more familiarity. That is, too much material too lavishly handled. Even with the cuts sanctioned by the composer, and made by Mr. Fiedler, there is, perhaps, over-richness.

Mr. Fiedler and his men gave an amazing performance of this extremely difficult work, a performance which suffered not one of multifarious details to lack due weight in the scheme of things, and which as well carried one irresistibly along with its utter conviction.

To be pleasantly reiterative, this was followed by the best reading of Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony which has been given here in years. The contrast of this and the preceding work was very striking. Where Reger's hand never trembles, Tschaikowsky goes mad with despair. Yet his sincerity, speaking through such a medium as yesterday's, was as moving, in its intense humanity, to the emotions, as was Reger's summons to the spirit. Each phrase, and, it seemed, each instrument, had its poignant individual voice. This is, perhaps, a weakling's version of life and destiny, but he would be crabbed, indeed, who would fail to respond to its intense appeal.

The concert came to an end with three excerpts from the second Peer Gynt Suite, of Grieg, and the four movements of the first. The performance proved that these well-known pieces have been unnecessarily neglected of late years. Each has a fine, artistic idea as its basis; ideas which are beautifully instrumentated and felicitously developed. Joyous or otherwise, there is the eternal melancholy of the North underlying the measures. Some composers use a drama as an excuse for thin music. Grieg wrote his with the sincere intention that it accompany the scenes of Ibsen's masterpiece. The music is truly "incidental," yet so perfectly constructed that most of it has stood, thus far, a set of perfect and indivisible units. The audience was very applausive. At the end of the pizzicato movement of Tschaikowsky's symphony the men rose with their leader to acknowledge its approval.

TRANSCRIPT.
OCTOBER 18, 1909

Grieg at the Symphony Concert

Reger—and Mr. Fiedler and his men as well—had their due applause at the end of the "Prologue to a Tragic Play" at the Symphony Concert of Saturday, not as hearty as that which rewarded his Variations and Fugue eighteen months ago, but sufficient to the first hearing of music that turns no inviting face to its hearers and sometimes seeks almost deliberately to baffle them. Tschaikowsky of the Fourth Symphony and Tschaikowsky of the Scherzo Pizzicato was covered with plaudits, and the listeners of Saturday night showed no weariness of seven-fold Grieg. Surely one element of the appeal of Grieg's music is its surprise. Until the hearer has heard too much of it too often, its tra[illegible] idiosyncrasies in interval and rhythm, its pervading exotic and short-breathed moods, please and hold him. Now, the audience of the Symphony Concerts on Saturday nights, however diligent it may be with its own pianos, has not often heard the Suites from "Peer Gynt" in their orchestral dress or listened to the torturing of them by unskilled conductors and orchestras. Perhaps, thus, it came almost freshly to the wildness of the lament of the violated and forsaken Ingrid, to the tonal verity—Grieg knew his Norwegian seas and coasts—of the shipwreck, to the exotic murmur of Solvejg's song, turning and re-turning upon itself, half of the woman's dream, half of the reality of the Northern summer, always haunting. So it came, too, perhaps, to the fitful music, now bright, now shadowed, now stilled and again quivering with stirring life of the beginning of a northern summer's day, or to the homely lament—here Grieg is a master of rhythm—of the music for Aase's death. Aintra's dance is too brief, after all, to cloy with the sugary Eastern syrup that the violoncellos administer and the Troll music is only a momentary gust. The little pieces of a little master—of fancy, if not of emotion; of sensitive technical skill, if not of orchestral variety, range and breadth. Reger and Tschaikowsky had proffered enough of the other thing.

H. T. P.

BOSTON JOURNAL.
OCTOBER 16, 1909.

Reger's Prologue At The Symphony

Boston Music Lovers First in America to Hear the Composer's Work.

Max Reger's "Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy" had its first performance on this side of the Atlantic at the Symphony matinee yesterday. Reger is a young German, now living in Leipsic, whom some regard as the greatest of living composers. Others prefer Debussy, and still others favor Sousa. There is no absolute accounting for tastes and opinions in such things.

Suffice it to say that this long-winded work was received in Boston yesterday respectfully, discreetly, as if the audience had not quite made up its mind whether it was worth while. A second hearing will settle the matter for better or for worse. The prologue is complex, if not incoherent; it is suggestive of dark and trouble moods; and possibly some, listening to it, would think of the ocean on a black and stormy night.

MUSIC DIFFICULT TO ANALYZE OR UNDERSTAND

It is music difficult to analyze, to understand and appreciate, and so it was taken by the Symphony audience yesterday. There was no feigned rapture. The faint applause conveyed respect for the composer and for the conductor. Mr. Fiedler did his best to make the performance effective.

It was not until the orchestra played the scherzo of Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony that the audience showed genuine pleasure. After all, the general taste is for things not too-high flown. The relief from the perplexing and plaintive preliminaries was evident in the prolonged applause that brought the whole orchestra to its feet. But there was a compliment also for the remarkable playing—an exhibition of virtuosity such as the musical public expects only of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

CONCERT OF CONTRASTS, TRAGIC PREDOMINATING

The symphony was beautifully done, skill and sentiment vying to produce something like perfection. The finale was performed with dazzling brilliancy but that playing of the scherzo will long be remembered. The second part of the program was devoted to the "Peer Gynt," music written by Grieg, three parts of the first suite being given and all of the second. The audience was delighted, and so the concert closed successfully. It was an afternoon of contrasts, with the tragic note predominating.

Next week there will be another novelty on the program, an overture by Granville Bantock, a young English composer, and Professor Willy Hess will play the Joachim violin concerto called "In the Hungarian Manner." The symphony will be Beethoven's eighth.

FARRAR-SAMAROFF CONCERT

Geraldine Farrar and Olga Samaroff will open their tour at Symphony Hall this afternoon. The concert will begin at 2.30. An orchestra of Symphony players, conducted by Gustav Strube, will assist. The particular features of the entertainment will be Miss Farrar's solo, "Bel raggio," from "Semiramide," and Mme. Samaroff's performance, with orchestral accompaniment, of a fantasia by Widor which was never before heard in this country. The full program is as follows:

Overture, "Fingal's Cave".....Mendelssohn
Fantasia for piano and orchestra.....Widor
Madame Samaroff and Orchestra.
Aria, Bel Raggio from "Semiramide"..Rossini
Miss Farrar.
Prelude, "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Soli for pianoforte:
a—Prelude, G minor.....Rachmanioff
b—Love Song.....Stojowski
c—Concert Study.....MacDowell
Madame Samaroff.
Songs:
Nocturne .....Franck
Papillon.....Faure
Phydile .....Duparc
Oh, quand je dors.....Liszt
Miss Farrar.
Soli for pianoforte:
a—Nocturne..... Chopin
b—Hungarian Rhapsody No. 12.....Liszt
Madame Samaroff.
Songs:
Komm wir wandeln.....Cornelius
a—Verborgenheit .....Wolff
b—Ich hab' in Penna.....Wolff
Susses Begrabnis.....Loewe
Liebesfeier .....Weingartner
Miss Farrar.
Slavic Dance.....Dvorak

The finale was ambitious again, over-ambitious, like the first movement. The opening figure of Fate returned again and seemed to intimate that all struggle was in vain.

Mr. Fiedler made much out of the finale. The canonic work was very well balanced and the Coda was worked up with phenomenal power. To the brilliant reading the work owes its cordial reception. Intrinsically it is inferior to Tschaikowsky's two later symphonies, although Tschaikowsky, even at his second-best, is superior to many composers who are ranked high at present. In the first movement we cannot help thinking that the cook put some Saur-kraut in the Bortzsch—the Russian themes are plated with German Silver.

ADVERTISER
OCTOBER 16, 1909

GLORIOUS PROGRAMME, ENTIRELY ORCHESTRAL

SYMPHONY GOERS TREATED TO THREE LARGE WORKS

First Performance in America of Max Reger's Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy.

By Louis C. Elson.

Programme.

Max Reger—Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy.
Tschaikowsky—Symphony in F minor. No. 4.
Grieg—"Peer Gynt" Suite.

This time the programme was entirely orchestral, and we can again say that we do not find the absence of a soloist to make any perceptible gap in the list. To hear our great orchestral organization in three large and well-contrasted works is glory enough for one afternoon. Max Reger's work was heard for the first time in America. It is quite evident that Regcr is to be reckoned with as one of the great influences of the present, even if we do not accord him the rank of a Brahms in fluency of development, or of a Strauss in orchestration. Spite of the giants, such men as Reger, Mahler, Hausegger and Weingartner, make their mark and mould their epoch in some degree.

"Prologue to a Tragedy"! At once one thinks of two other works on the same scheme—Brahms' "Tragic Overture" and Chadwick's "Melpomene." The latter is one of the greatest works of our native repertoire and may well stand comparison with the other works in this majestic field. Reger's work is, in some degree, the opposite of these. They express emotion without discarding form; Reger throws form to the winds. They give clear and logical development; Reger gives figure treatment that can scarcely, in its disjointed vein, be called Development. Being modern the work is complicated and also heavily scored, but it is not too long.

A single broad note of brasses ushers in the composition. Then come alternate layers of unisons and dissonant harmonies, of very soft and very loud passages. In such programme-music without a "programme" (i.e., a definite story) there is considerable danger of the auditor dilating with the wrong emotion. We gathered from the music, however, that the hero and heroine were at times uncomfortable. That much was evident even to the most conservative analyst.

Combats there were also; what Shakespeare would have called "Excursions and Alarums," in which the kettle-drums and the brasses had work to do. There was, as in Wagner's "Faust" overture, but little of the feminine element in the work. The hero was almost constantly to the front. Occasionally there was a suspicion of tearing a passion to tatters, but this was not often.

None the less Reger's overture impresses the reviewer with a sense of its greatness. He cannot take it all in at one hearing, but there is a vague sense of power, and of beauty, too, left after it. It is a work that we should like to hear again. It did not arouse the audience to great applause; but that means nothing, for a "Sugar-plum Fairy," played on the Celeste, would gain more noisy laurels at any time than a Beethoven Symphony. But such a work deserves an attentive hearing and a repeated one. The continuous melody at the close of the work is ineffably beautiful and gives us hopes of Reger. He is beginning to cease to be the apostle of ugliness. Thanks are due to Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra for the pains which they have taken with this work. And to think that it was first performed in Cologne in March of this year, and here we have it in Boston in October! Bravo, Mr. Fiedler!

It is well, once in a while, to remember that Tschaikowsky wrote other symphonies besides his "Pathetique." It was well, too, to have the melodic Russian and the still more melodic Norwegian come after the abstruse German. Yet we were somewhat out of touch with the Tschaikowsky work. The points which we always associate with the Russian master are present; the Muscovite folk-songs bubble up at frequent intervals; the deep woodwind growls; the piccolo scintillates; but there is a palpable effort to be grandiloquent, which is not present in the sixth symphony and which is more exciting in the fifth.

In the first movement ambition o'er-leaps itself. There is a fanfare of brasses which is like a challenge to fate; but Schumann has done this better in two of his symphonies. The kettle-drums give a ground-bass in this movement, an effect which Tschaikowsky made still better use of in his sixth symphony. But it is always refreshing to hear good melodies in a classical form, and this work had tune enough to supply some of our modern dissonancers for a life-time. But the effect of the first movement was rather weak after the Reger Prologue. One felt that the first was much the greater movement.

The tunes were at their best in the slow movement, in which a beautiful oboe melody was beautifully played at the very beginning, and the bassoon was also agreeably prominent at the end. The Scherzo, however, is the most popular movement of a work that is a little too popular throughout. Here there is peppery piccolo work and some effective pizzicato sweeps upon the strings. It was excellently performed and both conductor and orchestra were compelled to acknowledge the applause at its end.

TRANSCRIPT
OCTOBER 16, 1909

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

REGER'S NEW PIECE FOR THE FIRST TIME

The "Prologue to a Tragic Play," as Mr. Fiedler Condensed and Concentrated It—A First Impression of Its Form and Manner, Substance and Emotions—Reger's Power of Tone—The Tschaikowsky of the Fourth Symphony in Comparison—The Grieg of "Peer Gynt" and to Surfeit—Another Striking Concert

Whenever the public of the Symphony Concerts has heard Reger's orchestral music, it has warmly applauded it. The local Methuselahs of music—and some of younger years—shook wise and doubting heads when they first heard his Serenade less than two years ago, but the naive mood of the piece, that masqued much intricate invention and limitless scholarship, the charm of it, and Reger's delight in tonal beauty for its own sake, won more receptive hearers. Our audiences thrilled to the emotional intensity of his Variations for orchestra and the resplendent tonal power of the fugue that ended them. At the Symphony Concert of yesterday, when Reger's new "Prologue to a Tragic Play" came to first performance in America the audiences—as audiences on Friday afternoon go, and with allowence for the nature of the piece—was as hearty in its applause. The music runs long and intricately; it is exacting to follow and emotionally searching to hear. Yet not once did the audience give sign of waning attention. Musical opinion in Germany, which loves controversy over composers as Scots love it over theology or Americans over business, is sharply divided between the "Straussites" and the "Regerites." You cannot hold neutral and find stimulating interest and pleasure in the music of both. You must rail at the one and cherish the other. The men, said Reger's publisher curiously last summer, are oftenest for him; while the women are as frequently and ardently on the side of Strauss. Here in Boston there is no such division of the sexes or of musical opinion. We are more equable and catholic minded, and as the two Symphony Concerts that have begun the season have proved, we take our pleasure in both Reger and Strauss. Certainly the orchestra plays the music of each understandingly, gladly, thrillingly.

Tschaikowsky—the Tschaikowsky of his first mastered and individual symphony, the fourth, in F-minor—followed Reger's Prologue. The music had not been played here for almost exactly four years; the novel sound and aspect, the ear-tickling phrases and rhythms of the sustained pizzicato for the strings at the beginning and at the end of the Scherzo are sure to win it applause; the passages of "ballet music" that Tanéieff resented in the score have similar fascinations and similar results; the whole is eloquent of Tschaikowsky, Slav sentimentalist and Slav melodramatist, on his way to the passion and the tragedy of his two final symphonies; Mr. Fiedler's performance was large and orotund rather than nervously sensitive and racking; and the result again was an engrossed audience and applause so insistent that the conductor brought the orchestra to its feet at the end of the Scherzo. Grieg ended the concert and Grieg to surfeit. There are eight pieces in the two Suites that he made from his incidental music to Ibsen's "Peer Gynt." Mr. Fiedler played seven of them—all but the "Arabian Dance" of the second Suite. It was good to hear the music played with beauty of colorful tone, with fineness of detail, with supple rhythms. The first Suite, hackneyed as it is, deserves such rescue, on occasion, from the torments of popular performances; the second in comparison is genuinely unfamiliar. But Grieg was a "little master"; he had but one vein, —the vein of the "Morning Mood" and of "Solvejg's Song"—manfully as he tried to assume others; and seven courses of him, albeit diversified, were sure to cloy even an audience as eager as that of yesterday.

Reger is only thirty-six year old, his music, again according to his publisher, finds a wider sale than that of any other living composer; 108 is the "Opus Number" of the Prologue of yesterday, which is barely six months old; and "Opus 109"—a string quartet—already lies in the music-shop. Pictures of Reger, especially in the shape of the head and about the nostrils, look like engravings of Bach; and thus prompted, to see Reger himself is to note the resemblance. Reger professes Bach as his master; and he is as clearly the descendant of the long line of purely symphonic German composers, as Strauss is the child of Berlioz, Liszt and Wagner, the dramatizers of music. One quality, perhaps two, distinguishes Reger among all the rest of the swarming brood, and even from his musical forefathers themselves. Above almost any other composer Reger loves tone for its own sake, not for what it may express poignantly or graphically, but for the sensuous satisfactions that it may give to him who creates and to them that hear it and for the intellectual delight, again to him and to them, of the manipulation of it. No such ear for shadings of tone, no such imagination and invention in them, no such superhuman and almost diabolic ability to make notes expressive of these subtleties exist in our time. Like many another contemporary composer, Reger often writes music to be seen rather than heard. The ear, at the moment, cannot differentiate its interweaving or the mind follow its threads; they must be read somewhat as the eye and the mind follow the diagrams and the equations of a geometer in the solution of an intricate problem. (The omitted passages of the Prologue—and there were two such yesterday—are full of such music.) Any chord makes Reger almost monstrously fertile in invention. He modulates so incessantly, insistently and variously that his pieces may not properly, like Giordano's operas, bear any key signature. The range, the fertility, the intricacy, the pliancy of his polyphony are almost superhuman, an elephantiasis—were it not often so fine and subtle—of an intellectual faculty. These means serve the one dominant end—the sensuous beauty and the emotional appeal of tone in itself and the imaginative and expressive manipulation of it. The first impression, thus, of Reger's pieces, even of those in the smaller forms, is oftenest of a vital and resplendent mass of tone. Recall, for the supreme impression of it, thus far, in Reger's orchestral music, the Fugue that ends his Variations.

So considered, the "Prologue to a Tragic Play" seethes with tonal intensity and tonal power. It matters little what tragedy suggested the music. Perhaps there was none at all; and quite as probably Reger himself invented his own tragedy in tones as he wrote. The tragedy, in emotional significance, is unmistakably large, heroic, remote and luridly lit, full of swift and fateful vicissitudes, of superhuman deed, of racking passions that now blaze and now turn sombre, that are mighty and are tender—a tragedy of large and vivid external action and of intimate and intense emotions, that comes to shadowed yet triumphant close, to a kind of spiritual apotheosis, rare in the somewhat earthly minded Reger. "Now cracks a noble heart. . . . Proud death, what feast is toward in thine eternal cell." As Reger has written his music, he makes this tragedy a tragedy in tones and nothing else. His melodic thoughts, in bare statement, are short-breathed and in their narrow selves neither impressive nor significant. They suffice because they kindle Reger's imagination to the writing of his tragedy. None may excel him, when he chooses, in the dividing and the subdividing of melodic ideas and the worrying to the last gasp of the last strip of them. Reger can turn musical essayist, dessicate his ideas, and expatiate almost upon each atom of them. (He has done so in some of the omitted passages of the Prologue.) But Reger can also turn tragic poet and tragic dramatist in tones, and he is so oftenest in the condensed and concentrated version of his overture that Mr. Fiedler made yesterday.

The voice of fateful and heroic tragedy is eloquent throughout the music, now large and high, now leaping into fury, now dying to whispered and dolorous accents, rising again to mighty proclamation and then softening to a deep and still longing or to the mood of tender and eager vision. (There softenings may be a little Wagnerian, a little suggestive of the first act of "Die Walküre," but the Prologue is Reger's first venture into tonal drama and it is hard to escape the most puissant of its influences.) Always the tonal tragedy seethes and struggles—the strings over the other instrumental choirs—or shudders breathlessly, shatters itself upon itself, rekindles its fires of passion, combat and desire, and mounts anew in inexhaustible climax. Black darkness shrouds the mutterings and murmurings of the music, or lurid lights play over its expanses, softening their gleam to its sighs and longings. There are no images such as Strauss likes to summon in and with his music; no explicit tale unfolds itself; there are no psychological expositions and subtleties. There are only, in the true estate of dramatizing music outside the opera house, the chain of emotions that tones of themselves may impart and intensify and the engrossing and the penetrating atmosphere that tones of themselves may weave. If only Reger were such a master of large tonal design as he is of mighty tonal emotion. Too often, his form of expression, in the large sense, repeats itself—the long ascent, the gradual gathering of the divided voices, the climax that first concentrates and then shivers them, the moaning pause, the piercing single voice, and the multiplication, the ascent, and the gathering again. None the less, Reger, by the clear proof of this Prologue, is a puissant orchestral dramatist—and by the power of tones alone.

Was it the fault of Tschaikowsky himself or was it the contract of Reger that made the Russian's symphony sound rather tame and sentimental and akin to the "modulated melodrama" of the current threatre, after the heroic and truly tragic Prologue. Tschaikowsky could be tragic enough in his fifth symphony and in the "Pathetic Symphony" that Mr. Fiedler played last year, which in the fifth, his masterpiece, he is as fateful and seething, as longing or as portentous as is the new and dramatizing Reger. The symphony of yesterday is of another fibre, mood, intent and expression. In the fifth and in the "Pathetic," Tschaikowsky wrestles with overwhelming fate, wrestles now in agony and now in exaltation of spirit. The music that he has written in them is the deepest of all his music and he is poignantly moving. He is concerned with his individual temperament and emotional experiences, and not with such impersonal passions as though of Reger's Prologue, but the burning intensity of his expression, the frenzy of struggle, elevation, or despair make them universal.

The fourth symphony, each time that it comes to hearing, and not always in such a perilous vicinage as that of yesterday, seems the more to lack such intensities. In it, Tschaikowsky sentimentalizes over the struggles with fate that so often are the springs of his music, and takes a kind of perverse and melancholy joy in the process. Werther-like, he loves—he even craves—his haunting and torturing moods. He does not express them irresistibly, alike for himself and for his hearers, as he does in the two final symphonies. He dallies with them, even "prettifies" them—recall the passages in the first and the slow movement that begin and end in charm. He consciously seeks and achieves such "effects" as those that have popularized the Scherzo. He makes musical "copy" of his sleep-chasings and dream visions and writes an explanatory note to the insatiable Mrs. von Meck. The inspired, the tragic, the truly and universally expressive Tschaikowsky indeed speaks in the sustained passages of thundering fate in the introduction, and in the moment of emotional desolation that cuts the riot of the Finale. Elsewhere he is Tschaikowsky finding a kind of sentimental balm—and an æsthetic use—in his own restless melancholy, or Tschaikowsky, the modulated musical melodramatist.

H. T. P.

TRANSCRIPT
OCTOBER 21, 1909

MUSICAL NEWS

A New Concerto by Mr. Strube at the Symphony Concerts Next Week—Additional Music for "The Tempest"—Subscriptions at the Opera—Mr. Mahler Returns—Mme. Carreno and MacDowell's Music—Mr. Hammerstein Revives "The Bohemian Girl"

Mr. Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist, who was expected to play one of his own concertos at the Symphony Concerts of next week, has been constrained by sickness to defer for a time his visit to the United States. Accordingly for the concerts of Oct 29 and 30 Mr. Fiedler announces a new concerto for violoncello and orchestra written by Mr. Strube, of the band, and with Mr. Warnke, its first 'cellist, to play the solo part. New concertos for violoncello are rare in these days, and new pieces by Mr. Strube, especially after his masterly symphony of last spring, have their particular interest for the public of the Symphony Concerts, which have long fostered his talents. Later in the season, perhaps in a few weeks, Mr. Rachmaninoff will make his promised appearance.

TRANSCRIPT.
OCTOBER 16, 1909

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Bantock's Music for the First Time at the Symphony Concerts—The Beginning of the Cambridge Series—George Hamlin's Song Recital

Joachim's Hungarian concerto, rarely played by virtuosi, presumably on account of its almost superhuman technical demands, will be given at the third public rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The soloist, as on the occasion of its last performance here, in 1904, will be Professor Willy Hess, the concert-master of the orchestra. The Hungarian concerto is the work of a great violinist and a great technician; it is the work of a musician as well, in which it differs from the run of virtuoso pieces. Its testing of the whole range of the instrument's capacities suits it peculiarly to Professor Hess, and the performance may be expected to be a notable one. The first number of the programme will be Granville Bantock's Comedy Overture, "The Pierrot of the Minute." Bantock's name is new to the symphony programmes; he belongs to that group of younger Englishmen who have been the hope of that country for delivery from the reign of oratorio in recent years. He occupies a post as professor of music in the Manchester, England, Conservatory. His work follows the theme of some fantastic verses of the poet Dowsen, dealing with the love of Pierrot for the moon. The concluding number will be Beethoven's Eighth Symphony.

The programme of the first Symphony concert in Sander's Theatre, Cambridge, next Thursday evening, Oct. 21, will be—

Beethoven; Overture "Coriolanus."
Haydn; Aria, "With Verdure Clad."
Brahms; Symphony in D major, No. 2.
Bizet; Aria, "Je dis que rien ne m'épouvante," from "Carmen."
Struss; Tone-poem, "Don Juan."

The soloist will be Miss Laura Combs, soprano, remembered favorably for her singing in the performance of the Choral Symphony in Boston last spring.

MONITOR,
OCTOBER 18, 1909.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler conductor, gave on Saturday evening the first American performance of Reger's Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy, opus 108. Besides that they played the Fourth Symphony of Tschaikowsky, three movements from Grieg's second "Peer Gynt" suite and all of the first suite.

The only thing to say about the Reger prologue is that it is much like all other good music and so far is it from being revolutionary that it is very conservative. It tells of an individuality, of course; of a modern individuality, and of a very different one from that of Richard Strauss. Reger, as he appears in this work, is a more self-contained man than Strauss; he sticks persistently to the point. His undulations may shift but his theme has a way of being always in evidence.

The Prologue is built around a motto of three notes and this is never for long at a time absent from the music. The tragedy is certainly not one of unrestrained violence. It is a tragedy perhaps of one who goes along smoothly through the greater part of his life and is surprised at last by fate. Its leading character is not one who plots somebody's destruction only to bring about his own. It may be the tragedy of an Oedipus, it cannot be that of a Macbeth.

There is a dignity and a restfulness about this work that seems to indicate that modern music has come to master its great resources and is no longer going to be mastered by them. Here is none of the reveling in technique which characterizes Strauss; and here is none of the Strauss triviality. Reger's inspiration is not so rich as that of Strauss; consequently he has to fall back on thinking. But he is the more logical man; his unity is not a unity of tumult but a unity of related ideas.

Perhaps never since Mr. Fiedler has been conducting the symphony concerts has he had a program with which he was so entirely pleased as he was with the program of the second concert. He conducted it all equally well and with equal interest in its subject matter. Evidently he chose this program without feeling obliged to do something big and the result was as satisfactory a concert as he ever gave.

There have been moments in the first two Saturday evenings of this season when Mr. Fiedler has put some of the old time Gericke precision into the conducting of the simpler and more rhythmical pasages of the music. It is surprising to see how readily the orchestra responds to any indication on the part of the conductor that neatness of phrasing is desired. A little classic dryness is not a bad thing to have manifest itself in these days when humanizing influences are running away with hi[illegible]

* * *

ADVERTISER,
OCTOBER 27, 1909

TSCHAIKOWSKY'S "TEMPEST" GIVEN IN SYMPHONY HALL

Symphony Players Disclosed the Music to Be Brilliant in Contrasts—Acting Not Altogether Good.

By S. C. Williams.

Unusual circumstances justify commencement of a dramatic criticism with comment on music accompanying the performance. It is no disparagement of the Greet Players to say that many present in Symphony hall last night were more interested in hearing the first Boston performance of Tschaikowsky's fantasia, "The Tempest," than in seeing another performance of Shakespeare's play of that title.

Tschaikowsky's work was written in 1873, and was suggested by Vladimir Stassof, the art critic and literary champion of so-called "younger" Russian composers. After hearing a performance conducted in St. Petersburg by Nepravnik, Stassof wrote to the composer, lauding it as "a marvel of marvels. Caliban, Ariel, the love-scene, what passion, what languor, what beauty!" Laroche, on the other hand, said the storm was "chiefly remarkable for noisy orchestration." He wondered "by what technical means the composer succeeded in concocting such a pandemonium."

As in most cases, truth lies between two extremes. Last night's performance by 50 Symphony men under the baton of Gustav Strube disclosed Tschaikowsky in characteristic contrasts,—in superbly graphic touches, in tumultuous passion and melting appeal. It is brilliant music, not one of his great works, but still the work of a great composer. One wonders whether Laroche, who could not understand how the composer "succeeded in concocting such a pandemonium," ever heard "Francesca" or the "1812" overture. And what would he think of Richard Strauss' strenuous outpourings?

Sir Arthur Sullivan's music to "The Tempest" gave orchestral support to the performance. Written at Leipsic when Sullivan was only 19, it is unfailingly graceful and apposite. The playing of Mr. Strube's men awakened enthusiasm.

In comment upon the acting one cannot wax warm. A majority of the cast seemed a bit shaky in their lines, and, being deeply impressed by the size of the hall, became stilted in straining after audibility. In this respect Frank McEntee was the most conspicuous offender. His Prospero had heavy pulpit manners.

Mr. Greet's Caliban exhibits sardonic quality he summons easily, but is not really very savage. Violet Vivian was a Miranda whose persistent immaturity of manner surpassed belief. Two who acted with real gusto were Trinculo and Stephano, respectively played by Percival Seymour and George Vivian.

It is reported that before long the Greet players will have a permanent home in New York. That would be good fortune for them, and for the playgoing public. So situated, they could give more satisfactory performances than they are able to under present circumstances. That Mr. Greet, given ample resources, would be a strong influence in stimulation of intellectual interest in the stage no one familiar with his achievements can doubt. He has fought a good fight against heavy odds. It is matter for regret that he has not been able to sustain the early standard of his company.

[20]

HERALD, BOSTON, OCTOBER 17, 1909

SYMPHONY PLAYS REGER'S PROLOGUE

First Performance in America of This Composition; Spirited Production of Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 4.

SECOND OF SEASON'S CONCERTS IS GIVEN

By PHILIP HALE.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy.....Reger
Symphony No. 4.....Tschaikowsky
Music to Ibsen's "Peer Gynt".....Grieg

Reger's Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy, his latest orchestral work, was played for the first time at Cologne last spring. The performance last night was the first in America.

It is not known whether the composer had any particular tragedy in mind, whether one of Pelops' line, one by Shakespeare or one by some German author. It matters not. In its original form the prologue was long enough for a trilogy. Reger, for he is not wholly merciless, by a footnote in his score allows a conductor to make a liberal cut. Mr. Fiedler took advantage of the permission, and also cut for himself.

Reger is a prominent figure in the contemporaneous musical life, by reason of his bulk, his contrapuntal mazes, his defiant attitude, his pretensions, and the claims made for him by his friends. It was only meet and proper that Mr. Fiedler should give us the opportunity of hearing another of Reger's swollen orchestral compositions, the opportunity of seeing and hearing the composer weltering again in counter point.

It is not easy to speak patiently or calmly of this preposterous music; music that is not music, as there are books that are not books. The Regerite may answer with a provoking smile: "You should not judge from one hearing; you should hear the prologue often; it will grow on you; it is a gigantic work, not readily grasped and comprehended."

But the prologue is not unendurable by reason of some strangeness in the proportions of an unfamiliar harmonic scheme, daring modulations, bizarre instrumentation. It is unendurable because it is prodigiously dull. There is complexity, there is technical skill of a kind not to be encouraged when the results are so barren, there is a din; but where is strength, where is beauty, and, above all, where is tragic intensity or suggestion of bodement? Notes galore; themes without distinction; climaxes that do not thrill, that are in boresome succession; music that is jejune and futile.

Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony has been a stumbling block to some who find the first movement both blatant and trivial and the finale rowdy, yet it is doubtful whether the composer ever wrote a more thoroughly characteristic work, a franker confession of his views of life and death. Tschaikowsky's best music is usually a revelation of himself, of his mood at the time of composition. He is the most autobiographical of all composers. He screams his disappointments and sorrows; he is now childlike in his joy and now in doleful dumps.

His program of the symphony written for his friend Nadejda von Meck is one that might be applied, in part at least, to his fifth symphony and to his sixth. There was always in his mind the thought of Fate that would not allow Mankind, i. e. Tschaikowsky, happiness. Last night the brass was more than once overblown in the first movement, so that the accusation of raucous coarseness seemed not unreasonable. There is filagree work for the wood-wind instruments that is trivial. Yet when all is said, this first movement is strangely impressive. There is a tragic atmosphere about it that is not as a Regerian fog or storm, for the persons in the tragedy are clearly seen.

The second movement is one of the most melancholy episodes in the literature of music. The oboe solo with which it opens, played with exquisite feeling by Mr. Longy, is not sadder than the forced gayety of the middle part. The scherzo is unique—a succession of sleep-chasings, to use Walt Whitman's word—fantastical thoughts, grotesque, amorphous, vulgar, with touches of superb insanity. As for the Finale, it is the expression of unthinking, unreasonable, animal joy. Fate watching cynically sounds its warning, but in vain.

Yes, this symphony is at times coarse, vulgar, trivial—but it is highly imaginative and at the same time elemental. The composer stripped himself, and the world sees and hears a man, not something disguised to outward view as a man, with smug, hypocritical mask, but a man, a mixture of divinity and the beast, confronted with the eternal problems, bludgeoned by fate.

The performance was spirited and impressive. The coarseness was not sandpapered; that which is inherently trivial was not hidden. On the whole, the performance was by far the best that has been given here.

Grieg said of his music to "Peer Gynt" that it gained when it was played in the theatre and in connection with the play. This is undoubtedly true of the two movements (1 and 3) in the second suite. In the concert hall they are not effective, nor is the transcription of Solveig's song so beautiful as the song when sung. On the other hand, Anitras Dance is probably more effective as music when it is heard without the distraction of the dancing woman and Peer Gynt's singular comments on her personal appearance. "In the Hall of the Mountain King" is frankly theatre music and excusable only for that reason.

HERALD, OCTOBER 21, 1909.

RACHMANINOFF ILL.

Russian Composer and Pianist Will Not Join Symphony Until Nov. 8.

Serge Rachmaninoff, the distinguished Russian composer, conductor and pianist, who was engaged to make his first appearance in America with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony Hall Oct. 29, 30, was prevented by sickness from taking the steamer that would enable him to fulfil the engagement. He will join the orchestra, however, on its trip to New York, Philadelphia and other cities, the week beginning Nov. 8.

The program of the concert here Oct. 30 has, therefore, been changed. As now arranged, it will include Schumann's symphony No. 2; a new concerto for 'cello and orchestra by Gustav Strube (Ms.), and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel." Mr. Warnke, first 'cellist of the orchestra, will be soloist.

Mr. Rachmaninoff will appear at a later concert of the Symphony orchestra in Boston.

SERGE RACHMANINOFF.

BOSTON GLOBE—OCTOBER 23, 1909.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

"A Midsummer Night's Dream" at Symphony Hall This Afternoon—Current and Coming Attractions.

The Ben Greet company, assisted by an orchestra of Symphony men, Gustav Strube director, will present "A Midsummer Night's Dream" this afternoon in Symphony hall. Mendelssohn's music will be performed.

The cast is as follows: Theseus, Walter Beck; Lysander, Eric Blind; Demetrius, Alexander Calvert; Philostrate, John B. Astley; Egeus, Philip Golden; Quince, Frank McEntee; Snug, Charles G. Barney; Bottom, Ben Greet; Flute, Percival Seymour; Snout, Charles R. Hopkins; Starveling, P. J. Kelly; Hippolyta, Grace Halsey Mills; Hermia, Keith Wakeman; Helena, Violet Vivian; Oberon, George Vivian; Titania, Ruth Vivian; Puck, Millicent Evison.

Next Tuesday evening "The Tempest" will be presented, with Sir Arthur Sullivan's incidental music played by the orchestra.

MONITOR, OCTOBER 22, 1909.

SYMPHONY AT CAMBRIDGE.

MAX FIEDLER is so much at home when he is with the academic folk who throng Sanders theater to hear the Cambridge Symphony concerts that he makes them feel as though the orchestra were their own instead of a company of visiting musicians from Boston. He seems to feel that he is in a place where the German musical ideal is perfectly understood, in a place where the apologetic and controversial attitude is unnecessary. He knows that Brahms and Strauss are welcome there because all German thinkers are welcome there; and knowing this, he interprets these composers for the Cambridge audiences with peculiar freedom and power. And the Cambridge audiences have a historic sense which gives Beethoven a welcome on their programs, and Mr. Fiedler can make a work of that composer acceptable to them by giving it the straightforward, unpretending interpretation he deems it should have.

The Cambridge symphony season began Thursday night with the following program: Beethoven, Overture to "Coriolanus"; Haydn, Aria from "The Creation"; Brahms, Symphony No. 2; Bizet, Aria, "Je dis que rien"; Richard Strauss, "Don Juan." The soloist was Miss Laura Combs.

Sanders theater was filled, and applause, though given with academic discrimination, was enthusiastic. The conductor read his scores with such freedom and at the same time with such care that the audience were brought close to the thought of the composer. They liked the overture; they liked its simple outlines, they liked Beethoven's contrasting moments of argument and persuasion; they liked being startled by his bursts of quick temper, they liked being calmed again as his mood softened.

The spell of Brahms, Brahms of the Second symphony, joyous and serious by turns, and restrained always, was no less powerful over them; and Strauss in "Don Juan" spoke with sincerity and directness.

Miss Combs, the soloist of Thursday evening, appeared in Boston last spring as the soprano of the quartet in the Ninth symphony of Beethoven, and won all the praise that is to be won from taking that difficult and rather thankless part. Her voice had a better chance this fall in the Worcester festival, when she took the lead in the quartet of Liszt's Missa Solennis. Here the blend of her soprano with the other voices was most satisfying. But her singing in quartets was an incomplete test of her powers. In Cambridge Thursday evening she showed what manner of voice she really has and what purposes of art it can serve. The notable thing about it is its purity of tone throughout its range. It is by no means a dramatic voice; and if a soprano can thrive in these days without singing in the dramatic manner she does well. It is perhaps not such a militant voice as it ought to be, even for singing the aria "With Verdure Clad," but for Bizet's music, wherein the voice part is written to blend with the orchestral colors, nothing better than Miss Combs' light and pure soprano could be desired.

* * *

With Mr Bantock's reputed facility in oriental color, there might have been expected in this work a more potent suggestion of the spell of soft fragrance and subtle thraldom of sense which the lines apparently breathe forth.

As an anathema upon even so cold and chaste a kiss the composer pronounces an empty disillusionizing fifth in the dull-colored lower register of the flutes, and Pierrot's dream is over.

It was good to hear Beethoven's symphony played with the dignity and understanding inherent in Mr Fiedler's readings of that master.

BOSTON GLOBE—OCTOBER 23, 1909.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Joachim Concerto Played by Willy Hess.

First American Performance of Bantock Overture.

For the third pair of Symphony concerts Mr Fiedler chose his two orchestral numbers, in the one instance the ultra-modern romantic literature, and in the other, from the fountain head, classicism.

The first was "The Pierrot of the Minute," a comedy overture to a dramatic phantasy of Ernest Dowson's by Granville Bantock, which received in the concert of yesterday afternoon its first performance in America. The second was Beethoven's symphony in F major, the eighth.

Dividing the two came the soloist of the week, Prof Willy Hess, the concert master of the orchestra, in the highly exacting concerto by Joachim, who styled his work "in the Hungarian manner."

It is a triumph for the orchestra itself that from its first desk should come an artist who, beside possessing in exceedingly large measure the technical surety and broad musicianship so capably to fill his chair, should also combine with that routine dependability an artistry which can cope with the seven-leagued stride of this concerto. It is one of the longest, severest and most crucially testing pieces in all violin literature. Prof Hess finds an additional reason for regarding it highly in that Joachim was his teacher.

Prof Hess played the concerto upon his debut with the orchestra on Oct 22, 1904, just five years ago to a day. Yesterday he played it again with sovereignty over its multiplied technical difficulties and a reading more to be remarked for its breadth and dignity of style than for excessively Hungarian bravura and abandon.

The allegro was a well-balanced piece of virtuosity. The Hungarian theme, with its love of the minor, and the resultant augmented step in its melody, was played with a reverence and a tenderness rather than with the show of fire which a younger and more impetuous player might have given it. The dazzling rapidity of tones did not seem mere display. They went with remarkable facility, and with both a firmness and elasticity of bowing which made the intricate phrase intelligible. Prof Hess did the rapid chromatic octaves, the terrific double stopped voices in duet, and the other well-nigh incessant feats of executive skill with apparent ease.

The series of diversions in the second movement, beginning with the "Romanze," were memorable for much beauty in tone and phrasing. Particularly enjoyable was the fluent embellishment by the solo violin of a sustained singing melody in the 'cellos.

The true Hungarian love of rubato and well-contrasted accent and staccato note came more noticeably in the third and closing movement. The lightness, brilliance and well-measured surety of Prof Hess' spiccato bowing in this movement were somewhat marred by a slight but perceptible tardiness in the orchestra. Otherwise the accompaniment, which is highly engaging in and of itself, was most admirable.

The concerto is unquestionably too long and taxing a work when considered in the light of comfort either for hearer or performer. An artist of other than great power of concentration and prolonged nerve tension would do well to chose some less severely searching medium for his ability.

It is to be noted that, save for the first few notes of the solo instrument's entrance in the first movement, which, by the way, seems an illogical and unwarranted means of introduction, Prof Hess' intonation was practically impeccable throughout the work.

At its conclusion the soloist was summoned again and again to the platform by the continued applause of the audience, in which Mr Fiedler and the members of the band joined most heartily. It was a justly deserved ovation.

The New Overture.

It is an achievement that, in two of the first three pairs of concerts thus far given this season, Mr Fiedler has presented novelties which in both instances have received their initial performance in America.

Comparison between the Reger "Prolog to a Tragedy," heard last week, and the "Comedy Overture to a Dramatic Phantasy," by Granville Bantock, heard yesterday, is like an attempted comparison between one of Shakspere's monumental tragedies, as "Hamlet" or "Lear," with something written considerably less well than one of his lesser comedies. However, Mr Fiedler deserves our gratitude for keeping us abreast of the times in the way of novelties, and a little in advance of the patrons of the Symphony society in New York or of the Thomas orchestra in Chicago.

The new overture was something of a disappointment. Its workmanship is dainty, fantastic, elegant, quaint and too crudely realistic by turns. In its formal structure a constant irregularity in rhythm and tempo break up the movement into frequent episode, incident and excursion into some new caprice.

There is noticeable economy both in the use of thematic material and of counterpoint, indeed the tonal treatment at times is so meager that the thread of development seems insufficient. The instrumentation dismisses six members of the usual choir of brass and percussion. There is no marked novelty in harmonic device.

As to the work's relation to the composer's "program," in which the "Pierrot," in his dream of the fateful "minute," begs a kiss from the immortal moon-maiden and is doomed by her to thereafter love in vain, its whimsical vagaries might aptly be summoned by Ernest Dowson's phantasy to the mind of a fanciful composer.

As a poetic conceit the story possesses the charm induced by subtle and beautiful imagery. The musical work mirrors well the lightness and elusive grace of its fairy romance, but keeps it under the cold, scintillating light of a northern moon.

[21]

ADVERTISER.
OCTOBER 23, 1909

BANTOCK OVERTURE GREATLY ADMIRED

SURPRISE OF THE WEEK'S SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

Great Reception Given Prof. Hess, Who Plays Joachim's Hungarian Concerto.

By Louis C. Elson.

Programme.

Granville Bantock—"The Pierrot of the Minute." Overture.
Joachim—Hungarian Concerto, for Violin.
Soloist—Prof. Willy Hess.
Beethoven—Eighth Symphony.

A programme of but moderate length that vibrated pleasantly between the old and the new, the classical and the radical. The eighth symphony does not pall, although Beethoven's odd numbers (excepting the first) are all greater than his even ones in the matter of symphonies. But there are still many matters that modern composers can study from this symphony. First, conservatism in scoring, for it is not at all ambitious in its orchestral forces. Second, melody, for its themes sing themselves. Third, good humor, for there is not an atom of the bitter woe which is now becoming fashionable in its measures. And lastly, brevity, for it is one of the shortest of symphonic works and stops when the composer has nothing more to say.

This last quality is most refreshing, for your true modern goes on long after he has told you all his thoughts and would by no means give you a symphony of less than an hour's length. He would probably regard this as a Sinfoniettina. Yet it was good to listen to, all the same, and the sparkling themes lost nothing in the interpretation.

We feel like giving the chief praise to the bassoon and contrabass, for this is emphatically a symphony for these instruments, and they are very often to the fore, sometimes with themes of ponderous comicality, sometimes in funny duet touches with the kettledrums. We may remember that Beethoven loved the bassoon and always used it when he was in the free mood which he called "aufgeknoepft." Just as the horn was Weber's pet, and the clarinette Mendelssohn's, so the bassoon exhibits Beethoven in his best humor. But his playfulness always had something leonine in it, like the humor of Aristophanes.

But when composing this symphony our lion was in love. It is astonishing how often Beethoven fell in love and then fell out again. But the world was always the gainer by his passions and may thank Amalia Seebald for the joy of the seventh and eighth symphonies.

The reading was a good and unaffected one, and Mr. Fiedler did not try to give more to the work than Beethoven intended it to express. But the spirit of the development of the first movement, the dialogue between violins and cellos in the second, the beautiful horn passages in the Minuet, and the manner in which the contrabasses bit the flute's head off in the finale, were all points to enjoy, while the frenzy of happiness at the end was brilliant in the extreme. When Beethoven was joyous he painted the whole orchestra red, as witness the end of the ninth symphony, the end of the "Leonore, No. 3," and the Coda of this work.

When the Hessian Willy stepped to the front he was most cordially greeted; and certainly he deserved the tribute, for Prof. Hess has been the best of concertmeisters to the best of orchestras. But he immediately set about earning this "pay in advance" applause by giving a splendid display of technique and of musicianship. We cannot say that we are intensely moved by Joachim's concerto. His head was moved by thoughts of fingers and bow far more than his heart was moved by emotion when he wrought this work.

But the work is shapely, its themes are well defined and form good foils to each other, and the concerto has the merit of growing steadily better up to its close. Its first movement is its least effective. The work is of course thoroughly violinistic, or fiddlesque, (the reader can take either horn of this etymological dilemma) and was bound to be a little too long. One can alter Goldsmith in describing Joachim's composership and say that even his failings leaned to virtuosity's side.

There was a long Tutti at the beginning of the first movement, affording an excellent opportunity for the artist to get as nervous as anyone waiting in a dentist's side-room. But there is no nervousness (in the fidgetty sense) in Mr. Hess. He gave the most brilliant exhibition of violin technique that we have heard in a long time. Everything was there: skips, harmonics, double-stopping, G string work, and the final Coda was a perpetuum mobile of wonderful power. Amid all this there was not the slightest swerving from intonation (although at first a little lack of breadth) and the performance was a masterly one in every way.

Mr. Hess was recalled again and again and his playing rather than the content of the work deserved the great tribute.

The surprise of the concert was the Bantock overture. There was a time, only a few years ago, when Bridge, Mackenzie, and a few others of the conservative type, thought of founding a new English school of composition; with about as much chance of success (as Ernest Newman put it) as an ambitious hen would have in hatching out hard boiled eggs. And now, lo and behold! there is an Elgar building hour-long symphonies with tremendous orchestras, there is Delius plunging into the most modern radicalism, and here we have Granville Bantock evolving a most difficult orchestral work, with all kinds of complexities yet with a modern spirit and verve that carries the auditor along with quickened pulses.

In the first place the overture has a glow of tone color that is still unusual in England. Then also it has a delightful freedom of form that gives an added charm. It is the story of an enchanted Pierrot who stakes his life in a fairy dell for the sake of love. Although it is always risky to tell the tale of programme music without the composer's authorization, yet we found a suggestion of the fairies in the passages with tambourine and Glockenspiel (tinkling bells) in the earliest part, while Pierrot himself was suggested by a clear motive, rushing spasmodically to and fro on contrabasses, celli or bassoons.

Then came the most gentle of lullabies which cradled him to sleep. Then followed the most tender of love-scenes in which the horns had some exquisite work, while distant tinkling seemed like sounds in a dream. The strings, part of them bowing and part pizzicato, gave further ecstatic touches.

The reawakening was hinted at in a return of the Pierrot theme and the fragmentary passages that accompany it. If we do not find much coherency in the first part of this, the slumber-song and the love-scene noble additions to the modern repertoire, much more promising than the recent work of Elgar. It is a matter of congratulation that Mr. Fiedler is educating us in the advances that are being made abroad. It is only about a year ago that this work had its first performance in England.

We may not admire all of the novelties as much as we do this overture, but at least we ought to have a chance to hear them and form our own opinions. If Bantock has gone much further into this delicate school of work he may be characterzed as an English Debussy—at least in delicacy of orchestration.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Word has been received from Dresden that Rachmaninoff, who was to have been the soloist of the Symphony on Friday afternoon, Oct. 29 and Saturday evening, Oct. 30, is ill and will be unable to sail on the date he intended, so that his appearance here with the Symphony Orchestra has been postponed to later in the season. His failure to arrive on time will bring into this programme a new work by Gustav Strube, a concerto for violoncello and orchestra, which is still in manuscript, and has never had a public performance.

"THE TEMPEST."

The second and last performance by the Ben Greet Company, assisted by an orchestra of Symphony players under Gustave Strube, will be given in Symphony hall next Tuesday evening at 8.15. The play will be Shakespeare's "The Tempest," and so far the public has exhibited uncommon interest in it. The performance will be preceded by Tschaikowsky's fantasia, "The Tempest," and during the performance the incidental music written by Sir Arthur Sullivan will be played.

TRANSCRIPT, OCTOBER 23, 1909

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

The Season Actively Begun—Mr. Strube's New Concerto for Violoncello at the Symphony Concerts—Mr. Kreisler's and Mme Schumann-Heink's Recitals—Tilly Koenen for a New and Noted Singer—Dr. Wuellner Again

Despatches from Dresden bearing the information that Rachmaninoff has been prevented by illness from sailing to begin his American tour, will bring to performance sooner than was expected Gustave Strube's new concerto for the violoncello. It will be played by Mr. Heinrich Warnke on Friday afternoon, Oct. 29, and Saturday evening, Oct. 30. The work, which was written last spring, has never had a public performance and will be played from manuscript. The initial key is E minor, and though following the conventional form, the concerto is played without pauses between the movements. Concertos for the violoncello are many, but the playable and the unfading concertos are few. In adding to the literature of concert pieces for this instrument Mr. Strube has sought to contribute music which should be suited to its best capacities, the lower strings in cantilena, the middle upper registers for the brighter passages, with a discreet avoidance of the altitudes of the "humb p sitions." His first movement aims at conciseness—two contrasted themes for subject matter, with a rhapsodic development rather than a formal working out. This leads without pause into a slow movement in the mood of an intermezzo. The finale is so fashioned as to give unity to the work by building on the main theme of the first part, but with this subject so changed in rhythm as to bring it to a new mood.

The orchestration, as might be expected of the composer, is subtly disposed to important participation in the first and last movements, reduced to accompaniment in the second. The work will have all the advantage of Mr. Warnke's sympathetic warmth and his rich and varied intonation. Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," of the grotesque idiom, and Schumann's Symphony No. 2 in C major, complete the programme.

TRANSCRIPT. OCTOBER 23, 1909

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

WILLY HESS PLAYS JOACHIM'S CONCERTO

The Place the Violinist Has Won with the Public of the Concerts and Its Reward—The Mastery of His Playing Yesterday and the Glamor That He Gave It—The Drawbacks of Joachim's Music—Mr. Fiedler and Beethoven—An Example and, Perhaps, a Moral.

In spite of Bantock's new overture that began the programme yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall; in spite of Beethoven's symphony in F major that ended it; in spite, even, of Joachim's "Hungarian Concerto" that Mr. Hess had chosen for performance, the concert belonged primarily to the violinist. The audience listened eagerly to Bantock's overture, found seeming pleasure in it and rewarded it with the light applause that the vein of the music asks. It listened attentively to Mr. Fiedler's somewhat labored and mannered Beethoven—the conductor is less fortunate with him than with any other classic composer, because he will not let the music go its own way—and gave the eighth symphony the coolly grateful applause that usually on Friday afternoons deferentially acknowledges such pieces. For most of the audience the chief interest of the concert lay plainly in the annual appearance of Mr. Hess, in a solo piece.

Little by little the violinist has made for himself a distinctive place with the public of the Symphony Concerts. In spite of his habit, Mr. Hess has not needed to come to the concert-master's chair after the rest of the orchestra is seated, to persuade his audience that he is a man of clear individuality, finely and highly strung. Those audiences may not know his virtues as the leader of the string choir that successive conductors from Mr. Gericke through Mr. Fiedler, and many a watching and listening musician, have warmly praised. They may not know that many a fellow violinist counts Mr. Hess as the most distinguished and characteristic perpetuator of the German school of violin playing that began with Spohr and flowered for years in Joachim, and that these same violinists wonder that such a master as they hold Mr. Hess should divide his skill and energy between an orchestra and a string quartet, between teaching and incidental appearances, when he might go up and down the world as an eminent virtuoso. He has chosen his lot as he wished, and one of the rewards of it is a public that now knows him intimately as such relations go; that surmises, if it does not fully realize his worth as a concert-master; and that is ready each year to hear and to applaud him as one of the remarkable virtuosi of the violin in our time. It welcomed him heartily yesterday; it heard him intently for forty minutes—for Joachim is long-breathed—and at the end of the concerto it brought him back again and again to the stage now for acknowledging bows to his listeners and now for warm hand-shaking with Mr. Fiedler.

Moreover, it was as the virtuoso, pure but hardly simple, that Joachim's Concerto—the Concerto "in the Hungarian manner" that the violinist wrote in the fifties in the first flush of his fame—was bound to exhibit Mr. Hess. It is very long; even after fifty years it is a monument of technical exactions, difficulties and felicities; it has its succeeding moods—now gravely rhapsodic, now wistfully songful, and now alert with rhythmic and pulsing energy that curiously recall the emotional sequence of Paderewski's symphony; it is stoutly made music; but it is the music of creative meditation rather than of creative imagination; the Hungarian matter and manner of it seem pale and cold and rather Germanized to a generation that likes its "nationalism" hot and exotic to the ear; while its Hungarian voice, accent and emotion are steadily subordinated to the more imperative and emotional voice of the violin. Joachim, even when all the fictitious halos that now blur his true lineaments have dissolved, may prove a composer of a sort; but he was surely a master violinist. To play the violin was not only his profession, but the expression of his spirit. If he was priest of the classics, as the English shibboleth still runs, he was high priest of his instrument. To play the Hungarian concerto is, then, a feat not merely to test the technical resource, surety and felicity of a violinist, but to disclose, so to say, his intimate understanding of the secrets of his instrument, his emotional sympathy for it, and his spiritual devotion to it.

It was this aspect and quality of the Concerto that Mr. Hess steadily kept uppermost. There was reason again for the delight of the ear in the fineness of his tone, in its edgeless contours, its singular luminosity, its undulating flow, its delicate and penetrating warmth, its sensitiveness to every melodic curve, to every play of rhythm, to every little efflorescence of ornament. And the grave, the elegiac or the energetic mood in which Joachim wrote kept this tone clear of the sweetness with which it sometimes cloys. Not less was there cause for admiration in the design of Mr. Hess's playing. He comprehended the concerto as a whole; he assimilated each division of it to a clear musical and emotional plan; he wrought its details and its contrasts, like that of the meditative passage that interrupts the rhythmic whirl of the finale, with discriminating and sensitive felicity; he lead clearly each of the intertwining lines of the music; and his moments of climax, be they melancholy or energetic, were persuasive culminations of long maintained and modulated mood. The grace of phrase, when the music asks elegance, the weight of phrase when it asks gravity, the incisiveness of phrase when it bids accent, were all within Mr. Hess's familiar and established powers.

The distinction that clothed these separate powers and that clothed Mr. Hess's playing of the whole concerto was the summoning of the true and the irresistible voice of the violin. To hear was to take little thought of what Joachim would have it do or of the skill with which Mr. Hess made it answer unfailingly and almost spontaneously to his bidding. The thought that quickly became emotion, as musical thoughts should become, was of the perfect voice of an instrument that has a shimmering loveliness of tone, a sensuous quality that now penetrates and now intoxicates, that summonses and marshals its own vague images that clothes them with its own glamors, that pricks the fancy and sways the emotions as does no other voice. Joachim shut the violin fast and hard in his Concerto. Do this or do that, he said, at my will. Mr. Hess by the sheer emotion for his instrument that kindled him, by the sheer spiritual devotion to it that for the time absorbed him, set it free. It gave back not only its willing submission to his and to Joachim's will, but its unique and compelling voice. For once a Concerto written as Joachim wrote was the apotheosis of an instrument and not a player. The "Hungarian Manner" might go hang. The universal violin as it was played yesterday needs no such "national" fripperies.

It is nearly superfluous grumbling to quarrel at this late day with Mr. Fiedler's playing of Beethoven's symphonies. A harsh cynic once declared that the conductor was too eager to make them sound as though Richard Strauss had written them and that the reason by which he succeeded so well with the Choral Symphony was its likeness to ultra-modern music. Such judgment overshoots clear justice, but it gives, perhaps, the true clew to it. Mr. Fiedler spends tireless pains upon the preparation for performance of whatever music he undertakes. He brings to each piece his own eagerness and intensity of spirit. He would make almost every phrase of the music speak with its particular voice; he would miss never an accent, a contrast, a salient harmony, a subtly marshalled or a swiftly leaping climax. He would have effect and yet again effect. Now this method serves him to admiration in romantic and in highly dramatic music and in the pieces of the pictorial and restless moderns and ultra-moderns. The classics, especially the lighter and the more lyric classics—and of these the symphony in F-major of yesterday, is a shining example—are another and a different matter. Beethoven, Schubert, Mozart—whoever the composer may be—wrote them to flow of themselves, to weave their own tonal web, and to color it with their own changeful light and shadow. The music, and nothing but the music, is often its own best and truest emphasis.

Did Beethoven, in this eighth symphony set such store by "inner instrumental voices" duly and graphically disclosed as Mr. Fiedler did yesterday? Did he meditate the accentuation—and often the detached accentuation—of so many details? Did he care for such variously modified tempi and for a speed in the "tempo di minuetto" that surely blurred its graceful outline? It is easy to suspect that he did not. There is good reason to believe that he wrote the eighth symphony with unusual spontaneity that was almost creative elation. It surely can speak of and for itself, and to exhilarating pleasure. A conductor's hand should be as light and easy upon it as a rider's upon a thoroughbred in joyous mettle. Mr. Fiedler's was not. Yet Beethoven would surely have rejoiced in the glow of rich, warm and pulsing tone that the orchestra gave to his music. And this time he had a horn as well as clarinet to sing the little song of his Trio with its true voice.

H. T. P.

[22]

BOSTON JOURNAL-
OCTOBER 23, 1909

HESS AT BEST AT SYMPHONY MATINEE

Appears in Same Concerto in Which He Made Debut Five Years Ago.

WORK BRINGS FORTH REPEATED RECALLS

Novelty of the Program an Overture by English Composer, Granville Bantock.

A Bostonian pro tem. was the big figure at yesterday's Symphony matinee. Professor Willy Hess, the concertmaster of the orchestra, played Joachim's "Hungarian" violin concerto with all the power and brilliancy entitling him to be known as the foremost living exponent of Joachim's style and music.

Mr. Hess played this same concerto when he made his debut as a Symphony soloist just five years ago yesterday. It is apparently his favorite piece. Few violinists attempt it nowadays, and, in fact, Mr. Hess' performance of it is the only one with which the new generation of Bostonians is familiar. Mr. Hess studied with Joachim back in the middle '70's, some years after he had appeared here as a juvenile phenomenon; and unquestionably he has made a more memorable impression with this concerto than with other selections. It has difficulties that arouse all his well-known energy and that, surmounted as he surmounts them, afford a brilliancy hard to match. But, technique aside, the sentiment of the concerto is of the sober, deeper order which Professor Hess expresses with marked felicity.

Mr. Hess at His Best.

Yesterday, surely, Mr. Hess was at his very best. The fluency and the purity of his style have never seemed more agreeable. The brilliancy of the first and third movements was finely balanced by the charming romanza that characterizes the second movement, in the interpretation of which the soloist showed his mastery over crystal tones and tender moods. The audience was enraptured, no mistake, for when the concerto was over Professor Hess was recalled several times, though the promenade was then in order.

The novelty on the program was an overture by a young English composer, Granville Bantock; an overture called "The Pierrot of the Minute," written to introduce a dramatic phantasy by Ernest Dowson.

Fantastic Music.

The music pictures Pierrot in the park of the Petit Trianon asleep and dreaming of an adventure with the Moon Maiden. It is truly fantastic music, which pleases the ear and tickles the fancy, and at the same time proves the composer's cleverness. Mr. Bantock, by the way, came to Boston some years ago as musical director of an English show, "A Gaiety Girl," but now he is a professor in the University of Birmingham, the successor there of Sir Edward Elgar. The overture was well received. It did not call for any great enthusiasm. The rehearsal ended with a delightful performance of Beethoven's eighth symphony.

Rachmaninoff, the famous Russian composer and pianist, who was down for soloist next week, has cabled that he cannot come until later. His place will be taken by Heinrich Warnke, the solo 'cellist of the orchestra, and the substitute number will be a new work, a concerto for 'cello and orchestra by Gustav Strube, the well-known member of our great Boston band.

BOSTON GLOBE-
OCTOBER 27, 1909.

SHAKSPERE'S "TEMPEST."

Produced at Symphony Hall by Ben Greet's Players—Orchestra Plays Tschaikowsky's Fantasy.

At Symphony hall last evening, in conjunction with a performance of Shakspere's "Tempest," a band of 59 Symphony men, Mr Strube conducting, played as overture Tschaikowsky's fantasy, written upon this comedy, and the incidental music of Arthur Sullivan, both of which received at this time their first public pedformance in Boston.

Tschaikowsky's music is strangely uneven. Fortunately, Mr Strube cut one rendering of the tedious passage which the wind choir makes against an interminably reiterated accompanying figure in triplets in the divided strings. Much of the middle portion of the work is strong and clear in its related suggestiveness of the character and trend of the plot.

Of the two, the Sullivan music seemed more unfailingly apt and spontaneous. It grew out of the situation, or rather last evening it seemed to create the illusions and light fancy which the lines and, more often still the craft of the stage are intended to produce.

In the excessive short and isolated phrases which attend the movements of Ariel in the second scene of Act 1 the effect seemed incomplete and fleet-

The preludes to Acts 3 and 4 contain a freshness and charm of melody, a glow of color in their orchestration and a dramtic intensity in enriched harmonization which denote marked maturity for a youth of 20.

It is little wonder that the young Sullivan was held by this work to be a lineal descendant of Mendelssohn. The music accompanying the masque and the dances is of exquisite cast. Its dainty rhythms, sprightliness and melodic charm breathe the essence of light fancy with quite as perfect illusion as Mendelssohn's elfin-like scherzo, which was heard on Saturday afternoon.

In the consideration of Mr Greet and his colleagues, it must be borne in mind that of all Shaksperian comedies, this, his last, to make a convincing appeal to the eye, needs most the aid of an investiture and resourceful stage appliance, which Mr Greet's very dramatic creed forbids. Without this aid, all the greater exaction must fall upon the players.

Last night, with the exception of Miss Violet Vivian as Miranda, Miss Ruth Vivian as the sprite Ariel, and at times, Mr Proctor as Ferdinand, her lover, whose name and character the program omitted even to state, this demand for illusion received but scant response. The performance upon the stage was badly cast, indifferently rehearsed and shabbily put on. It is an affront to the melody of Shaksperian verse to retell it with such dilated, empty and pompous diction as offered by Frank McEntee as Prospero. His action was no more convincing.

Mr Greet himself, from his makeup, evidently makes Caliban half man, half lizard. His portrayal of the character oftenest aroused disgust. There is a certain elemental animalism about this creature which has an aspect of authority, even of dignity, until Prospero's greater power again subdues him. Mr Greet made scant recognition of it.

Mr Seymour as the Tester has an instinct for comedy, but he as the monster and the drunken butler indulged in coarse brawling unworthy of the play, their audience or the boards they trod.

BOSTON POST,
OCTOBER 23. 1909

"Pierrot of the Minute" at Symphony Rehearsal

BY OLIN DOWNES

Willy Hess, concertmeister, was soloist at the public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall; Granville Bantock's overture, "The Pierrot of the Minute," after Dowson's poem of the same name, was performed for the first time in America; Beethoven's Eighth Symphony brought the concert to an end.

Of late we have been hearing a great deal about Bantock—his originality, his Orientalism, his modern attitude toward the symphonic poem and literature as a basis for musical fantasy, etc. As an Orientalist — Bantock's most ambitious work, it appears, is his setting of "The Rubaiyat"—he may be all that is fantastical and atmospheric. In this overture we have Bantock, the Englishman, who, saving some passing measures of pleasing fancy and exoticism, seems to verge disappointingly near the conventional.

"The Pierrot of the Minute," a dramatic fantasy in one act, was published in 1897. The personages are Pierrot and a Moon Maiden. The scene is the famous Parc du Petit Trianon, where the air still vibrates with the music of forgotten loves. Pierrot appears, having obeyed a mysterious summons to enter this glade, if he would know the passion. He wonders why, of all people, he should be filled with this wistful longing, pours out a libation to Cupid and falls asleep. The Moon Maiden warns the saucy intruder to return before, in exchange for perilous happiness, he shall have lost his soul. But gayly, recklessly, the adventurer offers all for the priceless moments and is soon overcome with love for the unattainable fairy, whose lips are "more cold than I could dream." He begs a kiss and they talk of love. He tries to embrace the Moon Maiden, but she makes sport of him and eludes his grasp. Pierrot sulks. He is still entreating and she hesitating as morning breaks. He sinks into sleep and the Moon Maiden makes her farewell.

Dowson, like Pierrot, sought dreams. He passed the greater part of his life in the mud, was shyly and passionately devoted to a woman who ultimately married the waiter, and finally died from sorrow and poverty.

Bantock has not found sadness in the beautiful poem, nor, at least, attempted depiction of what is so touchingly apparent between Dowson's lines.

There is no illusion about that introduction, which is couched in the terms of one who might be well acquainted, for instance, with Dukas' crackling scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice." The whimsical sporting of the fairy and the mortal is well suggested, and one other passage appeared at a single hearing to have genuine fancy, if not imagination. The ending is painstakingly calculated, like the obvious sophistication, the labored coquettishness, of an elderly belle.

Mr. Hess played the Joachim concerto, which is a fine work, despite great length and over-elaboration, with fire and intrepid virtousity, which have always been his; with warmth and depth of sentiment, which have not always been so evident in his playing. He was enthusiastically recalled.

SUNDAY POST,
OCTOBER 24, 1909

It is possible to anticipate pleasure from Mr. Strube's violoncello concerto, which will be given for the first time next week at the Symphony concerts, because Mr. Strube states that he has attempted nothing "deep," "psychological," or otherwise. He has only tried to write good and agreeable music, playable on the 'cello. For eight years he has been studying the idiom of the instrument, and after numerous experiments, including another concerto wherein he failed to achieve the effects he desired, he believes that he has solved the problem of simplicity without sentimentality or passages that are as a vain thing for the performer. The first part of this concerto is in free rhapsodic form. The chief theme is at once stated by the solo instrument. There is a sub-theme for the wind instruments, then a second broaded theme for the 'cello. Mr. Strube has taken thought, after repeated hearings of many 'cello concertos, and the felicitous work in that form, by Saint-Saens, and has avoided the customary "Andante" or "Adagio." A fanciful intermezzo connects the first part with the final section, which is built upon the first theme of the first movement, now rhythmically transformed, and partaking of the character of an old gavotte, the harmonies continually interspersed with notes foreign to the chords. This movement is in regular sonata form.

The first theme of this concerto might have been conceived in the spirit of some old French folk-song. In his symphony given last season for the first time Mr. Strube, in certain respects of style and color, could be said to have equalled the modern Frenchmen in their own genre. Yet he does not consider himself a disciple of the French school. He is a warm admirer of the clearness and transparency which usually distinguishes the writings of these men, but he considers Richard Strauss the present musical leader, while deploring what, in his estimation, betrays a certain lack of taste in that composer.

TRAVELER,
OCTOBER 30, 1909.

Pension Fund Concert.

The first concert for the benefit of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, Nov. 21. There will be two soloists, and the programme will consist chiefly of selections by these artists. Mme. Olga Samaroff has kindly volunteered to play a concerto and a group of solo pieces for piano, and Prof. Willy Hess, the concert master of the orchestra, has also offered his services in like manner. The entire force of the orchestra will be employed, and Max Fiedler will conduct.

Symphony Concerts.

The last programme which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play before it leaves on its first monthly southern trip will bring as soloist Miss Geraldine Farrar, who has already appeared in Symphony Hall at her own concert with so much success. This programme will be played on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Miss Farrar will sing two selections which will be new to Boston audiences. One is an air from Gretry's one-act opera "Sylvain," "Je ne sais pas si ma soeur aime," and the others is a recitative and air from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue."

Won Wide Popular Approval.

It was doubtless owing to the fact that Sullivan wrote his "Tempest" music in much the same melodious, cheerful vein which had endeared Mendelssohn to Englishmen that it gained the instant popular approval which it did. From this time Sullivan was looked to by his friends as a sort of second Mendelssohn in embryo.

Unquestionably he did possess both the workmanship and esthetic sense to have created serious musical works which would have compelled larger recognition than the comic operas which he later gave to the world. Joseph Bennett, the veteran critic, who at one time knew Sullivan intimately, ascribes in his "Forty Years of Music" this decline in Sir Arthur's later achievement to his activities in a social life which usurped his time and diverted his interests.

This music to "The Tempest," however, created a vast stir. Sir Alexander Mackenzie found a spontaneity, a virility and a refinement in the work which he contended was comparable even to that of Mendelssohn's overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," which was played yesterday afternoon at the performance by the Ben Greet company. This, too, was the mature work of a youth. Mendelssohn was but 18 at its writing, yet Sir A. Mackenzie considered Sullivan's work to be equally mature in its invention and technique.

In his "Shakspere in Music" Mr Louis C. Elson states that "The Tempest" has been set as an opera 14 times. Purcell and Dr Arne composed one setting, part of the text of which was from Dryden.

Ariel's song, "Where the Bee Sucks," as set by Dr Arne, was considered by one London reviewer of Sullivan's music still to be quite as preferable, if not more so, after hearing the young composer's newer version. Later in his career Arthur Sullivan wrote incidental music to the "Merchant of Venice," "Henry VIII" and "Macbeth."

TRANSCRIPT,
OCTOBER 30, 1909

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

D'Indy and Miss Farrar Mated at the Symphony Concerts—The Apollo Club's Public Concert with Mme. Gadski—The Pianists and Their Programmes—Minor Recitals

For the last programme of the Symphony Orchestra before it leaves on the first of its winter tours Miss Geraldine Farrar, heard recently in Symphony Hall in a concert of her own, will be the soloist. Her two numbers will be an air from Grétry's one-act opera, "Sylvain," "Je ne sais pas si ma soeur aime," and the other a recitative and air from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue." The symphony will be d'Indy's, in B flat major, which has not been heard here since it was conducted by the composer three years ago. For a novelty comes Tschaikovsky's "Reve d'enfant," a movement of his second suite, and the programme will conclude with Smetana's overture, "The Bartered Bride."

GLOBE-
OCTOBER 24, 1909.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Incidental Music to "The Tempest."

Won for Arthur Sullivan His First Recognition as a Composer.

Interesting Recitals of the Current Week.

The performance of "The Tempest" at Symphony hall next Tuesday evening by the Ben Greet players, assisted by a band of Symphony men conducted by Gustav Strube, will, by all creditable accounts, be the first presentation in Boston of this comedy with Arthur Sullivan's incidental music. There have often been performances of Shakspere's "Tempest" at our theatres, but apparently the play has never before had in its Boston presentations the accompaniment of Sullivan's score.

This music marks a significant point in Arthur Sullivan's career. Indeed, the great success which attended its production at the Crystal palace concerts launched the young composer at once into the favor of both laymen and critics in London.

A letter writeen in 1860 to his father from the young Sullivan while a Mendelssohn scholarship student at Leipsic, adds by way of postscript: "I am writing music to 'The Tempest.' A year later in a letter dated Feb 10, he again writes his father: "Very much occupied with my 'Tempest.' I have completed two entr'actes, two dances and a song, besides parts of the melodrama and the overture. I have come to grief, I cannot get it into form to please me. At first it may sound rather harsh, but you will soon grow accustomed to it."

Sir Alexander Mackenzie, who lectured on Sullivan at the Royal institution, was of the opinion that the "harshness" alluded to would occasion but slight discomfort to modern ears, although seemingly violent to a public attuned only to Mendelssohnian harmonies. Under date of April 11, 1861, Sullivan writes: "My 'Tempest' was performed with great success in Leipsic last Saturday."

London Production in 1862.

On his return from Leipsic to London Sullivan added several numbers to the work, which was then produced in its completed form under the direction of Dr Manns at the Crystal palace concert April 5, 1862.

Instantly the young man of 20 was confirmed in the thought of the English people as the nation's coming composer from whom larger things were to be expected.

The critics as well as his audience were highly enthusiastic. Sir George Grove, also a director of the Crystal palace concerts, and Dr Manns, who conducted, decided to repeat the performance on the following Saturday. "All musical London was present" and the music was played to a reading of Shakspere's text as before. This second rendition brought a greater demonstration of approval than its predecessor.

Charles Dickens attended and after the performance waited with H. F. Chorley, the eccentric critic of the Athenaeum, for a word with Sullivan. When the young composer appeared the great novelist grasped his hand and said: "I don't profess to be a musical critic, but I do know that I have listended to a very remarkable work." This was the beginning of a warm friendship between them, which was severed only by death.

Nothing had previously come from Sullivan's pen to foretell this sudden leap into acknowledged success. It was an opportune moment for him. He dated his career as a composer to April, 1862. After this public confirmation of his ability he felt sure grasp of himself, as he afterward expressed to a friend: "I was ready to undertake everything that came in my way."

One might say there appeared then to be an "opening" in England for a young composer. Balfe and Wallace were writing their last operas. At the moment, John Hatton and George Macfaren were the only popular composers. Schumann was gaining headway slowly in England. Mendelssohn's vogue was well-nigh supreme.

[23]

TRANSCRIPT,
OCTOBER 25, 1909

PLAYS AND PLAYERS

"A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM" AGAIN

A Performance in Which Only Mendelssohn's Music Wrought Illusion — The Shortcomings on the Stage—Mr. Collier the International—Mr. Archer Surveys the Recent Progress of the American Stage—"Antony and Cleopatra" at the New Theatre—"The Great Divide" Succumbs in London—Miss Genee's Epilogue

Some time, somewhere, in some ideal state of the theatre and its allied arts, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" may come to performance with the acting, the music, and the decorations, so imaginatively mated to Shakspeare's comedy and so exquisitely fused in each other that they will bring, as nearly as human ingenuity can, the suggestion and the illusion of its fantastic romance, its fantastic humor and the fairy glamor that plays behind and about them both. Mendelssohn's music has become an integral part of the performance of the play. Where human heaviness and material things must stop short or clumsily fail, it can weave the atmosphere of the imagined scene, echo the accents of the verse, make its images as light and vaporous as they are in the answering fancy of the spectator when the finest of acting —because perforce it is a thing of flesh and blood—leaves it but luke-warm. There are phrases and figures, and blended or single instrumental voices in that wonderful music that are as the lamps of will-o'-the wisps to light the fairy scenes; and phrases, too, and the voices of the bassoons in particular, that strike the true note—and it is not of rude and crude clowning—for the humor of Bottom and his crew. They are diverting or they should be diverting to modern audiences not because they are deliberately and boorishly extravagant, but because they are so ignorantly earnest and well-intentioned. When they played to Theseus and his court, they may have been painfully and ludicrously conscious of themselves, but they were not, as their modern impersonators are, painfully and obviously aware of their audience. Mendelssohn's music can beguile the ear and the fancy so that the fairy folk of the play seem gossamer beings, airy-footed, and not the humans of flesh and blood and dancing steps that the eyes must perforce see. It, too, can bring on due occasion, the romantic air and the romantic pomp that glamor the quarreling lovers of the Athenian woods whom the young Shakspeare chose to see only as the masquerading hoydens of the Stratford fields and thickets. And the decorations should be decorations, and no more. Scenery stifles "A Midsummer Night's Dream." A background and a frame that only suggest may illuminate and rarefy it.

In one respect only did the performance of the comedy on Saturday afternoon in Symphony Hall attain these happy conditions. Fifty men from the Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Strube played Mendelssohn's music and gave to it, especially in the wind choir—horns, oboes, flutes and clarinets—its soft and haunting loveliness of tone as of the light voices of old forests, heard across fairy greens and suffusing the still night air. It was a performance throughout that caught at once the exquisite lightness, imagination, aptitude and economy of the music. The voice was the voice of Mendelssohn; but the spirit was the spirit of Shakspeare's fantasy, its romance and its poetry, its rhythm of fairies and its rhythm of clowns. Illusion, oftenest, sprang from the orchestra pit and not from the stage, and an instrument oftener than a player laid the spark to kindling fancy. On the stage, the acting version of the play cried out against Mr. Greet's whilom devotion to the Shakspearean text and the Shakspearean succession of characters and incident. It kept even old tags in the scene of the mock tragedy from sorry and silly old prompt books. Often the diction of the players was barely intelligible; very seldom did it attain any rhythmic or poetic felicity of speech. The mere histrionic mechanics of some of them were as deficient as their declaration, and the few that were experienced manifestly suffered from inadequate rehearsal. Illusion of the romantic figures of the play there was none, and illusion of the fairy personages sprang chiefly from the pleasant youth and innocence of some of the more childish performers. The "rude mechanicals" clowned valorously, though not quite so cheaply and superfluously as they did last year, and Mr. Greet as Bottom was their leader—and seemingly their satisfied leader—in the deed.

H. T. P.

MONITOR,
OCTOBER 25, 1909.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

THE third Symphony concert was one of Mr. Fiedler's lucky examples of program building. Bantock's "Pierrot" overture, played for the first time in America, Joachim's violin concerto, with Prof. Willy Hess as the soloist, and Beethoven's eighth symphony had novelty, virtuoso brilliancy and placid classicism all in their right proportions.

Chronologically it was an upside down arrangement, but chronology seems to be a less important consideration with the builder of programs orchestral than with the builder of programs pianistic or vocal. Suffice it that the three works of Saturday evening, played in the order given above, had a unity of esthetic effect; yes, whether a historian could be persuaded of it or not, there seemed to be a growth in artistic purpose from the first piece to the last. For if Beethoven had known all that Bantock's generation knows of orchestral color, if he had known all the varieties of tone expression that composers of Joachim's day knew, he would not have needed to make the eighth symphony different in a single note.

Bantock's work is called a comedy overture and rightly so, because it has a clear course of dramatic action which runs along pleasantly through various incidents and situations until it comes to a satisfactory artistic conclusion. No music ever justified its program better.

While it does not attempt to tell literally the story of Pierrot's love for the Moon Maiden it does relate the hero's twilight adventures so that the listener knows when and where everything happens. The music abounds in originality of detail though in its main traits it resembles the work of other composers whom there is no difficulty in naming. Its whimsical and fantastic descriptions are all after the manner of the "Nut Cracker" dances of Tschaikowsky; its love scene is plainly in the style of Richard Strauss. Bantock owes nothing to Tschaikowsky but his technique of description; his rhythm is all his own. The overture is remarkable for its adaptation of orchestral color to specific program uses; the piece has structure, firmly joined structure; but detail of color is its main resource of expression.

The Joachim concerto was played by Mr. Hess in a manner that displayed the intellectuality of the music without coldness and that disclosed all it contains of the romantic and passionate without exaggeration. The music is very formal, the balance of orchestral accompaniment to the solo part rigorously correct, yet the music has geniality and earnestness, and when interpreted by the faultless tone and the restrained execution of Mr. Hess, its appeal was not to be resisted.

Mr. Fiedler's conducting of the eighth symphony must have banished from everybody's mind the idea that the present conductor of the symphony concerts is not interested in Beethoven. Neither in the old days of the orchestra nor in its latter days has that composer been interpreted to better emotional purpose than on Saturday evening. And it was not merely a performance of the alegretto with the other movements dutifully played through, because they happen to be the setting of that pretty bit of inspiration; the whole work was taken up in Mr. Fiedler's best manner and given a unified, vigorous reading.

BEN GREET PLAYERS.

On Saturday afternoon in Symphony hall, the Ben Greet players presented their version of Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream." Added to the unique value of Mr. Greet's method of production was the performance of Mendelssohn's music for the comedy by Mr. Strube and 50 Symphony players. The nocturne and the well-loved "Spring Song" were interpolated for full measure.

All that need be said about the quality of this music has been said generations ago. Suffice it that here Mendelssohn is reflected as in a mirror. His refined and gentle art, with its purity of atmosphere and flawless workmanship, was peculiarly fitted for this sweet comedy of fairyland. All was played under Mr. Strube's unobstrusive hand with exact balance and beautiful tone.

Discussion as to whether this interesting revival of old time theatrical methods is the best way to produce Shakespeare is properly within the province of our colleague of the dramatic column, as is also any technical criticism of the acting. But the illusion achieved without scenery or lighting effects as now understood is at once a marvel and a delight.

The Athenian costume must have been as trying as the modern dress suit. One must have found it hard to distinguish the respectable citizen from the tramp—did they have the latter in those days? Yet one could not deny the effect produced by the manly presence and beautiful voice of Eric Blind as Lysander. Imposing, too, was the Demetrius of David Proctor. And it is a pleasant thought that the true descendants of these Greeks are with us today in prosaic America — albeit sometimes of humble station, but kings in appearance, and rejoicing in the noble names of their native folk lore.

Ruth Vivian as Titania was a charming, if somewhat too substantial, queen of the fairies; and in an excellent ensemble praise is due to the Puck of Millicent Evison, Violet Vivian as Helena, Keith Wakeman as Hermia, and George Vivian as Oberon, not forgetting the most excellent comedy of Mr. Greet as Bottom, an impersonation which evoked both laughter and applause.

JOURNAL—
OCTOBER 27, 1909.

Sir Arthur Sullivan's music for Shakespeare's "Tempest" had its first public hearing in this city last night at the performance of the old romantic drama given in Symphony Hall by the Ben Greet players. The music was played by an orchestra made up of Symphony men and conducted by Gustav Strube. Cuts were made to suit the measure of the play as prepared for special presentation by Mr. Greet. Cuts were also made in the Tschaikowsky overture, named "The Tempest," which introduced the performance, and which proved exceedingly dull. In fact, there was not the faintest applause when the prolonged monotonous strife was over.

The "Tempest" music was the first that attracted general attention to Sir Arthur Sullivan's gifts. It was performed in 1862 at the Crystal Palace in London. A dainty theme recurs from time to time—a haunting melody, more distinguished in character than any other feature of the music. Ariel's first song, "Come unto these yellow sands," familiarly known as the watchdog song, was prettily set. It was also poorly sung by Ruth Vivian. Miss Vivian shines in action rather than in speech or song. The same might fairly be said of most of the Greet players. Mr. Greet himself took the part of Caliban. With his weird accent he made the poor creature seem doubly disagreeable. There was some pretty dance music, but the dancing itself was so ludicrously unpoetical that the effect was utterly spoiled.

The program announced that "The Tempest" is Shakespeare's last play, thus deciding a point that critics have raved over for long, weary years. It also declared the play to have been "written as a tribute on the discovery of the new world." So was squashed for the time being the man who discovered that it was written around the Isle of Lampedusa.

The performance was witnessed by a large audience.

BOSTON HERALD,
OCTOBER 27, 1909.

SCENES FROM 'THE TEMPEST'

Performance Given in Symphony Hall by the Ben Greet Company.

BY PHILIP HALE.

Scenes from "The Tempest," beginning at scene 2, were performed last night in Symphony Hall by the Ben Greet company. An orchestra of members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, led by Gustav Strube, played Tschaikowsky's fantasia, "The Tempest," for an overture, and incidental music for the play by Sullivan.

There was a large audience, which applauded often, laughed at the pranks of Caliban, Trinculo and Stephano, and giggled in one of the most beautiful scenes of the play, the one in which Ferdinand wooes and wins Miranda. Miss Violet Vivian as Miranda charmed by the quality of her voice and by her simple innocence. The name of the actor who played Ferdinand was omitted on the bill, but he played in manly fashion and discreetly.

Miss Ruth Vivian was a graceful Ariel. Little could truthfully be said in praise of the others in the company. Mr. McEntee as Prospero was an ordinary necromancer who juggled with his voice and turned the poet's noble lines into singsong. Mr. Barney's conception of honest Gonzalo was grotesquely wrong, and he spoke in piping treble. Mr. Greet's Caliban lacked the elemental qualities, among them the superb vulgarity of nature. The others that took part were extremely amateurish.

Tschaikowsky's fantasia was played here for the first time. It would be unfair to judge of it from the performance of last night. It should be played in a symphony concert by a full orchestra and as the composer wrote it. No doubt it would then be found out that it would not add to Tschaikowsky's fame. He himself was disappointed in the work and expressed his disappointment with characteristic frankness and modesty.

The music of Sullivan has a Mendelssohnian flavor, as is natural, for Sullivan wrote it when he was a student at Leipsic, where Mendelssohn's name was as a fetish and his influence, surviving him, was great and pernicious. In spite of this flavor, the music is pretty and fanciful, and there are hints of the greater Sullivan, the writer of the operettas.

MONITOR,
OCTOBER 27, 1909.

"THE TEMPEST."

IN Symphony hall Tuesday evening the Ben Greet players gave the chief scenes of Shakespeare's "Tempest," with Ben Greet as Caliban, Frank McEntee as Prospero, Violet Vivian as Miranda, Ruth Vivian as Ariel, Philip Golden as the King and Charles R. Hopkins as Sebastian.

The performance was given in the same manner as that of "A Midsummer Night's Dream," with an open stage having as background a curtain painted decoratively to represent a woodland scene. The actors were given musical assistance by Gustav Strube and his orchestra of 50 Symphony men, who played by way of prelude the "Tempest" fantasia of Tschaikowsky and followed the course of the action with the interludes, song accompaniments and other orchestral comment of Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Tempest" music.

The fantasia filled a real need in the economy of the drama because it supplied a realistic picture of the storm which brought the King of Naples and his retinue to shipwreck on Prospero's island. It also gave indication of the haunting, inescapable spell of enchantment under which the island and all who visited it were held. M. Strube conducted the fantasia with a vigor not always characteristic of him; he obtained a pure, massive tone from his string players such as is not often heard even at the regular Symphony concerts, and he worked up the crescendo of the storm in a way that gave an effect of grandeur without noise.

The music of Sullivan did not consort altogether well with that of Tschaikowsky, because it is written in wholly different style. Sullivan's music is appropriate enough, but it is not, like Tschaikowsky's, symphonic and illustrative. Tschaikowsky's was meant to tell the story of the play; Sullivan's seems meant to create a diversion from it. The greatest opportunities for illustration are allowed by Sullivan to pass, and during a great part of the play he is silent altogether. He wrote for a theatrical band and he intended that the music should be subordinate to the drama; Tschaikowsky wrote for the concert stage and intended that his music should tell everything that could be translated out of the language of drama into tone.

The ruling of the action was almost entirely in the hands of Frank McEntee and Ruth Vivian, who as Prospero and Ariel were almost constantly on the stage. They had to produce the illusion of the enchanted island and keep it. They had to make the drama progress without letting its progress seem too logical, too much like the actual. And they needed Ben Greet to help. He as Caliban, with his heavy, lumpish wriggling and grovelling, offset the light stepping of Ruth Vivian and made her by contrast sem a veritable sprite where she might have seemed just an ordinary, prettily arrayed dancer. With music, intelligent acting, careful reading of lines, with costumes and background of richly blending colors which were now heightened and now subdued by play of light, the Ben Greet performance of the "Tempest" succeeded in making its main point with the large audience that attended it; it created and sustained the illusion of an enchanted island.

MADAME SCHUMANN-HEINK.
Next Saturday afternoon she will give song recital in Symphony hall; later she will appear with Symphony Orchestra.

[24]

RECORD,
OCTOBER 30, 1909

A GERMAN SYMPHONY CONCERT

From Mr. Elson's review in the Advertiser.

A German programme almost from first to last, although the older and the more modern Teutonic schools were in strongest contrast.

The programme would have gained, however, by not preceding the symphony with a Cherubini overture. "Les Abencerrages" overture is not so great a work as the overture to "The Watercarrier" or even that to "Anacreon," yet it has a strong kind of simplicity, very different from the naivete of a Haydn, and the work made its due effect.

Between these two (the Schumann symphony and "Till Eulenspiegel") was wedged Mr. Warnke with Mr. Strube's concerto for violoncello. There are so few useful cello concertos that a new one of even medium merit would be welcome, and Mr. Strube's is a good work. Mr. Strube conducted his own composition and those who know his steadiness upon the directorial stand need not be told that the orchestral points were well brought out. It was strongly scored. No modern can get along without the pepper of the piccolo, the tinklings of Glockenspiel and the explosions of bass-drum and cymbals. That is no fault, for the large halls of modern times demand more than in Beethoven's day.

Mr. Warnke's tone is light and is not at its best in a solo in Symphony hall. The first part of the work leaned more towards the expression than the technique of the instrument, but there was some broad work on the C string, which must receive credit.

FIRST PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The first concert for the benefit of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony hall on the evening of Nov. 21. There will be two soloists and the programme will consist chiefly of selections by these artists. Mme. Olga Samaroff has kindly volunteered to play a concerto and a group of solo pieces for piano, and Prof. Willy Hess, the concert-master of the orchestra, has also offered his services in like manner.

'MONITOR,
OCTOBER 30, 1909.

The last program which the Bostor Symphony Oorchestra will play before it leaves on its first monthly southern trip will bring as soloist Miss Geraldine Farrar, who has already appeared in Symphony hall at her own concert with much success. This program will be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

It will be a source of gratification to the many admirers of French music that Mr. Fiedler has chosen for this program d'Indy's symphony in B-flat major No. 2, which was played here by Mr. Gericke three years ago. The novelty on the program will be Tschaikowsky's "Reve d'enfants," taken from his Second Suite. The last orchestral number will be Smetana's overture "The Bartered Bride."

Miss Farrar will sing two selections which will be new to Boston audiences. One is an air from Gretry's one-act opera "Sylvain," "Je ne sais pas si ma soeur aime," and the other is a recitative and air from DeBussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue." "L'Enfant Prodigue" is the work by which Debussy won the Prix de Rome.

* * *

The first concert for the benefit of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony hall Sunday evening, Nov. 21. There will be two soloists. Madame Olga Samaroff has volunteered to play a concerto and a group of solo pieces for piano, and Prof. Willy Hess, the concert-master of the orchestra, has also offered his services. The entire force of the orchestra will be employed and Max Fiedler will conduct. Details of the concert will be made public in a few days.

* * *

TRANSCRIPT
OCTOBER 30, 1909

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A New Concerto for Violoncello by Mr Strube, with Mr. Warnke to Play It—The Romantic Schumann and the Sardonic Strauss Help to Make a Diversified Afternoon

At the fourth Symphony concert yest rday afternoon Mr. Gustave Strube's concer o for violoncello came to its first performance for novel fare in a programme which began with Cherubini's overture to "The Abencerrages," included Schumann's second Symphony, in C major, and ended with Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's," from which Mr. Fiedler drew a rich store of whimsical and poetic fancy and added a shrewd stab of pathos at the close.

Granted Mr. Strube's conception of what the concerto should be—not a piece for the uttermost display of the instrument, but one which shall employ its finer powers of expression without inviting extreme technical feats—the composer has, in his concerto for the violoncello, in much the same vein as his violin concerto, achieved the virtues of the former. He has written a charmingly pretty piece. It ran so smoothly, so evenly under the fairly jointless bowing of Mr. Waruke, yesterday afterno n, and withal so quietly that the assemblage might have forgotten that it was listening to what is traditionally regarded as a "show" piece, and supposed the composition to be something in the mood of Volkmann's serenade. The orchestration, where it falls to accompaniment, is subdued in color, and attuned to the mellow autumnal hues of the solo part; for the interludes it is often brilliant and close packed with ingenious effects. It is, like the strain of the solo instrument, never other than melodious, if it drone wood winds to a wande ing recitative, hammer its bells to a high, prolonged trill, or catch and freak the rhythm with something rich and strange as in the finale. In the solo part Mr. Strube most seeks the open resonance and the clear, high tones of the upper registers of the 'cello, where the instrument is most songful. He wanders for a few excursions into the altitudes where the thumb plies its cunning; he employs more often the sonority of the lower strings, not with the top-to-bottom leaps of the old style of concerto, but rather he seeks the deeper notes for the broadening of an idea which has appeared above, as one might in discourse choose a grave illustration for a point of less seriousness. When the solo winds into rhapsodic passages the instrument still continues to sing; it is nowhere made to caper. There are, to be sure, the rocking arpeggios so grateful to its resonance, flurries of octaves, and the dearly beloved passages of fluid rise and descent over the four strings against an orchestra quietly hymning the themes, but its rhapsodies are always without the hint of display. Unity has been given the composition in an extraordinary degree, both by playing its three movements without a pause, and by reaffirming the thematic material of the first movement in the last, with a change of it into an irresistibly lively and tripping rhythm which comes close to making the feet tap. If Mr. Strube learned from Goltermann the effectiveness of clustering a melody about an insistent note, leaving it to resume it again and again for the close or his phrase, he has then excelled his master, besides avoiding that master's frequent lapses into the pitfall of monotony. The work, while it displayed the warmth and pliable texture of Mr. Warnke's tone, enjoyed all the advantages of his melodious and reposeful playing. He met its few technical intricacies with a mastery which made them what they were intended to be—the expression of a mood and not a season of ground and lofty tumbling. It is a concerto in the lyric mood; something soft-tinted and fragile, something in cream white and a special shade of blue, a concerto in Delft.

At its close the soloist and the composer, who had occupied the conductor's desk, shared the honors of several recalls.

Schumann's Symphony, under Mr. Fiedler' directing, put forth, with singular strength, its dominating mood of an almost churchly solemnity, as of a relig on without rites—if such a thing can be conceived. It is mood which springs from the pagan in the composer's mind, and one which is evoked when the leader brings to the performance of the work less of passion and more of intellect in the combination brought to its performance yesterday. Through the whole texture of the piece, gathering its designs into a unified pattern, runs the imperious trumpet call, like a thread of gold. It was summoned again and again to dominate the structure of the symphony, as spires and turrets the piled masses of a pagan temple. Nowhere was this feeling for form and design so manifest in Mr Fiedler's conducting as in the measures of the Sherzo, winding and turning to cross its own path, passing through transient moods, always to return to its master mood—the mental unrest, the disquiet of the queerly downward flurry of the main theme in the first violins, which is laughter with half a shudder in it, laughter of the nerves. The dominating intellectual quality of the interpretation was expressed in another quarter where the symphony has been called into account—the contrapuntal passage challenged for its presence in a romantic movement. It was transformed by the baton of Mr. Fiedler into something of almost pictorial outline. He clothed it with expressive nuance as leafage clothes the stark outlines of moors. He divined the character of the scene to be not bold featured but quiet and homely, and bent himself to express tints and gradations rather than rugged outlines. The chirp and twitterings, the clamors and grotesqueries of "Till Eutenspiegel" were still to come; Mr. Fiedler was to marshall them in vivid narrative with all his command of the piquant idiom which Strauss so peculiarly invites—one had almost said incites. Meanwhile, it was Schumann of the red horn calls and the intense cry of strings; and the music of intense subjectivity had grandeur and dignity.

SUNDAY GLOBE—
OCTOBER 31, 1909.

Pension Fund Concert.

The first concert for the benefit of the pension fund of the Boston symphony orchestra will be given in Symphony hall Sunday evening, Nov 21. There will be two soloists and the program will consist chiefly of selections by these artists.

Mme Olga Samaroff has kindly volunteered to play a concerto and a group of solo pieces for piano, and Prof Willy Hess, the concert-master of the orchestra, has also offered his services in like manner. The entire force of the orchestra will be employed and Max Fiedler will conduct.

Rachmaninoff Coming

Although Rachmaninoff has been delayed abroad for a few days, he will arrive in this country in ample season to make his announced appearance at Symphony hall on the afternoon of Nov 16. Few artists of the present generation enjoy the reputation which Rachmaninoff has gained in European cities as composer, conductor and pianist, and his appearance here as a solo pianist promises to make one of the leading events of the present season. He will be heard in a number of his own compositions which are unfamiliar to American audiences. The subscription sale continues until next Friday, when the box office sale begins.

Fifth Symphony Program.

The fifth and last program of the Boston Symphony orchestra before it leaves on its first monthly southern trip will bring as soloist Miss Geraldine Farrar, who has already appeared in Symphony hall at her own concert with so much success. It will be a source of gratification to the many admirers of French music that Mr Fiedler has chosen for the program d'Indy's symphony in B flat major, No. 2, which was last played here by Mr Gericke three years ago.

The novelty will be Tschaikowsky's "Reve d'Enfant," which is a movement of his second suite and which, although of his middle period, has never had a place on a Symphony program. The last orchestral number will be Smetana's overture, "The Sold Bride."

Miss Farrar will sing two selections which will be new to Boston audiences One is an air from Gretry's one-act opera, "Sylvain," and the other is a recitative and air from "L'Enfant Prodigue," the work by which Debussy won the Prix de Rome.

BOSTON JOURNAL—
OCTOBER 30, 1909.

SYMPHONY PLAYS CHOICE NOVELTY

New 'Cello Concerto by Gustav Strube Given With Fine Results.

HEINRICH WARNKE PLEASING SOLOIST

Strauss Rondo Is Notable Feature of Program Conducted by Mr. Fiedler.

When in doubt or difficulty, all that Conductor Fiedler of the Symphony Orchestra needs to do is to call forth the talent in his incomparable band.

There was a remarkable illustration of this at yesterday's Symphony matinee. The original program for this fourth rehearsal presented as soloists the distinguished Russian composer and pianist, Serge Rachmaninoff. But the Russian's departure from home has been delayed. This necessitated a change of program, only the Strauss number, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," remaining. In place of the Rachmaninoff piano concerto, Mr. Fiedler offered a new 'cello concerto by one of the brilliant members of the orchestra, Gustav Strube, and in place of the absent soloist came the 'cello leader, Heinrich Warnke. And the substitutes proved to be among the most delightful features of the entire performance.

The concerto, which is in the key of E minor, was played as one movement. It has three distinct sections, however, the first of which opens in the later polyphonic manner, but soon gives prominence to two themes introduced by the solo 'cello. The second theme is a cantilena or ballad of marked romantic character. The lovely song was finely performed by Mr. Warnke. Of skill there is always an admirable exhibition when Mr. Warnke plays, but on this occasion his playing was unusually sympathetic and stirring.

The second section of the concerto is a charming little intermezzo, with 'cello obbligato, and the third part is dance-like and leads in a brisk finale. This solo instrument is all the while engaged in presenting themes and then embroidering them elaborately. The work is one of the best, if not the very best, that Mr. Strube has written, and it was performed, by soloist and orchestra most delightfully. The composer himself conducted the performance, and when it was over he shared the long applause with Mr. Warnke. The concerto is by long odds the choicest novelty presented so far this season.

The other notable feature of the rehearsal was the performance of the Strauss rondo, which was the second that Mr. Fiedler has led since he came to Boston. The conductor is never happier, or the orchestra either, than when engaged with Strauss. The orchestra played brilliantly. But the playing was none the less impressive in the comparatively restful second symphony of Schubert's, which came on the program after the Cherubini overture, "The Abencerrages," the least interesting number of all. The concert was not a long one, yet the Cherubini piece would not have been missed.

Miss Geraldine Farrar will be the soloist next week and the symphony will be Vincent d'Indy's second, in B flat.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST.
OCTOBER 31, 1909

On Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play for the last time in this city before leaving on the first southern tour of this season. Mr. Fiedler's choice of D'Indy's Second Symphony in B flat will be of exceptional interest to many. Tschaikowsky's "Reve d'Enfant," a movement of his second suite, has never yet had a place on a symphony programme. Miss Geraldine Farrar, soloist of the occasion, will sing an air from Gretry's one-act opera "Sylvain"—"Je ne sais pas si ma soeur aime," and a recitative and aria from Debussy's early cantata "L'Enfant Prodigue." Smetana's overturn to "The Sold Bride" will bring the conclusion.

ADVERTISER.
OCTOBER 30, 1909

SYMPHONY CONCERT GERMAN THIS WEEK

SCHUMANN AND STRAUSS IN CONTRASTED NUMBERS

A Cherubini Overture as Introduction—A Strube 'Cello Concerto Played by Mr. Warnke.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Cherubini—"Abencerrages" Overture.
Schumann—Symphony No. 2, C major.
Gustav Strube—Violoncello Concerto.
Soloist, Mr. Heinrich Warnke.
Strauss—Till Eulenspiegel.

A German programme almost from first to last, although the older and the more modern Teutonic schools were in strongest contrast. Schumann never grows old. Schubert has become threadbare in spots; some of Mozart's symphonies tax the patience, but there is scarcely a movement in any Schumann symphony that we would willingly spare. And this is in striking contrast with the manner in which time has dealt with his opponent Mendelssohn. The lace-handkerchief, boarding-school grief of the slow movement of the Scotch symphony, for example, or the first movement of the Italian, no longer produce either enthusiasm or tears, while Schumann's earnest melodies still nestle in the heart as they have always done.

The English take exception to the statement that Mendelssohn was an enemy of Schumann, but it ought not to be forgotten that the most intimate friend of Mendelssohn in England was Chorley, who always sneezed whenever Mendelssohn took snuff; and the most brutal criticisms that ever were written against a modern composer were Chorley's reviews in the "Athenaeum."

But it must be confessed that Schumann's scoring begins to sound muddy to ears accustomed to the iridescence of the modern colorists. The first movements of the second symphony, and its introduction too, seem but crude when judged by the orchestration. But it is a totally different story when one examines the contents. Mr. Fiedler caused the trumpet signal, which is carried through other movements than the introduction (where it first appears) to ring out very clearly, and in almost every way gave a strong reading. Only in the Scherzo would we have desired a little less rapid pace, in order that the figures might come out more clearly. The Finale was very finely read and performed, even to its syncopated end on the kettle-drums. The Adagio is less effective than some of Schumann's other slow movements, and even good playing could not make this a very powerful movement. Altogether we do not quite rank the Schumann second symphony with its others. Even the "Cologne" symphony, almost the last ray of sunshine in the clouded end of the composer's life, is, on the whole, stronger than this. Yet Schumann's least strong moments are still powerful enough to keep his works welcome.

The programme would have gained, however, by not preceding the symphony with a Cherubini overture. "Les Abencerrages" overture is not so great a work as the overture to "The Watercarrier" or even that to "Anacreon," yet it has a strong kind of simplicity, very different from the naivete of a Haydn, and the work made its due effect.

It was a long stride from the earnest vein of Schumann, whose very Scherzo movements are serious (or at all events not playful), to the wild pranks of Richard Strauss in "Till Eulenspiegel." The story is mediaeval and Rabelaisian, and the music is quite as broad as the tale. Clear motives typify Till who can be traced from beginning to end. He "bobs up" (no other term can describe it) through every kind of repression and persecution; he is saucy and insouciant; he is comically repentant when at the last he is hanged, and his last faint squeak is very mock-pathetic.

This hanging is a deviant from the old story in which Till evades his doom and cheats the executioner. For some time the reviewers were in doubt as to whether Strauss had given warrant for the execution—which shows the weak point of "programme-music"—for no one ought to have had any doubts upon the subject after hearing the change of style from glibness to utter dejection at the end.

It is great fun to watch the hero (his chief figure can be best identified on the horn solo, near the beginning) squirming through the score, chased by the watchmen, pursued by anathemas, mocking the Philistines, parading as a priest, and upsetting respectability everywhere. The world will yet come to recognize this as a masterpiece of humor of its kind, and greater than some of the later orchestral works of its composer.

It is, however, German humor, and requires a German to appreciate it fully and a German to conduct it. We doubt if even so great a conductor as Colonne could lead "Till Eulenspiegel" to success, as Mr. Fiedler did on this occasion. The ponderous dignity of the Philistines, the mercurial trickiness of Till, were placed in excellent foil with each other.

The interpretation, in spite of a too early entrance at one point, was a brilliant one. Especially was the trial and condemnation of Till made dramatic. The thunders of accusation, the apologetic squeaks of Till, the final execution and the dying yelps of the old vagabond were excellently well done. It was one of the memorable performances of a very trying work.

Between these two (the Schumann symphony and "Till Eulenspiegel") was wedged Mr. Warnke with Mr. Strube's concerto for violoncello. There are so few useful cello concertos that a new one of even medium merit would be welcome, and Mr. Strube's is a good work. Mr. Strube conducted his own composition and those who know his steadiness upon the directorial stand need not be told that the orchestral points were well brought out. It was strongly scored. No modern can get along without the pepper of the piccolo, the tinklings of Glockenspiel, and the explosions of bass-drum and cymbals. That is no fault, for the large halls of modern times demand more than in Beethoven's day.

The concerto was not prolix, an exceptional virtue in these days. It was continuous, although the spirit and outline of three movements was present and homogeneity was attained by thematic transferences from the first to the last part. It might as well be called an "Oriental Reverie" for it leans decidedly towards eastern progressions and scales. The first two-thirds of the work give a heavy amount of pensiveness, so that at first we thought some Faun was taking another afternoon off. But the Finale was beautiful and the figure treatment always interesting.

Mr. Warnke's tone is light and is not at its best in a solo in Symphony hall. The first part of the work leaned more towards the expression than the technique of the instrument, but there was some broad work on the C string, which must receive credit.

In the matter of intonation also we can pay hearty tribute to the soloist, but yet more abandon might help so free a work. The applause at the end was deserved, and conductor, composer, and soloist, came forth twice and bowed a duet, in which, however, they did not keep as good time together as in the concerto.

The concerto deserves to be heard again. We believe that it will grow upon acquaintance, especially if the free recitatives of the first part are shortened.

BOSTON GLOBE
OCTOBER 30, 1909.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Strube 'Cello Concerto for the First Time.

Brilliant Performance of Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel."

The program of the fourth Symphony rehearsal included the trite overture of Cherubini to his long defunct opera, "The Abencerrages," Schumann's serenely beautiful symphony No. 2, Mr Strube's concerto in E minor for violoncello and orchestra played from the manuscript in its first public hearing, and finally the merry and superbly impudent pranks on one "Till Eulenspiegel," who, "after the manner of ancient rogues," was most amiable when least penitent—as told in tone by Richard Strauss in his whimsical, gloriously capricious work of the name.

Mr Strube has written his 'cello concerto for a singer upon his instrument rather than a mere executant. He at once becomes mystical by flattening the seventh in the theme immediately given out by the wood-wind. Hints of the whole-tone scale are repeated later by the horns against the solo voice and enhance the elegiac quality of the work.

A broadly-flowing melody particularly fitting for the cello, because of a nobility in its pathos and its dignity, continues against a discreet but richly-scored accompaniment, which inforces a point in the principal voice from time to time, and upon its conclusion, carries the thought to more intensive hights in the tutti.

In the latter part Mr Strube has given the soloist a theme of more vivacious staccato notes, which must beg the concession of an element a little popular in nature, as compared with the cantabile portions of the work. Happily there are no long excursive and irrelevant cadenzas. One passage alone is given the soloist without orchestra, which allows him untrammeled scope for phrasing.

The quiet, intensive and at times plaintive cast of much of the solo voice gives a masterful artist in the "bel canto" of strings a large opportunity. In this regard Mr Warnke failed to recreate the beauty inherent in the work. His tone was thin and his phrasing often lacked breadth and fervor. Mr Strube conducted.

Schumann's symphony No. 2 is a perpetual fount of beautiful melody. The idealism and sweetness of the composer's spirit are everywhere apparent in it, particularly in the scherzo and the adagio. His voices converse amicably, spiritedly, charmingly. A happy comradeship pervades their speech, and, although it is untouched by morbid stress nor deep inwardness, its spell endures.

The adagio, as Mr Fiedler read it yesterday, was benediction. It is the pure essence of a romanticism, saved alike from sentimentality and musical neurosis. For a charming effect in the first trio of the scherzo, Schumann was indebted to his friend Mendelssohn.

Otto Dresel, a Boston musician, now dead, when, as a boy pupil of Mendelssohn, saw one day the score of this symphony in manuscript upon the master's table. The theme in triplets which begins this trio was given to the strings. Afterward in rehearsal at Gewandhaus he heard it as it still is, in the wood-wind, and attributed the change to the advice of his teacher.

Mr Fiedler and his men possessed the acme of alert and puissant virtuosity in the Strauss. Here was an incorrigible "Till Eulenspiegel" who committed wanton knaveries with shameless zeal, who impertinently upset the women's stalls in the market place, vowed vengeance on the world for his despised love, and at last wantonly outraged the sober court.

Mr Fiedler set this picturesque and imperturbable rogue of legend a merry pace and led the men from one escapade hot-footed into the next. This was the richly humorous but no less masterful Strauss.

At what time the Cherubini overture was not vapid and inane, it was stuffed with fustian.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST,
OCTOBER 31, 1909

Mr. Strube's 'cello concerto played for the first time at the Symphony concert of last week, is not one of that gifted composer's most successful works. It smacks of experimenting, which is always skilful and frequently beautiful and effective, as the second theme of the first part, the intermezzo, and the clever use of the continuous bass in the last part, a new version of the theme, which opens the work. All this is well, but still we do not believe that Mr. Strube has entirely solved the problem of the successful 'cello concerto. By reason of the nature of the instrument, it is difficult to invent themes which are at once playable and effective upon it, and yet have necessary contrast of character. The coquettish tune in the last section is rather common.

It is in his instrumentation that Mr. Strube triumphs, in the accompaniments of the solo instrument as well as the short but brilliant tuittis. As a whole, this work is far below the F sharp minor violin concerto. What one really listens for, more and more, as the piece goes on, is the glowing and transparent orchestra. Mr. Strube has what only a few composers in these days possess—themes, often truly distinctive themes, and his workmanship is beyond cavil. This 'cello concerto is always pleasing, and with the one exception above noted, in the best of taste; yet, at the first hearing its unity did not seem absolute, and some of the effects appeared rather calculated. The work was excellently played by Mr. Heinrich Warnke.

Mr. Fiedler gave a strong and characteristic reading of Schumann's greatest symphony—the second C major. The slow movement was far slower than it need have been. It is not necessary to subject its simple melodic phrases to the heavy, long-continued stress of 32 violins and the rest of an immense orchestra. This is only artless singing from the heart and should be accepted as such and permitted to speak for itself. Saving this, the performance was in many respects memorable. The scherzo, taken a trifle quicker than usual, had exactly the just rythm and accent. This symphony offers one of the clews to Tchaikowsky's admiration of Schumann, in its rather morbid introspectiveness, the impassioned reiteration of a short theme in the first movement, and in the scherzo, the middle section of which opens with a theme practically the same as the opening figures for the strings in the "Symphonie Pathetique." It is a pity that the last movement, with its noble triumphant march, like the winged victory, is not more brilliantly orchestrated, for, whatever his will, no conductor can make 10 instruments speak as 20, or 20 as 40.

Boston Public Is Free From Prejudice, Says Max Fiedler

Last season Mr. Fiedler visited Boston for the first time as Dr. Muck's successor at Symphony Hall. He was preceded by only a modest reputation, as present-day virtuoso conductors go. His audiences became acquainted with his fitness for the position through his performances, and they were an unknown quantity to him when he arrived. In this week's issue of the Boston Weekly Review he narrates his matured impressions of the city and his auditors.

"I have been asked to say something about Boston, not the Boston of the traveller with its diverse interests, but Boston as it seems to the conductor of its noble Symphony Orchestra. I was first asked how I liked Boston when I had only been here a few days, and of course I could not answer the question. But now I have been here longer. I have lived and thought and walked and known people in Boston; I have come back to Boston from other cities, and I have felt again and again the contact of a Boston audience, the impression that is almost like a wireless message from each auditor to the conductor of an orchestra, and that comes to him from any great gathering of listeners whether in one city or another.

"Boston, I think, is one of the best cities in the world for a musician to live in; and for a German musician it has an atmosphere in many ways strikingly like that of the German cities where the intellectual life of the people has been born and grown up in music, but more temperate, and I think more fair-minded. The Symphony audience must of necessity contain diverse opinions. There must be those whose souls and minds, listening together, respond to the wonderful expression of fine and almost impersonal emotion that often marks the classical composers. There must be those also who respond more heartily to the newer and the newest voices, finding their inspiration in the unrest of souls struggling with those human passions that are at once personal, wonderful, mysterious and terrifying. There is a pleasure in music that is almost wholly of the senses, the pleasure that is a mingling of both. In the German audience there is, shall I say, often the atmosphere of antagonism between schools, between opinions that in the Boston audience seems happily replaced by an intelligent and understanding forbearance. It is perhaps the Anglo-Saxon sense of justice added to thorough German comprehension of music. After an experience of many cities it seems to me a noble state of mind for an audience.

"But before I came to Boston I was told that the city was reserved, chilly! I was even jokingly warned to wear my overcoat at the conductor's desk. But I have found it quite different. There is not the boisterous kind of enthusiasm that one finds in some other American cities—but there is a warmth of understanding sympathy and appreciation that comes from audience to conductor only to be found in the most musically educated cities of Europe. It is a something, a sense of friendliness and the respect of many men and women to whom music is a living, beautiful thing, that warms my heart. It is no straw fire, this feeling for music, but rather a steady, well-founded, enduring enthusiasm."

And, apropos of the coming pension fund concert, it is of interest to consider Mr. Fiedler's final paragraph:

"I think that Boston fully understands and appreciates its great orchestra as a whole—but I sometimes wonder if it does not forget the individual musician. Among so many it is hard to realize that each is essential to the whole, and that each is a living man as well as a single instrument in a great harmony. I wish to see a time when the thought of advancing years shall have no terror for any man who gives his life and his soul to making that orchestra one of the very finest musical organizations in the world. I want to feel that no financial panic, no adverse conditions whatever can keep every seat in Symphony Hall from being filled on the night of a pension fund concert; and that, sooner or later, the beneficence that Boston so generously displays in other directions will provide for the old age of its splendid body of musicians."

THE SUNDAY HERALD,
OCTOBER 31, 1909—

First Pension Fund Concert.

The first concert for the benefit of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall, Sunday evening, Nov. 21. There will be two soloists and the program will consist chiefly of selections by these artists. Mme. Samaroff has volunteered to play a concerto and a group of solo pieces for piano and Mr. Willy Hess has also offered his services. The entire force of the orchestra will be employed and Mr. Fiedler will conduct. Full details of this concert will soon be made public.

The Symphony concert this week is one of unusual interest. The symphony will be Vincent d'Indy's in B flat major, one of the few symphonies that are truly great in form, in expression, in imaginative and lofty poetic contents. It has not been played here since the composer led it. A movement, "Reves d'Enfant," from Tschaikowski's second suite will be played for the first time at these concerts. The suite itself is little known, although it was successful when first played. The third suite overshadowed it. The other orchestral piece will be Smetana's delightful overture to "The Sold Bride."

Miss Geraldine Farrar will sing for the first time at these concerts. Her airs are Lucette's girlish, naive song in Gretry's opera "Silvain" and an air, sung by the Prodigal Son, a tenor, in Debussy's cantata which won him the prix de Rome in 1884, a cantata that is more in the manner of Massenet, Gounod et al. than in that of the composer of "Pelleas and Melisande."

---

[26]

POST, SATURDAY
OCTOBER 30

SYMPHONY CONCERT
BY OLIN DOWNES

After yesterday's public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall one fact stands out to the exclusion of most other things, namely, Mr. Fiedler's amazing conducting of Richard Strauss' tone-poem, "Till Eulenspiegel." It is not possible at this time to speak at any length of a very interesting concert, but to omit mention of that performance would be an injustice to Mr. Fiedler and the public.

"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," in Rondo form, is one of the most amazing creations that have dropped from the pen of any composer since Beethoven. It is the psychology of an over-man who sees life and eternity in a degree and to an extent which is denied the average two-legged animal. It is inconoclasm, and the end of iconoclasm, writ large over the universe. And these things are voiced through the medium of a musical invention of a Mozart-like fertility and freshness, with a power of characterization which did not exist before Strauss.

There have been two interpretations of this orchestral piece in Boston, the first by Strauss himself, as the conductor of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, in Symphony Hall, March 7, 1904, the second by Mr. Fiedler on the occasion mentioned. "Till Eulenspiegel" has often been upon the Symphony programmes, but it has not been interpreted. There was the sure grip of the master hand, the inexorable truth of every note, every phrase, every page. The entire psychology of that indescribably tender, ironical, fateful commentary on everything that is, with its intense cerebral energy and its boundless humanity, was exposed to the fragment of a thought; and if the entire work had been less than absolutely a part of the conductor's consciousness this mieroscopic depiction would have resulted in a series of etchings without unity. As it was, the whole thing was inevitable. In spite of Strauss' peculiar and exceedingly individual style, one thought measures ahead with certainty of what was to follow, and this cannot often be said even with those who have already a partial acquaintance with a work that will in years to come be as transparent as a Mozart sonata to the average auditor. Today there exist the majority who find it hard to get out of old musical formalities, and to these Strauss offers vexing problems, when he thinks out loud.

Mr. Gustav Strube's violoncello concerto was played for the first time. This, the overture of Cherubini, and the Schumann C Major Symphony, will be reviewed tomorrow.

he First Established and most Complete ewspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Boston Symphony Novelties

Max Fielder, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who sails from Liverpool for this country on Sept. 25th, is bringing with him a great deal of new music which is to be played by the orchestra during the coming season. In a letter to Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, Mr. Rielder said that he thought that he had a number of novelties which would more than compare favorably with those that have been brought out in recent years. Noticeable on this list are four works by Frederick Delius; his "Paris," "Appalachia," "In a Summer Garden," "Brig Fair." The Finnish composer Sibelius is also represented by four works new to Boston at least and probably new to most of the country. They are the "Swahnevit" Suite, Opus 54, "En Saga," symphonic poem, "Night and Sunrise," symphonic poem, opus 55, and "The Swan of Tuonela." One of the interesting features of the season will be the performance for the first time here in Boston and probably for the first time in the East of Richard Strauss's first tone poem "Macbeth." It was played by Theodore Thomas in Chicago some years ago but has never been on a program in the East. Mr. Fielder also purposes performing "Don Quixote" which Mr. Gericke brought out some eight years ago. He also announces the "Sinfonia Domestica" which Dr. Muck did two years ago and the Suite for wood-wind instruments.

In general Mr. Fielder has marked out a very interesting season for the Boston series. He will do the first, second, fourth, sixth and ninth symphonies of Beethoven, the fourth of Brahms, the seventh of Bruckner, Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," Haydn's Symphony in E flat major, Mozart's symphonies in E flat major, G minor, C major, Schumann's B flat major symphony and Tschaikowsky's "Manfred." It is planned for Boston to have fourteen soloists in the twenty-four programs, this to include the quartette needed for the performance of the Ninth Symphony.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

TRIBUNE

ess PROVIDENCE, R. I.

OCT 17 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Charles A. Ellis, the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces that at the third concert of the orchestra in Providence to be given on Tuesday evening, Feb. 15, the programme will contain a most unusually interesting feature. This will be Mozart's celebrated double concerto for two pianofortes which will be played by two of the most eminent American pianists, Harold Randolph and Ernest Hutcheson.

The concerto has not been played more than two or three times in this country, and it is very many years since the last performance, so that it will be absolutely new to not only the symphony audiences in Providence, but those of Boston where Messrs. Randolph and Hutcheson are to play it on the following Friday and Saturday. Altogether this is one of the most interesting features that the orchestra has ess PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

SEP 18 1909

MUSICAL NOTES.

Boston Symphony to Give Four Concerts in Providence This Winter

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is making more than usually extensive plans for the coming season, which is its 29th. Mr. Ellis, its manager, has so far arranged a total of 111 concerts and it is expected that at least two more will be added to this number. These concerts will be given between Oct. 8, when the first public rehearsal of the Boston series takes place, and April 30, when the last concert of the Boston series is played.

The orchestra will give its usual 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts in Boston, its 10 in New York, eight in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, four in Providence, three in Worcester, Hartford and New Bedford, while other cities in New England to be visited are Brockton, Springfield, Waterbury and Bridgeport.

The usual Western trip will be made in the week of Jan. 30, when concerts will be given on successive evenings in Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Erie, Rochester and Syracuse. Mr. Max Fiedler will again be the conductor.

Established and most Complete
wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Max Fiedler, conductor of the new Boston Symphony Orchestra, who sails from Liverpool for this country on Sept. 25, is bringing with him a great deal of new music to be played by the orchestra during the coming season. In a letter to Mr. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, Mr. Fiedler said he thought he had a number of novelties which would more than compare favorably with those brought out in recent years.

One of the interesting features of the season will be the performance for the first time in Boston and probably for the first time in the East of Richard Strauss's first tone poem "Macbeth." It was played by Theodore Thomas in Chicago some years ago, but has never been on a programme in the East. Mr. Fiedler also purposes performing "Don Quixote," which Mr. Gericke brought out some eight years ago. He also announces the "Sinfonia-Domestica," which Dr. Muck did two years ago and the suite for wood-wind instruments.

In general Mr. Fiedler has marked out a very interesting season for the Boston series. He will do the first, second, fourth, sixth and ninth symphonies of Beethoven, the fourth of Brahms, the seventh of Bruckner, Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," Haydn's Symphony in E-flat major, Mozart's Symphonies in E-flat major, G-minor, C-major; Schumann's B-flat major Symphony, and Tschaikowsky's, "Manfred." It is planned for Boston to have 14 soloists in the 24 programmes, this to include the quartette needed for the performance of the Ninth Symphony.

NEWS, PROVIDENCE, R. I.,
OCTOBER 9. 1909.

Farrar-Samaroff Concert

Charles A. Ellis of Boston announces that on Friday evening, Oct. 29, a concert will be given in Infantry hall by Geraldine Farrar of the Metropolitan opera company, New York, and Madame Olga Samaroff, pianist. This is one of seven similar concerts that they are giving this fall under Mr. Ellis' management, the other cities so favored being Chicago, Milwaukee, Detroit, Buffalo, Boston and Worcester. Geraldine Farrar has never appeared in Providence, and unquestionably there will be an enormous audience to hear this extraordinary young American who, long before she is 30, has sprung into the front ranks of the prima donnas of the day.

Madame Olga Samaroff is known here, for she has appeared in Providence several times. She is back in America this year after a year of wonderful success in Europe, and those that have heard her play say that her art has grown tremendously.

Altogether this concert promises to be one of the most interesting events of the musical season. Full details will be made known in due time.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

At the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Providence this winter the musical public will hear the two leading American sopranos now before the public. At the first concert Madame Corinne Rider-Kelsey will be the soloist, and the soloist at the fourth concert will be Madame Hissem de Moss. These two artists stand quite in a class by themselves, and much pleasure will be had from their singing. Madame Corinne Rider-Kelsey had a remarkable success in Covent Garden last year when she made her debut in opera. Again the attention the musical public is called to the ct that there will be four concerts in- ad of three, the dates being Tuesday enings, Nov. 23, Jan. 4, Feb. 15 and pril 5.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
OCTOBER 12, 1909.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Tonight brings the only concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will be given in the Court Square theater in Springfield, at 8.15 o'clock sharp. Max Fiedler will, of course, be the conductor and the soloist will be Madame Olga Samaroff, the most brilliant of American pianists. The program is as follows:—

Beethoven—
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont"

Brahms—
Symphony No. 2 in D Major

Rubinstein—
Concerto in D Minor, No 4, for piano and Orchestra

Wagner—
Overture to the Opera, "The Flying Dutchman" ss PROVIDENCE, R. I.

OCT 16 1909

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Charles A. Ellis, the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces that at the third concert of the orchestra in Providence, to be given on Tuesday evening, Feb. 15, the program will contain a most unusually interesting feature. This will be Mozart's celebrated double concerto for two pianofortes, which will be played by two of the most eminent American pianists—Harold Randolph and Ernest Hutcheson. The concerto has not been played more than two or three times in this country, and it is very many years since the last performance, so that it will be absolutely new to not only the symphony audiences in Providence, but those of Boston, where Messrs. Randolph and Hutcheson are to play it on the following Friday and Saturday. Altogether this is one of the most interesting features that the orchestra has announced here in Providence for many years.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om
dress PROVIDENCE, R. I.
e

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mozart's Double Concerto to be a Leading Feature.

Charles A. Ellis, the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces that at the third concert of the orchestra in Providence to be given on Tuesday evening, Feb. 15, the programme will contain a most unusually interesting feature. This will be Mozart's celebrated double concerto for two pianofortes which will be played by two American pianists—Harold Randolph and Ernest Hutcheson. The concerto has not been played more than two or three times in this country and will be new to not only the symphony audiences in Providence, bua those of Boston, where Messrs. Randolph and Hutcheson are to play it on the following Friday and Saturday. This is considered one of the most interesting features that the orchestra has announced in Providence for many years.

ess

MUSICAL NOTES.

C. A. Ellis, the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, makes the following announcement regarding last year's subscribers to Boston Symphony concerts: Four concerts will be given this year instead of the three of last year, the dates being Tuesday evenings, Nov. 23, Jan. 4, Feb. 15 and April 5. Season ticket holders of last year will be allowed to retain the same seats, payment to be made on or before Saturday, Nov. 13. The general sale of season tickets will open on Monday morning, Nov. 15. The soloists for the four concerts will be Mesdames Corinne Rider-Kelsey and Mary Hissem de Moss, sopranos; Mischa Elman, violinist, and Ernest Hutcheson, pianist.

* * *

HOLYOKE DAILY TRANSCRIPT.
SEPTEMBER 8. 1909

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give but one concert in Springfield during the coming season and that will take place on Tuesday evening, October 12th. Despite the fact the fact that the three concerts last year were so successful from every point of view, the working out of the schedule for the coming season has permitted the Orchestra to come to Springfield but once and for that time it must make a special trip.

Max Fiedler will be again the conductor and the soloist will be Madame Olga Samaroff, who will be heard for the first time with the Orchestra after her tremendous success last year in Europe.

SPRINGFIELD DAILY REPUBLICAN:
SEPTEMBER 8, 1909.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

But One Concert in Springfield This Season.

Music lovers will learn with regret that the Boston symphony orchestra will give but one concert in this city during the coming season. The management says: "Despite the fact that the three concerts last year were so successful from every point of view, the working out of the schedule for the coming season has permitted the orchestra to come to this city but once and for that time it must make a special trip. Max Fiedler will be again the conductor and the soloist will be Mme Olga Samaroff, who will be heard here for the first time with the orchestra after her tremendous success last year in Europe."

The concert will be given at Court Square theater Tuesday evening, October 12. It is a little early in the season, in the sense that everybody will be sorry to have the concert over with and no other to look forward to for another year. But that very fact should create a very large demand for places. Mme Olga Samaroff is a favorite pianist, and the announcement that she is to play will be a great attraction. Also, the appearance of Mr Fiedler as conductor will insure an enthusiastic reception for the orchestra—there is no conductor that the Springfield public likes better. The details of the concert will be announced soon, and it is one of the dates that everyone should keep open.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE.
SEPTEMBER 11, 1909

THEATRICAL

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give but one concert in Springfield during the coming season and that will take place on Tuesday evening, October 12th. Despite the fact that the three concerts last year were so successful from every point of view, the working out of the schedule for the coming season has permitted the orchestra to come to Springfield but once and for that time it must make a special trip.

Max Fiedler will be again the conductor, and the soloist will be Madame Olga Samaroff, who will be heard there for the first time with the orchestra after her tremendous success last year in Europe.

Full details concerning the concert will be made public in due time.

SPRINGFIELD SUNDAY REPUBLICAN:
SEPTEMBER 12, 1909.

The approaching concert in this city by the Boston symphony orchestra gives interest to the recent announcement of the season's plans for the famous New England organization. As already announced, Mr Fiedler is to be the conductor for a second year; it was suspected last season, indeed, that he would return, though definite announcement of it was long withheld. He is now ready with a partial list of the works to be brought forward during the coming year, in which a number of novelties figure. Max Reger is to be represented, at one of the October concerts in Boston, by his latest work, "Symphonic 'Prolog to a Tragedy." A composer whose music will for the first time appear on these programs is the Englishman Frederick Delius. There will also be novelties by Granville Bantock, also English, Scriabine, and Rachmaninoff. This last-named Russian composer is to visit this country this season as a pianist, and will appear with the Boston orchestra as soloist and also as conductor of his symphonic poem, "Die Felsen." There have been fewer changes than usual this year in the personnel of this superb orchestra, which has not lost its exquisite perfection since Mr Gericke left, and has never interested the public more than under Dr Muck and Mr Fiedler.

HOLYOKE DAILY TRANSCRIPT.
THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1909.

STAGELAND.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is making more than usually extnesive plans for the coming season which is its twenty ninth. Mr. Ellis, its manager, has so far arranged a total of 111 concerts and it is expected that at least two more will be added to this number. These concerts will be given between October 8th when the first public rehearsal of the Boston series takes place and April 30th when the last concert of the Boston series is played, the orchestra to play in Springfield Oct. 12th.

The Orchestra will give its usual twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in Boston, its ten in New York, eight in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, four in Providence, three in Worcester, Hartford and New Bedford, while other cities in New England to be visited are Brockton, Springfield, Waterbury and Bridgeport. The usual western trip will be made in the week of January 30th when concerts will be given on successive evenings in Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Erie, Rochester and Syracuse. Max Fiedler will again be the conductor.

SPRINGFIELD REPUBLICAN:
SEPTEMBER 23, 1909

ORCHESTRAL PROGRESS.

[From the Boston Post.]

A symphony orchestra has been organized in Seattle, with a substantial guarantee. The St Louis symphony, established two years ago, has been strengthened, with a tour, in addition to its local concerts, in view. The Cincinnati orchestra has been reorganized, with subscriptions assuring its existence for five years. Boston, Chicago, Pittsburg, Philadelphia and New York will have their customary concerts by permanent orchestras, a majority of which give concerts in other cities.

We note encouraging diffusion of musical intelligence. The great pianist, the regal prima donna and the passionate violinist have long had the dollars and plaudits of Americans, but up to a few years ago orchestral music, which is to the uninitiate but bewildering sound, prospered only in a few large and comparatively old centers of population. For its growth in public esteem Maj Higginson of Boston deserves much credit. Thanks to his unswerving support, the Boston symphony has long ranked as the peer of any orchestra in the world. Directly and indirectly, it has been tremendously influential in American music.

[27]

HOLYOKE DAILY TRANSCRIPT.
MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 20, 1909.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opens its season at Boston September 27, plans to give 111 concerts during the fall and winter. The orchestra is practically unchanged from last year, for it will contain but one new member, George Wendler, who has succeeded Mr. Schmid as first horn, and will be the colleague of Max Hess, who of course, remains. Mr. Schurer, who shared the first desk of the viola section with Mr. Ferir, has retired from the orchestra, but his place will be taken by Mr. Rennert, who was one of the recruits brought over from Europe in the second year of Dr. Muck's engagement, and although he was a viola player of note in Germany, he has been in the second violin section waiting for an opportunity to get among the violas. Prof. Willy Hess will be concert master, and with him at the first desk will be Selvain Noack, who will be heard this year for the first time as a soloist. The leader of the 'cellos will again be Heinrich Warnke, with Mr. Ferir at the head of the violas, Mr. Barleben at the head of the second violin section and Mr. Keller at the head of the double basses. Messrs. Langy, Grisez, Andre Maquarre and Sadony are the leaders in the wood wind section. Of the out of town concerts, the usual eight will be given at Cambridge, the two series of five each in New York, and the series of five in each of the cities visited on the regular monthly trip—Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, Providence is to have four concerts instead of three; and three concerts are to be given in New Bedford, which city the orchestra has not visited for a number of years. Worcester will have its three concerts, likewise Hartford but Springfield this year will have but one. Other cities to be visited in New England are Brockton, Bridgeport and Waterbury. In the regular western trip beginning the last week of January, concerts will be given in Buffalo, Cleveland, Erie, Rochester, Detroit and Syracuse.

HOLYOKE DAILY TRANSCRIPT.
OCTOBER 4, 1909.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The only concert that the Boston Symphony orchestra is to give in Springfield this season comes at the Court Square theatre Tuesday evening, the 12th.

The public sale of seats will open at the ticket office Friday morning, October 8, but in the meantime mail orders will be accepted at the theatre and filled as they are received before the opening of the public sale.

The concert promises to be most attractive. The soloist will be Madame Olga Samaroff, the brilliant American pianist who has already made herself well liked in this vicinity.

Madame Samaroff has lately returned from her first European tour. Last winter she played in the largest cities on the continent and in England with one extraordinary success.

The concert in Springfield will be Madame Samaroff's first orchestral engagement for the coming year, but she is to play a number of times in Boston Symphony, and will appear also with the Philadelphia, Pittsburg and Chicago orchestras. It is announced that she will play the most brilliant of concertos for piano—that of Rubenstein in D minor No. 4.

Mr. Fielder is just back from Europe full of plans for the season, and has brought with him the Springfield program which is as follows: Beethoven's Egmont overture, Brahms' charming Symphony in D major No. 2, Wagner's overture to the "Flying Dutchman." This with the concerto makes a program that is quite ideal.

SPRINGFIELD REPUBLICAN:
OCTOBER 5, 1909.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The European Success of Mme Samaroff.

The coming of Olga Samaroff as soloist with the Boston symphony orchestra at its concert in Springfield on next Tuesday evening, October 12, excites more than the usual amount of interest among the musical public. Her brilliant appearances here are well remembered, and now that she comes back bringing with her the enthusiastic approval of European critics, musicians will be more than ever keen to hear her play. Last winter she spent in Europe, and while it is true that in the spring of 1905 she gave two recitals in London, they took place under such obscure conditions that it may fairly be said that her European debut was made in London in the spring of 1908, when she played several times with the London symphony society.

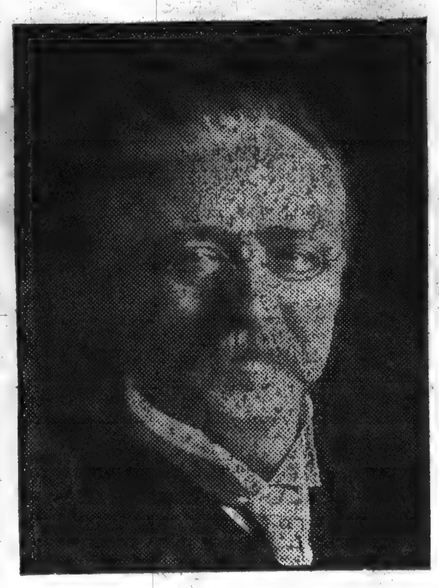
With Nikisch as conductor she was the soloist at the great Tschaikowsky concert given that spring, and her success with Tschaikowsky's second concerto at once established her as one of the principal features of the season. The following October she made her debut with the Colonne orchestra in Paris, and later, with equal success, she played with the Concertverein orchestra in Vienna and with the Tonkunstler orchestra in Munich, and, moreover, she gave a number of recitals. At her appearance here with the Boston symphony orchestra she will play Rubinstein's concerto No 4 in D minor. The sale of seats opens at the Court Square theater on Friday morning.

SPRINGFIELD SUNDAY REPUBLICAN:
OCTOBER 3, 1909.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Fine Program to Be Given by the Orchestra and Madame Samaroff, the Pianist.

The sale of seats for the only concert which the Boston symphony orchestra is to give in Springfield this year will open at the box office of the Court Square theater on Friday morning. Last year



MAX FIEDLER.
Conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra
[Photo by Garo.]

the orchestra gave three most successful concerts in this city, which not only were very well patronized but which left a most favorable impression on the musical public. It is, indeed, many years since a conductor has come to Springfield who has given such thorough satisfaction in every way as Mr Fiedler did. His spirit, his authority and his interpretative power were greatly appreciated, and more than this he was able to provide programs which would stand as models for all others to follow. This year he comes with the orchestra but once. The calls for concerts by the orchestra in New England are so many and so exacting that it has been found impossible this year to give Springfield more than one. But next year it is hoped that it can come back to the usual three.

For this concert the management will offer as soloist Mme Olga Samaroff, a pianist who already has won her spurs in Western Massachusetts, and whose return is eagerly awaited, because of her extraordinary success in Europe last year. Mme Samaroff is an American pianist, and a brave enough American pianist to begin her career in this country and wait for the verdict of her country people before attempting to play in Europe. Her appearances in London, Paris, Munich and Vienna were noteworthy events of the season, and the praise given to this artist was enough to turn the head of one less well-balanced. The best proof of her success in Europe is the fact that next spring she is to be soloist with a London Philharmonic society under Hans Richter, which is one of the greatest honors that can be given to an artist in England, and she is also to play a series of Nikisch concerts with the London symphony orchestra in London and in the British provinces. Moreover, for next winter she is to accept a number of important engagements on the continent, notably in Leipsic with the Gewandhaus orchestra and in Berlin with the Philharmonic orchestra in that city—all under Nikisch.

Mr Fiedler is just back from a summer abroad and has brought with him the program which he will play in Springfield, which this year is the first out-of-town concert of the orchestra. The first number will be Beethoven's Egmont overture, which will be followed by Brahms's Symphony No 2 in D major, one of the most delightful works in symphony overture. The other orchestra number will be the ever-welcome overture to Wagner's "The Flying Dutchman." Mme Samaroff will play Rubinstein's concerto for piano and orchestra in D minor No 4.

HOLYOKE DAILY TRANSCRIPT
OCTOBER 5, 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The career of Olga Samaroff, who is to be the soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra at its only concert at Court Square theatre next Tuesday evening, October 12, should be an inspiration to every American girl who looks to music as her life's work. Not yet 30, she has won a first place in the hearts of the American public, and last winter she had extraordinary successes in the principal musical centres of Europe. She is a native of San Antonio, Texas, of old American stock on her father's side and of German musical stock on her mother's. Her grandmother was her first teacher and later she had the distinction of being the only American girl ever admitted to the piano classes of the Paris Conservatoire. There she studied with Delaborde and later studied with Jedlieska in Berlin. Her first public performance was in Carnegie hall, New York, in January, 1905, and for three years she made successful tours of this country. Last winter she went abroad, and Europe fully confirmed the American verdict, and she returns this year with the pleasing knowledge that Europe has placed her side by side with such masters as Essipoff, Menter and Carreno. At the Boston Symphony concert she will play Rubinstein's Concerto No. 4 in D minor.

The seats go on sale at the theatre next Friday morning.

HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE.
OCTOBER 7, 1909.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The sale of tickets for the Boston Symphony concert in the Court Square theater next Tuesday evening, Oct. 12, will open at the box office in the theater tomorrow morning. An unusually large house is expected, because Manager Gilmore reports that the mail orders have been more numerous than ever before. This is due partly to the fact that the concert will be the only one this great orchestra gives in Springfield this year. An interesting function that the orchestra participated in took place in Sanders theater on last night (Wednesday) when it gave a complimentary concert as a part of the festivities attending the installation of President Lowell of Harvard university. Sanders theater contained all the notables gathered at Harvard for this great event. The audience was invited, no tickets being sold, and the program was made up of the three great "B's"—Bach, Beethoven and Brahms.

OCTOBER 9, 1909.

NEXT WEEK'S SYMPHONY

Only Concert By The Boston Organization This Year.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with Olga Samaroff as soloist, will give a concert Tuesday evening at Court Square theatre, Springfield. This is the only concert the orchestra will give in Springfield this season. Mr. Fiedler, who so greatly pleased his audience last season, will again conduct the orchestra. The program as announced will be:

MADAME OLGA SAMAROFF.

Beethoven, Overture to Goethe's "Egmont"
Brahms, Symphony No. 2 in D major
Rubinstein, Concerto in D minor No. 4
Wagner, Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"

MAX FIEDLER.

The Brahms symphony No. 2 which will be played here, was the principal work on the first Boston program.

The coming of Olga Samaroff, pianist, as soloist, with the orchestra, excites more than a little interest among the musical public.

Her brilliant appearances in this country are well remembered, and now that she comes back bringing with her the enthusiastic approval of European critics, musicians will be more than ever keen to hear her play.

At the concert Tuesday evening, she will play Rubinstein's concerto No. 4 in D minor. The sale of seats opened at Court Square theatre yesterday

HOLYOKE DAILY TRANSCRIPT.
THURSDAY, OCTOBER 7, 1909.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The sale of tickets for the Boston Symphony concert in the Court Square theater next Tuesday evening, October 12, will open at the box office of the theatre tomorrow morning. An unusually large house is expected because Manager Gilmore reports that the mail orders have been more numerous than ever before. This is due partly to the fact that the concert will be the only one this great orchestra gives in Springfield this year. For this concert the management will offer as soloist Mme. Olga Samaroff, a pianist whose return is eagerly awaited, because of her extraordinary success in Europe last year. Mme. Samaroff is an American pianist, and a brave enough American pianist to begin her career in this country and wait for the verdict of her country people before attempting to play in Europe. Her appearances in London, Paris, Munich and Vienna were noteworthy events of the season, and the praise given to this artist was enough to turn the head of one less well-balanced. The best proof of her success in Europe is the fact that next spring she is to be soloist with a London Philharmonic society under Hans Richter, which is one of the greatest honors that can be given to an artist in England, and she is also to play a series of Nikisch concerts with the London symphony orchestra in London and in the British provinces. Moreover, for next winter she is to accept a number of important engagements on the continent.

MADAM OLGA SAMAROFF, PIANIST.

An interesting function that the orchestra participated in took place in Sanders theatre on last night when it gave a complementary concert as a part of the festivities attending the installation of President Lowell of Harvard university. Sanders theatre contained all the notables gathered at Harvard for this great event. The audience was invited, no tickets being sold, and the program was made up of the three great "B's"—Bach, Beethoven and Brahms.

THE SPRINGFIELD REPUBLICAN:
OCTOBER 7, 1909.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Opening of the Box Office Sale of Tickets for the Concert at Court Square Theater.

The sale of seats for the Boston symphony concert in the Court Square theater Tuesday evening opens at the box office of the theater to-morrow morning. Manager Gilmore reports that the mail order sale has been very large, and the prospects are now that the entire house will be sold out. The fact that this is the only concert the orchestra is to give here this year has sharpened the interest of the musical public. The orchestra to-morrow is giving its first public rehearsal in Boston. Despite the new opera, which is exciting so much interest in Boston, the public of that city is paying more for its seats for the rehearsals and concerts than ever it has in the past. Mr Fiedler arrived from Europe last Thursday, and the orchestra has been rehearsing all this week. Brahms's symphony No 2, which will be played here, was the principal work on the first Boston program.

SPRINGFIELD REPUBLICAN:
OCTOBER 12,

Boston Symphony Concert To-night.

To-night brings the only concert of the Boston symphony orchestra, which will be given in the Court Square theater at 8.15 o'clock sharp. Max Fiedler will be the conductor and the soloist will be Mme Olga Samaroff. The program is as follows:—

Overture to "Goethe's "Egmont" ..... Beethoven
Symphony No 2 in D major ..... Brahms
Concerto in D minor, No 4, for piano and orchestra ..... Rubinstein Overture to the opera "The Flying Dutchman" ..... Wagner

[28]

m NEWS
ress Baltimore, Md.
SEP 8

NEW SOLOIST WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Rachmaninoff, Russian Composer, Coming With Noted Singers.

The announcement of the plans of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its coming Baltimore season is particularly interesting, in the fact, that, besides the assurances of a solid and delightful offering of orchestral pieces, the work of the organization will be augmented by a brilliant personnel of artists.

There will be five concerts, given as usual at the Lyric, on Wednesday evenings, November 10, December 9, January 1, Tuesday evening, February 22, and Wednesday evening, March 23. Of the four soloists who have already been announced, three are familiar and dearly beloved by all music lovers and concert-goers. These are Schumann-Heink, the wonderful contralto, who has recovered from her "Salome" experience sufficiently to be able to appear again; Mischa Elman, violinist, and Sembrich.

The fourth soloist is Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer and pianist, who is making his first American tour and who has never made his bow to a Baltimore audience. Both his orchestral and piano works are well known here, having generally been heard in orchestra and concerts and in recitals. He is regarded as one of the leading moderns in Russia, and his appearance is keenly anticipated. He is, perhaps, as generally well known for his "prelude in C sharp minor" for piano as for any other individual work.

SUN
ess Baltimore, Md.
SEP 12 190

FINE MUSIC AT BAR HARBOR

Mr. Edwin Litchfield Turnbull Writes Of Maine Resort.

Mr. Edwin Litchfield Turnbull, who is spending some time at Bar Harbor, writes to THE SUN as follows:

Messrs. Editors:

This beautiful American summer resort combines with the charm of an ideal climate magnificent sea coast and mountain scenery and the balmy atmosphere of pine forests, a cosmopolitan society and a gay and brilliant social season, yachting, sailing and driving, with a musical season of extraordinary attractions. Every morning at the Casino concerts are given from 11 to 1 o'clock by an orchestra of 20 players from the Boston Symphony, under the direction of Mr. Gustav Strube. This orchestra, made up of the finest artists in the world, gives the most delightful programs. The effect produced in the hall of the Casino, where the acoustics are excellent, is astonishingly full and rich, considering the small number of players—indeed, I would far rather hear this orchestra of 20 artists than many an orchestra of 50 or 60 players I have listened to. The combination of instruments used by Mr. Strube is very effective. There are four first violins, two second violins, two violas, cello, bass, flute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon, two horns, two trumpets, trombone, tympani.

The same orchestra plays also at the Casino hops, and furnishes the incidental music at the various entertainments and plays given during the season. There is a series of Kneisel Quartet concerts, and concerts by the Hess-Shroeder Quartet, both series being given in the Building of the Arts, a magnificent Grecian temple, in the hills near the golf links, where one may sit and hear divine music and get vistas of green hills and rugged mountains through the open doorways and breathe in delicious bracing mountain air meanwhile.

It was at one of the Kneisel Quartet concerts that I heard a melodious composition by Cortland Palmer, for piano and strings, superbly played by the composer and the Kneisel Quartet. It is a very beautiful work, and the gifted musician was enthusiastically recalled many times at its conclusion.

A wonderful audience, representing the best of American society from all parts of the country, assembles for these concerts, and afterwards tea is served on the greensward in front of the Temple and the music is socially discussed by superbly gowned women, and men in nobby flannels. Rather a modern setting for the Grecian atmosphere of the Temple, but intensely interesting all the same. Besides all this, there have been beautiful concerts every evening at the Louisvourg Hotel by four Boston Symphony men—violin, cello, piano and trumpet—and numerous recitals during the season by visiting artists, among them the Russian baritone, Oumiroff, who possesses a most beautiful voice and extraordinary temperament. And it is a perfect delight to hear him accompany himself in Russian folk songs.

EDWIN LITCHFIELD TURNBULL.

NEWS
Baltimore, Md.
SEP 18 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLANS BIG SEASON

Five Concerts Will Be Given In Baltimore, With Max Fiedler As Conductor.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is making more than usually extensive plans for the coming season, which is its twenty-ninth. Mr. Ellis, its manager, has so far arranged a total of 111 concerts, and it is expected that at least two more will be added to this number. These concerts will be given between October 8, when the first public rehearsal of the Boston series takes place, and April 30, when the last concert of the Boston series is played.

The Orchestra will give its usual 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts in Boston, its 10 in New York, 8 in Cambridge, 5 each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, 4 in Providence, 3 in Worcester, Hartford and New Bedford, while other cities in New England to be visited are Brockton, Springfield, Waterbury and Bridgeport. The usual Western trip will be made in the week of January 30. Max Fiedler will again be the conductor.

AMERICAN
ess Baltimore, Md.
SEP 19 190

Boston Symphony Novelties.

Max Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who sails from Liverpool for this country on September 25, is bringing with him a great deal of new music which is to be played by the orchestra during the coming season. In a letter to Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, Mr. Fiedler said that he thought that he had a number of novelties which would more than compare favorably with those that have been brought out in recent years.

From NEWS
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY SALE ON OCTOBER 18

Subscribers Have Until Thursday, October 14, To Re-Engage Last Year's Seats.

Subscribers to the series of Bostor Symphony concerts in the Lyric last year have until Thursday, October 14, i which to renew their subscriptions and retain the seats they had last year. The public sale of seats will be open on Monday, October 18.

The February concert will be given o Tuesday evening instead of on the usua Wednesday. The dates are as follows: Wednesday Evenings—November 10, December 8, January 12 and March 23. Tuesday Evening—February 22.

This slight change in the schedule ha been made necessary by local condition in Washington which could be met in n other way.

The soloists thus far engaged for th Baltimore series are Mme. Marcella Sembrich, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Serg Rachmaninoff, the eminent Russian com poser, conductor and pianist, who wi make his first appearance in Baltimor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mischa Elman.

From AMERICAN STAR
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 2

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Last year's subscribers to the series of Boston Symphony concerts in the Lyric have until Thursday, October 14, in which to renew their subscriptions and retain the seats they had last year. This may be done by mail or in person by application to W. A. Albaugh's ticket office, corner of Charles and Fayette streets. The public sale of seats will open on Monday, October 18.

Attention should be called to the fact that the February concert will be given on Tuesday evening instead of on the usual Wednesday. The dates are as follows: Wednesday evenings, November 10, December 8, January 12, March 23 and Tuesday evening, February 22.

The soloists so far engaged for the Baltimore series are Madame Marcella Sembrich, Madame Schumann-Heink, Serge Rachmaninoff, the eminent Russian composer, conductor and pianist, and Mischa Elman.

[29]

m NEWS
ress Baltimore, Md.
e OCT

FINE SOLOISTS FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

Two Of Most Noted Ones Are To Be Mesdames Schumann-Heink And Sembrich.

It has been some time since the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been able to offer Baltimore such a list of soloists as that which is announced for the coming season. Only four are now announced, for a fifth will be added later, but these four represent the highest quality of artists that will be in America this winter.

The two singers—Madame Marcella Sembrich and Madame Ernestine Schumann-Heink—are unsurpassed in their branch of art, and, with the appearance of Madame Sembrich here with the Orchestra there will be an added sentimental interest, for it will probably be the last time she will ever sing in Baltimore, for this is her last year in America, and she plans to make several of her farewells with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

For pianist there is Serge Rachmaninoff, who is not only one of the greatest pianists Russia has ever produced, but, since the death of Rimsky-Korsakoff, he is generally credited with being the greatest of living Russian composers. As a conductor also he has a high reputation in Europe.

From AMERICAN STAR
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date OCT 5

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It has been many years since the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been able to offer Baltimore such a remarkable list of soloists as that which is announced for the coming season. Only four are now announced, but a fifth will be added later. The two singers—Madame Marcella Sembrich and Madame Ernestine Schumann-Heink—are unequalled in their branch of art, and with the appearance of Madame Sembrich here with the orchestra there will be an added sentimental interest, for it will probably be the last time she will ever sing in Baltimore, for this is her last year in America, and she plans to make several of her farewells with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

For pianist there is Serge Rachmaninoff, who is not only one of the greatest pianists Russia has ever produced, but since the death of Rimsky-Korsakoff he is generally credited with being the greatest of living Russian composers. As a conductor also, he has a high reputation in Europe. Mischa Elman was heard with the orchestra last year, and his sensational success will long be remembered.

From AMERICAN
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It has been many years since the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been able to offer Baltimore such a remarkable list of soloists as that which is announced for the coming season. Only four are now announced, but a fifth will be added later. The two singers—Madame Marcella Sembrich and Madame Ernestine Schumann-Heink—are unequalled in their branch of art, and with the appearance of Madame Sembrich here with the orchestra there will be an added sentimental interest, for it will probably be the last time she will ever sing in Baltimore, for this is her last year in America, and she plans to make several of her farewells with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

For pianist there is Serge Rachmaninoff, who is not only one of the greatest pianists Russia has ever produced, but since the death of Rimsky-Korsakoff he is generally credited with being the greatest of living Russian composers. As a conductor also, he has a high reputation in Europe. Mischa Elman was heard with the orchestra last year, and his sensational success will long be remembered.

m NEWS
ress Baltimore, Md.
e
OCT 23 19

RUSSIAN PIANIST WILL APPEAR HERE

Rachmaninoff's Sailing Delayed, But He Will Be With Boston Symphony In This City.

Although Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer-pianist, who is to make his first appearance here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Wednesday evening, November 10, has been compelled to delay his sailing, so that his appearance in Boston has been postponed, he will arrive in this country in ample time to fulfill his engagement with the Boston Symphony in this city. Under these unexpected conditions, however, it is a question whether he will be able to conduct any of his own works, owing to lack of time for rehearsal, and he will probably simply appear as piano soloist.

SUN
ss Baltimore, Md.
OCT 10 1909

IN HARMONY'S REALM

Interest In Soloists Who Are To Come With Visiting Orchestras.

MME. HEINECK-LLOYD RETURNS

Miss Isadora Duncan To Visit Baltimore With The Damrosch Orchestra November 24.

Considerable interest has been manifested by local music lovers in the list of soloists who will appear at the coming Baltimore concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The list as thus far announced includes several of the best-known artists now before the public.

MR. MAX FIEDLER
Conductor Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The two singers, Madame Marcella Sembrich and Madame Ernestine Schumann-Heink, are unequaled in their branch of art. With the appearance of Madame Sembrich here with the orchestra there will be an added sentimental interest, for it is expected this will probably be the last time she will ever sing in Baltimore, since it is her last year in America.

For pianist there will be Serge Rachmaninoff, who is regarded by many as one of the greatest pianists Russia has ever produced. As a conductor also he has a high reputation in Europe, and it is not unlikely that he will appear here in the threefold capacity of pianist, composer and conductor. Mischa Elman was heard with the orchestra last year, and his success will be remembered.

AMERICAN
ss Baltimore, Md.
OCT 22 1909

To Assist Symphony Orchestra.

Members of the Baltimore Oratorio Society, of which Joseph Pache is conductor, are pleased over the receipt of a telegram from Max Fieldler, Jr., director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stating that the society has been chosen to assist the orchestra at its fourth concert in this city, on February 22. When seen relative to the matter, Mr. Pache said: "It is a great honor Mr. Fielder has paid us, and one for which I, as well as every member of the body, am deeply grateful. I feel, however, that the chorus is worthy of the great compliment, and am certain that it will once more prove its real strength. In order to have the best possible equipment, I am extending special invitations to the ablest soloists in the city to join the society, and I expect with their aid to surpass any of our past efforts."

The work in which the society will assist the orchestra will be Beethoven's great Ninth Symphony, the last movement of which was written for orchestra and horus.

wspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

BALTIMORE
OCT 23 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Although Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer-pianist, who is to make his first appearance here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Wednesday evening, Nov. 10, has been compelled to delay his sailing so that his appearance in Boston has been postponed, he will arrive in this country in ample time to fulfill his engagement with the Boston Symphony in this city. Under these unexpected conditions, however, it is a question whether he will be able to conduct any of his own works owing to lack of time for rehearsal, and he will probably simply appear as piano soloist.

AMERICAN STAR

Baltimore, Md.

OCT 16 1909

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The annual subscription sale of seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at Albaugh's Ticket Office, corner Charles and Fayette streets, tomorrow (Monday) morning, October 18. The usual quota of five concerts will be given during the winter in the Lyric. The dates are Wednesday evenings, November 10, December 8, January 12 and March 23, and Tuesday evening, February 22. Particular attention should be called to the fact that the February concert will come on Tuesday evening, instead of the traditional Wednesday. Local conditions in Washington have made it necessary to change the date and day of this concert.

It is many years since the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been able to offer Baltimore such a brilliant list of soloists as that which is announced for the coming season. At present it is possible to announce but four of the five, but those four are of extraordinary high quality. There will be two singers, Marcella Sembrich and Ernestine Schumann-Heink. As is generally known, this is Madame Sembrich's last year in America. Last spring she bade farewell to the operatic stage, and this year she is making a concert tour of the country, which will end her career so far as the United States is concerned. When Madame Sembrich first began to come to America, she was soloist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra a number of times, but in recent years, owing to her many engagements in opera, it has been impossible to make arrangements for her to appear with the orchestra. This year, however, as soon as it was known that she intended to devote herself to concert work, Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, straightway engaged her as soloist for concerts in Boston, New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore. Her appearances with the orchestra in Baltimore will probably mark the last time she sings in this city; so, aside from the musical interest, there will be a sentimental interest connected with this concert.

Madame Schumann-Heink is without doubt one of the most popular singers now before the public, and her appearances with the orchestra will be welcomed by her host of admirers in this city.

Particular attention attaches to the appearance here in November with the orchestra of Serge Rachmaninoff, who will then make his first appearance in Baltimore. Rachmaninoff, since the death of Rimsky-Korsakoff, is ranked as the greatest of living Russian composers. He has to his credit two operas, two symphonies, two symphonic poems and a number of small works for piano and chamber.

The other soloist now announced is Mischa Elman. His sensational success last year is vividly remembered by all who are interested in music. It was his purpose not to return to America for the season of 1909-1910, but Mr. Ellis, the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was able to offer him a large number of engagements which persuaded his manager to come back to America for a second consecutive season. Altogether he will play with the orchestra 15 times.

Max Fiedler, of course, will be the conductor during the coming year, and the personnel of the orchestra remains practically the same as last season. There is every reason to believe that Mr. Fiedler will fully uphold the splendid reputation made last year as an arranger of programs. He has announced a most interesting number of novelties, some of which will surely be heard in Baltimore.

From NEWS

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date OCT 22 1909

ORATORIO CHORUS TO ASSIST ORCHESTRA

Baltimore Society Will Sing At Boston Symphony Concert.

DUAL APPEARANCE WASHINGTON'S DAY

Directors Pache And Fiedler Arranged Matters While Abroad This Past Summer.

According to a telegram from Max Fiedler, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Baltimore Oratorio Society has been chosen to assist him at the fourth concert of the orchestra in this city on February 22.

Speculation has been rife as to what this occasion had in store, since, in his announcement, Mr. Fiedler withheld the additional attraction for the fourth performance. At the other four, Sembrich, Schumann-Heink, Rachmaninoff and Mischa Elman will be the assisting soloists.

Beethoven's colossal Ninth will be the symphony on the Washington's Birthday program, and it will be in the beautiful choral of the last movement that the Oratorio Society will be heard. Schiller's "Ode to Joy" was the inspiration and furnished the text of this stupendous movement.

From NEWS

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date OCT 22 1909

COMPLIMENT TO BALTIMORE'S ORATORIO SOCIETY

Announcement that the Baltimore Oratorio Society has been asked to assist at the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this winter will be received with pleasure by all the friends of the organization who know its worth. It is a decided compliment to be requested to aid the Boston Symphony, as the director of the Society says it is a sort of official recognition of the Society's merit. The addition of the local Society to the entertainment given by the Symphony Orchestra will undoubtedly increase the interest which Baltimore takes in the concerts given here.

From SUN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date OCT 17 1909

IN HARMONY'S REALM

Orchestra To Begin Sale.

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that the annual sale of seats for the series of Baltimore concerts will begin at Albaugh's ticket office tomorrow morning. There will be the usual five concerts this season. All of them with the exception of one will be given on Wednesday evenings. The exception will be the performance on February 22, which falls on Tuesday. The dates of the concert were Wednesday evenings, November 10, December 8, January 12 and March 23, and Tuesday evening, February 22.

It is many years since the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been able to offer Baltimore such an excellent list of soloists as those announced for this season. There will be two singers—Mme. Marcella Sembrich and Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink. This is Mme. Sembrich's last year in America. Last spring she bade farewell to the operatic stage, and this year she is making a concert tour of the country which will end her career so far as the United States is concerned.

Mme. Schumann-Heink is without doubt one of the most popular singers now before the public, and her appearance with the orchestra will be welcomed by her host of admirers in this city.

Serge Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist, will appear here with the orchestra in November. Rachmaninoff, since the death of Rimsky-Korsakoff, is ranked as the greatest of living Russian composers. He has to his credit two operas, two symphonies, two symphonic poems and a number of small works for piano and chamber. He is also regarded as one of the greatest pianists Russia has ever produced.

The other soloist announced is Mischa Elman, violinist. His success last year is remembered by all who are interested in music.

From AMERICAN STAR

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date OCT 22

Oratorio Society to Assist.

Members of the Baltimore Oratorio Society, of which Joseph Pache is conductor, are pleased over the receipt of a telegram from Max Fieldler, Jr., director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stating that the society has been chosen to assist the orchestra at its fourth concert in this city, on February 22. When seen relative to the matter, Mr. Pache said: "It is a great honor Mr. Fielder has paid us, and one for which I, as well as every member of the body, am deeply grateful. I feel, however, that the chorus is worthy of the great compliment, and am certain that it will once more prove its real strength. In order to have the best possible equipment, I am extending special invitations to the ablest soloists in the city to join the society, and I expect with their aid to surpass any of our past efforts."

The work in which the society will assist the orchestra will be Beethoven's great Ninth Symphony, the last movement of which was written for orchestra and chorus.

From AMERICAN STAR

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date OCT 23 1909

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Although Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer-pianist, who is to make his first appearance here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Wednesday evening, November 10, has been compelled to delay his sailing so that his appearance in Boston has been postponed, he will arrive in this country in ample time to fulfil his engagement with the Boston Symphony in this city. Under these unexpected conditions, however, it is a question whether he will be able to conduct any of his own works owing to lack of time for rehearsal, and he will probably simply appear as piano soloist.

From NEWS

Address Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S SOLOISTS ANNOUNCED

Sembrich And Schumann-Heink Are Among Those Who Will Sing Here.

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that Thursday, October 14, is the last day on which subscribers of last year may renew their subscriptions for the coming season and retain the seats they used in 1908-09. The public sale for new subscribers will open on Monday morning, October 18, at Albaugh's, 109 North Charles street.

The following are the soloists of the season who have already been engaged: Mesdames Sembrich and Schumann-Heink and Rachmaninoff (his first appearance in Baltimore) and Mischa Elman.

From SUN

Address Baltimore, Md.

Date SEP 26

IN HARMONY'S REALM

Visiting Orchestras Announce Dates For Baltimore Concerts.

MUSIC LOVERS ARE PREPARING

Course In Church Music On Organ And Choir Training To Be Given At Columbia University.

The plans of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming season in Baltimore are practically complete. Five concerts will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, November 10, December 8 and January 12, Tuesday evening, February 22, and Wednesday evening, March 23. Mr. Max Fiedler will again be the conductor.

Four soloists are thus far announced. They are Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer and pianist; Mme. Schumann-Heink, contralto; Mischa Elman, violinist, and Mme. Marcella Sembrich, soprano. The fifth soloist will be announced within a [illegible]

AMERICAN

Baltimore, Md.

SEP 26 1909

Boston Symphony Season.

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that Thursday, October 14, is the last day on which subscribers of last year may renew their subscriptions for the coming season and retain the seats they used in 1908-1909. The public sale for new subscribers will open on Monday morning, October 19, at the ticket office of W. A. Albaugh, 109 North Charles street. The following are the soloists of the season who have already been engaged: Mesdames Sembrich and Schumann-Heink, and Messrs. Rachmaninoff (his first appearance in Baltimore) and Mischa Elman.

From INQUIRER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date SEP 12 1909

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The five regular concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, November 8, December 6 and January 10, on Wednesday evening, February 23, and Monday evening, March 21. It is possible even at this early date to announce four of the five soloists. The first one will be Serge Rachmaninoff, the distinguished Russian composer and pianist, who will then make his first appearance in Philadelphia. Then will come Madame Schumann-Heink, Mischa Elman and Madame Marcella Sembrich. Max Fiedler will again be the conductor.

[illegible]

Address [illegible]

* * *

The five regular concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, November 8, December 6 and January 10; on Wednesday evening, February 23 and Monday evening, March 21. It is possible even at this early date to announce four of the five soloists. The first one will be Serge Rachmaninoff, the distinguished Russian composer and pianist, who will then make his first appearance in Philadelphia. Then will come Madame Schumann-Heink, Mischa Elman and Madame Marcella Sembrich. Max Fiedler will again be the conductod.

* * *

From EVENING BULLETIN

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date SEP 18 1909

Max Fiedler, who is again to be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will sail from Liverpool for this country September 25, and is expected to bring with him a great deal of new music, which is to be played by the orchestra this season. The Philadelphia concerts will be at the Academy of Music on Monday evenings, November 8, December 6 and January 10; Wednesday evening, February 23, and Monday evening, March 21. The soloists to appear are Sergius Rach-

---

ITEM

Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Mme. Schumann-Heink will be the soloist on one of the tours of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, singing five times with that organization. She will be heard in recital at the Brooklyn Academy of Music as early as September 29. Her first Carnegie Hall recital will be on November 6.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau and World

Address

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces its usual series of ten concerts in Carnegie Hall during the coming Winter. The dates are as follows: Tuesday evening, November 11, December 9, January 13, February 24, and March 24, and Saturday afternoons, November 13, December 11, January 15, February 26, and March 26. As announced last Spring, Mr. Max Fiedler has been retained for another year, and will again be at the head of the orchestra.

The soloists that can be announced at this time are: Gilibert, baritone; Samaroff, pianist; Elman, violinist; Sembrich, soprano; Rachmaninoff, pianist; Schumann-Heink, contralto, and Hess, violinist. Two others will be announced in due time.

From PRESS

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date SEP 19 1909

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is making more than usually extensive plans for the coming season, which is its twenty-ninth. Mr. Ellis, its manager, has so far arranged a total of 111 concerts and it is expected that at least two more will be added to this number. These concerts will be given between October 8, when the first public rehearsal of the Boston series takes place, and April 30, when the last concert of the Boston series is played.

The orchestra will give its usual twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in Boston, its ten in New York, eight in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, four in Providence, three in Worcester, Hartford and New Bedford, while other cities in New England to be visited are Brockton, Springfield, Waterbury and Bridgeport. The usual Western trip will be made in the week of January 30, when concerts will be given on successive evenings in Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Erie, Rochester and Syracuse. Mr. Max Fiedler will again be the conductor.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Address

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give five concerts in Philadelphia the coming season, on dates to be shortly announced. The orchestra is making more than usually extensive plans for the season, which is its twenty-ninth. Mr. Ellis, its manager, has so far arranged a total of 111 concerts, and it is expected that at least two more will be added to this number. These concerts will be given between October 8, when the first public rehearsal of the Boston series takes place, and April 30, when the last concert of the Boston series is played. The usual Western trip will be made in the week of January 30, when concerts will be given on successive evenings in Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Erie, Rochester and Syracuse. Max Fiedler will again be the conductor.

He sails from Liverpool for this country on September 25, bringing with him a great deal of new music to be played by the orchestra during the coming season. In a letter to Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, Mr. Fiedler said that his "novelties" include four works by Frederick Delius—his "Paris," "Appalachia," "In a Summer Garden" and "Briggs Fair." The Finnish composer Sibelius is also represented by four works that are probably new to most of the country. They are the "Swahnevit" Suite, opus 54; "En Saga," symphonic poem; "Night Ride and Sunrise," symphonic poem, opus 55, and "The Swan of the Tuonela." One of the interesting features of the season will be the performance, probably for the first time in the East, of Richard Strauss's first tone poem "Macbeth." It was played by Theodore Thomas in Chicago some years ago, but has never been on a programme in this part of the country so far as is known. Mr. Fiedler also purposes performing "Don Quixote," which Mr. Gericke brought out some eight years ago. He also announces the "Sinfonia Domestica," which Doctor Muck gave two years ago, and the suite for wood-wind instruments.

The season's repertoire of the Boston Orchestra will also include the first, second, fourth, sixth and ninth symphonies of Beethoven, the fourth of Brahms, the seventh of Bruckner, Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," Haydn's Symphony in E flat major, Mozart's symphonies in E flat major, G minor, G major, Schumann's E flat major symphony and Tschaikowsky's "Manfred."

[30]

INQUIRER

ess Philadelphia, Pa.

SEP 19 1909

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Max Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who sails from Liverpool for this country on September 25, is bringing with him a great deal of new music which is to be played by the orchestra during the coming season. In a letter to Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, Mr. Fiedler said that he thought he had a number of novelties which would more than compare favorably with those that have been brought out in recent years. Noticeable on this list are four works by Frederick Delius; his "Paris," "Appalachia," "In a Summer Garden," "Briggs Fair." The Finnish composer Sibelius is also represented by the "Swahnevit" Suite, Opus 54, "En Saga," symphonic poem, "Night Ride and Sunrise," symphonic poem, Opus 55, and the "Swan of Tuonela."

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om .....

ldress .....

te .....

Max Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who sails from Liverpool for this country next Saturday is bringing with him a great deal of new music which is to be played by the orchestra during the coming season.

Noticeable on this list are four works by Frederick Belius, his "Paris" "Appalachit," "In a Summer Garden," "Briggs Fair." The Finnish composer Sibelius is also represented by four works new to Boston at least and probably new to most of the country. They are the "Swahnevit" Suite, Opus 54, "En Saga," symphonic poem, "Night Ride and Sunrise," symphonic poem, Opus 55, and the "Swan of Tuonela."

One of the interesting features of the season will be the performance for the first time in the East of Richard Strauss' first tone poem, "Macbeth." It was played by Theodore Thomas in Chicago some years ago, but has never been on a program in the East. Mr. Fiedler also purposes performing "Don Quixote," which Mr. Gericke brought out some eight years ago. He also announces the "Sinfonia Domestica," which Dr. Muck did two years ago, and the Suite for wood-wind instruments.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m .....

dress .....

THE LATEST MUSIC GOSSIP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces its usual series of ten concerts in Carnegie Hall during the coming Winter. The dates are as follows: Tuesday evening, November 11, December 9, January 13, February 24, and March 24, and Saturday afternoons, November 13, December 11, January 15, February 26, and March 26. As announced last Spring, Mr. Max Fiedler has been retained for another year, and will again be at the head of the orchestra.

The soloists that can be announced at this time are: Gilibert, baritone; Samaroff, pianist; Elman, violinist; Sembrich, soprano; Rachmaninoff, pianist; Schumann-Heink, contralto, and Hess, violinist. Two others will be announced in due time.

n PRESS

ress Philadelphia, Pa.

e SEP 26

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra anounces that all subscribers who wish to retain the seats they had last year for the five concerts, to be given during the coming season, must renew their subscriptions before Wednesday, October 13, for, after that date the books will be opened to new subscribers, who will have the choice of seats that have been left. The public sale for new subscribers will open Saturday morning, October 16. The following artists are announced as soloists with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the Philadelphia concerts: Mesdames, Sembrich and Schumann-Heink, and Messrs. Rachmaninoff (his first appearance here) and Mischa Elman.

* * *

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

RECORD

ess PHILADELPHIA, P

SEP 26 1909

—The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that all subscribers who wish to retain seats held last year must renew subscriptions before Wednesday, October 13. The public sale for new subscribers will open Saturday morning, October 16, at Miss Harris' office, No. 1119 Chestnut street. The soloists for the five Philadelphia concerts are Mesdames Sembrich and Schumann-Heink, Messrs. Rachmaninoff and Mischa Elman. Mme. Schumann-Heink will be heard in recital at the Academy of Music on Thursday afternoon, October 28.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

PUBLIC LEDGER

PHILADELPHIA, PA

SEP 26 1909

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that all subscribers who wish to retain the seats they had last year for the five concerts to be given during the coming season must renew their subscriptions before Wednesday, October 13, for after that date the books will be opened to new subscribers, who will have the choice of seats that have been left.

The public sale for new subscribers will open Saturday morning, October 16, at Miss Harris's ticket office, in Heppe's Music Rooms, 1119 Chestnut street.

The following artists are announced as soloists with the Boston Smphony Orchestra for the Philadelphia concerts: Mesdames Sembrich, Schumann-Heink, Messrs. Rachmanioff (his first appearance here) and Mischa Elman. Others will be announced later.

From INQUIRER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date SEP 26 1909

Boston Symphony Season

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that all subscribers who wish to retain the seats they had last year for the five concerts to be given during the coming season must renew their subscriptions before Wednesday, October 13, for after that date the books will be opened to new subscribers, who will have the choice of seats that have been left. The public sale for new subscribers will open Saturday morning, October 16, at Miss Harris' ticket office, in Heppe's music rooms, 1119 Chestnut street. The soloists this season will include Sembrich, Schumann-Heink, Rachmaninoff (his first appearance here), and Mischa Elman.

n EVENING BULLETIN

ess Philadelphia, Pa.

SEP 2 1909

—o—

The five regular concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music, will be given this year on Monday evenings, November 8, December 6 and January 10, on Wednesday evening, February 23, and Monday evening, March 21. Four of the five soloists already have been announced, the first being Serge Rachmaninoff, the distinguished Russian composer and pianist, with Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mischa Elman and Marcella Sembrich to follow.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

10

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Last year's subscribers to the series of Boston Symphony concerts in the Academy of Music have until Wednesday, October 13, to renew their subscription and retain the seats they had last year. This may be done by mail or in person by application to Miss H. Harris at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut street.

The public sale of seats will open on Saturday, October 16.

Attention should be called to the fact that the February concert will be given on Wednesday evening instead of on the usual Monday. The dates of the concerts are as follows: Monday evenings, November 8, December 6, January 10, March 21, and Wednesday evening, February 23. This slight change in schedule has been made necessary owing to local conditions which could not be met in any other way.

The soloists so far engaged for the Philadelphia series are: Madame Marcella Sembrich, Madame Ernestine Schumann-Heink, Serge Rachmaninoff, the eminent Russian composer, conductor and pianist, who will make his first appearance in Philadelphia with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mischa Elman.

The orchestra's personnel is practically unchanged since last season—George Wendler takes the place of Schmid as first horn, and Rennert, from the second violins, moves to the first desk of the violas with Ferri, in place of Scheurer, who has retired from the orchestra.

* * *

m INQUIRER

ress Philadelphia, Pa.

e

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Last year's subscribers to the series of Boston Symphony concerts in the Academy of Music have until Wednesday, October 13, to renew their subscription and retain the seats they had last year. This may be done by mail or in person by application to Miss H. Harris, at Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut street. The public sale of seats will open on Saturday, October 16. Attention is called to the fact that the February concert will be given on Wednesday instead of on Monday evening. The dates of the concerts are as follows: Monday evenings, November 8, December 6, January 10, March 21, and Wednesday evening, February 23. This slight change in schedule has been made necessary owing to local conditions in Washington, which could not be met in any other way. The soloists so far engaged for the Philadelphia series, are: Madame Marcella Sembrich, Madame Ernestine Schumann-Heink, Serge Rachmaninoff, the eminent Russian composer, conductor and pianist, who will make his first appearance in Philadelphia with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mischa Elman.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

TIMES

om .....

dress .....

The announcement is made that last year's subscribers to the series of Boston symphony concerts in the Academy of Music have until Wednesday, October 13, to renew their subscription and retain the seats they had last year. The public sale of seats will open on Saturday, October 16.

Attention should be called to the fact that the February concert will be given on Wednesday evening instead of on the usual Monday. The dates of the concerts are as follows: Monday evenings November 8, December 6, January 10, March 21, and Wednesday evening, February 23.

The soloists so far engaged for the Philadelphia series are: Madame Marcella Sembrich, Madame Ernestine Schumann-Heink, Serge Rachmaninoff, the eminent Russian composer, conductor and pianist, who will make his first appearance in Philadelphia with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mischa Elman.

rom PRESS

ddress Philadelphia, Pa.

Date OCT 3

Last year's subscribers to the series of Boston Symphony concerts in the Academy of Music have until Wednesday, October 13, to renew their subscription and retain the seats they had last season. This may be done by mail or in person by application to Miss H. Harris, at 1119 Chestnut Street. The public sale of seats will open on Saturday, October 16.

Attention should be called to the fact that the February concert will be given on Wednesday evening instead of on the usual Monday. The dates of the concerts are as follows: Monday evenings, November 8, December 6, January 10, March 21 and Wednesday evening, February 23. This slight change in schedule has been made necessary owing to local conditions in Washington, which could not be met in any other way.

* * *

NORTH AMERICAN

Philadelphia, Pa.

Max Fiedler — Conductor

Mme. Sembrich — Soprano

Mme. Schumann-Heink Contralto

Brilliant List of Soloists.

The list of soloists scheduled to appear with the orchestra in Philadelphia is one of particular brilliancy. There will be two singers, Marcella Sembrich and Ernestine Schumann-Heink. The former bade farewell to the operatic stage last season, and this year, it is said, will mark her final appearances in America. She will probably never sing again in this city after her concert with the Boston Orchestra. After her experience with the dissonances of Richard Strauss' "Elektra" in Dresden last winter, Madame Schumann-Heink has returned to the concert stage, and her visit with Mr. Fiedler's organization should be of especial interest.

Serge Rachmaninoff, who, since the recent death of Rimsky-Korsakoff, ranks at the head of contemporary Russian composers, will appear with the orchestra in the triple capacity of composer, pianist and conductor. He will play his own sec-

EVENING BULLETIN

Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 16 1909

—o—

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its season of five concerts at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 8, the remaining dates being December 6, January 10, March 21 and February 23. An unusually interesting list of soloists will be presented this season. They are Marcella Sembrich, who is announced to make her farewell tour of America this winter; Mme. Schumann-Heink, who is to appear with the Boston orchestra for the first time in several years; Serge Rachmaninoff, the distinguished Russian composer and pianist; Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, and another yet to be announced.

[31]

rom TELEGRAPH

ddress Philadelphia, Pa.

Date OCT 3

Boston Symphony Concerts

The annual subscription sale of seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open next Saturday morning. The usual quota of five concerts will be given during the winter in the Academy of Music. The dates are Monday evenings, November 8, December 6, January 10 and March 21, and Wednesday evening, February 23. Particular attention is called to the fact that the February concert will come Wednesday evening instead of the traditional Monday. Local conditions in Washington have made it necessary to change the day and date for this concert.

A brilliant group of soloists will assist Conductor Fiedler and his band, four of whom are now announced. These include Mme. Sembrich, who made her operatic farewell last season, but who has returned to America for a series of final concert appearances; Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mischa Elman, whose initial American tournee last year was sensationally successful, and Serge Rachmanikoff, the Russian pianist and composer, who will make his first appearances in this country.

INQUIRER

ss Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 10 190

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The annual subscription sale of seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at Miss Harris' ticket office, in Heppe's piano rooms, 1119 Chestnut street, on next Saturday morning, October 16. The usual five concerts will be given during the winter in the Academy of Music. The dates are Monday evenings, November 8, December 6, January 10 and March 21, and Wednesday evening, February 23. Particular attention should be called to the fact that the February concert will come Wednesday evening, instead of the traditional Monday. Local conditions in Washington have made it necessary to change the day and date for this concert.

Of the five artists who are to appear with the orchestra during the season the management has announced the names of only four. These are Mme. Sembrich, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mischa Elman, the young violinist whose playing was one of last season's sensations, and the Russian, Serge Rachmaninoff, who, since the death of Rimsky-Korsakoff, is ranked as the greatest of living Russian composers and who is also said to be a pianist of the first rank. It may be recalled that Mme. Sembrich retired from the operatic stage last season, and it is stated that when she appears at the Academy with the Boston Orchestra it will be for the last time in this city.

om .....

ldress PUBLIC LEDGER PHILADELPHIA

te .....

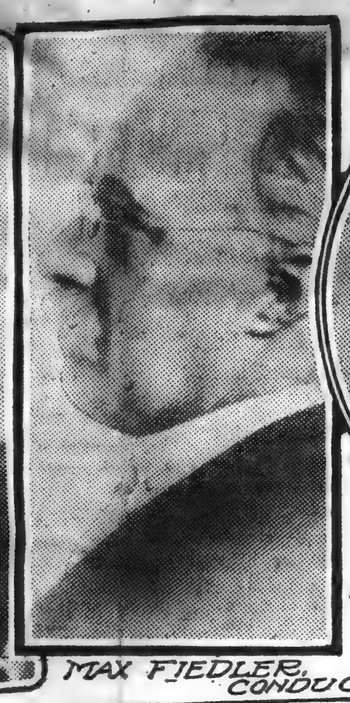
The season's sale for the five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which are to be given in Philadelphia this coming winter, opened at Miss Harris's ticket office, in Heppe's piano rooms, yesterday morning. The demand for tickets was gratifyingly large, and the subscription will show a substantial increase over that of last year.

The list of soloists has elicited much favorable comment. In four of the five concerts the assisting artists will be Madame Sembrich, Madame Schumann-Heink, Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist, and Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist. It has been many years since the Boston Orchestra has been able to offer such a brilliant list as this.

TIMES

SOLOISTS COMING WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

MAX FIEDLER, CONDUCTOR



MISCHA ELMAN, SOLOIST.

MME. SEMBRICH, SOLOIST.

MME. SCHUMANN-HEINK, SOLOIST.

ERGE RA

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
PUBLIC LEDGER
m
ress

tion the fact. F. C. E.

* * *

The annual subscription sale of seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at Miss Harris' ticket office in Heppe's Piano Rooms, 1119 Chestnut st., on next Saturday morning, October 16. The usual quota of five concerts will be given during the winter in the Academy of Mupsic. The dates are Monday evenings, November 8, December 6, January 10 and March 21 and Wednesday evening February 23. Particular attention should be called to the fact that the February concert will come Wednesday evening instead of the traditional Monday. Local conditions in Washington have made it necessary to change the day and date for this concert.

It is many years since the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been able to offer Philadelphia such a brilliant list of soloists as that which is announced for the coming season. At present it is possible to announce but four of the five, but those four are of extraordinary high quality. There will be two singers, Marcella Sembrich's last year in America. Last spring is generally known this is Madame Sembhich's last year in America. Last spring she bade farewell to the operatic stage, and this year she is making a concert tour through the country which will end her career so far as the United States is concerned. When Madame Sembrich first began to come to this country she was soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra a number of times, but in recent years owing to her many engagements in opera it has been impossible to make arrangements for her to appear with the orchestra. This year, however, as soon as it was known that she intended to devote herself to concert work, Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, straightway engaged her as soloist for concerts in Boston, New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore. Her appearances with the orchestra in Philadelphia will probably mark the last time she sings in this city; so aside from the musical interest, there will be a sentimental interest connected with this concert.

Madame Schumann-Heink is without doubt one of the most popular singers now before the public and her appearance with the orchestra will be welcomed by her host of admirers in this city.

Particular interest attaches to the appearance here in November with the orchestra of Serge Rachmaninoff who will then make his debut in Philadelphia. Rachmaninoff, since the death of Rimsky-Korsakoff, is ranked as the greatest of living Russian composers. He has to his credit three operas, two symphonies, two symphonic poems and a number of small works for piano and chamber. In addition to being a composer of such high rank, Rachmaninoff comes to America with a reputation of being one of the greatest pianists Russia has ever produced, and it will be primarily as a pianist that he tours America. It is probable, however, that at this concert he will appear in the three-fold capacity of pianist, composer and conductor. He will play his own second concerto, and Mr. Fiedler purposes placing on the programme his symphonic poem "The Cliffs," which in all probability the composer will conduct. Altogether this concert will be a most interesting event.

The other soloist now announced is Mischa Elman. His sensational success last year is vividly remembered by all who are interested in music. It was his purpose not to return to America for the season of 1909-1910, but Mr. Ellis, the manager of the Boston orchestra, was able to offer him a large number of engagements, which persuaded his manager to come back to America for a second consecutive season. Altogether he will play with the orchestra about fifteen times.

BOSTON SYMPHONY SOLOISTS ANNOUNCED

List Includes Sembrich, Schumann-Heink, Rachmanihoff and Elman

It is many years since the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been able to offer Philadelphians such a brilliant list of soloists as that which is announced for the coming season.

At present it is possible to announce but four of the five, but those four are of extraordinary high quality. There will be two singers, Marcella Sembrich and Ernestine Schumann-Heink. As is generally known, this is Madame Sembrich's last year in America. Last spring she bade farewell to the operatic stage, and this year she is making a concert tour through the country, which will end her career so far as the United States is concerned.

When Madame Sembrich first began to come to this country she was soloist with the Boston Symphany Orchestra a number of times, but in recent years, owing to her many engagements in opera, it has been impossible to make arrangements for her to appear with the orchestra. This year, however, as soon as it was known that she intended to devote herself to concert work, Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, straightway engaged her as soloist for concerts in Boston, New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore. Her appearance with the orchestra in Philadelphia will probably mark the last time she sings in this city.

Madame Schumann-Heink is without doubt one of the most popular singers now before the public, and her appearance with the orchestra will be welcomed by her host of admirers in this city.

Debut of Soloist.

Particular interest attaches to the appearance here in November with the orchestra of Serge Rachmaninoff, who will then make his debut in Philadelphia. Rachmaninoff, since the death of Rimsky-Korsakoff, is ranked as one of the greatest of living Russian composers. He has to his credit three operas, two symphonies, two symphonic poems and a number of small works for piano and chamber.

The other soloist now announced is Mischa Elman. His sensational success last year is vividly remembered by all who are interested in music.

Max Fielder will be the conductor during the coming year, and the personel of the orchestra remains practically the same as last, only two minor changes having been made in it.

RECORD

Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 17 1909

ber 1.

—The season's sale for the five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened yesterday morning. The demand for tickets was gratifyingly large and the subscription will show a substantial increase over that of last year.

lished: London, 1

[32]

RECORD

ss Philadelphia, Pa.

The annual subscription sale for the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at No. 1119 Chestnut street, next Saturday morning. Five concerts will be given during the winter in the Academy of Music. The dates are Monday evenings, November 8, December 6, January 10 and March 21, and Wednesday evening, February 23. At present it is possible to announce but four of the five soloists. There will be two singers, Marcella Sembrich and Ernestine Schumann-Heink. This is Madame Sembrich's last year in America, as she is making a concert tour which will end her career so far as the United States is concerned. Madame Schumann-Heink is without doubt one of the most popular singers now before the public, and her appearance with the Orchestra will be welcomed by her host of admirers in this city.

Particular interest attaches to the appearance here in November with the Orchestra of Serge Rachmaninoff, who will then make his debut in Philadelphia. Rachmaninoff, since the death of Rimsky-Korsakoff, is ranked as the greatest of living Russian composers. He has to his credit three operas, two symphonic poems and a number of small works. He has the reputation of being one of the greatest pianists Russia has ever produced, and it will be primarily as a pianist that he tours America. It is probable, however, that at this concert he will appear in the three-fold capacity of pianist, composer and conductor. He will play his own second concerto, and Fiedler purposes placing on the program the Russian's symphonic poem, "The Cliffs," which in all probability the composer will conduct.

The other soloist now announced is Mischa Elman. It was his purpose not to return to America for the season of 1909-1910, but Manager Ellis, of the Boston Orchestra, was able to offer Elman a large number of engagements, and thus persuaded him to return.

Max Fiedler, of course, will be the conductor during the coming year, and the personnel of the Orchestra remains practically the same as last, only two minor changes having been made in it.

* * *

PRESS

Philadelphia, Pa.

The annual subscription sale of seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at 1119 Chestnut Street on Saturday morning, October 16. The usual quota of five concerts will be given during the Winter in the Academy of Music. The dates are Monday evenings, November 8, December 6, January 10 and March 21 and Wednesday evening, February 23. Particular attention should be called to the fact that the February concert will come Wednesday evening instead of the traditional Monday. Local conditions in Washington have made it necessary to change the day and date for this concert.

It is many years since the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been able to offer Philadelphia such a brilliant list of soloists as that which is announced for the coming season. At present it is possible to announce but four of the five, but those four are of extraordinary high quality. There will be two singers, Marcella Sembrich and Ernestine Schumann-Heink. As is generally known, this is Madame Sembrich's last year in America. Last Spring she bade farewell to the operatic stage, and this year she is making a concert tour through the country which will end her career so far as the United States is concerned.

* * *

TELEGRAPH

Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 23 1909

Rachmaninoff with Boston Symphony

Although Rachmaninoff, the Russ composer-pianist, who is to make his appearance here with the Boston Sy phony Orchestra on Monday evening, vember 8, has been compelled to delay sailing, so that his appearance in Bost has been postponed, he will arrive in t country in ample time to fulfill his Phi delphia engagement with the Boston Sy phony Orchestra. Under these unexpect conditions, however, it is a quest whether he will be able to conduct any his own works, owing to lack of time rehearsal, and he will probably simply pear as piano soloist.

n INQUIRER

ress Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 2

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Although Rachmaninoff, the Russia composer-pianist, who is to make his fir appearance here with the Boston Sym phony Orchestra on Monday evening, N vember 8, has been compelled to dela his sailing so that his appearance in Bo ton has been postponed, he will arri in this country in ample time to fulfi his engagement with the Boston Sym phony in this city. Under these une pected conditions, however, it is a que tion whether he will be able to condu any of his own works owing to lack time for rehearsal, and he will probab simply appear as piano soloist.

TELEGRAPH

Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 30 19

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first of the regular concerts of Boston Symphony Orchestra in Phila phia will be given in the Academy Music on Monday evening, Novembe The soloist will be the eminent Rus composer and pianist, Serge Rachm noff, who will on that night make his appearance in America. The progra will comprise Granville Bantock's o ture, "Pierrot of the Minute," which be heard here for the first time; Tsc kowsky's Fifth Symphony in E M Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto pianoforte and orchestra, and Ric Strauss' tone-poem, "Don Juan."

ewspaper Cutting Bureau in the Wor

s

Although Rachmaninoff, the Russ composer-pianist, who is to make first appearance here with the Bo Symphony Orchestra on Monday e ing, November 8, has been comp to delay his sailing so that his app ance in Boston has been postpone will arrive in this country in time to fulfill his engagement the Boston Symphony in this Under these unexpected condi however, it is a question whethe will be able to conduct any of his works, owing to lack of time for hearsal, and he will probably s appear as piano soloist.

* * *

NORTH AMERICAN

ddress Philadelphia, Pa.

ate OCT 17 1909

sion as cellist.

The Hess-Schroeder Quartet, composed of musicians from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make its debut in Philadelphia on Monday afternoon, December 6, in Witherspoon Hall. The program will include a D minor quartet, by Schubert; a sonata, for violin, and piano, by Cesar Franck, and a Dvorak quintet for piano and strings.

RECORD

Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 17 1909

INQUIRER

dress Philadelphia, Pa.

te OCT 17 1909

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The season's sale for the five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which are to be given in Philadelphia this coming winter, opened at Miss Harris' ticket office, in Heppe's Piano Rooms, yesterday morning. The list of soloists has created much favorable comment. In four of the five concerts the assisting artists will be Madame Sembrich, Madame Schumann-Heink, Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist, and Mischa Elman, the Russion violinist. It has been many years since the Boston Orchestra has been able to offer such a brilliant list as this.

PRESS

Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 17 1909

* * *

The season's sale for the five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which are to be given in Philadelphia this coming Winter, opened at Miss Harris' Ticket Office, at 1119 Chestnut Street, yesterday morning. The demand for tickets was gratifyingly large and the subscription will show a substantial increase over that of last year.

The list of soloists has predicted much favorable comment. In four of the five concerts the assisting artists will be Madame Sembrich, Madame Schumann-Heink, Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist, and Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist. It has been many years since the Boston Orchestra has been able to offer such a brilliant list as this.

* * *

EVENING BULLETIN

s Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 23

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 8, with Serge Rachmaninoff, the celebrated Russian composer, conductor and pianist, as soloist. While Rachmaninoff has been compelled to delay his sailing, so that he will not be able to make his first appearance in Boston as expected, he will arrive in time for his engagement here. It is a question, however, whether he will conduct one of his own works, owing to lack of time for rehearsals, and he will probably, therefore appear simply as piano soloist.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the World

PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

ess

OCT 24 1909

Although Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer-pianist, who is to make his first appearance here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Monday evening, November 8, has been compelled to delay his sailing so that his appearance in Boston has been postponed, he will arrive in this country in ample time to fulfil his engagement with the Boston Symphony in this city. Under these unexpected conditions, however, it is a question whether he will be able to conduct any of his own works owing to lack of time for rehearsal, and he will probably simply appear as piano soloist.

PRESS

ss Philadelphia, Pa.

OCT 24 1

Although Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer-pianist, who is to make his first appearance here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Monday evening, November 8, has been compelled to delay his sailing so that his appearance in Boston, has been postponed, he will arrive in this country in ample time to fulfill his engagement with the Boston Symphony in this city. Under these unexpected conditions, however, it is a question whether he will be able to conduct any of his own works owing to lack of time for rehearsal, and he will probaly simply appear as piano soloist.

m

lress

e

Although Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer-pianist, who is to make his first appearance here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Monday evening, November 8, has been compelled to delay his sailing so that his appearance in Boston has been postponed, he will arrive in this country in ample time to fulfill his engagement with the Boston Symphony in this city. Under these unexpected conditions, however, it is a question whether he will be able to conduct any of his own works, owing to lack of time for rehearsal, and he will probably simply appear as piano soloist.

NORTH AMERICAN

Philadelphia, Pa.

The first of the Boston Symphony's five concerts scheduled for Philadelphia this season will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 8. The soloist will be Serge Rachmaninoff, the celebrated Russian composer and pianist, who will be heard in his own concerto.

The orchestral numbers of the program should prove highly attractive. They will include Richard Strauss' remarkable tone poem, "Don Juan"; Grenville Bantock's overture, "Pierrot of the Minute," and Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony. The occasion will signalize Rachmaninoff's debut in this city.

s

OCT 31 1909

The first of the regular Boston Symphony concerts in Philadelphia will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 8. The soloist will be the eminent Russian composer and pianist, Serge Rachmaninoff, who will on that night make his first appearance in America. The program will comprise Granville Bantock's overture, "Pierrot of the Minute," which will be heard for the first time; Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor, Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, and Richard Strauss' tone-poem, "Don Juan."

From PUBLIC LEDGER

ddress

OCT 31 1909

The first of the regular Boston Symphony concerts in Philadelphia will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, November 8. The soloist will be the eminent Russian composer and pianist, Serge Rachmaninoff, who will on that night make his first appearance in America. The programme will comprise Granville Bentock's overture, "Pierrot of the Minute," which will be heard for the first time; Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor, Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan."

EVENING TELEGRAM,

n

New York City.

ress

SEP 17 190

Rachmaninoff, who is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his appearance with this organization on their first tour of the season, will appear in the threefold capacity of composer, conductor and pianist. Following his appearance in this city with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on November 13, he will give a recital in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, November 20.

Record
Philadelphia Pa.
ess

NOV 9 1909

RUSSIAN PIANIST

Boston Symphony Concert Has Rachmaninoff as Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first Philadelphia concert of the orchestra's twenty-ninth season in the Academy of Music last night. The inclement weather apparently had little or no effect on the admirers of this celebrated organization. The Academy was more than comfortably filled.

In addition to the interest always felt in a visit of the orchestra, there was great curiosity throughout the musical colony to see and hear the young giant of the modern Russian school—Serge Rachmaninoff, who appeared as soloist, playing his second concerto. Rachmaninoff looks the ultra-modern musician as thoroughly as his wonderful creations are the product of a brain reared in the school of modernism in art. With his tall figure and athletic physique, he is instantly suggestive of the great to-day in music. He is a genius of the present and the future.

Of his second concerto it can truthfully be said that the second movement, the Adagio, approaches the perfection of creative art, while the climax of the closing movement seems like an outburst of genius.

As a pianist Rachmaninoff displays all the fluency and brilliancy of technique to be expected in an artist so celebrated. The second concerto is literally "for piano, with orchestra." There is so little work for the piano alone that it is difficult to judge of the impression which might be made by Rachmaninoff as a soloist. Of the impression he made with the orchestra, however, there was no room for doubt. A regular ovation was accorded him, which, however, failed to produce the much-desired encore.

The orchestral novelty on the program was Granville Bantock's "The Pierrot of the Minute." It is a short work of the program variety, and is a good example of the style of work which entertains without making a very profound or lasting impression. The symphony was Tschaikowsky's No. 5, in E minor. It was beautifully played. Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," concluded a program full of variety and interest, and holding only one disappointment—the failure of Rachmaninoff to play an encore.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTIS

ess New York City.

SEP 8

The Boston Orchestra.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra announces its usual series of ten New York concerts, to take place in Carnegie Hall during the coming winter. The dates are as follows: Thursday evenings, Nov. 11, Dec. 9, Jan. 13, Feb. 24, and March 24, and Saturday afternoons, Nov. 13, Dec. 11, Jan. 15, Feb. 26, and March 26. As announced last spring, Max Fiedler has been retained for another yea and will again be at the head of the chestra.

The soloists already promised Charles Gilibert, baritone; Olga Sam pianist; Mischa Elman, violinist; Sembrich, soprano; Sergei Rachmanin pianist; Mme. Schumann-Heink, contral and Willy Hess, violinist. Two other will be announced in due time.

Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, reports the significant fact that never before have so many orders for seats been received and so many subscriptions renewed so early in season as is the case this year.

From EVENING TELEGRAM,

Address New York City.

Date SEP 8 1909

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces its usual series of ten concerts in Carnegie Hall during the coming winter. The dates are as follows:—Thursday evenings, November 11th, December 9th, January 13th, February 24th, and March 24th; and Saturday afternoons, November 13th, December 11th, January 15th, February 26th and March 26th. As announced last Spring Mr. Max Fiedler has been retained for another year and will again be at the head of the orchestra.

EVENING MAIL

ess New York City.

SEP 11 1909

The Boston Symphony orchestra announces its usual series of ten concerts in Carnegie hall during the coming winter. The dates are as follows: Thursday evenings, November 11, December 9, January 13, February 24 and March 24; and Saturday afternoons, November 13, December 11, January 15, February 26 and March 26. Max Fielder has been retained for another year as conductor.

The soloists, as far as arranged for now, are Gilibert, baritone; Samaroff, pianist; Elman, violinist; Sembrich, soprano; Rachmaninoff, pianist; Schumann-Heink, contralto, and Hess, violinist.

Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, reports that never before have so many orders for seats been received and so many subscriptions renewed as early in the season as now.

TIMES

n

ess New York City.

SEP 12 1909

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces its usual series of ten concerts in Carnegie Hall during the coming Winter. The dates are as follows: Thursday evenings, Nov. 11, Dec. 9, Jan. 13, Feb. 24, and March 24, and Saturday afternoons, Nov. 13, Dec. 11, Jan. 15, Feb. 26, and March 26. As announced last Spring, Max Fiedler has been retained as the conductor of the orchestra for another year. The soloists already engaged are Charles Gilibert, Olga Samaroff, Mischa Elman, Marcella Sembrich, Rachnaniño. Ernestine Schumann-Heink, and Hess, the violinist.

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date SEP 12 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces its usual series of ten concerts in Carnegie Hall for the coming winter. The dates are as follows: Thursday evenings, November 11, December 9, January 13, February 24 and March 24, and Saturday afternoons, November 13, December 11, January 15, February 26 and March 26.

As announced last spring, Max Fiedler will again be at the head of the orchestra.

The soloists that can be announced at this time are Gilibert, barytone; Samaroff, pianist; Elman, violinist; Sembrich, soprano; Rachmaninoff, pianist; Schumann-Heink, contralto, and Hess, violinist. Two others will be announced in due time.

From WORLD

Address New York City.

Date SEP

MUSIC NOTES.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces its usual series of ten concerts in Carnegie Hall during the coming winter. The dates are as follows: Thursday evenings, Nov. 11, Dec. 9, Jan. 13, Feb. 24 and March 24; and Saturday afternoons, Nov. 13, Dec. 11, Jan. 15, Feb. 26 and March 26. Mr. Max Fiedler, conductor, has been retained for another year and will again be at the head of the orchestra. The soloists that can be announced at this time are Gilibert, baritone; Samaroff, pianist; Elman, violinist; Sembrich, soprano; Rachaninoff, pianist; Schumann-Heink, contralto, and Hess, violinist. Two others will be announced later.

The most interesting and the busiest season of the Russian Symphony Orchestra since its inception is promised by the conductor, Modest Altschuler, for the seventh season, 1909-1910. The New York concerts given by the Russian Symphony Society come on Thursday evenings, Nov. 18, Dec. 2, Jan. 27, Feb. 10, March 3. As is customary with the society, it will open its season Nov. 18 with Tschaikowsky's Six Symphony ("The Pathetique"), and will present an array of soloists of repute.

Wednesday next the subscription books for the regular winter season at the Manhattan Opera House will open.

n HERALD

ress New York City.

SEP 1 1909

Plans for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's New York season were made public yesterday. Ten concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall, five on Thursday evenings and five on Saturday afternoons, beginning November 11. Mr. Max Fiedler, last year's conductor, will again be its leader. The soloists announced are Mmes. Sembrich, Schumann-Heink, Olga Samaroff, Messrs. Sergei Rachmaninoff, Charles Gilibert and Willy Hess.

NATIO.

n

ress NEW YORK CITY

SEP 16

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces its usual series of ten concerts in Carnegie Hall, New York. The dates are as follows: Thursday evenings, November 11, December 9, January 13, February 24, and March 24, and Saturday afternoons, November 13, December 11, January 15, February 26, and March 26. As stated last spring, Max Fiedler will again be at the head of the orchestra. The soloists that can be announced at this time are: Gilibert, baritone; Samaroff, pianist; Elman, violinist; Sembrich, soprano; Rachmaninoff, pianist; Schumann-Heink, contralto, and Hess, violinist. Two others will be named in due time.

n EVENING SUN,

ress New York City.

SEP 17

In a musical Marathon and symphonic century run, Charles A. Ellis has scheduled the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in its twenty-ninth year, for a total of 111 concerts between Oct. 8, the first public rehearsal in Boston, and April 30, "when the last of the home series is played." There are forty-eight public appearances in Boston alone. New York has its ten, and there are eight in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, four in Providence, three in Worcester, Hartford and New Bedford. Also in New England, the symphony band visits Brockton, Springfield, Waterbury and Bridgeport. Going West on Jan. 30, the men play successive evenings in Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Erie, Rochester and Syracuse.

EVENING MAIL

om

dress New York City.

SEP 18

The dates for the Boston symphony will be Thursday evenings, November 11, December 9, January 13, February 24 and March 24; Saturday afternoons, November 13, December 11, January 15, February 26 and March 26. Among the soloists will be Charles Gilibert, baritone; Olga Samaroff, pianist; Mischa Elman, violin; Mme. Sembrich, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Mme. Schumann-Heink and Willy Hess, violin.

om GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

ldress New York City.

te

RACHMANINOFF is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his appearance with this organization on its first tour of the season. The famous Russian is to appear in a three-fold capacity of composer, conductor, and pianist. An imposing exposition indeed, placing before the public the question which of his three performances will be deserving of the greatest admiration. Following his appearance in this city with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Nov. 13, he will give a recital in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, Nov. 20.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

ss New York City.

SEP 18

Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces its usual series of ten concerts in Carnegie Hall during the coming winter. The dates are as follows: Thursday evenings, November 11, December 9, January 13, February 24, and March 24, and Saturday afternoons, November 13, December 11, January 15, February 26, and March 26. As announced last spring, Max Fiedler has been retained for another year, and will again be at the head of the orchestra. The soloists that can be announced at this time are: Gilibert, baritone; Samaroff, pianist; Elman, violinist; Sembrich, soprano; Rachmaninoff; Schumann-Heink, contralto, and Hess, violinist. Two others will be announced in due time.

Boston Symphony Novelties.

MAX FIEDLER, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who sails from Liverpool for this country Sept 23, is bringing with him a great deal of new music, which is to be played by the orchestra during the coming season. In a letter to Mr. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, Mr. Fiedler said that he thought that he had a number of novelties which would more than compare favorably with those that have been brought out in recent years. On his list are four works by Frederick Delius—"Paris," "Appalachia," "In a Summer Garden," and "Brigg Fair." The Finnish composer Sibelius is also represented by four works, the "Swahnevit" suite, opus 54, "En Saga," symphonic poem, "Night Ride and Sunrise," symphonic poem, opus 55, and "The Swan of Tuonela."

[33]

NEW YORK PRESS,

New York City.

SEP 18 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLANS.

Orchestra to Produce Works Never Before Heard in This Country.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will produce this winter several works by Delius and Sibelius never before heard in this country, including the former composer's "Paris" and "In a Summer Garden" and Sibelius's "Night Ride and Sunrise" and "The Swan of Tuonela." The orchestra also will play Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Macbeth," never before on a programme in the East; also Gericke's "Don Quixote" and the "Singfornia Domestica," which Dr. Muck did two years ago. Other productions will be the first, second, fourth, sixth and ninth symphonies of Beethoven, the fourth of Brahms, the seventh of Bruckner, Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," Haydn's Symphony in E flat major, Mozart's symphonies in E flat major, G minor, C major; Schumann's B flat major symphony and Tschaikowsky's "Manfred."

It is planned to have fourteen soloists in the twenty-four programmes. These will include the quartet needed for the performance of the ninth symphony. Max Fiedler, the conductor, sails for America on September 25.

Daily Citizen,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

SEP 18 1909

est. A hospital will be welcomed.

MUSIC NOTES.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is making more than usually extensive plans for the coming season, which is its twenty-ninth. Mr. Ellis, its manager, has so far arranged a total of 111 concerts, and it is expected that at least two more will be added to this number. These concerts will be given between Oct. 8, when the first public rehearsal of the Boston series takes place, and April 30th, when the last concert of the Boston series is played.

The orchestra will give its usual twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in Boston, ten in New York, eight in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, and three in Worcester, Hartford and New Bedford, while other cities in New England to be visited are Brockton, Springfield, Waterbury and Bridgeport. The usual Western trip will be made in the week of Jan. 30, when concerts will be given on successive evenings in Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Erie, Rochester and Syracuse. Max Fiedler will again be the conductor.

EVENING POST

From

Address New York City.

Date SEP 18 1909

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is making more than usually extensive plans for the coming season, which is its twenty-ninth. Mr. Ellis, its manager, has so far arranged a total of 111 concerts, and it is expected that at least two will be added to this number. These concerts will be given between October 8, when the first public rehearsal of the Boston series takes place, and April 30, when the last concert of the Boston series is played. The orchestra will give its usual twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in Boston, its ten in New York, eight in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, and Brooklyn; four in Providence, three in Worcester, Hartford, and New Bedford, while other cities in New England to be visited are Brockton, Springfield, Waterbury, and Bridgeport. The usual Western trip will be made in the week of January 30, when concerts will be given on successive evenings in Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Erie, Rochester, and Syracuse. Mr. Max Fiedler will again be the conductor.

Four concerts will be given in this city during the next season by the Volpe Symphony Orchestra, the dates being December 5, January 9, February 6, and March 13, in Carnegie Hall.

TRIBUNE

ress New York City.

1909

Rachmaninoff is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his appearance with this organization on its first tour of the season. Following his appearance in this city with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on November 13, he will give a recital in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, November 20.

Daily Times,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

SEP 18 1909

Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist and composer, will be the unique personality among the instrumentalists who will be heard on the concert stage of this city. Commencing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York on Saturday afternoon, November 13, he will in the following week be heard in a recital, the programme of which will include his famous Preludes. So various are the compositions of this composer that it is possible a recital of his songs will be given later in the season by a distinguished vocalist, with the composer at the piano. Negotiations are also pending for the presentation of his chamber music works, and his conducting of one or more of his orchestral numbers is an assured fact. The versatility of the composer will be amply displayed in his numerous appearances in New York and other cities.

With Monday night claiming recognition as opera night during the coming season, Friday night will make a bid for like consideration as symphony night. Three series of orchestral concerts will come on Friday evenings, those by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, under Gustav Mahler; the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Max Fiedler conducting, and the New York Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Walter Damrosch. A fourth series of concerts will be given by the New York Symphony players ternoons. These latter will have popular programmes to have them conform to the idea of concerts for young people. The concerts by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra will be given under new auspices, an organization having been formed especially to advance the interests of this series in Brooklyn, but no full announcement has yet been made of the plans to insure the success of these concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is making more than usually extensive plans for the coming season, which is its twenty-ninth. Mr. Ellis, its manager, has so far arranged a total of 111 concerts and it is expected that at least two more will be added to this number. These concerts will be given between October 8, when the first public rehearsal of the Boston series takes place, and April 30, when the last concert of the Boston series is played.

The orchestra will give its usual twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in Boston, its ten in New York, eight in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, four in Providence, three in Worcester, Hartford and New Bedford, while other cities in New England to be visited are Brockton, Springfield, Waterbury and Bridgeport. The usual Western trip will be made in the week of January 30, when concerts will be given on successive evenings in Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Erie, Rochester and Syracuse. Max Fiedler will again be the conductor.

RECORD

Philadelphia, Pa.

SEP 19 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY

New Music to Be Brought by Fiedler From Europe.

Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sails from Liverpool for America on September 25. He is bringing with him a great deal of new music which is to be played by the orchestra during the the season. In a letter to Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, Fiedler said he thought that he had a number of novelties which would more than compare favorably with those that have been brought out in recent years. Noticeable on this list are four works by Frederick Delius, his "Paris," "Appalachia," "In a Summer Garden," "Brigg Fair." The Finnish composer, Sibelius, is also represented by four works. They are the "Swahnevit," Opus 54; "En Saga," symphonic poem, "Night Ride and Sunrise," symphonic poem, Opus 55, and "The Swan of Tuonela." One of the interesting features of the season will be the performance for the first time in Boston, and probably for the first time in the East, of Richard Strauss' first tone poem "Macbeth." It was played by Theodore Thomas in Chicago some years ago. Fiedler also purposes performing "Don Quixote," which Gericke brought out some eight years ago, and the "Sinfonia Domestica," which Dr. Muck did two years ago and the suite for wood-wind instruments.

TRIBUNE

ress New York City.

1909

Rachmaninoff is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his appearance with this organization on their first tour of the season. The famous Russian is to appear in a threefold capacity as composer, conductor and pianist, an imposing exposition, indeed, placing before the public the question which of his three performances will be deserving of the greatest admiration. Following his appearance in this city on November 13, he will give a recital in Carnegie Hall on November 20.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Daily Eagle,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

SEP 18 19

Max Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who sails from Liverpool for this country on September 25, is bringing with him a great deal of new music which is to be played by the orchestra during the coming season. In a letter to Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, Mr. Fiedler said that he thought that he had a number of novelties which would more than compare favorably with those that have been brought out in recent years. Noticeable on this list are four works by Frederick Delius; his "Paris," "Appalachia," "In a Summer Garden," and "Brigg Fair." The Finnish composer Sibelius is also represented by four works new to Boston at least, and probably new to most of the country. They are the "Swahnevit" suite, opus 54; "En Saga," symphonic poem; "Night Ride and Sunrise," symphonic poem, opus 55, and the "Swan of Tuonela." One of the interesting features of the season will be the performance for the first time in Boston and probably for the first time in the East of Richard Strauss' first tone poem "Macbeth." It was played by Theodore Thomas in Chicago some years ago, but has never been on a programme in the East. Mr. Fiedler also purposes performing Strauss' "Don Quixote," which Mr. Gericke brought out some eight years ago. He also announces the "Sinfonia Domestica," which Dr. Muck did two years ago, and the suite for wood-wind instruments.

In general Mr. Fiedler has marked out an interesting season for the Boston series. He will do the first, second, fourth, sixth and ninth symphonies of Beethoven, the fourth of Brahms, the seventh of Bruckner, Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," Haydn's symphony in E flat major, Mozart's symphonies in E flat major, G minor, C major, Schumann's B flat major symphony and Tschaikowsky's "Manfred." It is planned for Boston to have fourteen soloists in the twenty-four programmes, but those for Brooklyn are not yet announced.

Mme. Olga Samaroff, the popular pianist, who made such a strong impression with the Boston Orchestra two years ago, is once more in America preparing for a tour of the country under the management of C. A. Ellis of Boston. Last year she spent in Europe, where she had made most gratifying success in the larger cities of the Continent and in London, both with orchestras and in recital. She attracted considerable attention from the mere fact that she had been content to win the approbation of the American public before she sought that of Europe, and in her case once more it was shown that the American musical public is discriminating and sound in judgment, for Europe more than indorsed its opinion of this brilliant young artist. Mme. Samaroff's season opens with a series of seven concerts under Mr. Ellis' management, in which she will be associated with Miss Geraldine Farrar of the Metropolitan Opera House. It is an interesting fact that these two young artists have been intimate friends since their student days in Berlin, and in giving this brief concert tour they are merely carrying out a plan formed years ago. Mr. Ellis reports that Mme. Samaroff is booked solidly up to the first of the year, and that she will have between sixty and seventy engagements during the season.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

s New York City.

SEP 19 19

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces its usual series of ten concerts in Carnegie Hall during the coming Winter. The dates are as follows: Thursday evenings, November 11, December 9, January 13, February 24 and March 24; and Saturday afternoons, November 13, December 11, January 15, February 26 and March 26. As announced last Spring, Mr. Max Fiedler has been retained for another year, and will again be at the head of the orchestra. The soloists that can be announced at this time are Gilbert, baritone; Samaroff, pianist; Elman, violinist; Sembrich, soprano; Rachmaninoff, pianist; Schumann-Heink, contralto, and Hess, violinist. Two others will be announced in due time.

WORLD

ss New York City.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is making more than usually extensive plans for the coming season, which is its twenty-ninth. Manager Ellis so far has arranged a total of 111 concerts, and it is expected that at least two more will be added to this number. These concerts will be given between October 8 when the first public rehearsal of the Boston series takes place and April 30, when the last concert of the Boston series is played.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Union,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

SEP 19 1909

Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who sails from Liverpool for this country on Sept. 25, is bringing with him a great deal of new music which is to be played by the orchestra during the coming season. In a letter to Mr. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, Mr. Fiedler said that he thought that he had a number of novelties which would more than compare favorably with these that have been brought out in recent years. Noticeable on this list are four works by Frederick Delius, his "Paris," "Appalachia," "In a Summer Garden," "Brigg Fair." The Finnish composer, Sibelius, is also represented by four works new to Boston at least, and probably new to most of the country. They are the "Swahnevit" suite, opus 54; "En Saga," symphonic poem; "Night Ride and Sunrise," symphonic poem, opus 55, and the "Swan of Tuonela." One of the interesting features of the season will be the performance for the first time here in Boston and probably for the first in the East, of Richard Strauss' first tone poem, "Macbeth." It was played by Theodore Thomas in Chicago some years ago, but has never been on a programme in the East. Mr. Fiedler also purposes performing "Don Quixote," which Mr. Gericke brought out some eight years ago. He also announces the "Sinfonia Domestica," which Dr. Muck did two years ago, and the suite for woodwind instruments. In general, Mr. Fiedler has marked out a very interesting season for the Boston series. He will do the first, second, fourth, sixth and ninth symphonies of Beethoven, the fourth of Brahms, the seventh of Bruckner, Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," Haydn's symphony in E flat major, Mozart's symphonies in E flat major, G minor, C major; Schumann's B flat major symphony and Tschaikowsky's "Manfred." It is planned for Boston to have fourteen soloists in the twenty-four programmes, this to include the quartet needed for the performance of the Ninth Symphony. The orchestra is making more than usually extensive plans for the coming season, which it is twenty-ninth. Mr. Ellis has so far arranged a total of 111 concerts, and it is expected that at least two more will be added to this number. These concerts will be given between Oct. 8, when the first public rehearsal of the Boston series takes place, and April 30, when the last concert of the Boston series is played. The orchestra will give its usual 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts in Boston, its 10 in New York, and eight in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, four in Providence, three in Worcester, Hartford and New Bedford, while other cities in New England to be visited are Brockton, Springfield, Waterbury and Bridgeport. The usual western trip will be made in the week of Jan. 30, when concerts will be given on successive evenings in Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Erie, Rochester and Syracuse.

m HERALD

ress Washington, D. C.

SEP 19

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in a preliminary notice, announces that the usual five concerts will be given in Washington in the New National Theater the coming season. The dates are: Tuesday afternoons, November 9, December 7, and January 11; Monday afternoon, February 21, and Tuesday afternoon, March 22. So far, three soloists are announced. They are Mme. Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Mme. Samaroff, pianist, and Mischa Elman, violinist. There will be two more soloists. Max Fiedler will again be the conductor.

POST

ss Washington, D. C.

SEP 19

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that the five usual concerts will be given in Washington the coming season. The dates are Tuesday afternoons, November 9, December 7, and January 11; Monday afternoon, February 21, and Tuesday afternoon, March 22. So far three soloists are announced—Mme. Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Mme. Samaroff, pianist, and Mischa Elman, violinist. There will be two more soloists. Max Fiedler will again be the conductor.

m EVENING STAR

ress Washington, D. C.

e 1909

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in a preliminary notice announces that five concerts will be given in Washington in the New National Theater the coming season. The dates are Tuesday afternoons, November, 9, December 7 and January 11; Monday afternoon, February 21, and Tuesday afternoon, March 22. Three soloists are announced. They are Mme. Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Mme. Samaroff, pianist, and Mischa Elman, violinist. There will be two more soloists. Max Fiedler will again be the conductor.

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is making more than usually extensive plans for the coming season, the twenty-ninth since its foundation. Mr. Ellis, its manager, has so far arranged a total of 111 concerts, and it is expected that at least two more will be added. These concerts will be given between October 8, when the first public rehearsal of the Boston series takes place, and April 30.

The orchestra will give its usual twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in Boston, ten in New York, eight in Cambridge, five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn; four in Providence, three in Worcester, Hartford and New Bedford, while other cities in New England to be visited are Brockton, Springfield, Waterbury and Bridgeport. The usual Western trip will be made in the week of January 30, when concerts will be given on successive evenings in Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Erie, Rochester and Syracuse. Max Fiedler will again be the conductor.

Max Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will sail from Liverpool for this country on September 25, is bringing with him much new music, which is to be played by the orchestra in the coming season. In a letter to Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, Mr. Fiedler said that he thought he had a number of novelties which would compare favorably with those that have been brought out in recent years. Noticeable on his list are four works by Frederick Delius, "Paris," "Appalachia," "In a Summer Garden" and "Brigg Fair." The Finnish composer Sibelius is also represented by four works new to Boston at least and probably new to most of the country. They are the "Swahnevit" suite, Opus 54; "En saga," symphonic poem; "Night Ride and Sunrise," symphonic poem, Opus 55, and "The Swan of Tuonela." One of the interesting features of the season will be a performance for the first time in Boston of Richard Strauss's tone poem "Macbeth." Mr. Fiedler also purposes performing "Don Quixote," which Mr. Gericke brought out some eight years ago. He also announces the "Sinfonia Domestica," which Dr. Muck did two years ago, and the suite for woodwind instruments.

In general, Mr. Fiedler has marked out an interesting season for the Boston concerts. He will do the First, Second, Fourth, Sixth and Ninth symphonies of Beethoven, the Fourth of Brahms, the Seventh of Bruckner, Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," Haydn's Symphony in E flat major, Mozart's symphonies in E flat major, G minor and C major, Schumann's B flat major symphony and Tschaikowsky's "Manfred." It is planned to have fourteen soloists in the twenty-four programmes, this to include the quartet needed for the performance of the Ninth Symphony.

[34]

STAATS ZEITUNG

ess ..... New York City.

Die Leitung des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters kündigt für die kommende Saison in Carnegie Hall 10 Konzerte an und zwar an folgenden Donnerstag-Abenden: 11. November, 9. Dezember, 13. Januar, 24. Februar, und 24. März, und an folgenden Samstag-Nachmittagen: 13. November, 11. Dezember, 15. Januar, 26. Februar und 26. März.

Dr. Max Fiedler wird auch in diesem Jahre an der Spitze des Orchesters stehen. Das Programm dieser Konzerte wird in seinen Hauptzügen später bekannt gegeben werden. Als Solisten wurden bisher folgende Künstler gewonnen:: Frau Schumann-Heint, Frau Sembrich, Olga Samaroff, Mischa Elman, Prof. Willy Heß, der Bariton Herr Gilibert und der russische Komponist Herr Rachmaninoff nebst zwei weiteren später bekannt zu gebenden Künstlern.

Wie Herr Ellis, der Manager dieser Vereinigung bekannt giebt, sind in keinem Jahre bisher so früh in der Saison so viele Aufträge sowohl für Abonnements-Erneuerungen, als für neue Subskriptionen eingelaufen, als diesmal, so daß die laufende Saison noch glänzender zu werden verspricht, als die vorhergegangene.

Wie uns die Leitung des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters mittheilt, wird sich Dirigent Herr Max Fiedler am 25. September in Liverpool nach New York einschiffen und zwar mit mehreren großen Koffern voll neuer Musik, welche Genüsse auserlesener Art für die kommende Saison versprechen. Man nennt uns vier effektvolle Werke von Friedrich Delius, nämlich: „Paris", „Appalachia", „Im Sommergarten", und „Brigg Fair", durchweg Novitäten. Auch der finnische Komponist Jean Sibelius ist durch vier Werke vertreten, welche für Boston und wahrscheinlich auch für die Vereinigten Staaten Novitäten sein werden, nämlich die „Swahnevit"-Suite Op. 54, das symphonische Poem „En Saga", das symphonische Poem „Nachtritt und Sonnenaufgang" Op. 55 und „Der Schwan von Tuonela".

Ferner wird Fiedler Richard Strauß' erstes Tonpoem „Macbeth" zur Aufführung bringen, welches Werk Theodore Thomas vor mehreren Jahren in Chicago vorgeführt hat, das jedoch für den Osten des Landes Novität ist. Ferner desselben Komponisten „Don Quixote" und die „Sinfonia Domestica", welche Muck vor zwei Jahren vorgeführt hat, nicht zu vergessen Strauß' Suite für Holzbläser.

Ganz besonders reich ist das klassische Programm Fiedler's. Er kündigt die Erste, Zweite, Vierte, Sechste und Neunte Symphonie Beethoven's an, die Vierte von Brahms, die Siebente von Bruckner, Goldmark's „Ländliche Hochzeit", Haydn's Es-Dur-Symphonie, die Mozart'sche Symphonie in Es-Dur, G-Moll, C-Dur, die Schumann'sche B-Dur und Tschaikowsky's „Manfred"-Symphonie.

* * *

Standard Union,

s ..... Brooklyn, N. Y.

SEP 20 1909

Rachmaninoff is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his appearance with this organization on their first tour of the season. The famous Russian is to appear in the three-fold capacity of composer, conductor and pianist. An imposing exposition indeed, placing before the public the question which of his three performances will be deserving of the greatest admiration. Following his appearance in Manhattan with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on November 13, he will give a recital in Carnegie Hall, Manhattan, Saturday afternoon, Nov. 20.

EVENING WORLD,

..... New York City.

SEP 22

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its usual ten concerts in Carnegie Hall, the first pair on Thursday evening, Nov. 11, and on Saturday afternoon, Nov. 13. Max Fiedler has been retained for another year as leader. He promises to bring a lot of new music when he returns from Europe next week. At its home in Boston and in other cities Mr. Ellis expects the organization to give no less than one hundred and eleven concerts this season.

STAATS ZEITUNG

From ..... New York City.

Address .....

* * *

Die Leitung des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters theilt mit, daß die bisherigen Abonnenten ihre Sitze bis zum 9. Oktober abholen können, falls sie sie zu behalten wünschen. Alle bis zu diesem Termin nicht behobenen Sitze werden an neu hinzutretende Abonnenten abgegeben werden. Die Abgabe von Sitzen an neue Subskribenten beginnt an der Kasse von Carnegie Hall am Vormittag von Montag, dem 9. Oktober.

EVENING SUN,

om ..... New York City.

Idress .....

SEP 20 1909

Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sails from Liverpool for this country this week Saturday. He is bringing new music, and in a letter to Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, Mr. Fiedler told some of his novelties as well as standard works for the season, as follows:.

Novelties by the English composer, Frederick Delius, including "Paris," "Appalachia," "In a Summer Garden" and "Brigg Fair"; others by the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, "Swahnevit" suite, opus 54; "En saga," symphonic poem; "Night Ride and Sunrise," opus 55, and "The Swan of Tuonela," the last not unknown to New York. Richard Strauss's "Macbeth," its composer's first work, once played by Theodore Thomas in Chicago, but perhaps never before in the East, also "Don Quixote," which Mr. Gericke conducted eight years ago, and "Sinfonia Domestica," which Dr. Muck led two years ago, and the Strauss suite for wood-wind instruments.

First time in Boston, Bantock's comedy overture, "Pierrot"; Berlioz's overture, "Rob Roy;" Boehe's "Epilogue to a Tragedy;" Debussy's "Petite Suite;" Elgar's "The Wand of Youth," Glazounoff's "Au Moyen Age," and "Le Chant du Destin," Rachmaninoff's "The Cliffs," Reger's "Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy," op. 108 Sinding's "Rondo Infinito" and Scriabine's "Reverie." Repeated are Humperdinck's "In a Moorish Café" and the American Loeffler's "Villanelle au Diable" and "Death of Tintagiles."

Standard works, including the first, second, fourth, sixth and ninth symphonies of Beethoven, the fourth of Brahms, the seventh of Bruckner, Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," Haydn's Symphony in E flat major, Mozart's symphonies in E flat major, G minor, C major; Schumann's B flat Major and Tschaikowsky's "Manfred."

These works, for Boston, of course, will be heard in New York as far as Mr. Fiedler's more limited number of concerts here may allow.

Daily Eagle,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

SEP 22 1909

The Institute's Busy Year.

Because of the Hudson-Fulton celebration, the Institute's season will open this year earlier than usual, and, thanks to the tireless energy of Professor Hooper, it will be even more active than its predecessors.

The opening address will be delivered at the Academy this evening by Booker T. Washington, of Tuskegee, on "The Industrial and Educational Progress of the Negro." On Friday evening, the Rev. Dr. Boynton will deliver the opening address for the Hudson-Fulton celebration, with music by the Brooklyn Oratorio Society.

From that time on until the end of May there will be two lectures or exhibitions for every week day, and sometimes three, for Institute members, beside the active musical season and the series of readings and illustrated lectures, at which special provision is made for Institute members. The quality of the provision thus made is as notable as the quantity. The more important special occasions will be the Gladstone and Tennyson centennials, for which [illegible] and Mr. Gilder will deliver the addresses; the Washington birthday memorial meeting, to be devoted to Dr. E. E. Hale; the Schumannn centennial and the one hundred and fiftieth Schiller anniversary. The regular courses of lectures, covering the arts and the history of civilization, as well as the applications of science and discovery to the questions of to-day, will include some of the best known authorities in the country, among them many who have already become favorites with Institute audiences.

Perhaps the most notable advance has been made by the Department of Music, which provides the most varied and active musical season of any institution in America. There will be three series of orchestral concerts this year, instead of two. The concerts by the New York Symphony Orchestra, under Walter Damrosch, have been transferred from Saturday afternoons to Friday evenings, in order that the afternoons may be free for the series of educational concerts for young people, at which Mr. Damrosch will give explanatory talks upon the music. As usual, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which makes the backbone of our musical season, will give its concerts on Friday evenings. That arrangement insures orchestral concerts for two Friday evenings in each month, except December. The Kneisel quartet will give its usual series here, while the list of recitals includes the names of most of the prominent concert artists now in this country. There will also be two operatic performances of Weber's new seldom-heard "Der Freischutz," in November, under the direction of Arthur Claassen of Brooklyn.

For variety, quantity and quality, the programme is not to be matched. The enlightened activity of the Institute is one of the things which makes Brooklyn best worth [illegible] in.

EVENING SU[illegible]

n .....

ress ..... New York City.

SEP 23 1909

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

DIPPEL SAILING TO OPEN THE METROPOLITAN.

Annual Naval Parade of the Opera Stars in Full Swing After Next Monday—One New Face in Boston Symphony —Three Who Go West No More.

Andreas Dippel, to whom many successful features of the Metropolitan Opera were due last winter, and from whom more appears to be expected in the season to come, was to-day reported at sea on his way to New York. He sailed from Cherbourg on the Kronprinz Wilhelm, due here next Monday. With the administrative director were also Alfred Hertz, the German conducter, who will also rehearse the New Theatre operettas, Glenn Hall, a young American tenor, new to the Metropolitan this year.

Geraldine Farrar, who has a preliminary concert tour under the direction of C. A. Ellis of Boston, was reported on the same steamship, arriving on Monday. Due the same day on the Grosser Kurfuerst are two German stage managers, Anton Schertel and Kurt Stern, the latter a new man. Two new Italian conductors, Egisto Tango, who was with the last Mapleson troupe, at the Academy in 1896, and Vittorio Podesti, are due to arrive Tuesday from Naples, aboard the Prinzess Irene. Already Herbert Witherspoon has arrived by the Kaiser Wilhelm II. this week, and Rita Fornia yet earlier.

The annual migration of stars will continue each week until early November, when Caruso comes last of all from a limited opera engagement in Berlin.

From Boston's Symphony Hall, W. E. Walter sends word that that town's famous orchestra is practically unchanged from last year, for it will contain but one new member, Georg Wendler, who has succeeded Mr. Schmid as first horn and colleague of Max Hess.

Mr. Scheurer, who shared the first desk of the viola section with Mr. Ferir, has retired from the orchestra, but his place will be taken by Mr. Rennert, who was one of the recruits brought over from Europe in the second year of Dr. Muck's engagement, and although he was a viola player of note in Germany, he has been in the second violin section waiting for an opportunity to get among the violas.

Prof. Willy Hess will, of course, be concert master, and with him at the first desk will be Sylvain Noack, who will be heard this year for the first time as a soloist.

The leader of the 'cellos will again be Heinrich Warnke, with Mr. Ferir at the head of the violas, Mr. Barleben at the head of the second violin section and Mr. Keller at the head of the double basses.

Messrs. Longy, Grisez, Andre Maquarre and Sadony are the leaders in the wood wind section.

Writing in the Chicago Tribune, in the absence of W. L. Hubbard in Japan, Mr Eric De Lamarter tells of three good men who will not "go West" for 1909-10.

There will be missing several of the stalwarts of last season. Foremost is the former leader of the Musical Art Society, Clarence Dickinson. Mr. Dickinson has been for many years one of the influential musicians of Chicago; his standing as a theorist, as an organist and as an artist of high attainments is well established. As conductor of the Chicago Musical Art Society he occupied a unique position. He gave great assistance to the cult of choral music in one of its loveliest forms, that of the unaccompanied choir. Mr. Dickinson has transferred his energies to New York, "more the pity," his critic concludes.

That sterling pianist, Ernesto Consolo, will be with Chicago no more, for the fatherland has reclaimed his genius. His loss is esteemed no inconsiderable thing. He is not only a good pianist, he is an unusual musician, a chamber music player among a thousand.

Also is the celebrated violinist, Hugo Heermann, departed from the Western city. Mr. Heermann leaves behind him a large corps of admirers, for he is justly ranked among the masters of his instrument.

paper Cutting Bureau in the World

[illegible]

Brooklyn, N. Y.

SEP 25 19[illegible]

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces the following dates for their concerts in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, during the coming season: Friday evenings, November 12, December 10, January 14, February 25, March 25. The following artists have been so far engaged to appear as soloists with the orchestra: Charles Gilibert, baritone; Mme. Samaroff, pianist; Elman, violinist, and Professor Willy Hess, Violinist.

[35]

[illegible]

New York City.

SEP 26 1909

MAX FIEDLER, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed for America on Sept. 25, bringing a great deal of new music which is to be played by the orchestra during the coming season. Noticeable on his list are four works by Frederick Delius: "Paris," "Appalachia," "In a Summer Garden," and "Brigg Fair." The Finnish composer, Sibelius, is to be represented by four works new to Boston, some of which, however, have been played elsewhere in America. They are the "Swahnevit" Suite, opus 54, "En Saga," symphonic poem, "Night Ride and Sunrise," symphonic poem, Opus 55, and "The Swan of Tuonela." Richard Strauss's first tone poem, "Macbeth," will be performed for the first time in Boston. Theodore Thomas played it in Chicago several years ago. Mr. Fiedler also proposes to do the "Sinfonia Domestica" and "Don Quixote."

* *

[illegible] the French baritone who

STAATS ZEITUNG

om .....

dress ..... New York City.

te [illegible] 26

Die Leitung des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, über dessen Pläne wir im letzten Sonntagsblatt berichtet haben, theilt das Engagement folgender Solisten für diese Konzerte mit: Es sind die Damen Schumann-Heink, Sembrich, Farrar, Homer, Carreño, Olga Samaroff, Tilly Koenen und Hissem de Moß und die Herren Ferruccio Busoni, Mischa Elman, Fritz Kreisler, Willy Heß, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Heinrich Warnke, Sylvain Noack.

* *

WORLD

..... New York City.

ss ..... SEP 26 19[illegible]

Boston Symphony Plans.

Max Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who arrives here from Liverpool this week, is bringing much new music to be played by the orchestra this season. Noticeable on his list are four works by Frederick Delius—"Paris," "Appalachia," "In a Summer Garden" and "Brigg Fair." The Finnish composer Sibelius is represented by four works [illegible] Boston at least and probably to most of the country. They are the "Swannevit" suite, Opus 54; "En Saga," symphonic poem; "Night Ride and Sunrise," symphonic poem, Opus 55, and "The Swan of Tuonela."

One of the interesting features of the season will be a performance for the first time here of Richard Strauss's first tone poem "Macbeth." It was played by Theodore Thomas in Chicago several years ago, but has never been on a programme in the East. Fiedler also purposes to perform "Don Quixote," which Gericke brought out eight years ago. He also announces the "Sinfonia Domestica" and the suite for wood wind instruments.

Soloists who will be heard with the orchestra—many of them at the New York concerts—are: Misses Geraldine Farrar, Olga Samaroff and Tilly Koenen, Mmes. Louise Homer, Schumann-Heink, Marcella Sembrich, Teresa Carreno and Mary Hissem de Moss and Messrs. Ferruccio Busoni, Mischa Elman, Fritz Kreisler, Willy Hess, Sylvain Noack, Serge Rachmaninoff and Heinrich Warnke.

* * *

[illegible] Citizen,

Br[illegible] N. Y.

SEP 26 19[illegible]

NOTABLE PROGRAMME.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Have a Wealth of New Works for Its Concerts.

Max Fielder, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is rapidly tuning his aggregation of 96 musicians up to concert pitch, for the organization will open in Boston, Oct. 9, its series of Saturday night concerts and the day before will begin a series of Friday afternoon rehearsals. A goodly number of famous artists have been secured to assist the orchestra, and among these are: Geraldine Farrar, Louise Homer, Tilly Koenen, Mary Hissem de Moss, Marcella Sembrich, Mme. Schuman-Heink, Teresa Carreno, Olga Samaroff, Ferruccio Busoni, Mischa Elman, Willy Hess, Fritz Kreisler, Sylvain Noack, Serge Rachmanioff and Heinrich Warnke.

This will be the twenty-ninth season of this famous orchestra, and, to make it notable, Conductor H. Fielder has made up a programme, including a number of compositions, all of which are novelties and some of which have never been played in this country. Besides several suites and symphonic poems by Sibelius, some of these are: Debussy's "Petit Suite;" Delius' "Paris," "Appalachia," "In a Summer Garden," and "Brigg Fair;" Elgar's "The Wand of Youth" suite; Glazounoff's "Au Moyen Age" suite and duo, "Le Chant du Destin;" Rachmanio's "The Cliffs," a symphonic poem; Sinding's "Rondo Infinito;" Scriabine's "Reverie;" Strauss' "Macbeth," "Dance from Salome," and "Suite for Wood Wind," the overture from Berlioz' "Rob Roy," and Boehe's "Epilogue to a Tragedy."

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

ss New York City.

SEP 25

Musical Notes.

THE management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that the time limit in which holders of season tickets of last year may renew their subscriptions is Oct. 9. Seats which are not retained by that date will be offered for sale to the public. The sale of season tickets to new subscribers will open at the ticket office of Carnegie Hall on Monday morning, Oct. 9. The following is a partial list of the soloists engaged for the two series of five concerts each: Mesdames Sembrich, Schumann-Heink, Samaroff, and Messrs. Rachmaninoff (his first appearance in New York), Gilibert, Mischa Elman, Willy Hess. Others are to be announced.

From Daily Citizen,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date SEP 26

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces the following dates for their concerts in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, during the coming season: Friday evenings, November 12, December 10, January 14, February 25 and March 25. The following artists have so far been engaged to appear as soloists with the orchestra: Charles Gilbert, baritone; Samaroff, pianist; Elman, violinist, and Willy Hess, violinist. These concerts are given under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute.

...ine World

om Standard Union, ddress Brooklyn, N. Y.

ate SEP 26

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces the following dates for their concerts in the Academy of Music during the coming season: Friday evenings, Nov. 12, Dec. 10, Jan. 14, Feb. 25, March 25. The following artists have been so far engaged to appear as soloists with the orchestra: Charles Gilibert, baritone; Samaroff, pianist; Elman, violinist, and Prof. Willy Hess, violinist. These concerts are given under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute.

...ines Bureau Since 1888 Compiled

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

ess

Sergei Rachmaninoff, the distinguished composer-pianist, is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in one of his own compositions as well as being the soloist on the same program when he appears with this organization in New York on November 13. In his appearance with the other orchestral organizations, such as the New York Symphony, the Russian, the Philadelphia, the Chicago and the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestras, he will also conduct his second symphony, which has been played several times during the past year. Pachmaninoff's New York recital on Saturday afternoon, November 20, will be made up entirely of his own compositions, including a group of [illegible] famous Preludes.

Daily Eagle,

ss Brooklyn, N. Y.

OCT - 2 1909

The prospects for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra are to give this winter in the Academy of Music are particularly bright. Last year was the most successful season the orchestra has ever had in Brooklyn, and the coming season should be even better than 1908-1909. Mr. Fiedler, of course, returns at the head of the orchestra. It is not going too far to say that Brooklyn liked him as well as any other conductor the orchestra has had. The soloists announced are: Gilibert, the baritone of the Manhattan Opera Company; Olga Samaroff, the brilliant pianist, who has returned to America after having had most gratifying successes in Europe last year; Mischa Elman, the sensational young Russian violinist, and Professor Willy Hess, the concert master of the

Standard Union,

ss Brooklyn, N. Y.

SEP 25 1909

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces the following dates for its concerts in the Academy of Music during the coming season: Friday evenings, Nov. 12, Dec. 10, Jan. 14, Feb. 25, March 25.

EVENING SUN,

om

ddress New York City.

ate OCT 2

Max Fiedler, arriving by the Mauretania, went on to Boston to-day after hearing the good news that practically all of the Boston Symphony Orchestra subscribers here last year in Carnegie Hall have renewed for the coming season, and that, with the new applications on hand, the subscription for 1909-1910 will be the largest in the history of the premier symphony of the world. Old subscribers have yet until next Saturday, while the new ones take their turn one week from Monday.

Louise Homer is soloist meanwhile at the first pair of Boston concerts next Friday and Saturday, which Mr. Fiedler opens with Beethoven's "Consecration of the House," Strauss's "Don Juan" and a Brahms symphony. In the first month's bills are novelties by Reger, Bantock, Tschaikowsky and Rachmaninoff. The last named makes his début in October and Geraldine Farrar is soloist in November before the orchestra's first trip here.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

ss New York City.

OCT 3 - 1909

Sonatas by Beethoven, Locatelli, Brahms, Grieg, Pie... Dvorak, Hastings and Enesco are promised during the coming ... of recitals by Mr. and Mrs. David Mannes at the S... Theatre.

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that practically all of last season's subscribers for the series of concert in Carnegie Hall have renewed for the coming season. With the new application the subscription for 1909-1910 will be the largest in its history. The dates of the evening concerts will be Thursday evenings, Nov. 11, Dec. 9, Jan. 13, Feb. 24 and March 24, while the dates of the afternoon concerts are to be Saturdays, Nov. 13, Dec. 11, Jan. 15, Feb. 26 and March 26. Subscribers of last year have until next Saturday, the 9th, in which to renew their subscriptions. The sale of tickets will be open for new subscribers at the box office in Carnegie Hall on Monday morning, October 11.

om

dress Union,

te Brooklyn, N. Y.

OCT - 3 1909

The prospects for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra are to give this winter in the Academy of Music are particularly bright. Last year was the most successful season the orchestra has ever had in this city, and the coming season should be even better than 1908-1909. Mr. Fiedler, of course, returns at the head of the orchestra. It is not going too far to say that Brooklyn liked him better than any other conductor the orchestra has had. His skill in making programmes, his genial personality, combined with his musicianly and interpretive ability, made him quite a unique figure in the musical life of this city.

The soloists announced are: Gilibert, the baritone, of the Manhattan Opera Company; Olga Samaroff, the brilliant pianist, who has returned to America after having had most gratifying successes in Europe last year; Mischa Elman, the sensational young Russian violinist, and Prof. Willy Hess, the great concertmaster of the orchestra.

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date 2 - 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that practically all of last year's subscribers for the series of concerts in Carnegie Hall have renewed their subscriptions for the coming season, and with the new applications that are on hand the subscription for 1909-'10 will be the largest in its history.

The dates of the evening concerts are Thursday evenings, November 11, December 9, January 13, February 24 and March 24, while the dates of the afternoon concerts are Saturdays, November 13, December 11, January 15, February 26 and March 26. Subscribers of last year have until next Saturday, the 9th, in which to renew their subscriptions. The sale of tickets will be open for new subscribers at the box office in Carnegie Hall on Monday morning, October 11.

...Bureau in the World

Standard Union,

n Brooklyn, N. Y.

ress

OCT 9 - 1909

The first of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's five concerts at the Academy of Music, under Institute auspices, this season, will be held Friday evening, Nov. 12.

TIMES

New York City.

OCT 3 - 1909

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that the time limit in which holders of season tickets of last year may renew their subscriptions is Oct. 9. Seats which are not retained by that date will be offered for sale to the public. The following is a partial list of soloists engaged for the New York concerts: Mmes. Sembrich, Schumann-Heink and Samaroff, and Messrs. Rachmaninoff, Gilibert, Mischa Elman, and Willy Hess. Others will be announced later.

STAATS ZEITUNG

om

ldress New York City.

te OCT 4

Von unseren Symphonie-Konzerten.

Die Leitung des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters theilt mit, daß fast alle letztjährigen Abonnenten für die beiden Konzertserien in Carnegie Hall ihre Sitze für die zu beginnende Saison beibehalten haben, so daß es unschwer sei, vorauszusehen, daß die zu beginnende Saison die größte in der Geschichte der berühmten Organisation sein werde.

Die Daten der Donnerstag Abend-Konzerte sind: der 11. November, 9. Dezember, 13. Januar, 24. Februar und 24. März, während die Samstag Nachmittags-Konzerte an folgenden Tagen abgehalten werden: 13. November, 11. Dezember, 15. Januar, 26. Februar und 26. März.

Die letztjährigen Abonnenten können ihre Subskriptionen bis Samstag den 9. Oktober erneuern; am 11. Oktober beginnt der Verkauf der Tickets für neu hinzutretende Abonnenten.

Daily Citizen,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

OCT - 6 1909

The prospects for the five concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give this winter at the Academy of Music are particularly bright. Last year was the most successful season the orchestra has ever had in this city and the coming season should be even better than 1908-09. Mr. Fielder, of course, returns at the head of the orchestra. It is not going too far to say that Brooklyn liked him better than any other conductor the orchestra has had.

The soloists announced are Gilibert, the baritone of the Manhattan Opera Company; Olga Samaroff, the brilliant pianist, who has returned to America after having many successes in Europe last year; Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, and Prof. Willy Hess, the concertmaster of the orchestra.

n of their with a

ress

OCT 9

For the five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music on Friday evenings, November 12, December 10, January 14, February 25, and March 25, the soloists so far announced are: Gilibert, the popular baritone of the Manhattan Opera Company, Madame Olga Samaroff, the American pianist whose playing is remembered in Brooklyn, Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, who made so deep an impression a year ago, and Prof. Willy Hess, the concert master of the Orchestra, who is an interesting representative of the classic school of violin playing. Last year's subscribers have the privilege of renewing their subscriptions and retaining the seats they had last season up to October 25. On October 28 such season tickets as are unclaimed will be placed on sale at the Brooklyn Institute.

WORLD

New York City.

The sale of season tickets for the two series of concerts the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Carnegie Hall will open in the box office tomorrow morning. There will be five concerts on Thursday evenings, and five on Saturday afternoons. The list of soloists already engaged comprises three singers, two pianists and two violinists. The singers are Madame Marcella Sembrich, Madame Schumann-Heink and M. Gilbert. Among the new works which Fiedler expects to give here are Max Reger's "Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy," op. 108; Richard Strauss's "Macbeth" and "Don Quixote;" Frederick Delius's "Paris," Granville Bantock's comic overture, "Pierrot of the Minute," and Sibelius's "En Saga."

[36]

EVENING SUN,

New York City.

ss

OCT 5 - 1909

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

ETERNAL VIGILANCE AND LIFE IN BOSTON.

A Story from the Hub with a Surprise in the Last Chapter—Also Another Story Not in a Stage Heroine's Memoirs—Sembrich and Gadski Here.

Here's a story with not so much a moral as a surprise in the last chapter. As the Boston Herald tells it, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has for years held an entire second balcony of 505 seats each Friday afternoon in reserve for the supporters who spend hours each week in Huntington avenue waiting for the Symphony Hall doors to open. These seats are sold for 25 cents each. There are no tickets of admission. The crowd pay their money as they enter the hall.

"In only this manner," says the story, "has it been possible to thwart ticket speculators, for the seats might easily bring $1 and on special occasions even more, for they are among the best in the house."

All this apropos of the annual auction, just concluded, of the better seats in the hall. The story continues:

"These auction sales are a relic of the early days in the old Music Hall. Even in those simple days the prices were low, and as the cost of maintaining the orchestra began to increase, the annual deficit increased in like ratio, for from the beginning Music Hall was crowded twice a week, yet no move was made by the management to increase the prices and the impulse came from the patrons of the concerts themselves.

"The inconvenience of securing season tickets became almost intolerable, for the line sometimes formed two days before the opening of the sale. Moreover as the value of the concerts was out proportion to the prices charged, and as the application for seats was larger than the supply, the speculators began to reap. It was then at the request of some of the patrons that a limited number of the choicest seats were sold in this way, but the plan gained so in favor that several years before the orchestra moved to Symphony Hall every seat in the house was sold by auction.

"Through all these years the original upset price was maintained until the fall of 1906. The prime reason for a move was to shorten and simplify the auction sales. It had been found that practically none of the $12 seats brought less than a $6 premium, and that none of the $7.50 seats had brought a premium of less than $2.50, so that the raising of the price merely meant so much time saved by cutting out the early bids.

"In recent years, however, one decided change has been noted in the conducting of the auction sales. Each year more of the regular patrons have been putting their orders for seats into the hands of commissioners."

If there's a moral to that truthful narrative, it appears to be that a "commissioner" by another name would sound like a "speculator" with wings of a stage angel and captain of industry combined.

Max Fiedler to-morrow gives his first concert of the season as a part of the inaugural of President Lowell of Harvard in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

EVENING SUN,

m

lress New York City.

e OCT 9 - 1909

All the great orchestra books are open at the several box offices in Carnegie Hall. Here in some cases the time for renewal ends to-day and the Boston Symphony tickets will be offered to all-comers, beginning on Monday morning.

Monday's opportunity is, however, the first for old subscribers at the Philharmonic window. They have from Oct. 11 to Oct. 18, and the Saturday night holdings are good for Thursdays under the new régime.

The New York Symphony, now playing West, has sixteen Sunday afternoons at the New Theatre; eight Tuesday evenings and six young people's concerts at Carnegie Hall; five Friday evenings and five young people's concerts at the Brooklyn Academy, and four symphony concerts each in Montclair and Orange.

Late returns from Boston say that, while the well subscribed opera is a competitor for the first time, the symphony orchestra subscription is the largest in twenty-eight years.

Ten years the Boston Symphony Orchestra has invited Sembrich to go East also as a soloist, only to find her engagements at the Metropolitan Opera House conflicting. This year C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, has combined concert tours and so secured the star for several concerts, of which one will be in New York.

Mr. Ellis also has Schumann-Heink, who has not appeared here with his orchestra in several years. It is understood that she will sing for the first time in Boston and New York a "scena" for contralto and orchestra, written for her by Frederick S. Converse, whose opera, "The Pipe of Desire," is scheduled for the New ... Theatre.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISE

ss ..... New York City.

OCT 9

The Boston Orchestra.

THE sale of season tickets for the two series of concerts the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Carnegie Hall during the coming winter will open at the box office, Carnegie Hall, Monday morning, Oct. 11, at 9 o'clock. As in past years, there will be five concerts on Thursday evenings and five concerts on Saturday afternoons. The dates for the evening concerts are Nov. 11, Dec. 9, Jan. 13, Feb. 24, and March 24, the concerts beginning at 8.15 o'clock. The dates of the five Saturday concerts are Nov. 13, Dec. 11, Jan. 15, Feb. 26, and March 26, the concerts beginning at 2.30 o'clock.

A particularly good series of concerts is promised. Not only is the list of soloists one of the most attractive that the orchestra has ever offered in New York, but Mr. Fiedler, the conductor, has planned programmes which are certain to maintain the enviable reputation he made last season in his arrangement of programmes. He promises a number of new works of more than ordinary interest and the revival of older works which are not often heard.

The list of soloists already engaged comprises three singers, two pianists, and two violinists. The singers are Mme Marcella Sembrich, Mme Schumann-Heink, and Mr. Gilibert.

Sergei Rachmaninoff and Mme Olga Samaroff are the pinanists that have been engaged, the former making his first appearance in New York with the Boston orchestra. It is not unlikely that he will appear in the three-fold capacity of pianist, composer, and conductor. He is to play his own concerto in C sharp minor, and Mr. Fielder purposes placing on the programme his symphonic poem, "The Cliffs." The two violinists are Mischa Elman, who will play at both the evening and the afternoon concert in January, and Prof. Willy Hess, the concertmaster of the orchestra.

The orchestra has practically the same personnel as last year, only two changes being noted, one in the 'cello section and a new alternate first horn.

Among the new works which Mr. Fielder expects to present in New York are Max Reger's Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy, Op. 108; Richard Strauss's "Macbeth" and "Don Quixote," Frederick Delius's "Paris," Granville Bantock's comedy overture, "Pierrot of the Minuet," and Sibelius's "En Saga."

NEW YORK PRESS,

m ..... New York City.

dress .....

OCT 10

The sale of season tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's two series of concerts in Carnegie Hall will open in the Carnegie Hall box office to-morrow morning at 9 o'clock. As in other years there will be five concerts on Thursday evenings and five concerts on Saturday afternoons. The dates for the evening concerts are November 11, December 9, January 13, February 24 and March 24; the dates for the matinees, November 13, December 11, January 15, February 26 and March 26.

A particularly interesting series of concerts is promised. Not only is the list of soloists an attractive one, but Fiedler, the conductor, has planned programmes which are certain to maintain the reputation he made last season as a purveyor of music. He promises a number of new works of more than ordinary interest and the revival of older works not often heard.

The list of soloists will comprise three singers, two pianists and two violinists. The singers are Sembrich, Schumann-Heink and Gilibert. It is nearly ten years since the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been able to have Sembrich as a soloist, for always in the past her engagements at the opera house have conflicted with the orchestra's only available dates. Neither has Mme. Schumann-Heink appeared here with the orchestra in several years.

She will sing for the first time in New York a scene for contralto and orchestra, written for her by Frederick S. Converse, whose opera, "The Pipe of Desire," is scheduled for performance this winter in the New Theatre.

Rachmaninoff and Olga Samaroff are the pianists, the former making his first appearance in New York with the Boston Symphony. He will probably appear in the threefold capacity of pianist, composer and conductor. He is to play his own concerto in C sharp minor, and Fiedler intends to place on the programme the pianist's symphonic poem, "The Cliffs." Mme. Samaroff has been playing abroad with much success since she was last heard here.

The two violinists engaged are Mischa Elman, who will play at both the evening and afternoon concerts in January, and Professor Willy Hess, the concertmaster of the orchestra. The Boston band has practically the same personnel as last year, only two changes being noted.

Among the modern works Fiedler expects to produce in New York are Max Reger's Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy, opus 103; Richard Strauss's "Macbeth" and "Don Quixote," Frederick Delius's "Paris," Granville Bantock's comedy overture, "Pierrot of the Minute" and Sibelius's "En Saga."

HERALD

ess ..... New York City.

OCT 10

Among the list of soloists engaged for the New York concerts of the Boston Orchestra, under Mr. Fiedler's direction, are Mme. Sembrich, soprano; Mme. Schumann-Heink, coptralto; Mr. Gilibert, barytone; Mme. Olga Samaroff and Mr. Sergii Rachmaninoff, pianists; Mr. Mischa Elman and Mr. Willy Hess, violinists. Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing here for the first time a scene for contralto and orchestra, by Mr. Frederick S. Converse, whose opera "The Pipe of Desire," is underlined for production in the New Theatre. Mr. Rachmaninoff, who will appear as pianist, composer and conductor, will play his own C sharp minor concerto and conduct his symphonic poem, "The Cliffs." Among the important modern works to be given here this season by the Boston Orchestra are Reger's "Symphonic Prologue to [illegible] Mr. Richard Strauss' "Macbeth" and "Don Quixote," Mr. Frederick [illegible] Mr. Granville Bantock's [illegible] Pierrot of the Minute," [illegible]

From STAATS ZEITUNG

Address ..... New York City.

OCT 10 1909

Date .....

Der Verkauf der Saison-Tickets für die zwei Konzert-Serien des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters beginnt in Carnegie Hall morgen, Montag, den 11., Vormittag. Wie in den vergangenen Jahren finden auch diesmal fünf Donnerstag Abend- und fünf Samstag Nachmittag-Konzerte statt, deren Daten wie folgt festgesetzt wurden: An Donnerstagen, 11. November, 9. Dezember, 13. Januar, 24. Februar und 24. März und an Samstag Nachmittagen: 13. November, 11. Dezember, 15. Januar, 26. Februar und 26. März.

Die bisher engagirte Liste der Solisten umfaßt drei Sänger, zwei Pianisten und zwei Violinisten. Die Sänger sind Marcella Sembrich, Ernestine Schumann-Heink und Herr Gilibert vom Manhattan Opera House. Zehn Jahre lang haben sich die Bostoner vergeblich bemüht, Frau Sembrich zur Mitwirkung heranzuziehen; immer wieder machte ihre Thätigkeit am Metropolitan Opera House diesen Plan zu nichte. Auch Frau Schumann-Heink hat man seit mehreren Jahren nicht im Rahmen des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters bewundern können. Die große Künstlerin wird hier u. a. eine für sie von Frederick S. Converse eigens geschriebene Scene für Alt mit Orchesterbegleitung singen. Der genannte Musiker ist bekanntlich der Komponist der in der kommenden Saison im New Theatre aufzuführenden komischen Oper „The Pipe of Desire".

Die Pianisten sind Sergei Rachmaninoff und Olga Samaroff. Der Erstere dürfte wahrscheinlich als Pianist, Komponist und Dirigent auftreten. Die Violinisten sind Mischa Elman, welcher in beiden Januarkonzerten mitwirken wird, und Professor Willy Heß, der Konzertmeister des Orchesters.

Unter den vom Dirigenten Herrn Fiedler vorzuführenden Novitäten befinden sich Max Reger's Symphonischer Prolog zu einer Tragödie, op. 108, Richard Strauß' „Macbeth" und „Don Quixote", Friedrich

KAPELLMEISTER MAX FIEDLER

Delius „Paris", Granville's „Bentock", Ouverture „Pierrot of the Minute" und Sibelius „En Saga".

* * *

[illegible] Paper Cutting Bureau in the World

n .....

ress ..... OCT 10 1909

Prof. Franklin W. Hooper, of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, reports that renewals by last year's subscribers for the Boston Symphony Orchestra are coming in in the most gratifying manner, and that the coming season will be as equally successful as last season. The five concerts will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evenings, Nov. 12, Dec. 10, Jan. 14, Feb. 25 and March 25. The soloists so far announced are: Gilibert, the popular baritone of the Manhattan Opera Company; Madame Olga Samaroff, the American pianist, whose playing is so gratefully remembered in Brooklyn; Mischa Elman, the remarkable Russian violinist, who made so deep an impression a year ago; and Prof. Willy Hess, the concert-master of the orchestra, who is unquestionably the greatest representative of the classic school of violin now before the public. Last year's subscribers have the privilege of renewing their subscriptions and retaining the seats they had last season up to Oct. 25. On Oct. 28 such season tickets as are unclaimed will be placed on sale at the Institute of Arts and Sciences.

WORLD

s ..... New York City

OCT 3 - 1909

Music Notes.

The dates of the evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are Thursday evenings, Nov. 11, Dec. 9, Jan. 13, Feb. 24 and March 24. The afternoon concerts will be on Saturdays, Nov. 13, Dec. 11, Jan. 15, Feb. 26 and March 26.

[37]

From NEW YORK AMERICAN,

ddress ..... New York City.

ate .....

OCT 10

To-morrow morning the sale of season tickets for the two series of concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give here during the coming winter will open at the box office, Carnegie Hall. As in past years there will be five concerts on Thursday evenings and five concerts on Saturday afternoons. The dates have been announced.

Particularly interesting programmes are promised, under the direction of Mr. Fiedler. New works of more than ordinary importance will be produced and older works, not often heard, revived. The list of soloists, already engaged, comprises three singers, two pianists and two violinists. The singers are Madame Marcella Sembrich, Madame Schumann-Heink and M. Gilbert. Roumaninoff and Olga Samaroff are the pianists engaged. The former will make his first appearance in New York with the Boston Symphony, possibly in the three-fold capacity of pianist, composer and conductor. He is to play his own concerto in C sharp minor and Mr. Fiedler purposes placing on the programme his symphonic poem "The Cliffs." Mme. Samaroff has been playing abroad with much success since she was last here. The two violinists are Mischa Elman, who will play at both the evening and afternoon concerts in January, and Professor Willy Hess, the concert-master of the orchestra, who is to produce in New York are Max Reger's Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy, Op. 108; Richard Strauss's "Macbeth" and "Don Quixote;" Frederick Delius's "Paris;" Granville Bantock's Comedy Overture, "Pierrot of the Minute" and Sibelius's "En Saga."

From TRIBUNE

Address ..... New York City.

Date .....

OCT 10 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The sale of season tickets for the two series of concerts the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Carnegie Hall during the coming winter will open at the box office, Carnegie Hall, to-morrow morning at 9 o'clock. As in past years, there will be five concerts on Thursday evenings and five concerts on Saturday afternoons.

The list of soloists already engaged comprises three singers, two pianists and two violinists. The singers are Mme. Marcella Sembrich, Mme. Schumann-Heink and Mr. Gilibert, of the Manhattan Opera House. It is nearly ten years since the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been able to have Mme. Sembrich as a soloist, for always in the past her engagements at the opera house have conflicted with the only available dates of the orchestra. This year, however, Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, has been able to get her for several concerts, of which that in New York is one. Neither has Mme. Schumann-Heink appeared here with the orchestra in several years. It is understood that she will sing here for the first time in New York a scena for contralto and orchestra which was written for her at her request by Frederick S. Converse, whose opera, "The Pipe of Desire," is scheduled for performance this winter at the New Theatre.

Rachmaninoff and Olga Samaroff are the pianists that have been engaged, the former making his first appearance in New York with the Boston Symphony. He is to play his own concerto in C sharp minor, and Mr. Fiedler purposes placing on his programme his symphonic poem, "The Cliffs."

The two violinists are Mischa Elman, who will play at both the evening and afternoon concerts in January, and Willy Hess, the concertmaster of the orchestra.

The orchestra has practically the same personnel as last year, only two changes being noted, one in the 'cello section and a new alternate first horn.

Among the new works which Mr. Fiedler expects to produce in New York are Max Reger's Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy, Op. 108; Richard Strauss's "Macbeth" and "Don Quixote," Frederick Delius's "Paris," Granville Bantock's comedy overture, "Pierrot of the Minute," and Sibelius's "En Saga."

CALL

ss .....

* * * *

Sergei Rachmaninoff is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in one of his own compositions, as well as being the soloist on the same program when he appears with this organization in New York on November 13. In his appearances with the other orchestral organizations, such as the New York Symphony, the Russian, the Philadelphia, the Chicago and the Cincinnati Symphony orchestras, he will also conduct his second symphony. Mr. Rachmaninoff's New York recital on Saturday afternoon, November 20, will be made up entirely of his own compositions, including a group of his "Preludes."

Daily Citizen,

m .....

Brooklyn, N. Y.

lress .....

OCT 16 1909

A cable from Rachmaninoff to the Wolfsohn Musical Bureau, announces that the distinguished Russian composer-pianist will arrive in this country on Oct. 26, aboard the Kron Prinz Wilhelm. He will immediately leave for Boston, where he is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Oct. 28 and 30. His first New York appearance will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Nov. 13, and in his own recital in Carnegie Hall on Nov. 20, at which time his new Sonata, "Op. 20," will be included in his programme.

[illegible] MORNING TELEGRAPH

ress ..... NEW YORK CITY

OCT 10 1909

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sale of season tickets for the two series of concerts the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Carnegie Hall during the coming Winter will open at the box office, Carnegie Hall, tomorrow morning at 9 o'clock. As in past years, there will be five concerts on Thursday evenings and five on Saturday afternoons. The dates for the evening concerts are November 11, December 9, January 13, February 24 and March 24, beginning at 8.15 o'clock. The dates of the five Saturday concerts are November 13, December 11, January 15, February 26 and March 26, beginning at 2.30 o'clock.

A particularly good series of concerts is promised. Not only is the list of soloists one of the most attractive that the orchestra has ever offered in New York, but Mr. Fiedler, the conductor, has planned programmes which are certain to maintain the enviable reputation he made last season in his arrangement of programmes. He promises a number of new works of more than ordinary interest and the revival of older works which are not often heard.

The list of soloists already engaged are three singers, two pianists and two violinists. The singers are Madame Marcella Sembrich, Madame Schumann-Heink and M. Gilibert. It is nearly ten years since the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been able to have Madame Sembrich as a soloist, for always in the past her engagements at the opera house have conflicted with the only available dates the orchestra had. This year, however, Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, has been able to secure her for several concerts, of which that in New York is one. Neither has Madame Schumann-Heink appeared here with the orchestra in several years. It is understood that she will sing here for the first time in New York a scena for contralto and orchestra which was written for her at her request by Frederick S. Converse, whose opera, "The Pipe of Desire," is scheduled for performance this Winter at the New Theatre.

Rachmaninoff and Olga Samaroff are the pianists that have been engaged, the former making his first appearance in New York with the Boston Symphony. It is not unlikely that he will appear in the threefold capacity of pianist, composer and conductor. He is to play his own concerto in C-sharp minor, and Mr. Fiedler purposes placing on the programme his symphonic poem, "The Cliffs." Madame Samaroff has been playing abroad with much success since she was last here.

The two violinists are Mischa Elman, who will play at both the evening and afternoon concerts in January, and Professor Willy Hess, the concert-master of the orchestra.

The orchestra has practically the same personnel of last year, only two changes being noted—one in the 'cello section and a new alternate first horn.

Among the new works which Mr. Fiedler expects to do in New York are Max Reger's Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy, Op. 108; Richard Strauss' "Macbeth" and "Don Quixote," Frederick Delius' "Paris," Granville Bantock's Comedy Overture, "Pierrot of the Minute," and Sibelius' "En Saga."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

om .....

EVENING SUN,

dress ..... New York City.

te ..... OCT 11 1

One public service of Max Fiedler, who opened the Boston Symphony season with a pair of concerts at the week's end, has been to call national attention to his youngest fellow artist among the leaders of the great American orchestras. That man is Fred Stock of Chicago.

The first Boston concerts with Louise Homer, the contralto of the Metropolitan, as soloist, had this characteristic programme: Beethoven, overture, "The Dedication of the House"; Brahms, Symphony No. 2; Saint-Saens, "La Fiancée du Timbalier;" Strauss, "Don Juan," and Mrs. Homer's songs with orchestra, including Liszt's "Loreley." Brahms's "Sapphische Ode" and Schubert's "Die Allmacht," the last two orchestrated by Frederick Stock.

That Fiedler often reminds his hearers of Theodore Thomas, whom Stock succeeded, may explain a certain sympathy or likeness of personality between these two men.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Daily Citizen,

s .....

Brooklyn, N. Y.

OCT 16 1909

Madame Olga Samaroff, who is announced as soloist here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second concert on Friday evening, Dec. 10, has begun her season's work with a series of seven concerts in which she is associated with Miss Geraldine Farrar, of the Metropolitan Opera House, under the direction of Charles A. Ellis, of Boston. Her first appearance of the season was last Tuesday night in Springfield, Mass., where she played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and had an enormous success. Not ony was the audience most enthusiastic over her, but the members of the orchestra applauded her as heartily. The general feeling in the orchestra, with whom she has played several times in the past, that her art has grown tremendously in the last year and that her position as the first pianist of her generation now before the public is more firmly assured than ever.

NEWS

Baltimore, Md.

OCT 16 190

SALE OF SEATS FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

Usual Quota Of Five Concerts Will Be Given This Winter At Lyric.

The annual subscription sale of seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at Albaugh's ticket office, corner of Charles and Fayette streets, Monday morning text. The usual quota of five concerts will be given during the winter in the Lyric. The dates are Wednesday evenings, November 10, December 8, January 12 and March 23 and Tuesday evening, February 22. Particular attention is called to the fact that the February concert will come on Tuesday instead of the traditional Wednesday. Local conditions in Washington have made it necessary to change the date and day of this concert.

Daily Eagle,

n .....

ress .....

Brooklyn, N. Y.

OCT 16 1909

Mme. Olga Samaroff, who announced as soloist here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second concert on Friday evening, December 10, has begun her season's work with a series of seven concerts, in which she is associated with Miss Geraldine Farrar of the Metropolitan Opera House, under the direction of Charles A. Ellis of Boston. Her first appearance of the season was last Tuesday night in Springfield, Mass., where she played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and had a great success. Not only was the audience most enthusiastic over her, but the members of the orchestra applauded her as heartily. The general feeling in the orchestra, with whom she has played several times in the past, was that her art has grown in the last year and that her position as the first pianist of her generation now before the public, is more firmly assured than ever.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

m .....

ress .....

Times,

OCT 16 1909

A cable from Rachmaninoff to the Wolfsohn Musical Bureau announces that the distinguished Russian composer-pianist will arrive in this country on October 26, aboard the Kron Prinz Wilhelm. He will immediately leave for Boston, where he is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on October 29 and 30. His first New York appearance will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on November 13, and in his own recital in Carnegie Hall on November 20, at which time his new Sonato Op. 20 will be included in his programme.

EVENING MAIL

om .....

ddress .....

New York City.

te .....

OCT 16

The Boston Symphony sale in New York has been very large and the outlook is more promising than it has ever been. The opening concert will occur Thursday evening, November 11, with Gilibert, of the Manhattan opera company, as soloist, and Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist and composer, who will make his first appearance at the Saturday afternoon concert.

From .....

Address .....

Brooklyn, N. Y.

OCT

Mme. Olga Samaroff, who is announced as soloist here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second concert on Friday evening, Dec. 10, has begun her season's work with a series of seven concerts in which she is associated with Miss Geraldine Farrar, of the Metropolitan Opera House, under the direction of Charles A. Ellis, of Boston. Her first appearance of the season was last Tuesday night in Springfield, Mass., where she played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and had an enormous success. Not only was the audience most enthusiastic over her, but the members of the orchestra applauded her as heartily.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

New York City.

OCT 17

French music.

Charles Gilibert will be the soloist at the first New York evening concert of the Boston Symphony, on Nov. 11, at Carnegie Hall. Two days later Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist-composer, will appear with the Boston orchestra.

AMERICAN

Baltimore, Md.

OCT 17 190

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The annual subscription sale of seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at Albaugh's Ticket Office, corner Charles and Fayette streets, tomorrow (Monday) morning, October 18. The usual quota of five concerts will be given during the winter in the Lyric. The dates are Wednesday evenings, November 10, December 8, January 12 and March 23, and Tuesday evening, February 22. Particular attention should be called to the fact that the February concert will come on Tuesday evening, instead of the traditional Wednesday. Local conditions in Washington have made it necessary to change the date and day of this concert.

It is many years since the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been able to offer Baltimore such a brilliant list of soloists as that which is announced for the coming season. At present it is possible to announce but four of the five, but those four are of extraordinary high quality. There will be two singers, Marcella Sembrich and Ernestine Schumann-Heink. As is generally known, this is Madame Sembrich's last year in America. Last spring she bade farewell to the operatic stage, and this year she is making a concert tour of the country, which will end her career so far as the United States is concerned. When Madame Sembrich first began to come to America, she was soloist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra a number of times, but in recent years, owing to her many engagements in opera, it has been impossible to make arrangements for her to appear with the orchestra. This year, however, as soon as it was known that she intended to devote herself to concert work, Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, straightway engaged her as soloist for concerts in Boston, New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore. Her appearances with the orchestra in Baltimore will probably mark the last time she sings in this city; so, aside from the musical interest, there will be a sentimental interest connected with this concert.

Madame Schumann-Heink is without doubt one of the most popular singers now before the public, and her appearances with the orchestra will be welcomed by her host of admirers in this city.

Particular attention attaches to the appearance here in November with the orchestra of Serge Rachmaninoff, who will then make his first appearance in Baltimore. Rachmaninoff, since the death of Rimsky-Korsakoff, is ranked as the greatest of living Russian composers. He has to his credit two operas, two symphonies, two symphonic poems and a number of small works for piano and chamber.

The other soloist now announced is Mischa Elman. His sensational success last year is vividly remembered by all who are interested in music. It was his purpose not to return to America for the season of 1909-1910, but Mr. Ellis, the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was able to offer him a large number of engagements which persuaded his manager to come back to America for a second consecutive season. Altogether he will play with the orchestra 15 times.

Max Fiedler, of course, will be the conductor during the coming year, and the personnel of the orchestra remains practically the same as last season. There is every reason to believe that Mr. Fiedler will fully uphold the splendid reputation made last year as an arranger of programs. He has announced a most interesting number of novelties, some of which will surely be heard in Baltimore.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

REVIEW

NEW YORK

OCT 17 1909

The Henry Wolfsohn Musical Bureau have obtained the consent of Mischa Elman to prolong his forthcoming American tour until the end of April, making four months in all that he will spend here this winter. His time for January and February is completely closed. Elman's appearances in New York include two concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a recital in Carnegie Hall on January 19, an appearance with the Russian Symphony Orchestra on March 4, and three Sunday evening concerts in the Metropolitan Opera House. With the numerous private engagements he will fill during the social season, it is anticipated that he will surpass the record of twenty-six appearances which he made last winter in New York before the end of his tour.

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date OCT 17 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The sale of season tickets for the ten concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in New York in the coming winter has been in progress in Carnegie Hall for the last week and has exceeded all expectations. The subscription is by far the largest the orchestra has ever had here, and the number of seats yet on sale is limited. The outlook is that there will be few desirable seats left for sale for the single concerts.

At the first evening concert, Thursday, November 11, the soloist will be Gilibert, barytone, of the Manhattan opera company, and on the following Saturday afternoon Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist and composer, will make his debut in New York.

Serge Rachmaunioff, soloist, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric.

Mme. Sembrich, soloist, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

REVIEW

NEW YORK

OCT 17 1909

Many unusual honors are being accorded Mme. Louise Homer, both in her concert tournee preliminary to the opening of the opera season, and from the management of the opera company, of which she has been a member for the past eleven years. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has secured her for their opening concert of the season in Boston, October 8 and 9, while she is engaged to open the musical season in Harrisburg, Hartford and several other Western cities. She has been one of the artists selected for the opening performance of Boston's new opera house, as well as in the opening performances of the Metropolitan Opera Company, in New York, Brooklyn and Philadelphia. Mme. Homer returns from her concert tour on October 30.

From THE MORNING TELEGRAPH

NEW YORK City.

dress .....

OCT 17 1909

te .....

The Boston Symphony.

The sale of season tickets for the ten concerts announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York during the coming Winter has been in progress in Carnegie Hall for the past week and has exceeded all expectations. The subscription is by far the largest the orchestra has ever had here, and the number of seats yet on sale is very limited. The outlook is that there will be very few desirable seats left for sale for the single concerts.

At the first evening concert—Thursday, November 11—the soloist will be Gilibert, baritone of the Manhattan Opera Co., and on the following Saturday afternoon Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist and composer, will make his debut in New York.

The American debut of Yolanda Mero has been pushed forward several days to allow the famous Hungarian pianist to accept a number of orchestral concerts out of town that have been offered to her through the failure of another famous pianist to visit this country. These include appearances in Chicago with the new Philharmonic Society, and in St. Paul with the St. Paul Symphony Orchestra. The positive date for Yolanda Mero's American debut has been set for Wednesday evening, November 3, in Carnegie Hall, when she will have the assistance of the Russian Symphony Orchestra, Modest Altschuler, conductor.

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date OCT 17 1909

A cable message from Rachmaninoff to the Wolfsohn Musical Bureau announces that the Russian composer and pianist will arrive in this country on October 26. He will go immediately to Boston, where he is to conduct performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on October 29 and 30. His first New York appearances will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on November 13, and in his own recital in Carnegie Hall, on November 20, at which time his new sonata, Op. 20, will be included in his programme.

MORGEN JOURNAL

ss .....

* * * *

Der russische Komponist und Pianist Rachmanioff kommt am 26. Oktober mit dem „Kronprinz Wilhelm" hier an. Er wird am 13. November mit dem Boston Symphonie-Orchester hier konzertiren und am 20. November in Carnegie Hall sein eigenes Konzert geben.

* * * *

Frau Gisela Weber wird am Freitag, den 5. November, Abends, in Mendelssohn Hall ihr Debut als Sängerin machen.

* * * *

Die Symphonie-Gesellschaft von New York wird am 7. November unter Walter Damrosch's Leitung die Saison eröffnen. Die Liste der bisher hier unbekannten Werke, die zur Aufführung gelangen werden, ist recht lang. Sie umfaßt: „Heidnisches Gedicht" nach Virgil's Hirtengedichten von Chas. Martin, dramatische Ouverture „Paolo und Francesca" von Arne Oldberg, „Zar und Sultan", eine Reihe von Tongemälden, Scherzo von Karl Goldmark, 3. Süite von Moszkowsky, „Le Printemps" von Alexander Glazonnor, Werke von Debrossy, eine im Fünfvierteltakt geschriebene Ballade Liadow's, Tschaikowsky's „Symphonie Pathetique" u. s. w.

STAATS ZEITUNG

om .....

New York City.

dress .....

te .....

Wie die Leitung des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters mittheilt, übertrifft das diesjährige Abonnement für die zehn New Yorker Konzerte des berühmten Orchesters selbst die rosigsten Erwartungen. Es ist der größte Andrang, der bisher beobachtet wurde, und die Zahl der für den Verkauf für die einzelnen Konzerte übrig bleibenden Sitze wird eine sehr beschränkte sein.

Der Solist des ersten, am 11. November Abend stattfindenden Konzerts ist Herr Gilibert, der Bariton des Manhattan Opera House, und für das nächstfolgende Samstag-Konzert der bekannte russische Komponist und Pianist Herr Rachmaninoff, der bei dieser Gelegenheit sein Debut in New York machen wird.

Die Oratorien-Gesellschaft wird während der kommenden Saison vier Abend- und ein Nachmittags-Konzert geben. Im ersten Abend-Konzert am 1. Dezember gelangt Beethoven's Messe in D. zur Aufführung. In den beiden Weihnachts-Konzerten am Nachmittag des 28. und am Abend des 30. Dezember Händel's „Messias". Im dritten Konzert am Abend des 28. Februar Horatio J. Parker „Hora novissima" und Bach's „Magnificat" und im letzten Konzert, Charfreitag Abend, den 25. März Bach's „St. Matthäus Passion".

SUN

New York City.

ress .....

17 1909

A cable from Rachmaninoff announces that the distinguished Russian composer-pianist will arrive in this country on October 26 aboard the Kronprinz Wilhelm. He will leave immediately for Boston, where he is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on October 29 and 30. His first New York appearances will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on November 13 and in his own recital in Carnegie Hall on November 20, at which time his new sonata, op. 20, will be included in his programme.

[38]

NEWS

Baltimore, Md.

OCT 16 190

SALE OF SEATS FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

Usual Quota Of Five Concerts Will Be Given This Winter At Lyric.

The annual subscription sale of seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at Albaugh's ticket office, corner of Charles and Fayette streets, Monday morning text. The usual quota of five concerts will be given during the winter in the Lyric. The dates are Wednesday evenings, November 10, December 8, January 12 and March 23 and Tuesday evening, February 22. Particular attention is called to the fact that the February concert will come on Tuesday instead of the traditional Wednesday. Local conditions in Washington have made it necessary to change the date and day of this concert.

AMERICAN

Baltimore, Md.

OCT 17 190

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The annual subscription sale of seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at Albaugh's Ticket Office, corner Charles and Fayette streets, tomorrow (Monday) morning, October 18. The usual quota of five concerts will be given during the winter in the Lyric. The dates are Wednesday evenings, November 10, December 8, January 12 and March 23, and Tuesday evening, February 22. Particular attention should be called to the fact that the February concert will come on Tuesday evening, instead of the traditional Wednesday. Local conditions in Washington have made it necessary to change the date and day of this concert.

It is many years since the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been able to offer Baltimore such a brilliant list of soloists as that which is announced for the coming season. At present it is possible to announce but four of the five, but those four are of extraordinary high quality. There will be two singers, Marcella Sembrich and Ernestine Schumann-Heink. As is generally known, this is Madame Sembrich's last year in America. Last spring ... to the operatic stage, ... he is making a concert ... country, which will end her ... the United States ... Madam... to Amer... ton Symp... but in ... engager... to m... with t... soon ... to devo... the ... Bo... Baltimo... orchest... the las... aside fr... be a... with the... ann-Hei... most, ... public, a... orchestra ... of admi... ion attac... November ... achmanin... appearan... 07, since ... is ranked ... compos... eras, two ... and ... and ch... now an... sensatio... rememb... in music ... return to ... 1910 but M... Boston Sym... offer ... agents whic... back ... ective se... with the o... course, ... coming ... orchest... last se... fina... spies... up a... poured ... Fayettes... heard in ... ing Bureau ... John Mu... consent ... his for ... the end ... this in all that he ... winter. His time ... February is com... man's appearances ... two concerts with ... Orchestra, a re... Hall on January 19, ... the Russian Sym... March 4, and three ... concerts in the Met... ropolitan Opera House. With the numerous private engagements he will fill during the social season, it is anticipated that he will surpass the record of twenty-six appearances which he made last winter in New York before the end of his tour.

n ..... om HERALD

ress ..... dress Washington, D. C.

..... te .....

Mme. Olga Samaroff, as soloist here with th Orchestra at its seco day evening, Decembe season's work with a certs, in which she Miss Geraldine Farra tan Opera House, und Charles A. Ellis of Bo pearance of the seaso night in Springfield, played with the Bost chestra, and had a g only was the audience over her, but the me chestra applauded her general feeling in th whom she has played the past, was that her the last year and that first pianist of her ge fore the public, is m than ever.

Newspaper Cutting

m .....

ress .....

OCT

e .....

A cable from Ra Wolfsohn Musical that the distinguish poser-pianist will ar try on October 26, Prinz Wilhelm. He leave for Boston, w duct the Boston Sy on October 29 and York appearance wi ton Symphony Orch 13, and in his own Hall on November his new Sonato Op. in his programme.

EVENING MA

om .....

ldress .....

te .....

The Boston Sympho York has been very la look is more promising been. The opening co Thursday evening. No

Gilibert, of the Man pany, as soloist, and Russian pianist and make his first appe day afternoon conce

rom .....

Address ..... Bro

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The annual subscription sale of seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at the Wilson ticket office in Droop's music store, 925 Pennsylvania avenue, next Tuesday morning, October 19, at 9 o'clock. For the five concerts which this famous orchestra is to give this winter in the New National Theater only a limited number of tickets remain to be sold, for the subscription is very large. Practically all the subscribers of last year have renewed for the coming season, and there is a large number of orders from new subscribers, so that it will be well for those purposing to secure season tickets to get them as early as possible, for the chances are that the house will be competely sold out by subscription.

The dates of the five concerts are, Tuesday afternoons, November 9, December 7, January 11, and March 22, and Monday afternoon, February 21. The attention of the patrons of the orchestra is particularly called to the fact that the February concert will be given on Monday afternoon instead of the usual Tuesday, this change being made necessary by local conditions. The concerts will begin as usual at 4:30 o'clock.

The list of soloists which the management will present during the season is not yet complete, but it is possible now to announce four of the five. These four are Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, Mme. Olga Samaroff, Mischa Elman, and Prof. Willy Hess.

Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey is generally regarded as being the leading concert soprano of American birth and training. She is notable for the purity and sweetness of her voice and the skill of her use of it.

Mme. Olga Samaroff needs no introduction to the Washington public, for she has played several times in the past here and won for herself many warm admirers. Since she was last here Mme. Samaroff has spent a year in Europe, where her success in London, Paris, Munich, Vienna and other great musical centers was quite equal to any that she has had over here.

Mischa Elman made his debut in Washington last year with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and it is not necessary to enlarge upon his qualities as a violinist. He is one of the sensations of the century and that he is to return again with the orchestra this year is a matter of congratulation to all concerned.

Prof. Willy Hess, concert-master of the orchestra, is also well-known and admired in Washington in the capacity of concert-master, soloist, and quartet leader. Prof. Willy Hess stands today at the head of the classical school of violinists.

Max Fiedler will again be the conductor, and the personnel of the orchestra is practically the same as it was last year, only minor changes having been made. Mr. Fiedler has mapped out a most interesting group of programmes for the Washington concerts, and altogether it promises to be one of the most thoroughly satisfying series the orchestra has ever given in this city.

From TIMES

Address Washington, D. C.

Date .....

BOSTON ORCHESTRA SOLOISTS CHOSEN

Five Concerts to Be Given in Washington This Season.

The Boston symphony orchestra will give five concerts at the New National Theater this season.

The dates of the five concerts are on Tuesday afternoons, November 9, December 7, January 11, and March 22, and on Monday afternoon, February 21. The concerts will begin as heretofore, at 4:30 o'clock.

The list of soloists which the management will present during the season is not yet complete, but it is possible now to announce four of the five. These four are Madame Corinne Rider-Kelsy, Madame Olga Samaroff, Mischa Elman, and Prof. Willy Hess.

Madame Corinne Rider-Kelsy is generally regarded as being the leading concert soprano of American birth and training. She is notable for the purity and sweetness of her voice.

Madame Olga Samaroff has played several times here, and won many warm admirers. Since she was last here Madame Samaroff has spent a year in Europe, where her success in London, Paris, Munich, Vienna, and other musical centers was equal to any that she has had over here.

Mischa Elman made his debut in Washington last year with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Prof. Willy Hess, concert master of the orchestra, is well known in Washington in the capacity of concert master, soloist, and quartet leader. Prof. Willy Hess stands today at the head of the classical school of violinists.

Max Fiedler will again be the conductor, and the personnel of the orchestra is practically the same as it was last year.

...ire being ac... ...er, both in ...inary to the ...on, and from ... opera com... ...een a mem... ...years. The ...tra has se... ...ing concert ... October 8 ...ged to open ... Harrisburg, ...er Western ... of the ar... ...ing perform... ...e house, as ...formances ... Company, ...nd Philadel... ...s from her ...0.

...ton Symphon... ...eason tickets ...iced by the ... in New Yor... ...has been in ... for the past ... expectation... ...r the larges... ...d here, and ... ...ale is very limited. The ... there will be very few ...eft for sale for the sin...

...evening concert—Thurs... day, November 11—the soloist will be Gilibert, baritone of the Manhattan Opera Co., and on the following Saturday afternoon Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist and composer, will make his debut in New York.

The American debut of Yolanda Mero has been pushed forward several days to allow the famous Hungarian pianist to accept a number of orchestral concerts out of town that have been offered to her through the failure of another famous pianist to visit this country. These include appearances in Chicago with the new Philharmonic Society, and in St. Paul with the St. Paul Symphony Orchestra. The positive date for Yolanda Mero's American debut has been set for Wednesday evening, November 3, in Carnegie Hall, when she will have the assistance of the Russian Symphony Orchestra, Modest Altschuler, conductor.

POST

s ..... Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The annual subscription sale of seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at the Wilson ticket office in Droop's Music Store, 925 Pennsylvania avenue, Tuesday morning, October 19, at 9 o'clock. Five concerts will be given by this famous orchestra this winter in the New National Theater.

The dates of the five concerts are Tuesday afternoons, November 9, December 7, January 11 and March 22, and Monday afternoon, February 21. The concerts will begin as usual at 4:30 o'clock.

JOURNAL

...nist und Pianist ... 26. Oktober mit ...m" hier an. Er ... mit dem Boston ... hier konzertiren.

und am 20. November in Carnegie Hall sein eigenes Konzert geben.

* * *

Frau Gisela Weber wird am Freitag, den 5. November, Abends, in Mendelssohn Hall ihr Debut als Sängerin machen.

* * *

Die Symphonie-Gesellschaft von New ... vember unter Walter ... die Saison eröffnen. ... hier unbekannten ...führung gelangen ...ang. Sie umfaßt: ... nach Virgil's Hir... ...s. Martin, drama... ...aolo und Frances... ...g, „Zar und Sul... ...von Tongemälden, ...Goldmark, 3. Süite ...e Printemps" von ... Werke von De... ...fötertellaft geschrie... ...w's, Tschaikowsky's ...que" u. s. w.

EVENING STAR

ress ..... Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The annual subscription sale of seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at the Wilson ticket office, 925 Pennsylvania avenue, next Tuesday morning, October 19, at 9 o'clock. For the five concerts which this famous orchestra is to give this winter in the New National Theater, the dates are Tuesday afternoons, November 9, December 7, January 11 and March 22, and Monday afternoon, February 21. Attention is particularly called to the fact that the February concert will be given Monday afternoon instead of the usual Tuesday. The concerts will begin, as usual, at 4:30 o'clock.

The list of soloists will include Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsy, Mme. Olga Samaroff, Mischa Elman and Prof. Willy Hess.

Max Fiedler will again be the conductor, and the personnel of the orchestra is practically the same as it was last year, only minor changes having been made.

EITUNG

New York City.

OCT 17

Wie die Leitung des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters mittheilt, übertrifft das diesjährige Abonnement für die zehn New Yorker Konzerte des berühmten Orchesters selbst die rosigsten Erwartungen. Es ist der größte Andrang, der bisher beobachtet wurde, und die Zahl der für den Verkauf für die einzelnen Konzerte übrig bleibenden Sitze wird eine sehr beschränkte sein.

Der Solist des ersten, am 11. November Abend stattfindenden Konzerts ist Herr Gilibert, der Bariton des Manhattan Opera House, und für das nächstfolgende Samstag-Konzert der bekannte russische Komponist und Pianist Herr Rachmaninoff, der bei dieser Gelegenheit sein Debut in New York machen wird.

Die Oratorien-Gesellschaft wird während der kommenden Saison vier Abend- und ein Nachmittags-Konzert geben. Im ersten Abend-Konzert am 1. Dezember gelangt Beethoven's Messe in D. zur Aufführung. In den beiden Weihnachts-Konzerten am Nachmittag des 28. und am Abend des 30. Dezember Händel's „Messias". Im dritten Konzert am Abend des 28. Februar Horatio J. Parker „Hora novissima" und Bach's „Magnificat" und im letzten Konzert, Charfreitag Abend, den 25. März Bach's „St. Matthäus Passion".

Mme. Olga Samaroff, who is announced as soloist here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its second concert on Friday evening, Dec. 10, has begun her season's work with a series of seven concerts in which she is associated with Miss Geraldine Farrar, of the Metropolitan Opera House, under the direction of Charles A. Ellis, of Boston. Her first appearance of the season was last Tuesday night in Springfield, Mass., where she played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and had an enormous success. Not only was the audience most enthusiastic over her, but the members of the orchestra applauded her as heartily.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

... New York City.

OCT 17 ...

French music.

Charles Gilibert will be the soloist at the first New York evening concert of the Boston Symphony, on Nov. 11, at Carnegie Hall. Two days later Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist-composer, will appear with the Boston orchestra.

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date OCT 17 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The sale of season tickets for the ten concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in New York in the coming winter has been in progress in Carnegie Hall for the last week and has exceeded all expectations. The subscription is by far the largest the orchestra has ever had here, and the number of seats yet on sale is limited. The outlook is that there will be few desirable seats left for sale for the single concerts.

At the first evening concert, Thursday, November 11, the soloist will be Gilibert, barytone, of the Manhattan opera company, and on the following Saturday afternoon Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist and composer, will make his debut in New York.

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date OCT 17 1909

A cable message from Rachmaninoff to the Wolfsohn Musical Bureau announces that the Russian composer and pianist will arrive in this country on October 26. He will go immediately to Boston, where he is to conduct performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on October 29 and 30. His first New York appearances will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on November 13, and in his own recital in Carnegie Hall, on November 20, at which time his new sonata, Op. 20, will be included in his programme.

SUN

... New York City.

ess .....

1 7 1909

A cable from Rachmaninoff announces that the distinguished Russian composer-pianist will arrive in this country on October 26 aboard the Kronprinz Wilhelm. He will leave immediately for Boston, where he is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on October 29 and 30. His first New York appearances will be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on November 13 and in his own recital in Carnegie Hall on November 20, at which time his new sonata, op. 20, will be included in his programme.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

ss New York City.

Musical Notes

THE redoubtable Max Reger, a self-styled disciple of the great Bach, who once modestly proposed to rewrite at least a portion of his master's works, was represented at the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston last Saturday by a work entitled "Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy," which was performed then for the first time in America. Max Reger, with more than 100 opus numbers to his credit in the brief span of thirty-six years, is by his industry alone one of the important figures of contemporary music. His variations and fugue for orchestra, introduced to New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the conductorship of Dr. Muck, made a profound impression, and probably Mr. Fiedler will see fit to include this symphonic prologue in his New York programme. Meantime what Philip Hale, the reviewer of the Boston Herald, has to say of the work is keenly interesting. Mr. Hale does not mince matters, as the following passage shows:

It is not easy to speak patiently or calmly of this preposterous music; music that is not music, as there are books that are not books. The Regerite may answer with a provoking smile: "You should not judge from one hearing; you should hear the prologue often; it will grow on you; it is a gigantic work, not readily grasped and comprehended."

But the prologue is not unendurable by reason of some strangeness in the proportions of an unfamiliar harmonic scheme, daring modulations, bizarre instrumentation. It is unendurable because it is prodigiously dull. There is complexity, there is technical skill of a kind not to be encouraged when the results are so barren, there is a din; but where is strength, where is beauty, and, above all, where is tragic intensity or suggestion of bodement? Notes galore; themes without distinction; climaxes that do not thrill, that are in boresome succession, music that is jejune and futile.

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The first pair of Boston symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 11, and Saturday afternoon, November 13. At the first concert the soloist will be Charles Gilibert, the eminent barytone of the Manhattan Opera Company. At the matinee concert Serge Rachmaninoff, the famous Russian composer and pianist, will make his first appearance as soloist in New York.

At each concert Mr. Fiedler will present a novelty. On Thursday evening he will play for the first time in New York Max Reger's Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy, Opus 108. The other orchestral numbers will be Brahms's symphony in D major, No. 2, and Richard Strauss's tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

On Saturday afternoon the novelty will be Granville Bantock's overture, "Pierrot of the Minute," which has been played with great success in Boston. The other numbers on the programme will be Schumann's second symphony, in C major; Rachmaninoff's concerto No. 2 for pianoforte and orchestra, and Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan."

EVENING POST,

s New York City.

OCT 22 1909

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Although Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer-pianist, who is to make his first appearance here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday afternoon, November 13, has been compelled to delay his sailing so that his appearance in Boston has been postponed, he will arrive in this country in ample time to fulfil his engagement with the Boston Symphony in this city. Under these unexpected conditions, however, it is a question whether he will be able to conduct any of his own works, owing to lack of time for rehearsal, and he will probably simply appear as piano soloist.

NEW YORK PRESS,

ess New York City.

OCT 17 1909

The sale of season tickets for the ten concerts the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in New York during the coming winter has been going on in Carnegie Hall for the last week, and it is asserted the subscription is by far the largest the orchestra has ever had here. It is probable, therefore, there will be few desirable seats left for sale for the single concerts. In the first evening concert, on November 12, the soloist will be Gilibert, baritone, and on the following Saturday afternoon Rachmaninoff, Russian pianist and composer, will make his debut in New

From Daily Eagle

ddress Brooklyn, N

te OCT 2 8 19

CURB LIGHT TO AID MUSIC

Women to Shade Glare During Concerts.

Members of Philharmonic Auxiliary Hold Meeting and Decide on Many Plans for Coming Season.

The Women's Auxiliary of the Philharmonic Concerts held a meeting this morning at the Academy of Music that was presided over by Mrs. Camden C. Dike. Mrs. Frank M. Lupton acted as secretary.

Mrs. Dike in her opening remarks said that a larrge majority of the former subscribers had renewed their subscriptions and that the outlook for the season was extremely bright. She then announced that the sale of seats to subscribers will open at the Academy on Tuesday morning, October 26. Mrs. Dike spoke of the sociability that had prevailed when the concerts were given at the old Academy and hoped that the same conditions would prevail in the new building. She impressed upon the members that one of the chief aims of the auxiliary is to look after matters of this kind.

Suggestions were called for, and a member ventured to advise that the lights in the auditorium be turned low during the concerts, as this would help the effect of the music. It was agreed that the lights might be dimmed to some extent, but lowering them to the vanishing point could not be considered, as it was decided that this plan, together with the soothing strains of the orchestra, might have a soporific effect upon some of the auditors.

The German section of the Institute suggested that in honor of Schiller's birthday Mr. Fiedler be requested to play Beethoven's Ninth Symphony; that fine soloists be secured, and that the Brooklyn Oratorio Society furnish the chorus. A motion to this effect was made by Mrs. Otto Goebel, seconded by Mrs. J. H. Recknagle, and carried.

It was announced that the Henry K. Sheldon fund would provide decorations for the platform this season. Mention was also made of the death of Frederick R. Conee, the former manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Daily Eagle,

ess Brooklyn, N. Y.

OCT 2 8 1909

People who expect to keep up with the musical procession here in this sleepy old town of Brooklyn this winter will get up early in the morning and may as well resign themselves to a course of tonics or prepare to eat three square meals a day. We shall have opera every Monday night, beginning Nov. 8, with two preliminary performances of "Freischuetz" thrown in for good measure. Then the orchestral programme will be richer than we have ever known, with five Friday night concerts each from the Boston Symphony, the New York Philharmonic under Mahler, the New York Symphony under Damrosch and five Saturday matinee concerts for young people by Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra. Here is the list of dates:

Friday, November 5—New York Symphony.
Saturday, November 6—New York Symphony (matinee).
Friday, November 12—Boston Symphony.
Friday, November 26—New York Symphony.
Friday, December 3—New York Philharmonic (Mahler).
Saturday, December 4—New York Symphony (matinee).
Friday, December 10—Boston Symphony.
Saturday, January 8—New York Philharmonic (Mahler).
Friday, January 14—Boston Symphony.
Friday, January 21—New York Symphony.
Friday, January 28—New York Philharmonic (Mahler).
Saturday, January 29—New York Symphony (matinee).
Friday, February 11—New York Philharmonic (Mahler).
Friday, February 18—New York Symphony.
Friday, February 25—Boston Symphony.
Saturday, January 26—New York Symphony (matinee)
Friday, March 11—New York Symphony.
Friday, March 18—New York Philharmonic (Mahler).
Friday, March 25—Boston Symphony.
Saturday, March 26—New York Symphony (matinee).

From GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISE

Address New York City.

Date OCT 22 1909

ALTHOUGH Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer-pianist, who is to make his first appearance here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday afternoon, Nov. 13, has been compelled to delay his sailing so that his appearance in Boston has been postponed, he will arrive in this country in ample time to fulfil his engagement with the Boston Symphony in this city. Under these unexpected conditions, however, it is a question whether he will be able to conduct any of his own works, owing to lack of time for rehearsal, and he will probably simply appear as piano soloist.

[39]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

Daily Citizen,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

s OCT 23 1909

The annual subscription sale of seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at the office of the Institute of Arts and Sciences Thursday morning at 8 o'clock. Last season was the largest the orchestra has enjoyed in Brooklyn since the old Academy was destroyed by fire, and as all who went to the concerts remember, practically every seat was sold. This year the prospects are that the season if possible will be even better for Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of the orchestra, made so many friends here that he might easily be called the most popular conductor the Boston Symphony has ever brought to Brooklyn. The five concerts will be given in the Academy of Music, and the dates are Friday evenings, Nov. 12, Dec. 10, Jan. 14, Feb. 25 and March 25.

M. Gilibert, baritone, will contribute two arias to the programme of the first Boston Symphony Orchestra concert here, on Nov. 12. Orchestral numbers will be the overture to "Oberon," von Weber; the Symphony in E minor, No. 5, Op. 64, Tschaikowsky; Suite "Peer Gynt," No. 1, Grieg, and the tone poem, "Till Eulenspidgel's Merry Pranks," Richard Strauss.

At the second concert, in December, the soloist will be Madame Olga Samaroff, the American pianist. In January the Brooklyn patrons will have another opportunity to hear Mischa Elman. The soloist for the February concert has not yet been chosen, but the management promises that the assisting artist will be fully up to the standard of the others. For March the management will present, for the first time in several years, as soloist Professor Willy Hess, the concert-master of the orchestra.

EVENING SUN,

ss New York City.

OCT 2 3

The Boston Symphony Orchestra tours are published in an annual booklet this week by Manager Charles A. Ellis and W. H. Brennan, his new business representative. The bookings of the orchestra are 112 in all, including fifteen in all New York and the usual home pair for the Pension Fund.

Rachmaninoff's début will be in New York, after all.

EVENING TELEGRAM,

s New York City.

OCT 25 1909

Madame Blanche Arral, a French singer with a high coloratura voice, sang for the first time in New York yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Neither the size of the audience nor its enthusiasm could have brought her any complaint. The seats were well filled and the auditors demonstrative and generous. Mme. Arral relapses quickly into operatic expression as she sings, her gestures being those of the theatre as opposed to the rigid poise of the concert stage. Her tones are brilliant, though at times their production could be improved.

Her recital included selections from "Hamlet," "The Queen of Sheba" and "Mignon." At the conclusion she sang an encore, for which the audience attested its favor. She was accompanied by Volpe's Symphony orchestra, which, if not the Boston Symphony orchestra, is so good that it should be encouraged. The orchestra played a Grieg suite and the final number, "Solveig's Song," was encored. The work of the musicians, if at times a little uneven, certainly demonstrated ambitious desire to do well.

NEW YORK PRESS,

ss New York City.

OCT 24 1909

Although Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer and pianist, who is to make his first appearance here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday afternoon, November 13, has been compelled to delay his sailing so that his appearance in Boston has been postponed, he will arrive in this country in ample time to fulfil his engagement with the Boston Symphony in this city. Under these unexpected conditions, however, it is a question whether he will be able to conduct any of his own works, there being so little time for rehearsing, and so he will probably appear only as piano soloist.

Daily Times,

s Brooklyn, N. Y.

OCT 23 1909

M. Gilibert, baritone, will contribute two arias to the programme of the first Boston Symphony Orchestra concert here, on November 12. Orchestral numbers will be the overture to "Oberon," von Weber; the Symphony in E minor, No. 5, Op. 64, Tschaikowsky; Suite "Peer Gynt," No. 1, Grieg, and the Tone Poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Richard Strauss.

Standard Union,

ess Brooklyn, N. Y.

OCT 24 1909

The annual subscription sale of seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at the offices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences Thursday morning, Oct. 28, at 8:30 o'clock. Last season was the largest the orchestra has enjoyed in Brooklyn since the old Academy was destroyed by fire, and, as all who went to the concerts remember, practically every seat was sold. This year the prospects are that the season if possible will be even better, for Mr. Fiedler, the conductor of the orchestra, made so many friends here, that he might easily be called the most popular conductor the Boston Symphony has ever brought to Brooklyn. The five concerts will be given in the Academy of Music, and the dates are Friday evenings, Nov. 12, Dec. 10, Jan. 14, Feb. 25, and March 25. Mr. Fiedler has begun his second year with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the most favorable conditions. Only a few very minor changes have been made in the personnel, and this year he has not to go through the process of becoming acquainted with his men and with his public. The first concerts in Boston were exceedingly successful both from the point of view of the programs which, in Mr. Fiedler's case, are almost always models of their kind, and in the performance. The management is able to present to Brooklyn an exceedingly attractive list of soloists this year. At the first concert the soloist will be Charles Gilibert, of the Manhattan Opera Company. Gilibert is one of the finest artists now on the lyric stage. He represents the best traditions of musical France, where all his career was spent until he came to this country to be a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company under Maurice Grau. He will sing two arias. At the second concert in December the soloist will be Madame Olga Samaroff, the American pianist, who already has a most admiring circle of friends here in Brooklyn. Since her last appearance Madame Samaroff has spent a winter in Europe, where she has played with a success most gratifying to herself and to her many friends in this country. Reports have it that her art is more beautiful than it ever has been, and that to-day more than ever she justifies her reputation as being the finest woman pianist of her generation. In January the Brooklyn patrons of the Boston Symphony will have another opportunity to hear with that orchestra Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, who made so astounding a sensation here a year ago. The best proof of his artistry is that he will play no less than twelve times with the Boston Symphony in various cities. The soloist for the February concert has not yet been chosen, but the management promises that the assisting artist will be fully up to the standard of the others. For March the management will present for the first time in several years as soloist Prof. Willy Hess, the concert-master of the orchestra. Prof. Hess needs no introduction to Brooklyn, where he has played with great success many times. It is not going too far to say that Prof. Hess is the greatest living exponent of the classic school of violin now that Joachim has gone. Mr. Fiedler has mapped out a series of programs which promises much to lovers of music. On his first program for November, the principal orchestra works will be: Weber's Overture to "Oberon"; Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony; Grieg's Suite No. 1 "Peer Gynt", and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

m TRIBUNE

ress New York City.

e OCT 24

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Although Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer-pianist, who is to make his first appearance here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday afternoon, November 13, has been compelled to delay his sailing so that his appearance in Boston has been postponed, he will arrive in this country in ample time to fulfil his engagement with the Boston Symphony in this city. Under these unexpected conditions, however, it is a question whether he will be able to conduct any of his own works owing to lack of time for rehearsal, and he will probably simply appear as a piano soloist.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

ess New York City.

OCT 24

Although Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer-pianist, who is to make his first appearance here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday afternoon, November 13, has been compelled to delay his sailing, so that his appearance in Boston has been postponed, he will arrive in this country in ample time to fulfil his engagement with the Boston Symphony in this city. Under these unexpected conditions, however, it is doubtful whether he will be able to conduct any of his own works owing to lack of time for rehearsal, and he will probably simply appear as piano soloist.

Reinald Werrenrath announces a song recital for Tuesday evening at Mendels[illegible] Hall.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
OCT 27 19

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

Audiences Are Expected to Be Largest in the History of the Society.

The audiences at the Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, will be, it is expected, the largest in the history of the Philharmonic Sosiety. In the old Academy of Music, on Montague street, the total seating capacity was only 1,650 and the amount of standing room was limited. The seating capacity for the new opera house is 2,050 and there is standing room for 250 without crowding. The subscribers to the Philharmonic concerts of last season have been given opportunity to renew their subscriptions for the coming year and this they have done to an unprecedented extent.

The members of the department of music, representing the musical profession, are represented by R. Huntington Woodman, president; Arthur Claassen and Perlee V. Jervis, vice-presidents; John Hyatt Brewer, secretary; H. Brooks Day, librarian; Graham Reed, G. Waring Stebbins, Samuel A. Baldwin, Herbert S. Sammond, Carl G. Schmidt, Robert G. Weigester, Clarence Eddy, Frederick R. Preston, Scott Wheeler, aDniel Gregory Mason, Charles Stuart Phillips, William A. Thayer, Mrs. Thomas Prosser, Mrs. A. Augustus Healy, Mrs. Otto Goepel, Mrs. Henry I. Judson, Mrs. H. J. Recknagel, Mrs. John Van Buren Thayer, Mrs. George W. Wingate, Mrs. George A. Allin, Mrs. John Anderson, Mrs. Henry D. Atwater, Miss Minna Behr, Miss Mary Benson, Mrs. William Berri, Mrs. Charles E. Bolles, Mrs. Joseph E. Brown, Mrs. Glentworth R. Butler, Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin, Mrs. Frederick W. Crane, Mrs. Henry E. Dreier, Mrs. Charles M. Field, Mrs. George S. Frank, Mrs. John Gibb, Mrs. Carl Goepel, Mrs. E. J. Grant, Mrs. J. W. Hollenback, Mrs. Calvin E. Hull, Mrs. William B. Hurd, Jr., Mrs. Robert J. Kimball, Mrs. Alexander S. Kirkman, Mrs. Eben J. Knowlton, Mrs. Edward H. Litchfield, Mrs. William H. Lyon, Mrs. Josiah T. Marean, Mrs. James L. Morgan, Mrs. Wihlelmus Mynderse, Mrs. John Notman, Mrs. George Notman Mrs. Edwin Packard, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. George A. Price, Mrs. James T. Russell, Mrs. Henry K. Sheldon, Mrs. Hiram R. Steele, Miss Margaret Thayer, Mrs. David Thornton, Mrs. Frederick C. Truslow, Mrs. Alfred T. White, Mrs. Richard Young, Mrs. William H. Ziegler.

To-morrow afternoon at 4 oclock will begin the opening sale of season tickets for those who were not subscribers for the whole of last season.

Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
OCT 27 1909

SUBSCRIPTIONS FOR CONCERTS

Boxholders and Others for Philharmonic Series at Academy of Music.

MARINE LIFE CONFERENCE.

Carl Fique's Lecture Recital on "Elektra."

The audiences at the Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, are expected to be the largest in the history of the Philharmonic Society. In the old Academy of Music, on Montague street, the total seating capacity was only 1,650, and the amount of standing room was limited. The seating capacity of the new opera house is 2,050, and there is standing room for 250 without crowding. The subscribers to the Philharmonic concerts of last season have been given opportunity to renew their subscriptions for the coming year, and this they have done to an unprecedented extent.

Among those who are holders of boxes are Mrs. Camden C. Dike, president of the Women's Auxiliary Board; Mrs. Henry R. Mallory, Mrs. Frank M. Lupton, Mrs. David A. Boody, Mrs. Frank S. Jones, Mrs. Lowell M. Palmer, Mrs. George D. Pratt, Mrs. Charles F. Pray and Miss Katherine S. Dreier. Among the directors of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society represented are John E. Leech, William H. Wallace, Crowell Hadden, Walter H. Crittenden, Carll H. De Silver, Henry N. Whitney, Alexander E. Orr, George H. Prentiss, John F. Praeger, Henry F. Noyes, Horace J. Morse, Dr. Thomas R. French, Charles J. Peabody, Gates D. Fahnestock. Martin Joost. Among the trustees of the Institute not included in the foregoing are A. Augustus Healy, Charles A. Schieren, John S. Frothingham, William J. Coombs, Jacob G. Dettmer, Dick S. Ramsay, Elijah R. Kennedy, Alfred T. White, Arthur M. Hatch, Abraham Abraham, Stanford H. Steele, Herman Stutzer and Lysander W. Lawrence.

The members of the department of music, representing the musical profession, are represented by R. Huntington Woodman, Arthur Claassen, Perlee V. Jervis, John Hyatt Brewer, H. Brooks Day, Graham Reed, G. Waring Stebbins, Samuel A. Baldwin, Herbert S. Sammond, Carl G. Schmidt, Robert G. Weigester, Clarence Eddy, Frederick R. Preston, Scott Wheeler, Daniel Gregory Mason, Charles Stuart Phillips, William A. Thayer, Mrs. T. Prosser, Mrs. A. Augustus Healy, Mrs. Otto Goepel, Mrs. Henry I. Judson, Mrs. H. J. Reckuagel, Mrs. John Van Buren Thayer, Mrs. George W. Wingate, Mrs. Mrs. George A. Allin, Mrs. John Anderson, Mrs. Henry D. Atwater, Miss Minna Behr, Miss Mary Benson, Mrs. William Berri, Mrs. C. E. Bolles, Mrs. Joseph E. Brown, Mrs. Glentworth R. Butler, Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin, Mrs. Frederick W. Crane, Mrs. Henry E. Dreier, Mrs. Charles M. Field, Mrs. George S. Frank, Mrs. John Gibb, Mrs. Carl Goepel, Mrs. E. J. Grant, Mrs. J. W. Hollenback, Mrs. Calvin E. Hull, Mrs. William B. Hurd, Jr., Mrs. Robert J. Kimball, Mrs. Alexander S. Kirkman, Mrs. Eben J. Knowlton, Mrs. Edward H. Litchfield, Mrs. William H. Lyon, Mrs. Josiah T. Marean, Mrs. James L. Morgan, Mrs. Wilhelmus Mynderse, Mrs. John Notman, Mrs. George Notman, Mrs. Edwin Packard, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. George A. Price, Mrs. James T. Russell, Mrs. Henry K. Sheldon, Mrs. Hiram R. Steele, Miss Margaret Thayer, Mrs. David Thornton, Mrs. Frederick C. Truslow, Mrs. Alfred T. White, Mrs. Richard Young and Mrs. William H. Ziegler.

The patrons of these concerts have now for four decades comprised the most substantial of Brooklyn citizens and the most devoted lovers of symphonic music. To-morrow afternoon at 4 o'clock is the opening sale of season tickets for those who were not subscribers for the whole of last season.

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N.
OCT 28 190

With Friday, November 12, as the night of the first Boston Symphony Concert, the plans are now all in readiness, and an exceedingly clear idea of the personnel of these big musical events is now possible. The subscribers include many of the most representative people of Brooklyn, and this year's subscription list seems stronger and more notable than ever. Among the box holders of the coming season are:

Mrs. Camden C. Dike, president of the Women's Auxiliary Board; Mrs. Henry Rogers Mallory, Mrs. Frank M. Lupton, Mrs. David A. Boody, Mrs. Frank Smith Jones, Mrs. Lowell M. Palmer, Mrs. George D. Pratt, Mrs. Charles F. Pray and Miss Katherine S. Dreier. The directors of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society represented, among others, are: John E. Leech, William H. Wallace, Crowell Hadden, Walter H. Crittenden, Carll H. DeSilver, Henry N. Whitney, Alexander E. Orr, George H. Prentiss, John F. Praeger, Henry F. Noyes, Horace J. Morse, Dr. Thomas R. French, Charles J. Peabody, Gates D. Fahnestock, Martin Joost.

Yet others of note who will figure in this year's Boston Symphony's are: A. Augustus Healy, Charles A. Schieren, John S. Frothingham, William J. Coombs, Jacob G. Dettmer, Dick S. Ramsay, Elijah R. Kennedy, Alfred T. White, Arthur M. Hatch, Abraham Abraham, Sanford H. Steele, Herman Stutzer, Lysander W. Lawrence, R. Huntington Woodman, Arthur Claassen, Perlee V. Jervis, John Hyatt Brewer, H. Brooks Day, Graham Reed, G. Waring Stebbins, Samuel A. Baldwin, Herbert S. Sammond, Carl G. Schmidt, Robert G. Weigester, Clarence Eddy, Frederick R. Preston, Scott Wheeler, Daniel Gregory Mason, Charles Stuart Phillips, William A. Thayer, Mrs. Thomas Prosser, Mrs. A. Augustus Healy, Mrs. Otto Goepel, Mrs. Henry I. Judson, Mrs. H. J. Recknagel, Mrs. John Van Buren Thayer, Mrs. George W. Wingate.

Mrs. George A. Allin, Mrs. John Anderson, Mrs. Henry D. Atwater, Miss Minna Behr, Miss Mary Benson, Mrs. William Berri, Mrs. Charles E. Bolles, Mrs. Joseph E. Brown, Mrs. Glentworth Reeve Butler, Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin, Mrs. Frederick W. Crane, Mrs. H. Edward Dreier, Mrs. Charles M. Field, Mrs. George S. Frank, Mrs. John Gibb, Mrs. Carl Goepel, Mrs. E. J. Grant, Mrs. J. W. Hollenback, Mrs. Calvin Edwards Hull, Mrs. William B. Hurd, jr.; Mrs. Robert J. Kimball, Mrs. Alexander S. Kirkman, Mrs. Eben J. Knowlton, Mrs. Edward H. Litchfield, Mrs. William H. Lyon, Mrs. Josiah T. Marean, Mrs. James L. Morgan, Mrs. Wilhelmus Mynderse, Mrs. John Notman, Mrs. George Notman, Mrs. Edwin Packard, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. George A. Price, Mrs. James T. Russell, Mrs. Henry K. Sheldon, Mrs. Hiram R. Steele, Miss Margaret Thayer, Mrs. David Thornton, Mrs. Frederick C. Truslow, Mrs. Alfred T. White, Mrs. Richard Young, Mrs. William H. Ziegler.

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
OCT 27 1909

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

Audiences Are Expected to Be Largest in the History of the Society.

The audiences at the Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, will be, it is expected, the largest in the history of the Philharmonic Sosiety. In the old Academy of Music, on Montague street, the total seating capacity was only 1,650 and the amount of standing room was limited. The seating capacity for the new opera house is 2,050 and there is standing room for 250 without crowding. The subscribers to the Philharmonic concerts of last season have been given opportunity to renew their subscriptions for the coming year and this they have done to an unprecedented extent.

The members of the department of music, representing the musical profession, are represented by R. Huntington Woodman, president; Arthur Claassen and Perlee V. Jervis, vice-presidents; John Hyatt Brewer, secretary; H. Brooks Day, librarian; Graham Reed, G. Waring Stebbins, Samuel A. Baldwin, Herbert S. Sammond, Carl G. Schmidt, Robert G. Weigester, Clarence Eddy, Frederick R. Preston, Scott Wheeler, aDniel Gregory Mason, Charles Stuart Phillips, William A. Thayer, Mrs. Thomas Prosser, Mrs. A. Augustus Healy, Mrs. Otto Goepel, Mrs. Henry I. Judson, Mrs. H. J. Recknagel, Mrs. John Van Buren Thayer, Mrs. George W. Wingate, Mrs. George A. Allin, Mrs. John Anderson, Mrs. Henry D. Atwater, Miss Minna Behr, Miss Mary Benson, Mrs. William Berri, Mrs. Charles E. Bolles, Mrs. Joseph E. Brown, Mrs. Glentworth R. Butler, Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin, Mrs. Frederick W. Crane, Mrs. Henry E. Dreier, Mrs. Charles M. Field, Mrs. George S. Frank, Mrs. John Gibb, Mrs. Carl Goepel, Mrs. E. J. Grant, Mrs. J. W. Hollenback, Mrs. Calvin E. Hull, Mrs. William B. Hurd, Jr., Mrs. Robert J. Kimball, Mrs. Alexander S. Kirkman, Mrs. Eben J. Knowlton, Mrs. Edward H. Litchfield, Mrs. William H. Lyon, Mrs. Josiah T. Marean, Mrs. James L. Morgan, Mrs. Wihlelmus Mynderse, Mrs. John Notman, Mrs. George Notman Mrs. Edwin Packard, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. George A. Price, Mrs. James T. Russell, Mrs. Henry K. Sheldon, Mrs. Hiram R. Steele, Miss Margaret Thayer, Mrs. David Thornton, Mrs. Frederick C. Truslow, Mrs. Alfred T. White Mrs. Richard Young, Mrs. William H. Ziegler.

To-morrow afternoon at 4 oclock will begin the opening sale of season tickets for those who were not subscribers for the whole of last season.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
OCT 23 1909

At the first Boston Symphony concert here, which is to be given Nov. 12, M. Gilibert, baritone, will contribute two arias to the programme.

From WORLD
Address New York City.
Date
Mr. Gilbert, baritone, will be the soloist Nov. 12 for the first Philharmonic Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
OCT 28 1909

Könen-Rezital.

Herr M. H. Hanson, der Manager Frl. Tilly Könen's, hat sich entschlossen, die westliche Tournee der Sängerin zu unterbrechen und sie am kommenden Dinstag Nachmittag in Mendelssohn Hall ein zweites Rezital absolviren zu lassen, wobei die Gewähr gegeben wurde, daß das Konzert nicht, wie anläßlich des ersten Auftretens der Künstlerin, durch die Arbeiten am danebengelegenen Neubau eine unliebsame Störung erfahren werde.

Herr Hanson hat ein Konzert in Omaha aufgegeben und die Sängerin wird eben Zeit genug haben, auf einem Zug des Twentieth Century gegen Osten zu eilen, um ihr hiesiges zweites Auftreten zu ermöglichen. Das Programm wird kommenden Sonntag bekannt gegeben werden.

Frl. Könen hat anläßlich ihres Auftretens am Dinstag in Boston im Rahmen des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters einen gewaltigen Erfolg davongetragen. Sie wurde nach ihrer Nummer neun Mal gerufen, nach einem gemeinschaftlich mit Dr. Wüllner gesungenen Duett gar elf Mal.

From EVENING SUN,
Address New York City.
OCT 26

Sergius Rachmaninoff is to make his first appearance, not in Boston, but in New York, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Saturday afternoon, Nov. 13.

The mighty handed young Russian composer was compelled to delay his sailing, so that his appearance in Boston had to be postponed. He will arrive in this country in time to catch up with the orchestra on its first tour South. Under these unexpected conditions, it is explained, the piano soloist will hardly be expected to conduct any of his own works, owing to lack of time for rehearsal.

Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
OCT 30 1909

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Nov. 12, when the soloist will be Charles Gilbert, baritone, of the Manhattan Opera Company of New York. The orchestral part of the programme will comprise Weber's overture to "Oberon," Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor, Grieg's First Suite "Peer Gynt," and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
OCT 30 1909

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, November 12, and the soloist will be Charles Gilbert, the baritone of the Manhattan Opera Company. The orchestral part of the programme will comprise Weber's overture to "Oberon," Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor, Grieg's First Suite "Peer Gynt," and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

EVENING MAIL

New York City.

OCT 30 1909

The first pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Carnegie hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, November 11-13, will have as soloists Gilibert at the first and the American debut of Rachmaninoff at the matinee. At the Thursday evening concert Mr. Fiedler will present for the first time in New York Max Reger's symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy, op. 108, Brahm's symphony in D major, No. 2, and Strauss' "Til Eulenspiegel."

Saturday afternoon Rachmaninoff will play his own concerto. The novelty will be Granville Bantock's "Pierrot of the Minute," and other numbers will be Schumann's second symphony in C major and Richard Strauss' tone-poem "Don Juan."

From Daily Eagle,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date OCT 30

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, November 12, and the soloist will be Gilibert, the eminent baritone of the Manhattan Opera Company. The orchestral part of the programme will comprise Weber's overture to "Oberon," Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor, Grieg's First Suite "Peer Gynt" and Richard Strauss' tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

New York City.

The first pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Nov. 11, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 13. At the first concert the soloist will be Charles Gilibert, the eminent baritone of the Manhattan Opera Company. At the matinée concert Serge Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer and pianist, will make his first appearance as soloist in New York. At each concert Mr. Fiedler will bring forward a novelty. On Thursday evening he will present for the first time in New York Max Reger's "Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy," opus 108. The other orchestral numbers will be Brahams's symphony in D major and Richard Strauss's tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel." On Saturday afternoon the novelty will be Granville Bantock's overture, "Pierrot of the Minute." The other numbers on the programme are Shumann's symphony in C major, Rachmaninoff's concerto No. 2 for piano and orchestra, and Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan."

EVENING TELEGRAM,

New York City.

OCT 28 1909

The first pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 11, and Saturday afternoon, November 13, respectively. At the first concert the soloist will be Charles Gilibert, the eminent baritone of the Manhattan Opera Company. At the matinee concert Serge Rachmaninoff, the famous Russian composer and pianist, will make his first appearance as soloist in New York.

[40

The First Extensive and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From ... MUSIC TRADES.

Address ...

OCT 30 1909

D

Sergius Rachmaninoff is to make his first appearance, not in Boston, but in New York, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Saturday afternoon, Nov. 13.

The mighty-handed young Russian composer was compelled to delay his sailing, so that his appearance in Boston had to be postponed. He will arrive in this country in time to catch up with the orchestra on its first tour South. Under these unexpected conditions, it is explained, the piano soloist will hardly be expected to conduct any of his own works, owing to lack of time for rehearsal.

* * * *

m ...

ress ...

... OCT 3

Rachmaninoff hat der Konzertdirektion Wolffohn gekabelt, daß er am kommenden Dienstag auf dem Schnelldampfer „Kronprinzessin Cäcilie" hier eintreffen wird. Der berühmte Russe wird seine Tour am 3. Nov. im Smith College zu Northampton beginnen und dann nach Boston zu Proben mit dem dortigen Symphonie-Orchester gehen, mit dem er am 8. November sein erstes Klavier-Konzert in Philadelphia spielen wird. Er ist außerdem Solist der Bostoner am 10. November in Baltimore und in der am 15. November beginnenden Woche in Hartford. Für den 13. November ist das erste Erscheinen des Künstlers in New York festgesetzt, und eine Woche später sein erstes eigenes Konzert, bei dem er u. A. sechs seiner berühmten Präludien spielen wird. Von seinen übrigen Engagements seien noch genannt, ein Recital in Boston am 16., ein Konzert mit dem Toronto Symphonie-Orchester am 18. November, und in der Woche nach seinem zweiten New Yorker Konzert, sein Auftreten mit dem Philadelphia Symphonie-Orchester in dreifacher Eigenschaft: als Pianist und als Dirigent und Komponist seiner E-moll-Symphonie. Am 28. und 30. Nov.

ist Rachmaninoff für zwei Konzerte der New Yorker Symphonie-Gesellschaft, am . und 4. Dez. für zwei des Chicagoer homas-Orchesters und später noch für solche des Pittsburger, Cincinnatier, Ruffischen und Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters engagirt.

* *

ss ...

Durch der außerordentlichen Erfolg des ersten Konzertes der Sängerin Fräulein Tilly Koenen hat ch Herr M. H. Hanson, der Manager der Künstlerin, entschlossen, die westliche Tourné der Dame zu unterbrechen und sie am Nachmittag des kommenden Dienstag in Mendelssohn Hall ein zweites Konzert absolviren zu lassen. Um dieses zweite Konzert zu ermöglichen, mußte ein solches in Omaha aufgegeben werden. Fräulein Koenen, eine Holländerin, die bisher nur als Sängerin deutscher Lieder, die sie mit bewundernswerther Einfachheit und doch tiefem Verständniß und herrlichem Ausdruck vorträgt, singt seit kurzem auch englische Lieder. Mit diesen hat sie am Dienstag in Boston, wo sie im Rahmen des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, einer weltberühmten Organisation, auftrat, einen mächtigen Erfolg errungen. Sie wurde nach jeder Nummer neun Mal gerufen. Nach einem Duett, das sie gemeinsam mit Dr. Müllner sang, gar elfmal. Dienstag's Koenen-Konzert dürfte ein auserlesener Genuß werden.

From NEW YORK AMERICAN,

Address New York City.

Date ...

The first pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 11, and Saturday afternoon, November 13. At the first concert the soloist will be Charles Gilibert, the well-known baritone of the Manhattan Opera Company. At the matinee concert, Serge Rachmaninoff, the famous Russian composer and pianist, will make his first appearance as a soloist in New York. At each concert Mr. Fiedler will present a novelty. On Thursday evening he will play, for the first time in New York, Max Reger's "Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy" (Opus 108). The other orchestral numbers will be Brahms's Symphony in D Major (No. 2), and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." On Saturday afternoon the novelty will be Granville Bantock's overture, "Pierrot of the Minute," which has been played with great success in Boston. The other numbers on the programme will be Schumann's Second Symphony in C Major, Rachmaninoff's Concerto No. 2, for pianoforte and orchestra, and Richard Strauss's

SUN

New York City.

1909

Rachmaninoff sailed from Bremen on Tuesday last on the steamer Kronprinzessin Cecilie, which is due in New York on Tuesday. The famous Russian will open his tour at Smith College, Northampton, on Wednesday, after which he will go to Boston for rehearsals with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing his first concert with that organization in Philadelphia on Monday, the 8th. He will also play with them in Baltimore on November 10 and on the 13th he will make his first appearance in New York. In the week of November 15 he is to play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Hartford. His first recital in Boston is on the 16th and he plays with the Toronto Symphony on the 18th and on Saturday afternoon, November 20, he will give his New York recital, the programme of which is to include six of his famous preludes.

The first pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 11, and Saturday afternoon November 13, respectively. At the first concert the soloist will be Charles Gilibert of the Manhattan Opera Company. At the matinée concert Serge Rachmaninoff, the famous Russian composer and pianist, will make his first appearance as a soloist in New York. At each concert Mr. Fiedler will present a novelty. On Thursday evening he will play for the first time in New York Max Reger's Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy, opus 108. The other orchestral numbers will be Brahms's symphony in D major No. 2, and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." On Saturday afternoon the novelty will be Grenville Bantock's overture "Pierrot of the Minute," which has been played with great success in Boston. The other numbers on the programme will be Schumann's second symphony in C major, Rachmaninoff's concerto No. 2 for pianoforte and orchestra and Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan."

TIMES

New York City.

The first pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Nov. 11, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 13, respectively. At the first concert the soloist will be Charles Gilibert, the baritone of the Manhattan Opera Company. At the matinée concert Serge Rachmaninoff, the famous Russian composer and pianist, will then make his first appearance as soloist in New York. At each concert Mr. Fiedler will present a novelty. On Thursday evening he will play for the first time in New York Max Reger's Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy, Opus 108. The other orchestral numbers will be Brahms's symphony in D major No. 2, and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

On Saturday afternoon the novelty will be Granville Bantock's overture, "Pierrot of the Minuet." The other numbers on the programme will be Schumann's second symphony in C Major, Rachmaninoff's concerto No. 2 for pianoforte and orchestra, and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan."

***

spaper Cutting Bureau in the World

The first pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 11, and Saturday afternoon, November 13, respectively. At the first concert the soloist will be Charles Gilibert, the eminent baritone of the Manhattan Opera Company. At the matinee concert Serge Rachmaninoff, the famous Russian composer and pianist, will then make his first appearance as soloist in New York.

n NEW YORK PRESS,

ress New York City.

e ...

The first pair of Boston Symphony concerts will take place in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 11, and Saturday afternoon, November 13. At Thursday's concert the soloist will be Charles Gilibert, the famous French baritone. At the matinee concert Serge Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer and pianist, will make his first appearance as soloist in New York. The orchestra's conductor, Max Fiedler, will present a novelty on each programme. On Thursday evening he will play for the first time in New York Max Reger's "Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy," opus 108, besides offering more familiar fare in Brahms's symphony in D major, No. 2, and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

On Saturday afternoon the novelty will be Granville Bantock's overture, "Pierrot of the Minute," which was played with great success in Boston. The other numbers on the programme will be Schumann's second symphony in C major, Rachmaninoff's Concerto No. 2 for pianoforte and orchestra, and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan."

WORLD

ss New York City.

OCT 31 1909

The first of the five Philharmonic concerts under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute, with the co-operation of the Women's Auxiliary Board of the Institute Music Department, will be given Friday evening, Nov. 12, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler conductor. M. Gilibert, baritone, will be the soloist.

WORLD

n ... New York City.

ress ...

... 1909

The first Boston Symphony night of the season, Friday, Nov. 12, promises to be a distinctive event socially. Many dinners will precede and many suppers follow at the Academy. Among the box holders will be: Mrs. Camden C. Dike, president of the Women's Auxiliary Board; Mrs. Henry Rogers Mallory, Mrs. Frank M. Lupton, Mrs. David A. Boody, Mrs. Frank Smith Jones, Mrs. Lowell M. Palmer, Mrs George D. Pratt, Mrs. Charles F. Pray and Miss Katherine S. Drier.

* * *

STAATS ZEITUNG

From ...

Address New York City.

D ... OCT 31

Das erste Paar der Bostoner Symphonie-Konzerte findet in Carnegie Hall, Donnerstag, den 11. November Abend und Samstag, den 13. November Nachmittag statt. Im ersten Konzert ist der Solist Herr Charles Gilibert vom Manhattan Opera House, in der Matinee der russische Komponist Herr Rachmaninoff. In jedem der Konzerte wird sich Dirigent Herr Fiedler mit einer Novität einfinden und zwar am Donnerstag Abend mit Max Reger's „Symphonischem Prolog zu einer Tragödie", op. 108 und am Samstag Nachmittag mit Granville Bantock's Ouverture „Pierrot of the Minute". Donnerstag spielen die Bostoner ferner Brahms' Zweite Symphonie und Strauß' „Till Eulenspiegel" und am Samstag Nachmittag Schumann's Zweite Symphonie. Strauß' „Don Juan" und Rachmaninoff's Zweites Piano-Konzert.

Herr Walter Damrosch

... on,

ss ...

OCT 31 1909

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Nov. 12, and the soloist will be Charles Gilibert, the eminent baritone of the Manhattan Opera Company of New York. The orchestral part of the programme will comprise Weber's overture to "Oberon," Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor, Grieg's First Suite, "Peer Gynt," and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Standard Union,

rom ...

Brooklyn, N. Y.

ddress ...

ate ... OCT 30

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given at the Academy of Music Friday evening, Nov. 12, and the soloist will be Charles Gilibert, the grand opera baritone.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

New York City.

... 1909

The Boston Smpphomy Orchestra will give its first pair of New York concerts Thursday evening, Nov. 11, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 13, in Carnegie Hall. Max Reger's new "Symphonic Prologue to a tragedy," Brahms's D major symphony, and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" are on the evening programme. The soloist will be Charles Gilibert, baritone. At the afternoon concert Granville Bantock's overture "Pierrot of the Minute" will be played for the first time here. The other numbers are Schumann's C major symphomp, Rachmaninoff's piano concerto in C minor, and Strauss's "Don Juan." The soloist will be Mr. Rachmoninoff.

The ... of the first sonata

om EVENING POST,

dress New York City.

te NOV 6 1909

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which never disappoints, and which has a large following that turns up its nose at concerts by mere New York musicians, will give the usual three performances once a month, in Manhattan and Brooklyn Boroughs. The New York list of organizations includes also the People's Symphony, under Mr. Arens; the Young People's Symphony, under Frank Damrosch (who will also conduct, as usual, the Oratorio and Musical Art Societies); the Volpe and the Russian Symphony Orchestras, not to forget Victor Herbert, whose Sunday concerts appeal particularly to lovers of his own bright music. The Kneisels and others will supply chamber music. Both the opera houses will have their popular Sunday evening concerts, the soloists above named, and many, many others, will sing, play the piano, the violin, the violoncello—and, to cut it short, everybody who has ears to listen and money to spend will have a chance to be happy.

EVENING MAIL

ess New York City.

NOV 6 1909

The Boston Symphony orchestra will be heard at Carnegie hall next week. The Thursday evening concert will have as novelty Max Reger's latest work for orchestra, entitled "A Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy," opus 108. This work had its first performance in Cologne in March, and at the opening concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra Mr. Fiedler gave it for the first time in America. It is dedicated to Arthur Nikisch and is complex to the last degree. It was originally very long, but at the request of Mr. Fiedler, the composer cut it considerably and Mr. Fiedler himself shortened it still more.

Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel," will be given by Mr. Fiedler, who will also present the Brahms symphony in D major, No. 2. The soloist will be Gilibert, who will sing two numbers. Saturday afternoon Rachmaninoff, the great Russian composer and pianist, will make his first appearance in New York in his own Second concerto for piano and orchestra, which was played just a year ago with the Boston Symphony orchestra by Gabrilowitsch. A novelty on the afternoon programme will be Granville Bantock's overture, "Pierrot of the Minute."

Daily Times,

ss Brooklyn, N. Y.

NOV - 6 1909

Next Friday night will bring to Brooklyn the first of the customary series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra which have for years always been anticipated as events of the first importance to music-lovers. Reports indicate that this splendid orchestra is so well established in favor that it will again be greeted here by the large and representative gatherings that have distinguished these concerts in the past. Max Fiedler, who came from Europe last season to conduct the orchestra, will continue to wield the baton, and has planned for this Brooklyn concert a programme which promises much enjoyment. The principal orchestral number will be Tschaikowsky's splendid Fifth Symphony, popularly known as the "Pathetic," a work whose noble, appealing qualities have become quite well known to concert goers, a fact likely to increase rather than lessen the interest in hearing it again. There will also be the overture to Weber's "Oberon," Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite and Richard Strauss' freakish tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." It has been the custom to have no soloist at the first concert of the season, permitting the orchestra to make an exclusive appeal to the audience. An exception has been made this year, and the services of Charles Gilibert, the French baritone of the Manhattan Opera Company, have been engaged for the occasion. He will sing two arias.

EVENING SUN,

ess New York City.

... 1909

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to New York next Thursday and Saturday, with two fine programmes printed in THE EVENING SUN of yesterday, and Caruso starts the Metropolitan home season on Monday-week, the great events of music for 1909-10 will all be in sight at last.

Standard Union,

ess Brooklyn, N. Y.

NOV - 6 1909

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Nov. 12, when the eminent French baritone, Charles Gilibert, of the Manhattan Opera Company, is to be the soloist.

EVENING WORLD,

ss New York City.

NOV 6 1909

The first pair of concerts of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At the evening concert the soloist will be Charles Gilibert of the Manhattan Opera Company. At the matinee concert Serge Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer and pianist, will make his first appearance in New York. At each concert Mr. Fiedler will present a novelty. On Thursday evening he will play for the first time in New York Max Regers Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy, opus 108. On Saturday afternoon the novelty will be Granville Bantock's overture "Pierrot of the Minute," which has been played with success in Boston.

[41]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV - 6 1909

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in the Academy of Music on next Friday evening, November 12, at 8:15. The soloist will be the French baritone, Charles Gilibert, of the Manhattan Opera Company.

Mr. Fiedler has arranged a most attractive programme, attractive not only in the works themselves, but in the broad contrasts between the different works. The first number will be the ever-welcome "Oberon" overture by Weber, which needs no introduction to a Brooklyn audience. Then will come Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor. Although the poignant tragedy of the last movement of the "Pathetic" has raised that symphony to a position which somewhat overshadows the other works of the Russian composer, there are many critics of authority who regard the Fifth Symphony as the culmination of Tschaikowsky's genius. The performance of the "Pathetic" last year under Mr. Fiedler, was one of the most noteworthy events of the season. He is particularly in sympathy with Russians in general and Tschaikowsky in particular, and his performance of the Fifth Symphony is said to be equally great.

The music of the North is likewise represented by Grieg's first suite, "Peer Gynt." This music has been so butchered and mangled and hauled by unimportant orchestras that the public is in danger of forgetting how beautiful it really is, and Mr. Fiedler has earned a debt of gratitude from the musical public by restoring it to its proper place on a Symphony programme. The final number will be Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." Mr. Gilibert's arias will be announced later. The programme as it stands is as follows:

Overture to the opera Oberon.....Weber
Symphony No. 5, in E minor.....Tschaikowsky
Aria.
Suite, Peer Gynt, No. 1.....Grieg
Aria.
Tone poem, Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Richard Strauss
Soloist, Charles Gilibert.

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV - 6 1909

FIRST BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT FRIDAY NIGHT

Mme. Sembrich at Watters' Recital on Nov. 17.

FINE ORCHESTRA SEASON.

Brooklyn Will Fare Well for Music This Winter—Manhattan Music Notes.

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in the Academy of Music on next Friday evening, when the soloist will be the French baritone, Charles Gilibert, of the Manhattan Opera Company. Mr. Fiedler has arranged a most attractive programme, attractive not only in the works themselves, but in its broad contrasts.

The first number will be the "Oberon" overture by Weber. Then will come Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor. Although the poignant tragedy of the last movement of the "Pathetic" has raised that symphony to a position which somewhat overshadows the other works of the Russian composer, there are many critics of authority who regard the Fifth Symphony as the combination of Tschaikowsky's genius.

The music of the North is likewise represented by Grieg's first suite, "Peer Gynt." This music has been so mauled by unimportant orchestras that the public is in danger of forgetting how beautiful it really is and Mr. Fiedler has earned a great debt of gratitude from the musical public by restoring it to its proper place on a symphony programme. The final number will be Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

From
Address NEW YORK CITY
Date NOV 6 1909

At the opening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Nov. 11 and 13, very interesting programmes are to be renederd. At the Thursday night concert. The symphony will be Brahm's in D. Max Reger's latest gigantic work, the "Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy," Op. 108, will be played here for the first time, and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" will conclude a most attractive programme. At the Saturday afternoon concert the numbers will be Schumann's Symphony in C, Granville Bantock's overture "Pierrot of the Minuet," Strauss' "Don Juan," and the second piano concert by Rachmaninoff, played by the composer.

The Symphony Society under the direction of Walter Damrosch will open its season at Carnegie Hall instead of at the New Theatre, on Sunday afternoon. The programme is also most interesting, the symphony being Elgar's in A flat. Besides this, Smetana's "From Bohemia's Forests and Meadows," Mozart's Ballet music "Les Petits Riens" (first time here) and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Russian Song" will be played.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From
Address
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS IN LINE AGAIN

First Appearances in New York This Season at Carnegie Hall This Week.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first appearances in New York this season at Carnegie Hall the coming week. As usual, the performances of this distinguished organization will be given in pairs on Thursday evenings and the Saturday afternoons following. Max Feidler, the Hamburg conductor, who last season, his first with the Boston organization, placed the orchestra on an even higher plane than the one it had occupied previously, will again be at the director's desk.

The orchestra remains practically the same as last season, and Willy Hess is still the concert master. This season will be the twenty-eighth of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the progress of this artistic achievement has been the progress of musical art in America.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 7

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in the Academy of Music on next Friday evening, Nov. 12. The soloist will be the eminent French baritone, Charles Gilibert, of the Manhattan Opera Company. Mr. Fiedler has arranged a most attractive programme, attractive not only in the works themselves, but in the broad contrasts between the different works. The first number will be the ever-welcome "Oberon" overture by Weber, which needs no introduction to a Brooklyn audience. Then will come Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony in E Minor. Although the poignant tragedy of the last movement of the "Pathetic" has raised that symphony to a position which somewhat overshadows the other works of the Russian composer, there are many critics of authority who regard the Fifth Symphony as the combination of Tschaikowsky's genius. The performance of the "Pathetic" last year under Mr. Fiedler was one of the most noteworthy events of the season. He is particularly in sympathy with Russians in general, and Tschaikowsky in particular, and his performance of the Fifth Symphony is equally great. The music of the North is likewise represented by Grieg's first suite, "Peer Gynt." This music has been so butchered and mauled and hauled by unimportant orchestras that the public is in danger of forgetting how beautiful it really is, and Mr. Fiedler has earned a great debt of gratitude from the musical public by restoring it to its proper place on a symphony programme. The final number will be Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." Mr. Gilibert's arias will be announced later. The programme as it stands is as follows:

Overture to the Opera "Oberon".....Weber
Symphony No. 5 in E Minor...Tschaikowsky
Aria, Suite, "Peer Gynt," No. 1.....Grieg
Aria, Tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" .....Richard Strauss Soloist—Charles Gilibert.

TRIBUNE
New York City.
NOV 7 190

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The first pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, November 11, at 8:15, and the following Saturday afternoon, November 13, at 2:30 o'clock. At the first concert the assisting artist will be Charles Gilibert, the well known barytone of the Manhattan Opera Company, and at the Saturday afternoon concert the eminent Russian composer and pianist, Serge Rachmaninoff, will make his first appearance in New York.

On each of the programmes Mr. Fiedler has placed an interesting novelty. On Thursday night he will play for the first time in New York Max Reger's latest work for orchestra, which is entitled "A Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy," Opus 108. On Saturday afternoon for the first time New York will hear a work by Granville Bantock, one of the younger set of English composers, his comedy overture, "Pierrot of the Minute," which was played in Boston a few weeks ago with much success. Rachmaninoff will play his own second concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, which was made known here a year ago at a Boston Symphony concert by Gabrilowitsch.

It was first planned that Rachmaninoff should not only play his own second concerto, but should conduct one of his works, but his sailing having been delayed, rehearsals were impossible, so he will appear simply in the capacity of pianist. The two complete programmes are as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 11.
Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy.....Reger
(First time.)
Aria.
Symphony in D major, No. 2.....Brahms
Aria.
Tone Poem.....Richard Strauss
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Op. 28.
Soloist, Charles Gilibert.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 13.
Overture, "Pierrot of the Minute,"
Granville Bantock
(First time.)
Symphony No. 2, in C major.....Schumann
Second concerto, in C minor, Op. 18...Schumann
(For pianoforte and orchestra.)
Tone Poem, "Don Juan".....Richard Strauss
Soloist, Serge Rachmaninoff.

HERALD
New York City.

MUSIC NOTES.

BOSTON'S Symphony Orchestra will give its first concert here this season in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, with Mr. Marx Fiedler again as conductor.

For the evening concert Mr. Charles Gilibert, barytone of the Manhattan Opera Company, will sing. A novelty will be Mr. Max Reger's "Symphonic Prelude to a Tragedy." Other orchestral numbers will be Brahms' second symphony and Mr. Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel."

Mr. Sergei Rachmaninoff, Russian composer, pianist and conductor, will make his first appearance here at the afternoon concert, playing his own second concerto. Mr. Granville Bantock's overture to "Pierrot of the Minute" will be heard here for the first time. Schumann's second symphony and Mr. Strauss' tone poem "Don Juan" will complete the programme.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
SUN
New York City.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first pair of concerts at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The programmes follow:

THURSDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 11.
Symphonic prologue to a tragedy (first time) Reger
Aria.
Symphony in D major, No. 2.....Brahms
Aria.
Tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," op. 28.....Richard Strauss
Soloist, Charles Gilibert.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 13.
Overture, "Pierrot of the Minute," (first time).....Granville Bantock
Symphony No. 2 in C major.....Schumann
Second concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in C minor, op. 18.....Rachmaninoff
Tone poem, "Don Juan".....Richard Strauss
Soloist, Serge Rachmaninoff.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NEW YORK JOURNAL
From
Address NEW YORK
NOV 7

Am Donnerstag Abend begann Rachmaninoff seine amerikanische Kunstreise in Northampton, Mass. Am nächsten Montag wird er bei einem Konzert des Boston Symphony Orchesters in Philadelphia mitwirken. Am Samstag Nachmittag veranstaltet er hier ein Recital in der Carnegie Hall.

* * *

WORLD
New York City.
NOV 7

Boston Symphony Programmes.

The first pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening at 8.15 and the following Saturday afternoon at 2.30 o'clock. At the first concert the assisting artist will be Charles Gilibert of the Manhattan Opera Company, and at the Saturday afternoon concert the eminent Russian composer and pianist Serge Rachmaninoff will make his first appearance in New York.

On each programme Mr. Fiedler has placed an interesting novelty. On Thursday night he will play for the first time in New York Max Reger's latest work for orchestra, "A Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy," opus 108. On Saturday afternoon for the first time New York will hear a work by Granville Bantock, one of the younger set of English composers, of whom much is being said. It is his comedy overture, "The Pierrot of the Minute," played in Boston a few weeks ago. Rachmaninoff will play his own second concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, made known here a year ago at a Boston Symphony concert by Gabrilowitsch.

Reger's "A Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy" was performed for the first time at the ninth Gurzenich concert in Cologne in March, 1909. The first performance in America was at the Boston Symphony concert in Boston on Oct. 15 last. The prologue is dedicated to Arthur Nikisch.

"The Pierrot of the Minute" was performed for the first time at the Worcester (England) Festival on Sept. 9, 1908, and had its first performance in America at the Boston Symphony concert in Boston on Oct. 22. The work was inspired by Dowson's little play of the same title. Dowson, who died ten years ago, was a member of the Yellow Book circle, and this fantasy was first published in 1897 with drawings by Aubrey Beardsley. Pierrot has gone to the park of the Petit Trianon in obedience to a mysterious message which bids him to sleep there one night if he would encounter Love. A Moon Maiden descends the steps of the Temple of Love and bending over the sleeper kisses him. He awakes and, although warned that the kisses of the Moon are fatal sweetness, he recklessly demands the pure and perfect bliss, though life be the price to pay it. With gay laughter and sprightly jest they learn together the lore of Love; but daybreak approaches and the Moon Maiden must leave him. Together they gaze at the coming dawn and then Pierrot falls softly asleep once more and the Moon Maiden vanishes. The overture ends with the awakening of Pierrot, his love dream nothing but the illusion of a minute. The two programmes are:

Thursday Evening, Nov. 11.
Reger.....Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy
(First time.)
Aria
Brahms.....Symphony in D major, No. 2
Aria
Richard Strauss—
Tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," op. 28.
Soloist, Charles Gilibert.
Saturday Afternoon, Nov. 13.
Granville Bantock's Overture, "Pierrot of the Minute."
(First time.)
Schumann.....Symphony No. 2, in C major Rachmaninoff—
Second Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, in C minor, op. 18.
Richard Strauss.....Tone poem, "Don Juan"
Soloist, Serge Rachmaninoff.

Philharmonic Programme.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,
New York City.

MUSIC NOTES OF MOMENT.

The first pair of concerts to be given here this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening at 8:15, and Saturday afternoon, November 13, at 2:30 o'clock. At the first concert the assisting artist will be Charles Gilibert, the well-known baritone, and at the Saturday afternoon concert the eminent Russian composer and pianist, Serge Rachmaninoff, will make his first appearance in New York. On each of the programmes Mr. Fiedler has placed an interesting novelty. On Thursday night he will play for the first time in New York Max Reger's latest work for orchestra, entitled "A Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy" (opus 108). On Saturday afternoon for the first time New York will hear a work by Granville Bantock, one of the younger set of English composers, of whom much is now being said, his comedy overture, "The Pierrot of the Minute," which was played in Boston a few weeks ago with much success.

Rachmaninoff will play his own second concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, which was made known here a year ago at a Boston Symphony concert by Gabrilowitsch. Reger's "Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy" was performed for the first time at the ninth Gurzenich concert in Cologne in March, 1909. It was played shortly afterward at a Philharmonic concert in Vienna, and at the twenty-first Gewandhaus concert of last season in Leipsic. The first American performance of the work was at the Boston Symphony concert in Boston on October 15. "The Pierrot of the Minute" was performed for the first time at the Worcester (England) recital on September 9, 1908, and had its first performance in America at the Boston Symphony concert in Boston on October 22. The work was inspired by Dowson's little play of the same name.

The full programmes are as follows: Thursday evening, Reger's "Symphonic Prologue," Brahms's Symphony in D major (No. 2); Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" music and arias by Charles Gilibert; Saturday afternoon, Bantock's "Pierrot" overture, Schumann's Symphony in C major (No. 2); Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto for piano and orchestra, in C minor (with the composer as soloist), and Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan."

* * *

[42]

Stand[illegible] Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 7 1909

Nearly all the subscription sales in the various cities where the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives a series of concerts are closed and the great organization is assured of the most prosperous season in its history, which also indicates that the musical season in general is to be the best this country has ever enjoyed. Besides the twenty-four public rehearsals and twenty-four concerts in Boston, the seats to which are sold by auction and this year realized a much greater sum than last, the Boston Symphony gives subscription concerts in Cambridge, Providence, Worcester, Hartford, New Bedford, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. In all of these cities the houses are nearly sold out for the season, and this, despite that never in the history of the United States has there been so much musical activity as there is this year. The subscription sale for the ten concerts in New York is particularly gratifying, because it demonstrates once more how firmly established Boston's orchestra has become in the affections of the musical public of the metropolis.

From NEW YORK PRESS,
Address New York City.
Date [illegible] 7

In the concert world this week there will be enough activity to please the devotees of music that has no dramatic accompaniment. On Tuesday afternoon Marcella Sembrich will give her annual recital of songs. On Wednesday evening the Philharmonic Society will offer its third concert of the season. On Thursday afternoon Miss Georgia Hall, American violinist, will be heard for the first time in New York. On Thursday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler conductor, will begin its Manhattan season. On Saturday afternoon the same orchestra will make its first appeal this season to a matinee audience. An entertainment combining saltatorial with symphonic delights will be given on Tuesday evening in the Metropolitan Opera House under the management of R. E. Johnson, when Isidora Duncan, with light stepping feet, and Walter Damrosch, with gracefully poised arms, will mingle movement and music.

From AMERICAN STAR
Address Baltimore, Md.
NOV 6

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts which will be given in the Lyric on next Wednesday evening, November 10, at 8:15, will present to Baltimore audiences for the first time one of the greatest of living Russian composers, who is at the same time one of the greatest living pianists—Serge Rachmaninoff. This will be his second appearance in America, his first taking place on Monday night in Philadelphia. Originally it had been intended that he should make his American debut in Boston, and under this plan it had been announced that he would not only play his own second concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, but would likewise conduct one of his own orchestral works, probably his new symphonic poem, "The Isle of Death." Unfortunately, however, he was compelled to delay his sailing a week, which cut off his Boston debut and made it impossible to have sufficient rehearsals for the orchestral work, so here in Baltimore he will appear simply as a pianist.

Mr. Fiedler has arranged a program which is typical of his good taste and keen discernment. It contains broad contrasts and all the music is delightful. The first number will be the ever-welcome "Der Freischutz" overture, by Weber, and then will come the loveliest of Brahm's symphonies—that in D Major No. 2. The concert will be brought to an end by an end by Richard Strauss' rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

From AMERICAN
Address Baltimore, Md.
NOV 7

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts, which will be given in the Lyric on next Wednesday evening, November 10, at 8:15, will present to Baltimore audiences for the first time the greatest of living Russian composers, who is at the same time one of the greatest living pianists—Serge Rachmaninoff. This will be his second appearance in America, his first taking place on Monday night in Philadelphia. Originally it had been intended that he should make his American debut in Boston and under this plan it had been announced that he would not only play his own second concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, but would likewise conduct one of his own orchestral works, probably his new symphonic poem, "The Isle of Death." Unfortunately, however, he was compelled to delay in sailing a week, which cut off his Boston debut and made it impossible to have sufficient rehearsals for the orchestral work, so here in Baltimore he will appear simply as a pianist.

Mr. Fiedler has arranged a program which is typical of his good taste and keen discernment. It contains broad contrasts and all the music is delightful.

TIMES :
BOS[illegible]
Th[illegible]
New York City.
NOV 7 1909

Max Fiedler
Boston Symphony Orchestra

The first pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, Nov. 11, at 8:15, and the following Saturday afternoon, Nov. 13, at 2:30 o'clock. At the first concert the assisting artist will be Charles Gilibert. At the Saturday afternoon concert the Russian composer and pianist, Serge Rachmaninoff, will make his first appearance in New York. On each of the programmes Mr. Fiedler has placed an interesting novelty. On Thursday night he will play for the first time in New York Max Reger's latest work for orchestra, which is entitled "A Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy," Opus 108. On Saturday afternoon for the first time New York will hear a work by Granville Bantock, one of the younger set of English composers, a comedy overture, "Pierrot of the Minute." Rachmaninoff will play his own second concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, which was made known here a year ago at a Boston Symphony concert by Gabrilowitsch.

Reger's "Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy" was performed for the first time at the ninth Guerzenich concert in Cologne in March, 1909. It was played shortly afterward at a Philharmonic concert in Vienna and at the twenty-first Gewandhaus concert of last season in Leipsic. The first performance in England was at a promenade concert in London on Sept. 14, 1909, and the first performance in America was at a Boston Symphony concert in Boston on Friday afternoon, Oct. 15, and Saturday evening, Oct. 16 last. The prologue is dedicated to Arthur Mikisch, and is scored for three flutes, (one interchangeable with piccolo,) two oboes, English horn, two clarinets, bass clarinet, two bassoons, double bassoon, three trumpets, six horns, three trombones, bass tuba, a set of three kettledrums, bass drum, cymbals, and the usual strings. It was originally very long, but at the request of Mr. Fiedler the composer last Summer made a very considerable cut in it, and Mr. Fiedler has taken upon himself to shorten it so that now it plays within a moderate time. No hint has been made as to what tragedy Reger had in mind or whether the prologue was conceived for any tragedy, written or contemplated.

From NEWS
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date NOV 6 1909

RUSSIAN COMPOSER WILL PLAY HERE

Rachmaninoff To Appear With Boston Symphony At First Concert.

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts, which will be given in the Lyric next Wednesday evening at 8.15 o'clock, will present to Baltimore audiences for the first time one of the greatest of living Russian composers, who is at the same time one of the greatest living pianists—Serge Rachmaninoff. This will be his second appearance in America, his first taking place on Monday night in Philadelphia.

Mr. Fiedler has arranged a program which is typical of his good taste and keen discernment. It contains broad contrasts and all the music is delightful. The first number will be the "Der Freischutz" overture by Weber, and then will come the loveliest of Brahms' symphonies—that in D major No. 2. The concert will be brought to an end by an end by Richard Strauss' rondo, "Till Eulen-

From DRAMATIC MIRROR
Address [illegible]
NEW YORK NOV 13 1909

Sergei Rachmaninoff, who was recently appointed Royal Director of Music in Russia, arrived Tuesday in New York. He will appear in this country with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and with the orchestras in Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, and New York. He is a composer, pianist and conductor.

[illegible] Newspaper Clipping Bureau
From [illegible]
Address [illegible]
NOV 6 - 1

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts, which will be given in the Lyric on next Wednesday evening, Nov. 10, at 8.15, will present to Baltimore audiences for the first time the greatest living Russian composers, who is at the same time one of the greatest living pianists, Serge Rachmaninoff.

Serge Rachmaninoff was born in Novgorod, Russia, on March 20, 1873. He was admitted to the Ptersburg Conservatory at the age of 9 and Denjanski was his first teacher on the piano. In 1885 he entered the conservatory at Moscow, studying the piano with Sweyer and composition with Arenski and Yanejer. After the death of Sweyer he studied with Alexander Siloti, and in 1891 he was graduated from the conservatory as pianist, and in the following year at the competitive examination he received as scholar of composition the great gold medal for his one-act opera, "Aleko." The first few years after his graduation his life was one of a traveling virtuoso. Conductor Fiedler has arranged a program which is typical of his good taste and keen discernment. The program in full is as follows:

Weber—Overture to the opera "Der Freischutz."

Brahms—Symphony in D Major No. 2.

Rachmaninoff—Second concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in C Minor, op. 18.

Richard Strauss—Tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Soloist—Serge Rachmaninoff.

From SUN
Address Baltimore, Md.
Date [illegible] 7

Boston Symphony Wednesday.

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts will be given in the Lyric Wednesday evening, when Baltimoreans will hear for the first time one of the greatest of living Russian composers and who is also regarded by many as one of the greatest pianists now before the public—Serge Rachmaninoff.

This will be Rachmanioff's second appearance in America, his first taking place tomorrow evening in Philadelphia. It was intended that he should make his American debut in Boston and under this plan it had been announced that he would not only play his own second concerto for pianoforte and orchestra but would also conduct one of his own orchestra works. He was compelled however, to delay his sailing a week which cut off his Boston debut and made it impossible to have sufficient rehearsals for the orchestral work, and he will therefore appear in Baltimore only as soloist.

Rachmaninoff was born in the Government of Novgorad, Russia, March 20, 1873. He was admitted to the Petersburg Conservatory at the age of nine and Denjanski was his first teacher, on the piano. In 1885 he entered the Conservatory at Moscow studying the piano with Sweyer and composition with Arenski and Yanejer. In 1891 he was graduated from the Conservatory as pianist, and in the following year at the competitive examination he received as scholar of composition the great gold medal for his one-act opera "Aleko."

From EVENING STAR
Address Washington, D. C.
Date [illegible]

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, November 9, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Mrs. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, concert-soprano. At this concert she will make her first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mrs. Rider-Kelsey will sing two numbers, one of them the aria of Agatha from Weber's "Der Freischutz," and the other aria, "Dove Sono," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro."

The program contains one of the most important novelties of the year. Granville Bantock's overture, "Pierrot of the Minute." Bantock has written a great many things in all forms and is especially influenced by oriental imagery. The work to be played here was performed for the first time at the Worcester (England) festival, September 9, 1908. Its full title is "The Pierrot of the Minute, a Comedy Overture to a Dramatic Phantasy" of Ernest Dowson. Ernest Dowson became known through the medium of the famous "Yellow Book." He died in 1900 at the age of thirty-three. The Phantasy is a charming poem, telling the story of a Pierrot who goes to sleep in the glade in the Parc du Petit Trianon, and there he confers with the Moon-Maid.

The other two numbers will be Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony and Beethoven's overture to "Egmont." The program is as follows:

Tschaikowsky, Symphony No. 5 in E minor; Weber, Agatha's aria from "Der Freischutz"; Granville Bantock, overture, "Pierrot of the Minute" (first time); Mozart, aria, "Dove Sono," from "The Marriage of Figaro"; Beethoven, overture to Goethe's "Egmont"; soloist, Mrs. Corinne Rider-Kelsey.

From HERALD
Address Washington, D. C.
NOV 7 1909

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in the New National Theater on next Tuesday afternoon, November 9, at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Mrs. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, who is to-day one of the most famous of American concert-sopranos, and at this concert makes her first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mrs. Rider-Kelsey will sing two numbers, one of them the great aria of Agatha from Weber's "Der Freischutz" and the other the charming aria "Dove Sono" from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro." The complete programme:

Symphony No. 5, in E minor.....Tschaikowsky
"Agatha's Aria," from "Der Froischutz"....Weber Overture, "Pierrot of the Minute" (first time)
.....Granville Bantock
Aria, "Dove Sono," from "The Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont".....Beethoven
Soloist, Mrs. Corinne Rider-Kelsey.

From POST
Address Washington, D. C.
Date [illegible]

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given in the New National on Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock. The soloist will be Mrs. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, who is today one of the most famous American concer sopranos, and at this concert makes her first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mrs. Rider-Kelsey will sing two numbers, the aria of Agatha from Weber's "Der Freischutz" and the charming aria "Dove Sono" from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro."

The program contains one of the most important and at the same time the most attractive novelties of the year—Granville Bantock's overture "Pierrot of the Minute." Granville Bantock is one of the most interesting figures in modern English music.

The other two numbers will be Tschaikowsky's superb fifth symphony and Beethoven's overture to "Egmont." The program in full and in proper order is as follows: Tschaikowski, symphony No. 5 in E minor; Weber, Agatha's aria from "Der Freischutz;" Granville Bantock's overture, "Pierrot of the Minute" (first time); Mozart, aria "Dove Sono" from "The Marriage of Figaro;" Beethoven, overture to Goethe's "Egmont." Soloist, Mrs. Corinne Rider-Kelsey.

From INQUIRER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date [illegible]

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The first Boston Symphony concert of the year will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening at 8.15 o'clock, and the program is full of unusual interest, presenting an important novelty by an English composer and marking the first appearance in America of a man who is now generally regarded as the greatest of living Russian composers and one of the greatest pianists now before the public. The novelty will be Granville Bantock's comedy overture "Pierrot of the Minute." The assisting artist will be Serge Rachmaninoff.

Originally it had been intended that Rachmaninoff should make his first appearance in America in Boston at the Boston Symphony concerts on October 29 and 30, but his sailing was delayed; therefore, Philadelphia has him first. For the same reason it has been found impossible to carry out the original plan of having him not only play his own piano concert, but to conduct one of his works, for his late arrival in America precluded the possibility of sufficient rehearsals. So he will play his own second concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, opus 18 in C-Minor.

The full program for the concert is as follows:

Granville Bantock ..... Overture "Pierrot of the Minute" (First time).
Tschaikowsky .. Symphony No. 5 in E-Minor.
Rachmanioff .. Second Concerto in C-Minor for pianoforte an orchestra. Op. 18.
Richard Strauss ..... Tone Poem "Don Juan"
Soloist—Serge Rachmaninoff.

TRIBUNE
New York City.
[illegible] 1909

IN WASHINGTON SOCIETY.

[From The Tribune Bureau.]

Washington, Nov. 9.—Mrs. Taft occupied a box at the National Theatre this afternoon to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra. With her were her sister, Mrs. Louis More, Mrs. Charles Whiteside Rae, Mrs. A. Garrison McClintock, of New York and Washington, and Miss Mabel Boardman. The most brilliant audience of the season was present. With the German Ambassador were Countess von Bernstorff, Countess Luise-Alexandra von Bernstorff and Count von Wedel. Mrs. Leiter, who also occupied a box, entertained Mrs. John R. McLean, Mrs. Norman Williams, Mrs. Wallingford, of Cincinnati; Miss Kellogg, of Utica, N. Y., and Miss Dorothy Williams. Others there were Mrs. C. A. Williams, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. James McMillan, Mrs. Joseph Audenreid, Mrs. Clarence Moore, Mrs. Edward Mitchell, Mrs. John Hay, Mrs. Calderon Carlisle, Mrs. Arnold Hague, Mrs. Gordon Cumming, Mrs. Richardson Clover, Mrs. James Lowndes, Miss Tuckerman, Mrs. William M. Irwin, Miss Irwin, Mrs. Daniel P. McCartney and Mrs. J. G. Mann.

[43]

TIMES

Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Opens Season At the New National Tuesday

Mrs. Corinne Rider-Kelley Is Soloist, and the Program Will Include a Novelty Number.

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts of the season will be given at the National Theater on Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock.

The soloist will be Mrs. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, who is today one of the best known American concert sopranos and at this concert makes her first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mrs. Rider-Kelsey will sing two numbers, one of them the aria of 'Agatha" from Weber's "Der Freischutz," and the other the aria "Dove Sono," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro."

The program contains one of the most important and at the same time most attractive novelties of the year, Granville Bantock's overture, "Pierrot of the Minute." Granville Bantock is an interesting figure in modern English music.

Bantock has written many compositions in all forms, and especially is he influenced by oriental imagery. The work to be played here was performed for the first time at the Worcester (England) Festival, September 9, 1908.

Other numbers will be Tschaikowsky's superb fifth symphony and Beethoven's overture to "Egmont." The program follows:

Tschaikowsky—Symphony No. 5 in E minor.

Weber—Agatha's Aria from "Der Freischutz."

Granville Bantock—Overture, "Pierrot of the Minute."

Mozart—Aria, "Dove Sono" from "The Marriage of Figaro."

Beethoven—Overture to Goethe's "Egmont."

Soloist—Mrs. Corinne Rider-Kelsey.

• • •

The first Boston Symphony concert of the year will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow (Monday) evening at 8:15 o'clock. The programme is of unusual interest, presenting an important novelty by an English composer and marking the first appearance in America of a man who is now generally regarded as the greatest of living Russian composers and one of the greatest pianists now before the public. The novelty will be Granville Bantock's comedy overture, "Pierrot of the Minute." The assisting artist will be Serge Rachmaninoff. Originally it had been intended that Rachmaninoff should make his first appearance in America in Boston at the Boston Symphony concerts on October 29 and 30, but his sailing was delayed; therefore Philadelphia has him first. For the same reason it has been found impossible to carry out the original plan of having him not only play his own piano concerto, but to conduct one of his works, for his late arrival in America precluded the possibility of sufficient rehearsals. So he will play his own Second Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, Opus 18 in C minor.

Serge Rachmaninoff was born in the Government of Novgorod, Russia, on March 20, 1873. He was admitted to the Petersburg Conservatory at the age of 9, and Denjanski was his first teacher of the piano. In 1885 he entered the conservatory at Moscow, studying the piano with Sweyer and composition with Arenski and Yanejer. After the death of Sweyer he studied with Alexander Siloti, and in 1891 he was graduated from the conservatory as pianist and in the following year at the competitive examination he received as scholar of composition the great gold medal for his one-act opera, "Aleko." The first few years after his graduation his life was that of the traveling virtuoso. In 1899 he was invited by the London Philharmonic Society to appear with it as pianist, composer and conductor. In 1897 he had become conductor of private opera, but a year later he gave this up, although he had proved his extraordinary talent in this direction. In 1894 he was made first conductor of the Imperial Theatre at Moscow and produced a number of important operas, but two years later, feeling that the field was not broad enough for his artistic ability, he left not only the theatre, but Russia, and made his permanent residence in Dresden, where his home now is. Since then, with the exception of visits to Russia as "guest" conductor and a number of engagements as pianist each year, he has devoted himself entirely to composition. He has written two concertos for the piano, two suites for two pianos and a large number of smaller piano works. He has contributed to musical literature important works of chamber music, and in the larger forms for orchestra he has written two symphonies, two symphonic poems and a caprice. He has also written several operas which have had success in Russia.

Granville Bantock, who is one of the most interesting figures in modern English music, is the son of an English physician and was intended for the Indian civil service. In 1908 he was appointed to the Peyton chair of music in the University of Birmingham as successor to Sir Edward Elgar. The work to be played here was performed for the first time at the Worcester (England) Festival, September 9, 1908. Its full title is "The Pierrot of the Minute," a comedy overture to a dramatic phantasy by Ernest Dowson. Ernest Dowson became known through the medium of the famous "Yellow Book." He died in 1900 at the age of 33. The Phantasy is a charming poem telling the story of a Pierrot who goes to sleep in the glade in the Parc du Petit Trianon, where he confers with the Moon Maid. The overture is light, sparkling, melodious and most excellently scored. The full programme for the concert is as follows:

Overture—"Pierrot of the Minute" (first time) ..... Granville Bantock
Symphony No. 5, in E minor ..... Tschaikowsky
Second Concerto, in C minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, opus 18 ..... Rachmaninoff
Tone poem—"Don Juan" ..... Richard Strauss
Soloist, Serge Rachmaninoff

• • •

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

NOV 7

The first Boston Symphony concert of the season will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening at 8.15 o'clock. The program is full of unusual interest, presenting an important novelty by an English composer and marking the first appearance in America of a man who is now generally regarded as the greatest of living Russian composers and one of the greatest pianists now before the public. The novelty will be Granville Bantock's comedy overture "Pierrot of the Minute." The assisting artist will be Serge Rachmaninoff. Originally it had been intended that Rachmaninoff should make his first appearance in America in Boston at the Boston Symphony concerts on October 29 and 30, but his sailing was delayed, therefore Philadelphia has him first. For the same reason it has been found impossible to carry out the original plan of having him not only play his own piano concert, but to conduct one of his works, for his late arrival in America precluded the possibility of sufficient rehearsals. So he will play his own second concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, opus 18 in C Minor.

Serge Rachmaninoff was born in the Government of Novgorod, Russia, on March 20, 1873. He was admitted to the Petersburg Conservatory at the age of nine. His first teacher on the piano was Denjanski. In 1885 Rachmaninoff entered the Conservatory at Moscow, studying the piano with Sweyer, and composition with Arenski and Yanejer. After the death of Sweyer, Rachmaninoff studied with Alexander Siloti, and in 1891 graduated from the Conservatory as pianist, and in the following year at the competitive examination received as "scholar of composition" the great gold medal for a one-act opera "Aleko." The first few years after his graduation Rachmaninoff's life was that of a traveling virtuoso. In 1899 he was invited by the London Philharmonic Society to appear with it as pianist composer and conductor. In 1897 he had become conductor of private opera, but a year later he gave this up, although he had proved to have an extraordinary talent in this direction. In 1894 he was made first conductor of the Imperial Theatre at Moscow, and he produced a number of important operas, but, two years later, feeling that the field was not broad enough for his artistic ability, he left Russia and made his permanent residence in Dresden. Since that time, with the exception of visits to Russia as "guest" conductor and a number of engagements as pianist each year, he has devoted himself entirely to composition. He has written two concertos for the piano, two suites for two pianos and a large number of smaller piano works. He has contributed some importnt works of chamber music, and in the larger forms for orchestra has written two symphonies, two symphonic poems and a caprice. He has also written several operas which have had success in Russiaa.

Granville Bantock, who is one of the most interesting figures in modern English music, is the son of an English physician and was intended for the Indian Civil Service. When the young man was 21 years old he decided to devote himself to music and he entered the Royal Academy of Music of London as a pupil of Frederic Corder. Bantock gained experience chiefly as conductor of musical comedy and light music in general in the English provinces, and as conductor of the famous "The Gaiety Girl" he visited America in 1894. With this company he made a tour of the world and has written a most entertaining book, entitled "Round the World With 'A Gaiety Girl.'" On his return to England he became conductor of the Stanford's opera "Shamus O'Brien," and then he branched out, conducting more serious concerts. In 1908 he was appointed to the Peyton Chair of Music in the University of Birmingham as succcessor to Sir Edward Elgar.

Bantock has written a great many things in all forms, and especially is he influenced by Oriental imagery. The work to be played here was performed for the first time at the Worcester (England) festival, September 9, 1908. Its full title is "The Pierrot of the Minute, a Comedy Overture to a Dramatic Phantasy of Ernest Dowson." Ernest Dowson became known through the medium of the famous "Yellow book." He died in 1900 at the age of 33. The Phantasy is a charming poem telling the story of a Pierrot who goes to sleep in the glade in the Park du Petit Trianon where he confers with the Moonmaid of more or less interesting character. The overture is said to be light, sparkling, melodious and most excellently scored. The full program for the concert is as follows:

Granville Bantock—Overture "Pierrot of the Minute" (first time).
Tschaikowsky—Symphony No. 5, in E Minor.
Rachmaninoff—Second Concerto in C Minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 18.
Richard Strauss—Tone poem, "Don Juan."
Soloist—Serge Rachmaninoff.

• • •

PRESS

Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 7

The first Boston Symphony concert of the year will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening at 8.15 o'clock and the programme is full of unusual interest, presenting an important novelty by an English composer and marking the first appearance in America of a man who is now generally regarded as the greatest of living Russian composers and one of the greatest pianists now before the public.

The novelty will be Granville Bantock's comedy-overture, "Pierrot of the Minute." The assisting artist will be Serge Rachmaninoff. Originally it had been intended that Rachmaninoff should make his first appearance in America in Boston at the Boston Symphony concerts on October 29 and 30, but his sailing was delayed; therefore Philadelphia has him first.

Serge Rachmaninoff was born in the government of Novgorod, Russia, on March 20, 1873.

He was admitted to the Petersburg Conservatory at the age of 9 and Denjanski was his first teacher on the piano. In 1885 he entered the Conservatory at Moscow, studying the piano with Sweyer and composition with Arenski and Yanejer. After the death of Sweyer he studied with Alexander Siloti and in 1891 he was graduated from the conservatory as pianist, and in the following year, at the competitive examination, he received as scholar of composition the great gold medal for his one-act opera "Aleko." The first few years after his graduation his life was one of a traveling virtuoso. In 1899 he was invited by the London Philharmonic Society to appear with it as pianist, composer and conductor. In 1897 he had become conductor of private opera, but a year later he gave this up, although he had proved himself an extraordinary talent in this direction. In 1894 he was made first conductor of the Imperial Theater at Moscow, and produced a number of important operas, but two years later, feeling that the field was not bread enough for his artistic ability, he left not only the theater but Russia, and made his permanent residence in Dresden, where his home now is. Since then, with the exception of visits to Russia as "guest" conductor and a number of engagements as pianist each year, he has devoted himself entirely to composition.

Granville Bantock has written a great many things in all forms and especially is he influenced by oriental imagery. The work to be played here was performed for the first time at the Worcester (England) festival, September 9, 1908. Its full title is "The Pierrot of the Minute." a comedy overture to a dramatic phantasy of Ernest Dowson.

The full program for the concert is as follows:—

Granville Bantock..Overture "Pierrot of the Minute" (first time).
Tschaikowsky.....Symphony No. 5 in E Minor
Rachmaninoff..Second Concerto in C Minor for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 18.
Richard Strauss.....Tone poem "Don Juan."

• • •

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

n .....

ress .....

Neuer Symphonie-Orchester.

Am nächsten Freitag Abend findet in der Academy of Music das erste diesjährige Konzert des „Boston Symphony-Orchestra" statt. Max Fiedler dirigirt auch heuer wieder das berühmte Orchester, ohne dessen Auftreten die hiesige Musik-Saison nicht vollständig wäre. Herr Fiedler hat für das erste Brooklyner Konzert wieder ein ausgezeichnetes Programm aufgestellt, dessen Hauptnummer Tschaikowsky's berühmte fünfte Symphonie, die als „Pathetique" bekannte, ist. Ferner enthält das Programm Weber's „Oberon" = Ouverture, Grieg's „Peer Gynt Suite" und Richard Strauß' „Till Eulenspiegel". In früheren Jahren trat in dem ersten Konzerte dieses Orchesters kein Solist auf. Das Konzert am Freitag bildet eine Ausnahme dieser Regel, da Charles Gilibert, der berühmte französische Baritonist von Hammerstein's Manhattan Opera House, auftreten und zwei Arien singen wird. Alle Anzeichen deuten darauf hin, daß das Konzert sehr gut besucht sein wird.

n .....

ress .....

NOV 5

Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert in the Parsons Theater on Monday evening, November 15, the first of three to be given during the season. It has become customary to fill the theater with music lovers on each visit of the Boston players and the coming concert is likely to excel preceding performances in point of attendance and interest. It is seldom that such a talented composer and pianist as Sergei Rachmaninoff visits Hartford and his rendering of his own "Pianoforte Concerto, op 18," under such favorable conditions is eagerly awaited. The overture to Weber's "Der Freischutz," Tchaikowsky's "Fifth Symphony" and Beethoven's great overture, "Leonore, No. 3," are orchestral numbers completing the program. The seat sale opens this morning at John M. Gallup & Co.'s music store.

NEW YORK HERALD,

New York City.

NOV 10 1909

FASHION TURNS OUT FOR CONCERT IN WASHINGTON

Society Welcomes First Opportunity of the Season for a General Assembly.

HEARS BOSTON ORCHESTRA

In Their Newest and Handsomest Gowns and Hats, Women Fill Theatre at the National Capital.

HERALD BUREAU,
No. 1,502 H STREET, N. W.,
WASHINGTON, D. C., Tuesday.

Society has been yearning for an opportunity to "turn out" and it came this afternoon at the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the new National Theatre.

Mrs. Taft and scores of the members of the fashionable set at the capital went by automobile or drove to the theatre and for half an hour before the concert the streets were blocked with chugging cars and prancing horses. Every woman wore her newest and very smartest gown and hat. Everybody was glad to see everybody else. The music was delightful, and altogether the afternoon was quite a success and society feels that now it has the excuse to go ahead and declare the season to have begun.

Mrs. Taft arrived at the theatre a few minutes before Mr. Max Fiedler, the conductor, raised his baton. The White House landaulette whizzed up to the curb and Mrs. Taft was the first to alight. She wore a becoming street gown of smoked purple, with a purple toque topped with a large white aigrette. Mrs. More wore a stunning gown of apricot satin with a large black hat and long black cloak. Mrs. Taft and her sister were joined in their box by Miss Mabel Boardman, Mrs. Charles W. Rae and Mrs. A. Garrison McClintock.

Other prominent society members present were Mrs. Charles O'Donnell Lee and her sister, Miss Mary McCauley, who will be one of the débutantes of the season; Mrs. Preston Gibson and Mr. Paul Pearsall, who occupied one of the boxes. Entertaining box parties also were Mrs. Levi Z. Leiter, who had with her Mrs. Buckner Wallingford, Miss Kellogg, of Utica, and Miss Dorothy Williams, sister of Mrs. Joseph Leiter; Mrs. Henry Cabot Lodge, Mrs. Thomas Carter, wife of Senator Carter, of Montana, and Mr. and Mrs. Archibald Hopkins.

In the audience were Mrs. Nathaniel Francis, Mrs. Clarence Moore, Mrs. Philip Sheridan, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mr. Reginald Huidekoper, Mrs. George Howard, Mrs. "Jack" Story, Mrs. Edward Mitchell, the Countess de Buisseret, wife of the newly appointed Minister from Belgium; Mr. de Thal, Second Secretary of the Russian Embassy; Mrs. Harlan, wife of Justice Harlan; the Misses Harlan, Mrs. Philip Hichborn, Miss Constance Hoyt, the German Ambassador and the Countess von Bernstorff, Mr. H. W. Kennard, Second Secretary of the British Embassy; Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Jenkins and Miss Louise Foraker.

BOSTON HERALD,

NOVEMBER 12, 1909.

SYMPHONY IN NEW YORK.

Orchestra Plays New Prologue to Tragedy by Max Reger.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, Nov. 11—The first concert of the 24th season in this city of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place tonight in Carnegie Hall. The programme consisted of a new symphonic prologue to a tragedy by Max Reger, the air of the Drum Major from Ambroise Thomas' "Le Caid," Brahms' symphony in D major, the air of the Devil from Massenet's "Griselidis," Charles Bordes' song, "Dansons la Gigue," and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

The singer was Charles Gilibert of the Manhattan Opera House.

The Reger composition was played with immense vigor and a rich body of tone by the gentlemen from Boston, and Mr. Fiedler conducted.

ss .....

NOV 11

one week, beginning next Monday.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts in Providence are now renewing their subscriptions for the coming season, when it should be noted four concerts are to be given instead of the customary three. The limit of renewal for them is Saturday next, Nov. 13. On Monday, Nov. 15, the general sale of season tickets will open and will continue until up to and including Friday, Nov. 19. On Saturday, Nov. 20, the sale of tickets for the first concert will begin.

The season tickets are on sale as usual at the store of M. Steinert & Sons, 327 Westminster street.

[44]

BOSTON GLOBE
NOVEMBER 6, 1909.

MISS FARRAR CHARMS

Soloist in Two Airs From Gretry and Debussy.

Moderns to the Front at Rehearsal of Symphony Orchestra.

It was to the moderns that Mr Fiedler paid his respects in the public rehearsal of the symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon. The program included d'Indy's "Symphony No. 2 in B-flat major," Tschaikowsky's "Children's Dreams," from this "characteristic" suite, and the overture to Smetana's opera, "The Bartered Bride," for the orchestral numbers, with Miss Geraldine Farrar as soloist in two airs from Gretry and Debussy.

To hearers for whom beauty must spring from some obvious, palpable or accustomed source, d'Indy's symphony ceases to be cosmos and becomes musical chaos. Upon the ears of those for whom musical dissonance is merely the jangling together of uncongenial tones, the work will impose ravages which are frequently distressingly grewsome and always are impolite.

It quite depends upon the point of view, if for no other reason d'Indy's symphony commends itself by the supreme daring of its workmanship, both in its recreation of the scale and in its palette of glowing, iridescent orchestral color. Its spirit and content impart suggestion of both demoniac mysticism of exaltation and infinitude.

To a work necessarily so psychic and introspective, Tschaikowsky's exquisite excerpt from his suite proved an excellent foil. Here was tenderness, simplicity and sweet quietude. Themes which are beautiful for their serenity and graceful melody are developed through alternating strings and woodwind, against a varying accompaniment.

The 'cellos sing a melody of marked beauty. The movement is made up throughout of finely spun illusion—yet the story is told with a simple and unfaltering loveliness of style.

Miss Farrar's air of "Lucette" from Gretry's opera, "Silvain," was not a happy choice. Its composer acknowledged himself deficient in harmonization. It is quaint, but is so at the expense of being colorless.

The recitative and aria from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son" gave her wider scope, but still missed much of the characterizing penetration and intensity which her recent recital had prepared one to expect.

In telling of the passing festal train in which are to be seen the prodigal's brother and sister, a more pointed suggestion of the picture might have been expected from Miss Farrar, the singing-actress. As the singer, however, her voice and, at the close of the number, her face and posture, well betokened the despair and hopeless languor of the wanderer.

Although the score has since been revised, the work exhibits the tendency of the young Debussy, who while a student at the Conservatoire could write a composition with such signs of the new idiom he was later to develop, and with it could win the grand "Prix de Rome."

A brilliant reading of the overture to the "Bartered Bride" closed the concert.

The Most Extensive and Most Complete
Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

[illegible] NOV 7, 1909

The attention of last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts is called to the fact that if they wish to renew their subscriptions for the coming season and would retain the seats they had last year, renewals must be made on or before next Saturday, Nov. 13. All applications for such renewals should be sent to C. A. Ellis, manager, care of M. Steinert & Sons, 327 Westminster street. On the following Monday, Nov. 15, the books will be open for new subscribers.

The Boston Symphony's plan to give four concerts in Providence this year instead of the usual three will enable Mr. Fiedler to make a much wider survey of the field of music than has been possible in the past. The announcement also of the soloists has created excited comment, especially since in their number are two of the leading American concert-sopranos, Madame Corinne Rider-Kelsey and Madame Mary Hissem de Moss. Mischa Elman will be warmly welcomed when he appears with the orchestra and much interest is exhibited in the promised appearance of Ernest Hutcheson, who as a pianist ranks among the leaders.

BOSTON ADVERTISER.
NOVEMBER 6, 1909

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME IS MOSTLY FRENCH

D'INDY, DEBUSSY AND GRETRY THE COMPOSERS

Miss Geraldine Farrar at Her Best in Recitative and Aria From "L'Enfant Prodigue."

By Louis C. Elson.

Programme.

D'Indy—Symphony in B flat. No. 2.
Gretry—Air de Lucette. From "Sylvain."
Soloist—Miss Geraldine Farrar.
Tschaikowsky—"Reves d'enfant."
Debussy—Recit. and Aria from "L'Enfant Prodigue."
Miss Farrar.
Smetana—Overture to "The Sold Bride."

Let our orchestra be the best in the world (which it is), let the instrumental numbers be of the highest character, and these things will be light as air in comparison with the appearance of a famous soloist, with the public at large. Depend upon it, it was not to hear D'Indy's symphony that people stood out on the sidewalk from 9 o'clock in the morning. And in this connection it may do good to some of these patient waiters to know that when the waiting line is about at the main door of the Children's hospital it is complete; those who stand beyond this have a much better chance of getting into heaven on their good deeds than of getting into Symphony hall on their quarter-of-a-dollar.

Yet there were several things besides Miss Farrar in the concert of yesterday afternoon. One may not like D'Indy's symphony, but one requires to study it if one wishes to keep abreast of the modern vein of composition. It is "La Musique Cerebrale," which may be freely translated as music that gives you a headache. Music in this garb is no longer a "heavenly Maid," she is a sphinx who delights in giving the victim—we should say the auditor—unsolvable riddles. It seems like a reversion to the old times (14th and 15th centuries) when composers did not care whether their works sounded good or ill, so long as they were complicated and correct according to mathematical rule. We came a little late for the first movement, and the dissonances, heard through the closed doors, were more comfortable than when taken at short range. Mr. Fiedler made decidedly more of the work than M. D'Indy himself did when he conducted it here four years ago.

One may acknowledge the skill of the many theme transferences, from movement to movement, but Tschaikowsky has done this thing better in his 5th symphony. The patchy style of the third movement has been quite as well portrayed (and with more definite meaning) by Charpentier in his Montmartre scenes. The langours and musical sighs of the second movement and the finale, are a long way after Wagner and his "Tristan and Isolde." The fugue of the finale exhibits undeniable skill, and there is a fine climax at the end, but, all in all, it can never become enjoyable music, and we still believe that music was intended to give delight and move the emotions. A persistent, but small minority, recalled Mr. Fiedler at the end of the work, and the excellent playing and clear reading deserved the tribute.

Tschaikowsky's "Reves d'Enfant" was scarcely worth the doing. It began with a sombre Oriental theme on clarinette and bassoon (both played excellently), which seemed to picture a most precocious child struggling with the infinite. There were a couple of lullabies, which mitigated the brooding of this theme and later, a few colicky interruptions. But altogether it was a rather sour sugar-plum and was an uncomfortable half-way house between classical and popular music. While we do not consider Smetana's overture to his pretty opera to be comparable to his great national symphonic poems, yet there is a sprightliness and spontaneity in the work that charms. Smetana in Bohemian means "cream," and in spite of all the troubles and afflictions which came, this cream never turned sour. The strings (especially the deeper ones) played splendidly in the fugal theme and its working out. Only in Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture do we recall as sprightly and chattering a fugal subject. The high spirits of the delicious overture are maintained from first to last, and this overture seemed to us the finest instrumental work of the concert.

Miss Farrar appeared at her best on the symphonic platform. Her last appearance on this stage, in concert, a few weeks ago, was the best she had made when separated from the footlights, but the impression on this occasion went even beyond that. It is evident that Miss Farrar will grow yet and she has every chance of rivalling the foremost in her field. Her selections were in vivid contrast. The old French school of Gretry contrasted admirably with the subtler suggestions of Debussy. Gretry lived in a time when composers had to say what they meant and were not permitted to leave two-thirds to the imagination. There were no musical enigmas in the 18th century. Therefore Gretry's air was pleasantly melodic and refreshingly intelligible.

Miss Farrar sang this in the most artistic manner, making no bid for popular applause by over-forcing it, but interpreting the number with all the naive archness which it demanded.

Her other Aria was an absolute surprise. Here was an unknown Debussy! A Debussy of melody and glow of fervor! A Debussy of beautiful orchestration and of the clearest meaning. And it suited Miss Farrar's voice like a glove. So that we can earnestly say that we have never before found her so eminently satisfactory, so artistic, upon the concert stage. We suppose that part of the seven recalls that followed this number were due to the efforts of the uninitiated to force an encore, but we would gladly think, also, that much of the unceasing applause was a tribute to a beautiful work beautifully rendered. But why should the skillful D'Indy and the poetic Debussy not remain unaffected and attractive, instead of over-ambitious and ugly? Echo answers (truthfully, if not acoustically) "because they want to outdo Wagner!"

POST, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1909

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY OLIN DOWNES

Miss Geraldine Farrar, attired again in a "parrot" hat of a lighter shade than that of some weeks ago and carrying a well-known sable muff, sang at the Symphony rehearsal in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Fiedler interpreted D'Indy's B flat symphony for the third time in this city. Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride" brought the concert to an end.

D'Indy's work may best be reviewed after a second hearing. It is still a new taste, a pitfall for hasty judgment. Unquestionably it is one of the loftiest conceptions in modern music, and Mr. Fiedler made many complicated pages clearer than they had previously been.

Miss Farrar sang an air from one of Gretry's operas, "Sylvain," "Je ne sais pas si mas soeur aime," recitative and aria from Debussy's "Enfant Prodigue." She was heard to advantage in the latter piece, which has more than a tinge of Massenet, though she was hardly in as good vocal condition as on the occasion of her late recital. There was the appropriate simplicity and coquetry in Gretry's air, but Miss Farrar's simplicity is always a little obvious; there is sophistication back of it, consciousness which the hearer does not often forget.

The brilliant performance of Smetana's brilliant overture made its mark, but after all the success of the concert consisted in a work which when first heard here seemed about the ugliest possible example of successive sounds in existence, and this work achieved an encore yesterday.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
TURN

m .....

ress .....

NOV 14

MUSICAL NOTES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Little Changed from Last Year.

The annual sale of season tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's series of concerts in Providence during the coming winter will open at the music store of M. Steinert & Sons, 327 Westminster street, this week. So extremely successful have the Symphony concerts in Providence been during the last four years that it has been deemed advisable this year to increase their number from three to four, and therefore the orchestra will give four concerts on Tuesday evenings, Nov. 23, Jan. 4, Feb. 15, and April 5.

This orchestra this year remains practically unchanged from last in respect to personnel. There have been some minor changes in the string choirs, and, most important of all, there is a new first horn, who has shown that he is an artist far above ordinary rank, and thus the orchestra for the first time has two first horns of highest qualities. Mr. Fiedler, who made so many friends in Providence last year, is again back at his post as conductor.

Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, has provided a list of soloists of notable worth for each of the four concerts in Providence. There will be two singers, one pianist, and one violinist, and, generally considered, these make the most brilliant list of artists the orchestra has ever offered here. At the first concert the soloist will be Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey. Her voice is essentially of lyric quality, and she has a purity of style, which has enabled her to become one of the foremost interpreters of the music of Mozart.

For the second concert the soloist is Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist; for the third concert, Ernest Hutcheson, one of America's foremost pianists; for the fourth and last concert, Mrs. Mary Hissem de Moss, a soprano, well and favorably known in the concert field.

BOSTON JOURNAL—NOVEMBER 6, 1909.

GERALDINE FARRAR SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Her Singing and Her Appearance Both Pleasing to Audience.

ORCHESTRA STARTS ON TOUR SUNDAY

Sylvain Noack, Second Concert Master, Makes Hub Debut on Return.

Geraldine Farrar, looking much the same as Pocahontas may have looked when she charmed the people of London town, chiefly with a wonderful feathered headress that streamed behind her as she came smiling forth, was the star at yesterday's Symphony matinee. Truly for once those who came to hear her sing remained to praise her appearance. The hat, fitting snugly around her head and bobbing gently behind, was no more daring than that sable muff.

The Getry number, Lucette's air from the comic opera produced in Paris in 1770, proved rather flavorless, particularly in comparison with the sharply tinted selection from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue" that Miss Farrar sang as a second number.

Betrays Weak Parts.

Getry's music, besides betraying the weak parts of Miss Farrar's vocal apparatus, gave little opportunity for the display of the temperamental qualities that distinguish her singing. It is parlor music, and the Melrose prima donna did not undertake to relieve its monotone.

The Debussy number, Azrael's recitative and air "Time is no More," from the lyric scene with which the French radical won the Prix de Rome at the Paris Conservatory twenty-five years ago, was much the more effective. It would be a pleasure, judging by this, to hear Miss Farrar as Melisande. She has both skill and the understanding for the role.

The audience was left rather cold after the Getry piece, but it was moved to applaud in something more than complimentary fashion after Miss Farrar had sung the sad soliloquy of the Eastern prodigal.

Orchestra Off on Tour Tomorrow.

The concert opened with a performance of the D'Indy symphony in B-flat major, which the composer conducted when he was here four years ago. The novelty was the andante or fourth movement from Tschaikowsky's "Suite Caracteristique." The movement is called "Children's Dreams." It has many pleasing effects. Along with the Smetana overture, "The Bartered Bride," it lent some bright colors to a program that was inclined to be dull and drab.

The orchestra leaves town tomorrow on its first monthly trip South. Serge Rachmaninoff, who will make his first appearance here in Jaunary, will be the soloist in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Hartford. The soloist here the week after next, when the orchestra returns, will be Sylvain Noack, second concert master, who will then make his formal debut here in the Saint-Saens concerto in B minor, No. 3, op. 61.

SAMAROFF-HESS SOLO PROGRAM

At the first of the season's pension fund concerts, Mme. Olga Samaroff will play Schumann's concerto for piano in A minor, a work in which she has never been heard in Boston, and Professor Willy Hess will play the favorite Mendelssohn concerto for violin, likewise a work in which he has never been heard in Boston.

The orchestral numbers under Max Fiedler will comprise Goldmark's "In the Spring" overture, Dukas' "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," Wotan's "Farewell" and the magic fire scene from "Die Walküre" and the "Ride of the Valkyries."

Seats will go on sale at Symphony Hall next Friday morning.

THE COMMERCE
NEW YORK CITY
NOV 12 1909

Following his triumphs in Philadelphia, Baltimore and last night in New York with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Rachmaninoff is announced for his recital in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, November 20, in a programme of his own interesting compositions. Rachmaninoff has enhanced the fine reputation he has already established of his ability as a composer, but his wonderful pianistic qualities have come as a surprise even to his friends. His chief works include two operas, several orchestral suites, including two symphonies, three piano concertos, Sonate for the violincello and painoforte and several pieces for the violin. He has also written any number of pieces for the piano and possibly 100 songs and cantatas.

The programme for his recital in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, the 20th, is as follows. Sonate—D minor, opus 28. a. Allergo moderato. c. Lento. c. Allegro Vivace. II.—A. Melodie. b. Humoresque. c. Barcarolle. d. Polichnell. III.—Four Preludes—A. D major. b. D minor. c. G minor. d. C sharp minor.

[45]

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, NOVEMBER 8, 1909.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

IN Symphony Hall Saturday evening at the fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler presented the following program: D'Indq, Symphony in B flat, No. 2, op. 57; Gretry, Air of Lucette, from "Sylvian"; Tschaikowsky, "Children's Dreams," from "Characteristic" Suite, No. 11, op. 53; Debussy, "Azael's Recitative" and aria, from the lyric scene "The Prodigal Son"; Smetana, overture to the opera, "The Bartered Bride." The soloist was Miss Geraldine Farrar.

D'Indy's symphony is in one sense an original piece of music and yet it adds to the sum of musical thought little that is new; for what the listener at first deems to be originality he finds upon reflection to be nothing but subtlety. It is written in the traditional form of the German symphony, there are the four movements as they are found in the works of Beethoven and Brahms; but D'Indy, while writing his music after the old strict symphonic pattern, has used all the ingenuity of his French mind to avoid appearing conventional. So his prevailing attitude in his Second Symphony is one of negation.

One of his means of diverting the listener's attention from the formalism of his work is his refined use of tone color. He has such varied ways of blending the high colors of the woodwind, he arranges his combinations with such an effect of balance, that his music has a distinct color rhythm, almost a color structure. D'Indy's genius for orchestra color asserted itself most strongly in the second, the slow movement; something else was manifest in the third movement, where perhaps the composer's negative methods found their best justification. This division of the symphony is the scherzo; but it contains no traces of conventional musical humor, no sparkling minuet, no pizzicato jesting, is written in no spirit of rollicking play; all its fun is contained in a single irresistible joke at the very close.

Tchaikowsky's "Children's Dreams," a new piece of music in the Symphony concerts, is in the composer's best manner as to orchestration and rhythm; it suits its name, for in spirit it is both dreamy and childlike. Like one of the minor songs of Schubert, it is marked with the composer's genius, but its leading idea is one that the composer himself has expressed more tellingly elsewhere.

Miss Farrar, in her singing of Gretry, showed her peculiar talent for interpreting the delicately humorous soprano airs which the old operatic composers knew how to write. As Miss Farrar advances in her career she shows more and more disposition to give her interpretations directness. This may not seem to some persons a wholly desirable thing, because she is losing by it one of the powers which hitherto has accounted for her success, her power to appeal through pure vocal tone. But Miss Farrar is not an artist to be content with renewing past successes. She will stay in the field where she has made her triumphs, but she will vitalize her work with new intellectual purposes, she will make her career to be not one of repetition, but of growth.

n .....

ress .....

.....

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The attention of last year's subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts, Max Fiedler, conductor, is called to the fact that if they wish to renew their subscriptions for the coming season and would retain the seats they had last year, such renewals must be made on or before next Saturday, Nov. 13th. All applications for such renewals should be sent to C. A. Ellis, manager, care of M. Steinert & Sons, 327 Westminster street. On the following Monday, Nov. 15th, the books will be open for new subscribers.

The announcement that the Boston Symphony will give four concerts in Providence this year instead of the usual three has been received with much pleasure by all the patrons of these concerts, for it will enable Mr. Fiedler to make a much wider survey of the field of music than has been possible in the past. The announcement also of the soloists has created a most favorable comment, especially since in their number are two of the leading American concert sopranos, Madame Corinne Rider-Kelsey and Madame Mary Hissem de Moss. Mischa Elman will be warmly welcomed when he appears with the orchestra and much interest is exhibited in the promised appearance of Ernest Hutcheson who is a pianist who ranks among the leaders of the world.

TRANSCRIPT, NOVEMBER 6, 1909

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MISS FARRAR, MR. FIEDLER AND THE ORCHESTRA

The Notable Qualities of the Series Thus Far—Mr. Fiedler's Advance—The Work of the Band—Miss Farrar's Singing Yesterday—A New Trifle by Tschaikowsky

Tonight, the Sympnony Orchestra completes its first group of concerts for the new musical year—the five that have preceded the beginning of its monthly journeys to other cities. By common agreement they have been concerts of unusual and sustained excellence; notable alike for the diversified interest of the programmes, the quality of the performance, and the finer attributes that Mr. Fiedler has disclosed or confirmed as a conductor. His mingled catholicity and ingenuity as a maker of programmes commended him from his beginnings here. They have flowered this autumn in the choice of such interesting new pieces as Reger's "Prologue to a Tragic Play," Bantock's "Pierrot" overture, and Mr. Strube's concerto for violoncello; in such significant revivals as those of d'Indy's noble symphony, played yesterday afternoon, and of Strauss's "Don Juan" and "Til Eulenspiegel"; and in the repetition once more of such symphonies as those of Brahms and Schumann. With like catholicity, Mr. Fiedler has not eschewed the lighter pieces, proper and welcome to symphony concerts—Grieg's music to "Peer Gynt," for example, or the fanciful little fragment, "Children's Dreams," from one of Tschaikowsky's Suites at the concert of yesterday. Thus, when Mr. Fiedler's hearers must wrestle with the intricacies or the magnitudes of d'Indy and Reger, he has amused and comforted them. And oftenest he has ended the happy diversity of each programme with a piece that in itself and in striking performance held his audience to the very close. Not within recollection have departures before the end of the concerts been so few as in the past five weeks. The assisting singers, like Miss Farrar and Mme. Homer, have been of a genuine distinction, which their particular accomplishment at the concerts has once more proved. The virtuosi from the orchestra. Mr. Hess and Mr. Warnke, have been the leaders of its string choir, but virtuosi as well in their own right of personal achievement.

Better still, the orchestra has steadily played, not only with its familiar precision and symmetry, but with a new care, in comparison with last year, for the quality of its tone, and with a fine fire of imagination, feeling, and expression that has clothed its performances, whatever the nature and the requirements of the piece, with a new, communicating and stimulating vitality. Plainly, the band has owed a part of the new strength and vividness and fineness of these qualities to Mr. Fiedler himself. His first year of work with the orchestra and its public has clearly ripened him. He has been more sedulous, this autumn, of the quality than of the volume of the tone that he drew from the orchestra. He has sought a fine rather than a large brilliance. He is more sensitive to tonal symmetry and euphony. He has worn away his earlier liking for a kind of thickness, almost coarseness, of emphatic effect. He has abated his desire to manipulate all things. He has come closer to the golden, the impersonal, mean with his classics, while with the music of our own time, the force of his romantic, dramatizing, and broadly and sharply imaginative temperament, has had illuminating and enhancing play. He has not tried to do too much; and thereby has he really done more. He has ordered and refined his eagerness, and the new discrimination has given his best qualities the clearer outlet. He is justly now a conductor of higher deserts and higher rank than he was when he came first to our orchestra.

To many in the audience of yesterday the concert was the concert of Miss Farrar. She sang a light air from a girlish part in Grétry's eighteenth-century opera of "Sylvain," and another transposed from the tenor tones for which it was written from the cantata with which Debussy in the eighties won the Prix de Rome, and which he has since revised with a touch now and then of his later and individual manner. Both were music of sophisticated and calculated simplicity, and it was easy to believe that Miss Farrar, courting a subtle correspondence between her own aspect and the mood and the quality of her music, bore herself and clothed herself accordingly. With her dark hair laid low and flat and smooth about her face in what was once the manner of the palmy days of Miss de Mérode, and in the panoplied feathers of the hat above, she looked like a Sèvres figure of the eighteenth century who had somehow strayed into the milliner's and the dressmaker's shops of the Rue de la Paix in the twentieth century, and then and there fancifully clad herself. It is the happy fortune of Miss Farrar to forget herself in her impersonations on the operatic stage and to become as the character. In the concert-room, of late, she has been perhaps a little too inclined to impersonate herself with the visible elaboration that is one of the passing infirmities of highly strung and highly successful youth. Certainly yesterday she was the image of sophisticated simplicity. The illusion gained its applause, and the quality of her singing duly swelled it.

The air out of Grétry's opera, where it falls to a very young girl, is of an adroit simplicity of melodic line and pervading spirit, but of an artful naiveté of nice detail and delicate variety of expression. It bids the singer make her tones of the lightest and most transparent timbre. On the side of expression she must sing with a virginal serenity of feeling and yet with an underlying and as maidenly a playfulness. Of the singer as a singer, it exacts the nicest following of the slender and pliant melodic line, a light softness of phrase, a fineness of vocal detail, an unforced brightness of what the textbooks call "execution." Miss Farrar subdued her tones to the exquisite fragility of the music; she caught its soft lightness; she was adroit in all its delicate artifice; she kept its half-simple, half-sophisticated air. Her singing of the piece would have become a Sèvres shepherdess who had suddenly opened her lips and whose artistry of voice matched the artistry of hand that had shaped and painted her. The transposed piece from "The Prodigal Son"—why need Miss Farrar seek such transpositions?—was more conventional stuff—the contemplative recitative, the melancholy and sentimental air returning upon itself. The matter and the manner of it were of a Debussy who was content, as the promising student of the eighties, to cultivate the lyrical sweetness, the ingenious repetitions, the gently mounting lyric curve of the Massenet of those distant days. He imitates a convention, but he accomplishes the imitation with a beguiling felicity and little touches of personal distinction. It was music to disclose the lyric qualities of Miss Farrar's voice in their present freshness and suavity, and her ability to express gentle emotions in the Parisian vein of sweetish and languorous melancholy. She expressed them with as Parisian an elegance.

To another part of the audience, perhaps, the keenest pleasure of the day lay in the pieces that with Miss Farrar's "numbers" made the second half of the programme. One was Smetana's overture to his opera of "The Bartered Bride," the vivid concert piece that, until last winter, seemed all that we in America might know of his writing for the theatre. As Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra took it yesterday, it sounded doubly vivid. The conductor's pace at the beginning was racing; the orchestra seconded him with the brilliant play and interplay of glinting tone, and throughout neither speed nor shimmer flagged. The music ran like a dazzling improvisation; the sheer rush and radiance of it caught the hearer into it. The contrasting, the more sentimental, passages came and went like momentary flecks upon the light and racing brilliance of the whole. The music, the performance, tingled with gay rapture and light exuberance. The conductor and the orchestra gave the stream of light melody an hundred irridescent tints. It is long indeed since our concerts have known such a flashing tour de force. And the new delicacy, euphony and loveliness of tone that Mr. Fiedler is cultivating glamoured Tschaikowsky's little piece. The melodies out of which it springs are pensive and vaporous fancies. Tschaikowsky manipulates and develops them in the vein of gentle musing. He lets his ingenuities wander a little vaguely as though this music of childhood dreams were innocently shaping itself. He keeps the instrumental coloring of a subdued melancholy. Across the years, the mature composer remembers childish, sleep-visions, though not as children dream them. He is a musical sentimentalist playing in melancholy wise with forgotten things that troop suddenly out of memory. The music, and still more the tone of the orchestra, summoned like things to the fancy of those that heard. The third part of the audience remains—that found its deepest pleasure in Mr. d'Indy's symphony. They shall have their joy of it again tonight. It is not to be dismissed at the end of a long article.

TIMES

New York City.

NOV 28 1909

***

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie H on Thursday evening, Dec. 9, and Satu day afternoon, Dec. 11. The soloist at the Thursday evening concert will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, who will play the Schumann Concerto in A minor. The Symphony will be Vincent d'Indy's in B flat Major No. 2, last heard here four years ago, when it was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of the composer himself. The third number will be Tschaikowsky's ballet suite, "Casse-Noisette."

On Saturday afternoon there will be two solists, Mme. Schumann-Heink and Mr. Georges Longy, the solo oboe of the orchestra. Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing the "Sextus" recitative and aria from "Titus," and Gounod's "Stances de Sapho," while Mr. Longy will play Handel's Concerto for oboe and string orchestra. The purely orchestral works will be Smetana's overture, "The Bartered Bride," and Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony in F minor, opus 36.

***

POST, NOVEMBER 7, 1909

D'INDY'S SYMPHONY

BY OLIN DOWNES

History repeated itself last night at Symphony Hall, when, as at the Friday afternoon concert, the feature of the occasion did not consist in the hat or the gown of a popular young prima donna, but in the triumphant performance of one of the monumental works of modern music—D'Indy's B-flat symphony.

In 1905, when given here, first under Mr. Gericke, and later under the unauthoritative baton of the composer, the symphony seemed without exception the ugliest succession of sounds ever put upon paper. It is infinitely to the credit of Mr. Fiedler and his audience that yesterday evening the composition compelled the closest attention, that at its conclusion conductor and men were forced to acknowledge more than one round of applause.

A single movement of this work is sufficient to establish its maker as one of the greatest of the mentalities that are pulling the world forward today. Music embraces all things in its sphere of expression. There is no emotion, no impression of any kind, which may not be marvellously reflected and apotheosized in its wondrous mirror. This expressive capacity is being developed farther every day by the moderns. But there is another quality of the most subtle and wonderful of arts which transcends all this, which is pure and high and ineffable, aloof from everything but itself. This essence cannot be named any more than infinity or the hereafter, which it may be, and it is in that supreme field, attainable but to the very few, that D'Indy struggles with God. Caught up for a moment to this place, and where is all that we knew yesterday?

The mechanism is as extraordinary as the material. It is inexorable logic and there is positively formal adherence to the principles which inspired Beethoven. This is indeed a symphony, a work of art which by virtue of its spirit and construction should endure for all time. One development, one superb thought, follows another, flowers from it, like the sights of a passing landscape. Even if memory served, which it does not, words could not imply the white altitudes of the slow movement, or the sweep and the grandeur of the finale. The colossal workmanship is not workmanship. It is like the bed of a river, the channel fashioned by elemental forces at work.

We are prone to lavish carelessly such adjectives as epoch-marking, but here is music which bears the impress of the ages gone and the centuries to come.

The symphony should be heard again very soon. The large majority sensitive to musical impressions should know its every niche and spire. It appears to go even a step farther in harmonic development than any other modern work. Its rhythmic structure, which, though extremely complex, is very definitely proportioned, is enough to give birth to a dozen text books.

BOSTON POST, NOVEMBER 8, 1909

SOCIETY SEES A NEW DRESS

Miss Farrar's Costume Occasions Comment

Boston society, or that part of it which attended the Symphony concert Saturday night, spent all day yesterday discussing the rather sensational costume worn by Geraldine Farrar at the concert at which she sang.

The startling originality of the hat she wore two weeks ago hardly prepared conservative Boston for the sensation her appearance created. The extreme cut of the bodice and the close fit of the white satin skirt are still the subject of almost scandalized gossip.

When she first appeared on the platform to sing Dubussy's recitative, the audience, wholly unprepared, drew a big breath. For a few moments the audience sat spellbound. Then a confused murmur and the restlessness that ran around the hall showed the effect of the gown.

The gown, which is perhaps the most talked of article of clothing in Boston today, was a modern modification somewhere between a classic Greek and Egyptian type.

The bodice was cut low—very low. In back it was cut in a "V" shape clear to where the waist should be. If there was any doubt, it is now certainly settled that Miss Farrar has a perfectly formed set of shoulders and—a back that would have made Paris hesitate in his award of the apple.

The bust of the creation was draped in diaphanous chiffon, from which hung glittering spangles. The white shimmering satin skirt must have been made on her, so tightly did it conform to the lines of her figure to below the knees.

Paying no heed to the stir she must have been aware she had created, Miss Farrar started her solo, but her clear notes failed, perhaps for the first time, to engross the attention of her hearers.

Some evinced their decided disapproval by leaving the hall, but most of the women present stayed, all the men stayed, and most of those present are eager to go through the ordeal again.

The applause which she received when her solo ended was pronounced, whether to cover the embarrassment or to show a real appreciation of her singing. A buzz of talk that refused to be drowned out by the orchestra followed her withdrawal.

[46]

SUNDAY HERALD,
NOVEMBER 7, 1909.

D'INDY'S SECOND SYMPHONY GIVEN

Noble Work Heard at the Fifth Concert for the Third Time in Boston—Miss Geraldine Farrar Sings.

By PHILIP HALE.

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, took place last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony in B flat major, No. 2.....d'Indy
Lucette's air from "Silvain".....Gretry
"Reves d'enfant".....Tschaikowsky
Air of Azael from "The Prodigal Son" Debussy
Overture to "The Sold Bride".....Smetana

This was the third performance of D'Indy's symphony in Boston. The first was led by Mr. Gericke in January, 1905; the second, Dec. 2 of the same year, was led by the composer. Works and conductors are quickly forgotten in the fleeting years, but some may remember the discussion excited by this symphony. Some argued that as it was stuffed with dissonances, it was not only indigestible, it was immoral. The music was dubbed ugly, and the old cry was raised: "There is no place for ugliness in art."

They that thus characterized the symphony probably intended to say that it was ugly in their ears. Unable to appreciate unerring and superb workmanship, they wished that their ears should be soothed or tickled. They preferred to be passive hearers. It did not occur to them to bring an imaginative mind to the symphony; to endeavor to ascertain the purpose of the composer. Some dismissed him as a Frenchman and therefore a man deliberately trying to be bizarre. It was seldom that these objectors would sit down and dispute calmly and reasonably.

They would not have the Symphony, and those who saw rare beauty, loftiness of thought, elemental depth and all-embracing breadth, exultant strength as in the apotheosis—one of the most remarkable finales in the whole literature of music—were surely affected persons, men and women who should be suspected, and it was whispered that they were "decadents," that they entertained dark thoughts about morality and religion. And so it was once with the music of Beethoven and later with that of Schumann, and still later it was Wagner's turn. Wagner, like d'Indy, was not a melodist.

It takes some time to become acquainted with the language of a new thinker in music. Hearers who believe that the art died with Mendelssohn, but admit that Tschaikowsky and Brahms were men of parts, though often mistaken in the expression of their thoughts, will not take the trouble to listen attentively to the compositions of D'Indy, Loeffler, Debussy with the desire to extend their musical horizon. They miss the old familiar harmonic progressions, the melodic lines drawn after the approved pattern, the conservative and safe routine. They have ears but they do not hear, nor would they be persuaded or convinced if a great master spoke to them from the dead in admiration and praise of those now living and misunderstood or slighted.

Works come and go, and the great majority are in a few years, or even in a season, as though they never were. Why recall the discussion concerning D'Indy's symphony, why discuss it today? The inspired work will arouse enthusiasm and wonder long after we all are unable to chatter and squabble. The impression made last night, thanks to Mr. Fiedler's admirable reading and the equally admirable performance, was deeper than before. Here is music that comes from both the heart and the brain, music that is free from taint or dross, music that invites to contemplation and meditation, that strengthens and purifies the soul.

There is no program save the suggestion of the two eternally warring forces, the powers of good and evil, with the ultimate triumph of righteousness as proclaimed in the magnificent chorale at the end of the last movement. A program, however thoughtfully written, would be impertinent. The composer has put the adventures of his soul into music. That soul, tried and tempted, vexed and buffeted, is a noble one; melancholy and proud, yet not disdainful or forgetful of humanity and love; not bound to earth, not sensuous, but serene, confident, receptive of divinity.

Miss Geraldine Farrar sang here at a Symphony concert for the first time. Her first selection was an air sung by the younger sister in Gretry's "Silvain," which is not an opera in the modern meaning of the word, but a little comedy written in Marmontel's artificially simple manner with ariettes and concerted numbers. Lucette tells why she thinks her sister is in love. She gives childish reasons, yet there is in them the coquetry and the malice of the girl who has already begun to wonder curiously about love and would fain know its secrets, its bliss, its fever, its dole and teen. The music is fragrantly old-fashioned. It has the tenderness of Mozart with a naivete that reminds one of the wondrous boy, with a piquancy in the melodic line that is wholly French and of the 18th century.

The other air was that of Azael, the tenor, in Debussy's cantata, "The Prodigal Son," with which the composer took the prix de Rome in 1884, when he was 22 years old. The music has grace and charm after the manner of the earlier Massenet. There are few hints of the later and greater Debussy, but the melody has a pretty flow and the instrumentation is poetic.

Miss Farrar, dressed unconventionally as far as the traditions of the Symphony stage are concerned, but an apparition of loveliness not soon to be forgotten, sang the air of Gretry with true and adorable simplicity, and the air of Debussy with a quiet intensity of recollection and remorse that gave dramatic significance to the music which is inherently superficial in the expression of emotion. Never has her voice seemed more beautiful. Never has she sung here with truer art.

Tschaikowsky's "Children's Dreams," played for the first time at these concerts, a movement in his second Suite, is amiable music, conspicuous only by reason of a few instrumental touches. Smetana's overture is always welcome.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

n .....
ress .....
NOV 17 1909

Symphony Orchestra Sale.

For the past two days the season sale for the four concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in this city this winter has been in progress at the music store of M. Steinert & Sons, on Westminster street. The subscription has been very large and there is no reason to doubt that the concerts will be better attended than in the past.

It is now possible to announce the programme of the first concert, which will be given Tuesday evening, Nov. 23. The soloist will be Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey. The programme follows: Overture to the opera "The Sold Bride," Smetana; Symphony in E-Minor No. 5, Tschaikowsky; aria from "Der Freischutz," Weber; Suite "Peer Gynt," No. 1, Grieg; aria, "Dove Song," from the "Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Beethoven.

The sale of single seats opens at Steinert's Saturday.

EVENING WORLD,
New York City.
NOV 15 1909

RACHMANINOFF PLAYS WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Serge Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer and pianist, made the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon take on extra significance. He interpreted his own second concerto, which Gabrilowitsch, Tina Lerner and Pugno have played for us, in a new and most impressive manner, more than justifying the European estimates of his ability. He is to make a concert tour of America, and his first recital next Saturday afternoon cannot fail to be musically important. The orchestra played "Pierrot of the Minute," an overture by Granville Bantock, an English composer little known here; Schumann's second symphony and Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan" with all the brilliancy of which that exceptional organization is capable. Mr. Fiedler conducted ad-

ss .....
PROVIDENCE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERTS

The season of music in Providence which opened so brilliantly with the concert given a few weeks ago by Geraldine Farrar and Olga Samaroff will receive a further impetus on Tuesday evening, Nov 23d, when the Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, gives the first of its annual series of concerts in Infantry hall. The subscription sale of seats for the season will open at the music store of M. Steinert & Sons, 327 Westminster street, Monday morning. Prospective patrons should note well the fact that the orchestra is to give four concerts in Providence this year instead of the three of several years past. The patronage given to the orchestra in this city has grown so in the last four years that the management decided to grant the request of many of its subscribers for at least one more concert and it is possible that within a few years the orchestra will get back to its old number of five that it used to give here in its early days. The concerts, of course, will be given in Infantry hall and the dates are Tuesday evenings, Nov. 23d, Jan. 4th, Feb. 15th, April 5th.

Generally speaking last season was the best the orchestra ever had in Providence. The patronage was greater and the popularity that Mr. Fiedler, the conductor, won was a good sign that the patrons of the concerts were thoroughly satisfied. This year Mr. Fiedler returns again as conductor and with him will come the orchestra practically unchanged. There have been a few minor changes in the string choirs and there is a new first horn who in the few times he has played in Boston has shown conclusively that he is one of the greatest artists of his instrument the orchestra has ever had.

Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, has provided a list of soloists of notable worth for each of the four concerts in Providence. There will be two singers, one pianist and one violinist, and generally considered these make the most brilliant list of artists the orchestra has ever offered here. At the first concert the soloist will be Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, whose name is familiar to all who follow the course of music in America, even to those who may not have heard her sing. Mme. Rider-Kelsey stands in the foremost rank of American sopranos and her services are constantly in demand throughout the country from early in the fall until late in the spring. Her voice is essentially of lyric quality and she has that rare purity of style which has enabled her to become one of the foremost interpreters of the music of Mozart now before the public.

At the second concert in January the soloist will be that most successful of Russian violinists, Mischa Elman. Elman has already been heard in Providence in recital and it is well remembered the sensation this young boy made with his magnificent tone and mature style.

The soloist at the February concert will be Ernest Hutcheson, the head of the piano department of the Peabody institute of Baltimore. Mr. Hutcheson is a virtuoso of highest rank who has long since vindicated his right to stand among the great pianists of the world.

The soloist for the final concert will be Mrs. Mary Hissem de Mosa, soprano, who divides with Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey the field of highest quality for concert work in this country.

The sale of seats for the first concert when Mrs. Corinne Rider-Kelsey will be the soloist will open at the music store of M. Steinert & Sons, next Saturday morning, Nov. 20th, and the program will be announced later.

ss .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SALE

For the past two days the season sale for the four concerts which the Boston Symphony orchestra is to give in Providence this winter has been in progress at the music store of M. Steinert & Sons, in Westminster street. The subscription has been very large and there is no reason to doubt now that the concerts will be better attended than ever in the past.

It is now possible to announce the program of the first concert which will be given on next Tuesday evening, Nov. 23. The soloist as already announced will be Madame Corrinne Rider-Kelsey. The program is as follows:

Smetana, overture to the opera, "The Sold Bride;" Tschaikowsky, symphony in E-Minor No. 5; Weber, aria from "Der Freischutz;" Grieg, Suite "Peer Gynt," No. 1; Mozart, aria, "Dove Sono" from the "Marriage of Figaro;" Beethoven, overture to "Leonore" No. 3.

The sale of single seats opens at Steinart's on Saturday, Nov. 20.

EVENING MAIL
New York City.
NOV 13 1909

Rachmaninoff, whose triumphs in Philadelphia with the Boston Symphony orchestra resulted in seventeen recalls, plays his own concerto with this orchestra this afternoon in Carnegie hall. The first recital by the great Russian composer and pianist will be given in Carnegie hall next Saturday afternoon at 2.30 o'clock.

The programme, devoted entirely to his own composition, will include his D minor sonata, opus 28; four numbers, entitled "Melodie," "Humoresque," "Barcarolle," "Polichinelle," and four preludes, including the C sharp minor.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau of the World
TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Musical Notes

The season of music in Providence which opened so brilliantly with the concert given a few weeks ago by Geraldine Farrar and Olga Samaroff will receive a further impetus Tuesday evening, Nov. 23, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives the first of its annual series of concerts in Infantry Hall. The subscription sale of seats for the season will open at the music store of M. Steinert & Sons, 327 Westminster street, to-morrow morning.

Prospective patrons should note the fact that the orchestra is to give four concerts in Providence this year instead of the three of several years past. The patronage given to the orchestra in this city has grown so in the last four years that the management decided to grant the request of many of its subscribers for at least one more concert and it is possible that within a few years the orchestra will get back to its old number of five that it used to give here in its early days. The concerts, of course, will be given in Infantry Hall and the dates are Tuesday evenings, Nov. 23, Jan. 4, Feb. 15, April 5.

Generally speaking last season was the best the orchestra has ever had in Providence. The patronage was greater and the popularity that Mr. Fiedler, the conductor, won was a good sign that the patrons of the concerts were thoroughly satisfied. This year Mr. Fiedler returns again as conductor and with him will come the orchestra practically unchanged. There have been a few minor changes in the string choirs and there is a new first horn, who in the few times he has played in Boston has shown conclusively that he is one of the greatest artists of his instrument the orchestra has ever had.

MAX FIEDLER.
Conductor, Boston Symphony Orchestra.
—Photo by Garo.

Mr. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, has provided a list of soloists of notable worth for each of the four concerts in Providence. There will be two singers, one pianist and one violinist and generally considered these make the most brilliant list of artists the orchestra has ever offered here.

At the first concert the soloist will be Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, whose name is familiar to all who follow the course of music in America. Mme. Rider-Kelsey stands in the foremost rank of American sopranos. Her voice is essentially of lyric quality and she has that rare purity of style which has enabled her to become one of the foremost interpreters of the music of Mozart now before the public.

At the second concert, in January, the soloist will be that successful Russian violinist, Mischa Elman, who has already been heard in Providence in recital. It is well remembered the sensation this boy made with his magnificent tone and mature style. He has been engaged for a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony; in fact, the reason of his return to America this year was primarily that the Boston Symphony wished him for Boston and all the larger Eastern cities. As he has never been heard with orchestra here this concert should be one of more than ordinary interest.

The soloist at the February concert will be Ernest Hutcheson, head of the piano department of the Peabody Institute of Baltimore. Mr. Hutcheson is a virtuoso of highest rank, who has long since vindicated his right to stand among great pianists of the world. He was born in Australia in 1871 and for six years was a student in Leipsic, where he won the Mozart prize. Later he studied in Weimer under Stevenhagen and in 1898 he studied in Berlin. Since 1900 he has lived in Baltimore. He is to play the same week with the orchestra in Boston.

The soloist for the final concert will be Mrs. Mary Hissem de Moss, soprano, who divides with Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey the field of highest quality for concert work in this country. The sale of seats for the first concert, when Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey will be the soloist, will open at M. Steinert & Sons Saturday morning, Nov. 20, and the programme will be announced later.

[47]

TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NOV 13 1909

MUSICAL NOTES.

First Concert of Boston Symphony Season, Tuesday Night.

The first of the four concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in Providence during the coming winter will take place in Infantry Hall Tuesday at 8:15. The soloist will be Madame Corinne Rider-Kelsey who is one of the leading American concert sopranos now before the public. Much has been said of Boston's Orchestra in the past, but it is doubtful whether any such superlative praise has been given to it as was printed in the New York papers a week ago after its concerts in that city, when the usually phlegmatic critics seemed to lack superlatives enough to characterize the performances of the famous band. At any rate, it seems true that that orchestra has never played more brilliantly than it does this season under the direction of Max Fiedler.

Once more Mr. Fiedler demonstrates his skill as an arranger of serious programmes. The one he has made for Providence may well stand as a model of its kind in the brilliancy of the works to be performed and in their contrasting character. The concert will open with the overture to Smetana's opera, "The Sold Bride." This opera was the greatest success of the season at the Metropolitan Opera House last year and yet it is not going too far to say that brilliant as the opera is, the overture is its bright particular gem. In fact, if the unfortunate Smetana had left nothing else but this one piece of work, this would have been sufficient to stamp him as a musical genius of highest order.

The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's Fifth in E-minor, less familiar than the "Pathetic" and yet regarded by many critics as marking the highest point of the Russian's genius. It is full of national color and of the tragedy that is found in all of Tschaikowsky's works and yet it has in parts of it that delightful melodious grace which also characterized him in his lighter moments. Mr. Fielder's close sympathy with the Russian school has made him a conductor par excellence of Tschaikowsky's monumental works.

The other two orchestral numbers will be Grieg's first "Peer Gynt" suite and Beethoven's immortal overture "Leonore," No. 3. The "Peer Gynt" suite has been vulgarized and maltreated so in the past few years that the public has almost lost sight of its real musical value and to Mr. Fielder is due sincere thanks for having put it back into its proper place.

The soloist, Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, has just sung with marked success with the orchestra at its first concert of the year in Washington. She will sing here the same two works she presented there. The first is Agatha's great Aria from Weber's "Der Freischutz" and the second the lovely tune from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," "Dove," "Sono."

The programme in its order is as follows:

Overture to the opera, "The Sold Bride".....Smetana
Symphony in E-minor No. 5.....Tschaikowsky
Aria from "Der Freischruetz".....Weber
Suite, "Peer Gynt" No. 1.....Grieg
Aria, "Dove Sono," from "The Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
"Leonore," overture No. 3.....Beethoven

ARION CHOIR CONCERT.

EVENING MAIL
New York City.
NOV 11 1909

MAX FIEDLER.
Conductor of Boston Symphony Which Plays at Carnegie Hall To-Night.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT

The first of the four concerts which the Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, is to give in Providence during the coming season will take place in Infantry hall on next Tuesday evening, Nov. 23, at 8:15. The soloist will be Madame Corinne Rider-Kelsey, who is one of the leading American concert sopranos now before the public. Much has been said of Boston's orchestra in the past, but it has never played so brilliantly as it does this season under the direction of Max Fiedler, who with his greater familiarity with his publics and his closer sympathy with the men under him seems this year to have accomplished most remarkable results. If the Boston Symphony orchestra has been supreme in the past, its position is even more unassailable this year.

Once more Mr. Fiedler demonstrates his skill as an arranger of serious programs. The one he has made for Providence may well stand as a model of its kind in the brilliancy of the works to be performed and in their contrasting character. The concert will open with the overture to Smetana's opera, "The Sold Bride." This opera was the greatest success of the season at the Metropolitan opera house last year.

The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's Fifth in E-minor, less familiar than the "Pathetic," and yet regarded by many critics as marking the highest point of the Russian's genius. It is full of national color and of the tragedy that is found in all of Tschaikowsky's works, and yet it has in parts of it that delightful melodious grace which also characterized him in his lighter moments. Mr. Fielder's close sympathy with the Russian school has made him a conductor par excellent of Tschaikowsky's monumental works.

The other two orchestral numbers will be Grieg's First "Peer Gynt" Suite and Beethoven's immortal overture, "Leonore," No. 3. The "Peer Gynt" Suite has been vulgarized and maltreated so in the past few years that the public has almost lost sight of its real musical value, and to Mr. Fiedler is due most sincere thanks for having put it back into its proper place.

The soloist, Madame Corinne Rider-Kelsey, has just sung with marked success with the orchestra at its first concert of the year in Washington. She will sing here the same two works she presented there. The first is Agatha's great aria from Weber's "Der Freischutz," and the second the lovely tune from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro." "Dovo Sono."

The program in order is as follows.

Smetana—Overture to the opera, "The Sold Bride."
Tschaikowsky—Symphony in E-mionr, No. 5.
Weber—Aria from "Der Freischutz."
Grieg—Suite, "Peer Gynt," No. 1.
Mozart—Aria, "Dovo Sono," from "The Marriage of Figaro."
Beethoven—"Leonore" overture, No. 3.

m HERALD
ress New York City.
ite

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS BRILLIANTLY

Begins Its Twenty-Ninth New York Season with a New "Symphonic Prologue."

Boston's Symphony Orchestra began its twenty-ninth New York season in Carnegie Hall last night before a fashionable audience. Mr. Max Fiedler's men played, if possible, with a more delightful tone, more technical skill and more admirable results than ever.

The conductor frequently, in answer to the applause, pointed to his men as the ones who deserved it all, and certainly that company of virtuosi from "the Hub" earned its share of the evening's applause.

Mr. Fiedler began the concert with a new composition by Mr. Max Reger, entitled "Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy." It is not likely that the work will help the fame of this Leipsic composer, over whom much critical ink has been spilled in Germany. Those who consider him an unappreciated genius may find subtle beauties in its almost interminable sketches of pretentious sound. Last night it seemed as if Mr. Reger had precious little to say, and even as a piece of orchestral color the new work lacks interest.

Brahms' fine second symphony has long been a favorite with the Boston Orchestra and Mr. Fiedler made it once more a treat. The lovely adajietto was so exquisitely played that if repititions were allowed at these concerts it would have been repeated.

The climax of the evening, however, was reached with Mr. Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," a work bristling with extraordinary difficulties, and as remarkable for its grotesque musical pranks as for its occasional loveliness. The manner in which the orchestra revelled in its intricacies, tossing one phrase after another back and forth between the various choirs, playing with the German folk-song that Mr. Strauss uses brilliancy and the mock love episodes with surpassing delicacy, was a triumph for the orchestra.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Charles Gilibert, barytone of the Manhattan Opera House, who sang an air from Ambrose Thomas' "Le Caid," the "Chauson du Diable," from Mr. Massenet's "Griselidis," and an air by Mr. Charles Bordes, "Dawson's la Cigue," all three with capital effect. He was recalled a dozen times.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date NOV 14 1909

SYMPHONY CONCERT OF HIGH ORDER

Orchestra Played as Brilliantly as Ever and Mme. Rider-Kelsey Sang Delightfully.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Providence season opened last evening at Infantry Hall with an audience that was satisfactory in size considering the bad weather and that in appreciation and sympathy left nothing to be desired. The orchestra has been changed but little since last winter, while Max Fielder was in his old place at the conductor's stand and wielded the baton with the old-time skill and efficiency. Mr. Fielder won instant popularity here last year when he made his first appearance in front of the orchestra in this city and that he retains that position with the patrons of the concerts was clearly evidenced last evening. And that he deserved the feeling of admiration could not be doubted by those who saw him lead his musicians and noted how completely he had them in hand and how skilfully he conducted them through the difficult passages of the music they rendered.

The programme of the concert was admirably arranged to show the versatility of the orchestra, the ability of this trained body of players to render almost any composition with credit and adequate expression as well as to give variety to the audience so that it should not tire of too much instrumental music of one kind, though that is hardly possible in connection with this orchestra.

The programme follows:

Overture to "The Sold Bride"....Smetana
Symphony No. 5, in E-minor, op 64.....Tschaikowsky
Scena and aria, "Softly Sighing," from "Der Freischutz".....Weber
Orchestral suite, from the music to "Peer Gynt," op. 46.....Grieg
Recitative and aria, "Flown Forever," from "The Marriage of Figaro"..Mozart
Overture, "Leonora," No. 3, op. 72.....Beethoven

The first number, the overture to Smetana's opera, "The Sold Bride," needs little introduction to lovers of the best in music and was rendered with keen appreciation of its value and beauty and with a delicacy of feeling that made it a rare delight to listen to it.

Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony in E-minor is regarded as one of the strongest of that composer's series. It is truly Russian in tone and has the characteristics of the music of that nationality more prominently marked than some of the others and at the same time has a quality that thrills with the note of tragedy that sounds all through the music.

Grieg's first suite of incidental music to Ibsen's drama, "Peer Gynt," Mr. Fielder has given back to its old position among dignified productions to the delight of those who particularly love the style of music which this composer produced.

Beethoven's No. 3, overture, "Leonore," was rendered with most satisfying expression and formed a fitting finale to the programme of orchestral pieces.

The name and fame of the assisting artist, Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, are known wherever good music is sung and she was assured of a warm welcome from a Providence audience and her cordial reception she must have considered very flattering. She is widely recognized as one of the best of American sopranos and she added to her reputation by her admirable work last night. Her voice possesses a purity of tone and a richness of quality which make it a delight. Her two selections were well suited to reveal the wide range of her register and the depth and quality of her high and low notes as well as the excellent training which has made a skilled instrument of her wonderful voice. The great aria of Agatha from Weber's "Der Freischutz" was sung with fine effect, while the beautiful selection from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro" was a gem.

From EVENING TELEGRAM,
Address New York City
Date NOV 12

WHEN the Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its season in New York, students of music and those to whom music is the most beloved of all the muses, sit themselves down in contentment to listen and to be pleased. So Carnegie Hall was filled last evening to hear the orchestra play under the direction of Max Fiedler, who is now conductor, and to hear Gilibert, who was the soloist, sing.

The orchestra has become so much a factor of the musical life of the city that it is not so much the manner of its playing as that which it plays which interests its admirers.

Last evening they were treated to a symphony by Max Reger, which perhaps was received with less enthusiasm than others of the numbers.

The symphony No. 2, B major, by Brahms, was very interesting and unquestionably was heard with delighted approbation, but possibly most of all which pleased was Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," in rondo form.

Gilibert seemed to be a little hoarse, but with that embarrassment sang with such art and appreciation that he was warmly applauded. His most pleasing number of the three which he sang was a composition by Thomas.

If anything, the orchestra this year seems to play with a richer and broader tone than it has in its previous seasons in New York and its visits promise to be seasons of rare enjoyment to those who are fond of the symphony concerts.

[48]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From
Address
Date NOV 21

Next Tuesday evening brings the first of the four concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in Infantry Hall during the coming winter. Again Mr. Fiedler shows his wonted skill and good taste in the arrangement of programmes. For this concert he has chosen four orchestral works, all of them strongly contrasted and each a masterpiece of its kind. The first number is the overture to Smetana's opera, "The Sold Bride." The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's Fifth in E-Minor, a work which has been of recent years somewhat overshadowed by the "Pathetic yet a symphony generally conceded by critics to be stronger than the more famous No. 6. It is more truly national and has the strain of tragedy running through it that characterizes nearly all Tschaikowsky wrote. Grieg's first suite of incidental music to Ibsen's drama "Peer Gynt" has been of late years in danger of disappearing entirely from serious programmes. Mr. Fiedler has restored it to its proper place and once more it gives delight. The final number will be the immortal "Leonore," No. 3, overture by Beethoven.

Mme. Corrine Rider-Kelsey, the soprano and assisting artist, needs no introduction to a Providence audience, for her art has made her famous throughout the country. She will sing two numbers strongly contrasted, the first being the great aria of Agatha from Weber's "Der Freischutz" and the other being the lovely tune of "Dove Sono" from "The Marriage of Figaro," by Mozart.

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,
New York City.

(Copyright by A. Dupont.)

CHARLES GILIBERT,
Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall to-night.

From EVENING SUN, New York City.
Address ... NOV 12 1909

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

WHERE BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA IS OPERA-PROOF.

Twenty-four Years a Rival of Opera in New York and Still the Symphony Audience Grows—Standees for Reger and Applause for Fiedler and Brahms—What 'Klytemnestra' Said of 'Elektra.'

Charles A. Ellis, the Augustin Daly of absolute music, stood in Carnegie Hall last night while through the gates of brass there walked in double file the biggest subscribing audience that ever opened a Boston Symphony season in New York. He will carry the good news to the home town after two other concerts here. What's more, though the orchestra for the first time has grand opera for rival in Boston, it is going on twenty-four years now since Major Higginson first sent his men to New York. The greatest opera town on earth has kept the Boston Symphony coming ever since. The public has chosen to set up the visitors within its gates in a specially high artistic niche of their own, and apparently it always will while the Sacred Codfish still waves.

Max Fiedler, starting his second year as conductor, had the satisfaction of earning a polite ovation after two latter movements, "grazioso" and "con spirito," of the D-major symphony of Brahms. As some votes should be weighed, so some applause should be counted, like this, more significant of solid appreciation than often is the popular hysteria over high points in music-drama. The cheery symphony brought the first pause in a topheavy programme.

Charles Gilibert, like great Cæsar in the play, filled in any other chinks and spaces of the bill between Reger and Strauss. The giant baritone radiated human sympathy. He put into ironical poems of Paul Verlaine and others a more musical spirit than three French composers had, though their names were Charles Bordes, Thomas and Massenet.

Max Reger's new "Prologue to a Tragedy," which was new and came first, had never a chance to please the host of latecomers, kept standing. Even the standees could hear a killing or two. Was the trumpet call for royal Richard and the princes in the Tower? The harmonic atmosphere was that of sighing "Melisande."

Modern music when it seeks a production at white heat has to go to Richard Strauss. His "Till Owlglass" sounded crystal clear as the Boston men ended.

SUN
New York City.
NOV 12 1909

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS

FIRST CONCERT OF TWENTY-FOURTH SEASON.

A Long and Labored Overture to a Tragedy From the Pen of Max Reger—Brahms's D Major Symphony a Blessed Relief—Gilibert the Soloist.

The first concert of the twenty-fourth season in this city of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night in Carnegie Hall. The programme consisted of a new symphonic prologue to a tragedy by Max Reger, the air of the drum major from Ambroise Thomas's "Le Caid," Brahms's symphony in D major, the air of the devil from Massenet's "Griselidis," Charles Bordes's song "Dansons la gigue" and Richard Strauss's tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The singer was Charles Gilibert of the Manhattan Opera House.

Max Reger's "Symphonischer prolog zu einem trauerspiel" was produced in Cologne in March of the present year and had its first hearing in America at the home concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of October 15. The composition in its original form was so long that while Reger did not have the heart to cut it himself he mercifully indicated where excision might be made.

It is reported that Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston orchestra, made not only this cut but also another of his own finding. Without doubt the work could be cut still more without the infliction of grievous disappointment on any audience of normal disposition.

The composer gave no hint of the title of the tragedy which drove him to this music. Nothing in Shakespeare reaches such depths of desperation nor could even the sardonic ingenuity of Bernard Shaw conceive such a complication of distressing relatives. The probabilities are that Reger created this exceedingly [illegible] after reading something [illegible] Wagnerian [illegible]

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER
New York City.
NOV 12 1909

The Boston Orchestra.

THE first New York concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Max Fiedler is again the conductor, took place in Carnegie Hall last evening. The concert began with the first performance in New York of a "Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy" by the redoubtable Max Reger, which had its first performance anywhere only last March in Cologne. Then the distinguished French baritone Charles Gilibert sang the drum major's air from Ambroise Thomas's opera, "Le Caid." Next came Brahms's second symphony. Then Mr. Gilibert sang to piano accompaniment the Devil's solo "Loin de sa femme" from Massenet's "Griselidis," one of the new operas promised for the Manhattan Opera House, and a setting by Charles Bordes of Paul Verlaine's poem "Dansons la gigue." And then the concert came to an end with Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Max Reger is one of the men that must be heard, whether one particularly cares to hear him or not. He is much discussed. He is important. Though only in his thirty-seventh year, his opus numbers passed some time ago the hundred mark. A professed disciple of Bach, he doubtless believes himself the great modern contrapuntist. Once he even threatened to rewrite the master's works. Some of Reger's music has won admiration here. The variations and fugue played by the Boston orchestra in Carnegie Hall a year and a half ago are a case in point. Some of his songs have even been heard with pleasure. But admiration and pleasure are vain words when it is a question of this "Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy." What tragedy is not specified. To many the tragedy must be the prologue itself, with its fearful din, its merciless onslaught of noise. And yet indisputably Reger is so important a figure in music to-day that this work of his, even though one earnestly believe it no music, a contradiction of music, deserves a hearing, and one is glad the hearing is provided by such an orchestra as that from Boston.

In delightful contrast was Brahms's D major symphony, one of that composer's most genial, most melodious works. If at times Mr. Fiedler seemed not altogether in sympathy with Brahms, not heedful enough of his reticence and repose, it must be admitted that the scherzo was played delightfully and that the finale evoked applause of a heartiness that seldom follows an orchestral composition by Brahms. In the "Till Eulenspiegel" Mr. Fiedler was altogether happy. He is known as a Strauss "specialist," and he conducted the work with unmistakable enthusiasm.

Mr. Gilibert was evidently suffering from a severe cold and had not his usual control of his voice. Still his singing constantly indicated what it could achieve but for the cold, and his diction was as clear and expressive as ever. In the florid air from "Le Caïd" his verve and bonhomie were delightful. The air from "Griselidis" is hardly effective when removed from its setting in the opera, and in any case an opera air sung to piano accompaniment is out of place in a symphony concert. Bordes's "Dansons la gigue" did not suffer from this drawback, and it is the sort of song that Mr. Gilibert, when in voice, can sing with unsurpassable charm. The piano accompaniments were well played by Mr. Charlier of the Manhattan Opera House.

J. P. S.

It has been admitted by Reger's admirers that his compositions do not consist of the time honored proposition of themes followed by a musical discussion of them through the processes of thematic development. His thematic ideas are in tumultuous war from the very start. This, indeed, seemed to be the case with the composition heard last night, except in one episode which was founded on a tolerably well defined slow theme and which might have meant anything from the gloom of Macbeth to the dissatisfaction of Cleopatra's clown over that worm.

It would be pleasant to say that this composition showed a fine mastery of the stormy harmonic fashion of the current period in music and that the orchestration was rich in the proper tints for its embodiment. But to say this is to assert that Reger was making disagreeable and meaningless sounds merely for their own sake. To say it would offend many who fondly believe that in the breathless struggles of some contemporaneous musicians to find a new melodic medium of expression they find the prophetic tongue of a new gospel of musical art.

But even the composers themselves are not sure that they have found this. They are just groping, and while they are groping they seem to have lost their hold on fundamental tonalities, on clarity of structure, on an intelligible means of communication between themselves and the thinking part of the public. It is certain that Mr. Reger's music heard last night was conceived in travail and that the real tragedy of it was its inability [illegible]

After listening to this composition one heard the D major symphony of Brahms with deep joy. Here indeed was no uncertainty either in purpose or in execution. Modern tonalities, the pungent harmonies but timidly touched by the older masters, the darker tints of the orchestra and the sharper contrasts of outline and rhythmic structure stood side by side with those fundamental idioms of musical speech which have become part of the song language of the world.

Brahms has his polyphony, too, but it does not exist simply for the sake of hurling one voice in jarring discord against another. The "drab tints" of which Mr. Huneker wrote, lie like the shadows in a well disposed painting, and the high lights gleam with sunshine and the atmosphere of out doors.

Whether music will continue along the path which Reger and his kind are trying to blaze out cannot now be determined. Whether hearers will ever learn what it is that these writers are trying to tell us no man may declare, for we are bound to remember that what we now say about them was said a quarter of a century ago about Wagner and would as surely have been said a century back about Puccini.

But if this is the true path then all of us must come to the light after much darkness; all of us must attain a state of blessedness through much suffering. Let us try to be patient. We do not have to listen to Reger every day, whereas we can some often to a feast of Brahms with keen appetite.

The Reger composition was played with immense vigor and a rich body of tone by the gentlemen from Boston, and Mr. Fiedler conducted the compositions [illegible]

EVENING POST
New York City.
NOV 12 1909

[illegible] Orchestra.

"I love music, but I hate musicians," the eminent German author, Dr. Riehl, used to say. Why did he hate musicians? Because most of them do not love music, but only love themselves. Their one thought is to show off their own accomplishments and cleverness; they choose pieces which help them to do this, regardless of their intrinsic merits. Orchestral conductors are no better than the singers and players. They give their audiences a surfeit of Berlioz, Richard Strauss, Max Reger, and other orchestral tone-jugglers, not because their works deserve such preference on account of their contents, but because they help to show off the good points and the brilliant execution of the orchestra.

Mr. Max Fiedler made a bad impression on those who love the best music by the programme he arranged for the season's first Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Surely, it would have been enough to have one show piece, like Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." There was no demand for the other one, Max Reger's "Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy." It would be an affront to Mr. Fiedler's taste and judgment to suppose that he selected this piece because he considered it particularly meritorious. Let us be charitable and further assume that he did not choose it because it would serve to show New Yorkers once more what an admirably drilled band the Boston Symphony Orchestra is. Let us take it for granted that he produced it simply because it is a novelty. But why should our orchestras present a novelty unless it is interesting? No one, surely, could be so devoid of all judgment as to claim any merit for that "Prologue" except that of clever contrapuntal writing and fairly good orchestral coloring. Max Reger impresses some persons by talking as if he had something important to say; but what he does say is as entertaining as conversation about the weather when no other topic suggests itself. Only by such a comparison can one give an idea of the utter emptiness of Reger's music.

A delightful relief was the singing by Mr. Gilibert of the amusing air of the Drum Major from "The Cadi" by Thomas. Mr. Fiedler redeemed himself by allowing such an amusing trifle, and later on two others—"Far from His Wife" from Massenet's "Griselda," and "Let's Dance the Jig" by Charles Bordes—to be introduced in a serious concert. Every menu ought to have its sherbet and olives; Hans von Bülow advised this long ago (he recommended Strauss waltzes for the purpose), and the applause bestowed on M. Gilibert last night showed that the audience relished the change. Much of this applause, to be sure, was bestowed because of the bright and impressive way in which the popular French baritone sang these numbers.

There was one masterwork on the programme—Brahms's second symphony. It was well played and tumultuously applauded. The second symphony is one of those works which pleases—and always has pleased—even those who do not accept every work by this composer as a masterpiece, and who echo the question once boldly put to him by one of his most intimate and adoring friends (Frau Herzogenberg): "Why, when we know you can produce pure gold, do you so often give us brass?"

NEW YORK AMERICAN,
New York City.
NOV 12 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY BEGINS SEASON HERE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first evening concert at Carnegie Hall last night, and thereby began its New York season. Mr. Fiedler offered a programme entirely in keeping with the high standard set and observed by this orchestra. Sometimes, it is true, a choice is made of a composition that meets all the requirements of mathematics in music, but is not altogether satisfying or pleasing to the usual auditor. This was the case with the opening number on last night's programme.

After the usual ovation which the New York patrons of the Boston Symphony give to the conductor, the orchestra began Max Reger's symphonic prologue to a tragedy, given for the first time in New York.

It has been said of Mr. Reger that his music is without development in the true sense; that everything in it starts involved and complicated. And this is surely a criticism of the prologue. It was almost impossible to locate a theme or to determine a motif. It was a huge jumble of trembling violins, sighing horns and obstreperous basses.

As a delightful contrast, this was followed by the "Air of the Drum Major," from the first act of "The Cadi," by Thomas, sung by Charles Gilibert, of the Manhattan Opera House. The simple tunefulness of the air added to the delightful baritone voice of the singer caused the rather depressed auditors to sit up and re-assume good nature.

Mr. Gilibert sang two other numbers later in the evening. One was the "Air of the Devil," from the second act of Massenet's, "Griselidis," which opera has been promised a production at the Manhattan this season; and Bordes's "Let us dance the jig," both of which received great applause.

A second large number was Brahm's Symphony No. 2, in D major. This symphony was as different from the Reger number as can possibly be conceived, for from the start of the first movement to the last note of the fourth it proved to be a collection of ravishingly sweet melodies, suggesting, at times, the Mendelssohn fairy music in "Midsummer Night's Dream." In all four movements there was not a dull instant, not once was the central idea of beautiful harmony interfered with or broken. It was music as dainty as filigree, but never insignificant nor lacking in color.

Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," a descriptive fairy story set to music, closed the concert.

There was not an empty seat in Carnegie Hall, which is more than can be said for the attendance of some of the recent concerts in the place.

[illegible] Paper Clipping Bureau in the World
TOWN & COUNTRY
From ... NEW YORK
Address ...
Date ... NOV 20 1909

The first concert of this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November eleventh, Max Fiedler conducting and Charles Gilibert of the Manhattan Opera House being the soloist. The program was entirely modern. The first number was a Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy (first time in New York) by Reger, a composition full of many involved ideas and their similar contra-pointal expression, all of which took some twenty minutes for its performance. In this number and in the third number, Brahms' symphony in D major, both conductor and orchestra did everything possible for the producing, as usual, of those artistic results which place this organization at the head of its class. Monsieur Gilibert sang twice and songs less familiar on programs: Air of the Drum Major from "The Cadi," by Thomas, and again two French songs, one from Massenet's "Grisélidis," and "Dansons la Gigue," by Bordes. Being, as he is, a singer of high rank, together with the fact that he always finds his own intimate pleasure in the tales of the songs he sings, he brought the expected gratification to his hearers. Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," which had been played also at the first concert of the Philharmonic Society the week before, brought the program to a close.

S. A. D.

as if he at any rate knew what it was all about. Nevertheless he seemed to stand on firmer ground when he reached the Brahms symphony. It would be flattery to say that his reading of this latter work exhausted all its poetic possibilities. But it was far from being a poor reading.

It had elegance of style, polish in the phraseology, intelligence in the shading, and splendid vigor in certain passionate episodes. The orchestra covered itself with glory by the beauty, richness, solidity and fine balance of its tone, as well as by the certainty of its technic, and the unanimity of its ensemble.

Mr. Gilibert gave much pleasure by his delightful delivery of the familiar air of the tambour major, which he embellished with many vocal graces and informed with a delightful humor. The other two numbers gave him less scope for the display of his admirable powers, but he did them full justice. The audience was large and its applause after the several movements of the Brahms music showed that old acquaintance not only was not forgot but was much more welcome than [illegible]

[49]

From EVENING SUN.

Address New York City.

NOV 1 2 1909

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

WHERE BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA IS OPERA-PROOF.

Twenty-four Years a Rival of Opera in New York and Still the Symphony Audience Grows—Standees for Reger and Applause for Fiedler and Brahms—What 'Klytemnestra' Said of 'Elektra.'

Charles A. Ellis, the Augustin Daly of absolute music, stood in Carnegie Hall last night while through the gates of brass there walked in double file the biggest subscribing audience that ever opened a Boston Symphony season in New York. He will carry the good news to the home town after two other concerts here. What's more, though the orchestra for the first time has grand opera for rival in Boston, it is going on twenty-four years now since Major Higginson first sent his men to New York. The greatest opera town on earth has kept the Boston Symphony coming ever since. The public has chosen to set up the visitors within its gates in a specially high artistic niche of their own, and apparently it always will while the Sacred Codfish still waves.

Max Fiedler, starting his second year as conductor, had the satisfaction of earning a polite ovation after two latter movements, "grazioso" and "con spirito," of the D-major symphony of Brahms. As some votes should be weighed, so some applause should be counted, like this, more significant of solid appreciation than often is the popular hysteria over high points in music-drama. The cheery symphony brought the first pause in a topheavy programme.

Charles Gilibert, like great Cæsar in the play, filled in any other chinks and spaces of the bill between Reger and Strauss. The giant baritone radiated human sympathy. He put into ironical poems of Paul Verlaine and others a more musical spirit than three French composers had, though their names were Charles Bordes, Thomas and Massenet.

Max Reger's new "Prologue to a Tragedy," which was new and came first, had never a chance to please the host of latecomers, kept standing. Even the standees could hear a killing or two. Was the trumpet call for royal Richard and the princes in the Tower? The harmonic atmosphere was that of sighing "Melisande."

Modern music when it seeks a production at white heat has to go to Richard Strauss. His "Till Owlglass" sounded crystal clear as the Boston men ended.

From GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

New York City.

NOV 12 1909

The Boston Orchestra.

THE first New York concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Max Fiedler is again the conductor, took place in Carnegie Hall last evening. The concert began with the first performance in New York of a "Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy" by the redoubtable Max Reger, which had its first performance anywhere only last March in Cologne. Then the distinguished French baritone Charles Gilibert sang the drum major's air from Ambroise Thomas's opera, "Le Caïd." Next came Brahms's second symphony. Then Mr. Gilibert sang to piano accompaniment the Devil's solo "Loin de sa femme" from Massenet's "Grisélidis," one of the new operas promised for the Manhattan Opera House, and a setting by Charles Bordes of Paul Verlaine's poem "Dansons la gigue." And then the concert came to an end with Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Max Reger is one of the men that must be heard, whether one particularly cares to hear him or not. He is much discussed. He is important. Though only in his thirty-seventh year, his opus numbers passed some time ago the hundred mark. A professed disciple of Bach, he doubtless believes himself the great modern contrapuntist. Once he even threatened to rewrite the master's works. Some of Reger's music has won admiration here. The variations and fugue played by the Boston orchestra in Carnegie Hall a year and a half ago are a case in point. Some of his songs have even been heard with pleasure. But admiration and pleasure are vain words when it is a question of this "Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy." What tragedy is not specified. To many the tragedy must be the prologue itself, with its fearful din, its merciless onslaught of noise. And yet indisputably Reger is so important a figure in music to-day that this work of his, even though one earnestly believe it no music, a contradiction of music, deserves a hearing, and one is glad the hearing is provided by such an orchestra as that from Boston.

In delightful contrast was Brahms's D major symphony, one of that composer's most genial, most melodious works. If at times Mr. Fiedler seemed not altogether in sympathy with Brahms, not heedful enough of his reticence and repose, it must be admitted that the scherzo was played delightfully and that the finale evoked applause of a heartiness that seldom follows an orchestral composition by Brahms. In the "Till Eulenspiegel" Mr. Fiedler was altogether happy. He is known as a Strauss "specialist," and he conducted the work with unmistakable enthusiasm.

Mr. Gilibert was evidently suffering from a severe cold and had not his usual control of his voice. Still his singing constantly indicated what it could achieve but for the cold, and his diction was as clear and expressive as ever. In the florid air from "Le Caïd" his verve and bonhomie were delightful. The air from "Grisélidis" is hardly effective when removed from its setting in the opera, and in any case an opera air sung to piano accompaniment is out of place in a symphony concert. Bordes's "Dansons la gigue" did not suffer from this drawback, and it is the sort of song that Mr. Gilimert, when in voice, can sing with unsurpassable charm. The piano accompaniments were well played by Mr. Charlier of the Manhattan Opera House.

J. P. S.

From EVENING POST

New York City.

NOV 1 2 1909

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"I love music, but I hate musicians," the eminent German author, Dr. Riehl, used to say. Why did he hate musicians? Because most of them do not love music, but only love themselves. Their one thought is to show off their own accomplishments and cleverness; they choose pieces which help them to do this, regardless of their intrinsic merits. Orchestral conductors are no better than the singers and players. They give their audiences a surfeit of Berlioz, Richard Strauss, Max Reger, and other orchestral tone-jugglers, not because their works deserve such preference on account of their contents, but because they help to show off the good points and the brilliant execution of the orchestra.

Mr. Max Fiedler made a bad impression on those who love the best music by the programme he arranged for the season's first Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Surely, it would have been enough to have one show piece, like Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." There was no demand for the other one, Max Reger's "Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy." It would be an affront to Mr. Fiedler's taste and judgment to suppose that he selected this piece because he considered it particularly meritorious. Let us be charitable and further assume that he did not choose it because it would serve to show New Yorkers once more what an admirably drilled band the Boston Symphony Orchestra is. Let us take it for granted that he produced it simply because it is a novelty. But why should our orchestras present a novelty unless it is interesting? No one, surely, could be so devoid of all judgment as to claim any merit for that "Prologue" except that of clever contrapuntal writing and fairly good orchestral coloring. Max Reger impresses some persons by talking as if he had something important to say; but what he does say is as entertaining as conversation about the weather when no other topic suggests itself. Only by such a comparison can one give an idea of the utter emptiness of Reger's music.

A delightful relief was the singing by Mr. Gilibert of the amusing air of the Drum Major from "The Cadi" by Thomas. Mr. Fiedler redeemed himself by allowing such an amusing trifle, and later on two others - "Far from His Wife" from Massenet's "Griselda," and "Let's Dance the Jig" by Charles Bordes—to be introduced in a serious concert. Every menu ought to have its sherbet and olives; Hans von Bülow advised this long ago (he recommended Strauss waltzes for the purpose), and the applause bestowed on M. Gilibert last night showed that the audience relished the change. Much of this applause, to be sure, was bestowed because of the bright and impressive way in which the popular French baritone sang these numbers.

There was one masterwork on the programme—Brahms's second symphony. It was well played and tumultuously applauded. The second symphony is one of those works which pleases—and always has pleased—even those who do not accept every work by this composer as a masterpiece, and who echo the question once boldly put to him by one of his most intimate and adoring friends (Frau Herzogenberg): "Why, when we know you can produce pure gold, do you so often give us brass?"

From NEW YORK AMERICAN,

New York City.

NOV 1 2 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY BEGINS SEASON HERE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first evening concert at Carnegie Hall last night, and thereby began its New York season. Mr. Fiedler offered a programme entirely in keeping with the high standard set and observed by this orchestra. Sometimes, it is true, a choice is made of a composition that meets all the requirements of mathematics in music, but is not altogether satisfying or pleasing to the usual auditor. This was the case with the opening number on last night's programme.

After the usual ovation which the New York patrons of the Boston Symphony give to the conductor, the orchestra began Max Reger's symphonic prologue to a tragedy, given for the first time in New York.

It has been said of Mr. Reger that his music is without development in the true sense; that everything in it starts involved and complicated. And this is surely a criticism of the prologue. It was almost impossible to locate a theme or to determine a motif. It was a huge jumble of trembling violins, sighing horns and obstreperous basses.

As a delightful contrast, this was followed by the "Air of the Drum Major," from the first act of "The Cadi," by Thomas, sung by Charles Gilibert, of the Manhattan Opera House. The simple tunefulness of the air added to the delightful baritone voice of the singer caused the rather depressed auditors to sit up and re-assume good nature.

Mr. Gilibert sang two other numbers later in the evening. One was the "Air of the Devil," from the second act of Massenet's, "Griselidis," which opera has been promised a production at the Manhattan this season; and Bordes's "Let us dance the jig," both of whichc received great applause.

A second large number was Brahm's Symphony No. 2, in D major. This symphony was as different from the Reger number as can possibly be conceived, for from the start of the first movement to the last note of the fourth it proved to be a collection of ravishingly sweet melodies, suggesting, at times, the Mendelssohn fairy music in "Midsummer Night's Dream." In all four movements there was not a dull instant, not once was the central idea of beautiful harmony interfered with or broken. It was music as dainty as filigree, but never insignificant nor lacking in color.

Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," a descriptive fairy story set to music, closed the concert.

There was not an empty seat in Carnegie Hall, which is more than can be said for the attendance of some of the recent concerts in the place.

SUN

New York City.

NOV 12 1909

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS

FIRST CONCERT OF TWENTY-FOURTH SEASON.

A Long and Labored Overture to a Tragedy From the Pen of Max Reger—Brahms's D Major Symphony a Blessed Relief—Gilibert the Soloist.

The first concert of the twenty-fourth season in this city of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night in Carnegie Hall. The programme consisted of a new symphonic prologue to a tragedy by Max Reger, the air of the drum major from Ambroise Thomas's "Le Caid," Brahms's symphony in D major, the air of the devil from Massenet's "Griselidis," Charles Bordes's song "Dansons la gigue" and Richard Strauss's tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The singer was Charles Gilibert of the Manhattan Opera House.

Max Reger's "Symphonischer prolog zu einem trauerspiel" was produced in Cologne in March of the present year and had its first hearing in America at the home concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of October 15. The composition in its original form was so long that while Reger did not have the heart to cut it himself he mercifully indicated where excision might be made.

It is reported that Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston orchestra, made not only this cut but also another of his own finding. Without doubt the work could be cut still more without the infliction of grievous disappointment on any audience of normal disposition.

The composer gave no hint of the title of the tragedy which drove him to this music. Nothing in Shakespeare reaches such depths of desperation nor could even the sardonic ingenuity of Bernard Shaw conceive such a complication of distressing motives. The probabilities are that Mr. Reger created this exceedingly tragic prologue after reading something by Oscar Wilde translated into Wagnerian

It has been admitted by Reger's admirers that his compositions do not consist of the time honored proposition of themes followed by a musical discussion of them through the processes of thematic development. His thematic ideas are in tumultuous war from the very start. This, indeed, seemed to be the case with the composition heard last night, except in one episode which was founded on a tolerably well defined slow theme and which might have meant anything from the gloom of Macbeth to the dissatisfaction of Cleopatra's clown over that worm.

It would be pleasant to say that this composition showed a fine mastery of the stormy harmonic fashion of the current period in music and that the orchestration was rich in the proper tints for its embodiment. But to say this is to assert that Reger was making disagreeable and meaningless sounds merely for their own sake. To say it would offend many who fondly believe that in the breathless struggles of some contemporaneous musicians to find a new melodic medium of expression they find the prophetic tongue of a new gospel of musical art.

But even the composers themselves are not sure that they have found this. They are just groping, and while they are groping they seem to have lost their hold on fundamental tonalities, on clarity of structure, on an intelligible means of communication between themselves and the thinking part of the public. It is certain that Mr. Reger's music heard last night was conceived in travail and that the real tragedy of it was its inability to convey to its hearers anything more

After listening to this composition one heard the D major symphony of Brahms with deep joy. Here indeed was no uncertainty either in purpose or in execution. Modern tonalities, the pungent harmonies but timidly touched by the older masters, the darker tints of the orchestra and the sharper contrasts of outline and rhythmic structure stood side by side with those fundamental idioms of musical speech which have become part of the song language of the world.

Brahms has his polyphony, too, but it does not exist simply for the sake of hurling one voice in jarring discord against another. The "drab tints" of which Mr. Huneker wrote, lie like the shadows in a well disposed painting, and the high lights gleam with sunshine and the atmosphere of out doors.

Whether music will continue along the path which Reger and his kind are trying to blaze out cannot now be determined. Whether hearers will ever learn what it is that these writers are trying to tell us no man may declare, for we are bound to remember that what we now say about them was said a quarter of a century ago about Wagner and would as surely have been said a century back about Puccini.

But if this is the true path then all of us must come to the light after much darkness; all of us must attain a state of blessedness through much suffering. Let us try to be patient. We do not have to listen to Reger every day, whereas we can some often to a feast of Brahms with keen appetite.

The Reger composition was played with immense vigor and a rich body of tone by the gentlemen from Boston, and Mr. Fiedler conducted the compositions

---

Press-Paper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

The first concert of this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November eleventh, Max Fiedler conducting and Charles Gilibert of the Manhattan Opera House being the soloist. The program was entirely modern. The first number was a Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy (first time in New York) by Reger, a composition full of many involved ideas and their similar contra-pointal expression, all of which took some twenty minutes for its performance. In this number and in the third number, Brahms' symphony in D major, both conductor and orchestra did everything possible for the producing, as usual, of those artistic results which place this organization at the head of its class. Monsieur Gilibert sang twice and songs less familiar on programs: Air of the Drum Major from "The Cadi," by Thomas, and again two French songs, one from Massenet's "Grisélidis," and "Dansons la Gigue," by Bordes. Being, as he is, a singer of high rank, together with the fact that he always finds his own intimate pleasure in the tales of the songs he sings, he brought the expected gratification to his hearers. Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," which had been played also at the first concert of the Philharmonic Society the week before, brought the program to a close.

S. A. D.

---

as if he at any rate knew what it was all about. Nevertheless he seemed to stand on firmer ground when he reached the Brahms symphony. It would be flattery to say that his reading of this latter work exhausted all its poetic possibilities. But it was far from being a poor reading.

It had elegance of style, polish in the phraseology, intelligence in the shading, and splendid vigor in certain passionate episodes. The orchestra covered itself with glory by the beauty, richness, solidity and fine balance of its tone, as well as by the certainty of its technic, and the unanimity of its ensemble.

Mr. Gilibert gave much pleasure by his delightful delivery of the familiar air of the tambour major, which he embellished with many vocal graces and informed with a delightful humor. The other two numbers gave him less scope for the display of his admirable powers, but he did them full justice. The audience was large and its applause after the several movements of the Brahms music showed that old acquaintance not only was not forgot but was much more welcome than the new one.

---

[49]

NEW YORK PRESS,

New York City.

ss NOV 12 1909

TONE-PERFECT CONCERT BY BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA

Carnegie Hall Thronged to Hear the Great Symphony Players.

REGER'S PROLOGUE A SUCCESS

Fiedler Offers Programme Pleasing in the Main, but Marred by Incongruous Interpolations.

Boston's famous Symphony Orchestra came to town last night to begin its twenty-fourth season in New York. As usual, Carnegie Hall held an immense throng of eager listeners, anxious to welcome musicians and conductor. The auditors found the orchestra unchanged in any important particular; still an aggregation of players that holds its own with any orchestra in the world. Recently New Yorkers felt jubilant when the Philharmonic Society brought forward its reorganized orchestra, an excellent body of men.

It was clear, however, last night that the Boston Symphony Orchestra still is supreme in one respect, beauty of tone. This beauty is not confined to a few departments of the orchestra; the full, mellow richness of timbre is characteristic of the whole body, as if every instrument had been carefully selected to conform to one ideal.

Max Fiedler, who is in his second year as conductor of the Boston Orchestra, often has been commended for his programmes, even if his style of interpretation did not always please. He deserves thanks for introducing his audience last night to Reger's Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy, opus 108, a finely inspired piece of music. Brahms's Second Symphony, for an intermediate offering, was well chosen, too, and the "Till Eulenspiegel," by Strauss, made a good ending.

But what influence injected Thomas's "Air du Caid," music absolutely out of place in a dignified symphony concert, between the Reger and Brahms works, and why were there further interruptions in the shape of Massenet's "Chanson du Diable" and Ch. Borden's "Dansons la Gigue," which songs, to accentuate the incongruity, were sung with piano accompaniment? Surely these vocal interpolations were not pleasing to Fiedler.

To be sure, Gilibert was the soloist, and, fine artist that he is, one would forgive a multitude of incongruities only to hear him. Though not in particularly good voice, his tones being somewhat muffled and not always perfectly true to the pitch, the big Frenchman sang exquisitely. His bonhomie in the Massenet song, with its humorous setting forth of a married man's joys when free of his wife, was simply irresistible. Every word, beautifully distinct and colored with delightful roguery, seemed closely associated with the singer's round, beaming countenance. Yet, delightful as was Gilibert's performance in itself, his contributions were distinctly ill suited to the occasion.

More than one hearing of Reger's Symphonic Prologue, which had its first performance in Europe as recently as last spring, would give a more comprehensive idea of this big composition. Yet the work is not too complex to make a distinct and most favorable impression immediately. Reger here has thrown aside some of his scholarly airs and has adopted a fervently romantic mode of utterance, not too heavily incumbered with polyphony. His style is eclectic. German rhythmical vigor and propulsive enthusiasm are mingled with Gallic refinements such as Debussy and his school favor.

One even can note a fondness for melody sung in orchestral unison, the mode of the full-blooded South. There are strong contrasts in mood, passionate outbursts, superb in their orchestral splendor, alternating with moments of idyllic repose. The instrumentation is really beautiful, opulent in cumulations of sound, rich and transparent in quieter moments. This instrumentation is not written for effect; it seems to be part of the composers' inspiration, it represents an undivided element in the flow of tone-poetry.

By all means let us hear this work again, even if it is long. With the cuts Fiedler made, from pages 22 to 35 and 71 to 85 of the orchestral score, the duration is within the compass of the average listener's patience.

Fiedler's reading of the Brahms symphony, it must be confessed, was disappointing. The "Adagietto Grazioso" came to effective hearing, it is true, and won enthusiastic applause. But the opening "Allegro non troppo" was taken at too slow a pace, the "Adagio" was broadened into sentimental exaggeration and the final "Allegro con spirito" came to an imposing climax of tone that was not in character. It is difficult to preserve a happy medium in interpreting Brahms. His music too often is stripped of all emotion; but Fiedler, with the romantic fervor of a true Teuton, goes to the opposite extreme and reads into the master's music a fulsomeness of feeling and pomposity that was entirely contrary to Brahms's nature.

Whereas Fiedler took many of his tempi in the Brahms music too slowly, he erred in the other direction in the Strauss tone-poem, missing much of the devilish humor the composer here has expressed orchestrally. Mahler's extraordinary reading of the work, so lucid, so wonderfully balanced in tone, so much alive with interpretative detail, was too vivid in one's memory.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From

Address

NOV 20 1909

Following his appearance in Philadelphia, Baltimore and in New York with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Rachmaninoff is announced for his first recital in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, November 20 (to-day), in a program of his own interesting compositions. Rachmaninoff has enhanced the fine reputation he has already established of his ability as a composer, but his wonderful pianistic qualities have come as a surprise even to those who are his friends.

EVENING MAIL

New York City.

s NOV 12 1909

REGER'S NEW PROLOGUE PLAYED BY FIEDLER

Gilibert Sings and a Brahms Symphony Is Also Performed at the First Concert Here This Season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

By EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

The Boston Symphony orchestra opened its twenty-fourth season in New York last night in Carnegie hall before a very large audience. Mr. Max Fiedler, entering his third season, provided a strange and incongruous programme, but never since the advent of this conductor to the Boston orchestra have his readings seemed so full, so satisfying and so varied in color.

Many times last night it seemed as though an entirely new Fiedler had come, and he certainly brought new messages. It has been the custom of this orchestra to give the first concert of the season without soloist, but last night Charles Gilibert, one of the greatest favorites of the Manhattan Opera house, contributed three numbers in his delightful and inimitable manner. So far as the pleasure derived from hearing M. Gilibert sing is concerned, there can be no question, and probably he caused a wider interest than other numbers on the programme, but solos of the type given by the great French baritone were not in place on a programme of the kind provided last night. They were essentially disturbing to those who desire perfect contour.

It is not a good precedent to set, because the audiences who attend such concerts as the Boston orchestra provides get what they need of lighter music elsewhere, while half the art of a symphony concert lies in the fitness with which musical companions are brought together.

There have been some few great arias writen for vocalist and orchestra, and these are thoroughly in place under conditions like those of last night, but excerpts from the operas which are to be heard at any time, or even operatic excerpts under any conditions, are questionable in taste.

Coming between the Reger symphonic prologue to a tragedy and the Brahms Second symphony in D major, M. Gilibert sang the air of the drum major from "The Cadi," by Thomas, and before the Richard Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel" he sang "Air of the Devil," from Massenet's "Griselidis," which Mr. Hammerstein will produce this season. The one song which was less out of place than the others was "Dansons la Gigue," originally written as melody with orchestra by Charles Bordes, but played by M. Charlier at the piano. The composer of this number was in the programme book as "still living in Paris," however, since the book was printed his death has been anounced. The Reger work is another of those lengthy musical discourses suggestive of philosophy, psychology and expression in the language of the secessionist and other forbidding and awe-inspiring elements which the modern Germans have taught us to anticipate. There is, however, much that is attractive, interesting and clever in the writing, and there are moments of true nobility. It is in a more lucid vein than other examples we have heard from the same composer.

The Brahms symphony sounded fresh and flowing of inspiration and of performance as well. Mr. Fiedler has never given a more satisfactory interpretation of this master. The Strauss tone poem was also played with humor and fine virtuosity.

[illegible] young pianist,

WORLD

ess New York City.

NOV 12 1909

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS ITS SEASON.

Gilibert Soloist, and a Brahms Symphony the Feature of an Attractive Programme.

By Reginald de Koven.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler conductor, gave the first concert of its twenty-ninth New York season at Carnegie Hall last night, presenting an attractive programme, of which a "Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy," by Max Reger, was the novelty, Brahms's No. 2 D major the symphony, and Charles Gilibert the soloist. Hearing this great organization after a lapse of months, one realized afresh that there are orchestras and orchestras and that this particular orchestra has reached the acme of orchestral perfection in being not merely a body of musicians playing together more or less well, but a magnificent single solo instrument, on which the conductor may play at will.

In compact sonority and beauty of tone, and practically irreproachable balance and detailed finish of execution, there is certainly a great gap which separates the Boston orchestra from any other in this country.

If the much discussed Max Reger be all his adherents aver, his prologue, played for the first time last night, did not prove the fact. Fearsome and dire indeed must have been the tragedy the composer had in mind to inspire this long winded and somewhat oppressive, if also imposingly sonorous, composition. Its temper is restless and overwrought; the thematic material is fragmentary and rather dry and presented in a manner so complex and bewilderingly contrapuntal that the work seems obscure, even inchoate. But it was a master hand that wrought the orchestration, if the mind behind it had little of importance or aesthetic beauty to communicate.

The graceful, flowing serenity and unconcealed melodic spontaneity of Brahms's second symphony, so much more genial and readily assimilated than his first, came like the sunshine of balmy spring, when the world is new, after Reger's fierce and gloomy mouthings; yet surely there is a touch of over-developed, over-philosophized Brahms in this curious ultra-modern composer. Mr. Fiedler's reading of the symphony was poetic on the whole, if a little constrained and unplastic, especially in the lovely adagio, so full of the purest sentiment and pathos. The delicious, piquant scherzo, a veritable dance of elves in some shady glade, was delightfully done; while the masterly finale was played with a spirit, clarity and nice adjustment of detail which was wholly admirable. I enjoyed Mr. Fiedler more in this work than I have done hitherto during his incumbency.

Mr. Gilibert, singing with all his usual artistic suavity and finish, was heard to advantage in the Drum Major's aria from Thomas's opera "The Cadi," sung with contagious entrain; the "Chanson du Diable," from Massenet's "Griselidis," and a song, "Dansons la Gigue," by Bordes, the latter two to a piano accompaniment. I do not mean to be hypercritical, but M. Gilibert's selections on the whole seemed a bit out of key with symphonic surroundings; yet he was applauded most warmly.

A performance or Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," which was one of those bits of scintillating virtuosity which distinguish and show the wonderful resources of this orchestra, gave a brilliant finish to a thoroughly well made and enjoyable programme. The fantastic humor and gnome-like freakishness of this quaintest of musical conceits were brought out with great finesse and vivid pictorial quality by Mr. Fiedler.

The first matinee concert of the orchestra, at which the Russian pianist and composer Rachmaninoff will be the feature, takes place to-morrow.

TIMES

om

ldress New York City.

te NOV 12 1909

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

A New Symphonic Prologue by Max Reger Heard for the First Time.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to New York to begin its twenty-fourth season here with more friends and admirers than ever. It gave its first concert on this visit last evening in Carnegie Hall, and the audience that heard it was one of the largest that it had ever had.

Mr. Max Fiedler returns as the conductor of the organization His programme last evening was a long one, made up of a new "Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy," by Max Reger, heard for the first time in New York; Brahms's second symphony, and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." Mr. Charles Gilibert was the soloist, and sang the air of the Drum Major from Ambroise Thomas's opera "The Cadi," the air of the Devil from Massenet's opera "Griselidis," and "Dansons le Gigue," by Charles Bordes.

The prologue by Max Reger is not a thing that will enhance the reputation of the young composer. He writes too much music for his own good, and puts forward too much that is deficient in idea, and too leniently dealt with by self-criticism. This piece is not comparable in any respect with the fine set of variations that Dr. Muck played two seasons ago. It is extremely long, notwithstanding the fact that it has undergone a pruning process once by the composer at Mr. Fiedler's request, and once again, it is said, by Mr. Fiedler himself. It is also extremely labored; its numerous themes are intractable and dull, and though the composer has expended much ingenuity and skill upon them, he has evolved a piece that is vastly complicated and heavily scored, but is little more than dullness raised to a higher power.

Nor does its pervading atmosphere of gloom give it tragic power. There is one episode of a nobler fibre, and the closing passage is touched with something of warmth and spontaneity, that gains a greater force through what has gone before. Much has had to be endured, however, to enjoy these portions; and as the piece stands, twice shortened, they are far from enough to impart any quickening of the imagination or firing of the fancy to him who listens.

The work was played with infinite pains on the part of Mr. Fiedler and his men, and they did all there was to be done for it; but they could not raise it above its own level.

There was an antidote to Rege in Mr. Gilibert's singing. Thomas's air of the Drum Major is not music of a very high order, but it has something of the true comic spirit, and it was given a rare distinction by Mr. Gilibert's delivery of it, so absolutely true to its spirit, so exquisite in diction, so faithfully reflecting every shade of the text and of the musical phrase.

It is singing of the highest art, and yet Mr. Gilibert's voice is, as it always has been, much lacking in richness and beauty of quality. The same comment is to be made as to the satirical air of the Devil from Massenet's opera "Grisélidis"—one of those promised for production this season at the Manhattan Opera House; it expressed all the ironical motive that the composer tried to put into his music. There was the most substance in the song "Dansons le Gigue," by Charles Bordes, a composer whose death was cabled only two or three days ago. Mr. Gilibert was most heartily applauded, and it is pleasant to believe that the rare qualities of his vocal art were appreciated.

The performance of Brahms's second symphony was full of warmth and color, and such a one as overturns the charge of his thick and muddy orchestration. It roused the audience to an unusual pitch of enthusiasm. They used to say—a diminishing number still say—that his music is dull and that it breeds distastes in audiences! Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," which was heard for the second time in a week, was also most brilliantly played with such apparent ease, such clearness, and such characteristically sardonic expression as to show forth all its Rabelaisian humor.

STAATS ZEITUNG

From New York City.

Address

NOV 15

Theater und Musik.

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Der Solist des gestern Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall abgehaltenen Konzerts der Bostoner war Herr Sergei Rachmaninoff, der bekannte russische Komponist und Pianist, der mit dem Orchester sein Zweites Piano-Konzert vortrug. Wir haben dieses Werk, das recht oberflächliche, aber mitunter wirksame Musik enthält, richtige Salonmusik, im Vorjahr von Herrn Gabrilowitsch vortragen gehört, und er hatte damit mehr Glück als der Komponist, der gestern einen recht trockenen, harten Anschlag und geringe Färbungsfähigkeit des Tons erwies.

Das Orchester unter Herrn Fiedler übertraf sich in Schumann's Zweiter Symphonie und Strauß' „Don Juan" selbst. Eine Novität, „Pierrot of a Minute", die der Komponist, Herr Granville Bantock, eine Ouverture nennt, die wir eher als ein Intermezzo oder Scherzo ansehen würden, hatte, ganz brillant gespielt, guten Erfolg. Wir kommen im morgigen Blatt auf dieses Konzert zurück. H.

[50]

TRIBUNE

New York City.

NOV 15 1909

MUSIC

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Orchestra (or its conductor) has never offended so deeply and made such abject amends as last night at the first concert for the season in Carnegie Hall. It is hard to conceive such a thing, but possibly to perform the "Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy" (unnamed, for which the author of the work ought to be grateful), by Max Reger, is a matter of conscience with Mr. Fiedler. Perhaps he feels that it is a missionary labor that he is performing; if so he went about it last night like the fabled New England missionaries who carried with them large cargoes of rum. He compelled the audience to endure nineteen minutes of Reger, but did all he could during the greater part of the evening which remained to efface the impression by permitting the always delightful Charles Gilbert to sing three songs such as were never heard in a symphony concert in New York before. This is not said in dispraise of the songs or the singer.

"Le Tambour Major," from Ambroise Thomas's "Caïd," never sounded half so welcome in all the threescore or more of times that it has enlivened the Sunday night concerts at the Metropolitan Opera House as it did last night, when it cleansed the ears and refreshed the minds of the audience that had been compelled to hear Reger's prologue. And, though Brahms's D major symphony came afterward, enough gratitude for the relief was still felt to make the song in which the devil (as he appears in Massenet's opera, "Griselidis") rejoices in having escaped from his wife for a space and Charles Bordes's "Dansons la Gigue" acceptable—even though they were sung to pianoforte accompaniments. There were nineteen minutes of Reger despite two elisions in the prologue, one suggested by the composer and one made without his consent by Mr. Fiedler. Neither operation was heroic enough. There is a story which used to be current in newspaper offices to the effect that a copy reader serving his novitiate was told by the editor to cut down an article one-half. "Which half shall I leave?" was the innocent inquiry that followed.

If this prologue, after having been twice curtailed, had next been beheaded, then dismembered, and all of the fragments put away as things unpleasant to contemplate are generally disposed of, the revision would have been eminently satisfactory. There never was a time when an inconsequential and ugly piece of music was faulted but that somebody was promptly on hand with the warning that the innovations of Beethoven and Wagner were also damned; but the spirit of progress is as little in the fear which ordinarily prompts such utterances as it is in the hide-bound conservatism which pronounces condemnation against all real strivings. The public has gone far in accepting manner of utterances in place of ideas, but in the end it is most likely that contents will win back their own and proper place in popular appreciation. Mr. Gilibert's songs were delightful, the Brahms symphony called dignified beauty into the scheme, and Mr. Fiedler and his incomparable men sent the audience home in merry mood with a brilliant performance of Richard Strauss's musical joke, "Till Eulenspiegel."

H. E. K.

EVENING TELEGRAM,

New York City.

NOV 15 1909

The Saturday matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall may well be considered a genuine musical event, since it included the first appearance of Rachmaninoff, the great Russian composer and pianist, who played his own concerto. Gabrilowitch and Tina Lerner have played the same work here, but this time it sounded like a new composition. Rachmaninoff is a long, lean, Russian, wolf-like man. Keen intellect looks out through his long, narrow eyes, that light up with flashes of passionate fire and beam with magnetic charm. The long, narrow fingers of Rachmaninoff master all technical difficulties with seeming ease. The stormy passages of this wonderful concerto are poured forth in an overwhelming flood under his hands. The utmost sweetness of the melody of the work seems to sing itself. The Russian is as potent in interpreting as he is in creating.

The eclectic programme included Granville Bantock's overture, "The Pierrot of the Minute," full of tricksy, elvish melodies; Schumann's beautiful second symphony and Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan." It was a delightful concert, Mr. Fiedler excelling himself as a programme builder as well as a conductor.

STAATS ZEI[illegible]

New York City.

NOV 12 [illegible]

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Herr Max Fiedler dirigirte gestern Abend in Carnegie Hall, die sehr gut gefüllt war, das erste diesjährige Symphonie-Konzert unserer stets gern gesehenen Bostoner Gäste, die ja ein bischen auch zu uns gehören. Die Begrüßung war eine herzliche. Als Herr Fiedler erschien, wurde er mit sehr freundlichem Applaus empfangen, und der Kontakt zwischen den Künstlern und dem Publikum war wie gewöhnlich gleich von Anfang an hergestellt. Das Konzert eröffnete mit einer Novität, Max Reger's „Symphonischem Prolog zu einer Tragödie". Dieser Komponist, dessen Charakterbild vorderhand von der Parteien Haß und Gunst verwirrt, in der Musikgeschichte schwankt, hat es mit 36 Jahren schon zum Opus 108 gebracht, eine unheimliche Thätigkeit und Fixigkeit, die angesichts der komplexen Beschaffenheit seiner Werke auf eine ganz ungewöhnliche Vertrautheit mit den Formen deutet. Wir sind gegen diese und andere Tugenden des Komponisten Reger gewiß nicht blind, aber ungeachtet des Interesses, das wir dem Streben und Schaffen der Modernen entgegenbringen, können wir die „Regeritis" nicht mitmachen, wenigstens nicht in Werken, wie das gestern gehörte. Reger giebt keinen Anhaltspunkt, welche Tragödie er bei dieser Komposition im Auge hatte. Genug, es war ein Trauerspiel, das können wir nach dem gestrigen Genuß bestätigen!

Vor allem ist diesem neuesten Reger die diesem Komponisten eigenthümliche Regellosigkeit und Undurchsichtigkeit in ganz besonderem Maß eigen. Wer es versuchen sollte, dieses verwickelte thematische Labyrinth zu entwirren oder gar einen Leitfaden dazu zu schreiben, der würde sich aus den Irrwegen kaum zurückfinden. Hut ab vor dieser stupenden kontrapunktischen Gelehrsamkeit, diesem enormen Können in der Handhabung großer Massen, dieser gewaltigen musikalischen Rechen- und Fugenkunst, aber die darin enthaltene Trockenheit schreckt immer wieder ab. Die Erfindung ist Nebensache. Die Themen sind kurz, wenig prägnant, der Komponist faßt sie an und läßt sie wieder los und erstickt sie am Liebkosen in dem Fett der undurchdringlichen Modulation, Harmonisirung und Instrumentation.

Die Durchführung ist ganz regellos, es pendelt alles nur so wahllos herum, ein ewiges unruhiges Moduliren und Rhythmisiren, eine stets mit vollen Backen einherrollende, verwickelte Polyphonie, wie mit tausend Zungen und doch so unberedt und leer! Keine Konzentration, ein ungeordnetes Darauflosmusiziren, ewig ein tragischer Pathos, der bald grotesk wird. Die Instrumentirung ist dick, massig, unmäßig.

Herr Fiedler baute mit seinem Meisterorchester ganz enorme Steigerungen auf und vergoldete alles durch den Glanz des Tonschwalles, aber gerade dieses helle Tageslicht ließ die kakophone Fratze umso unbarmherziger hervortreten. Die Bostoner haben diesem Reger ein Begräbnis erster Klasse bereitet, eine „Generalsleich'", wie man in Wien sagt. Das Publikum klatschte lebhaft Beifall. Galt er nur den Spielern und dem Dirigenten? Oder auch dem Komponisten? Erstere haben die Anerkennung ehrlich verdient.

Herr Fiedler gab uns hierauf eine überaus lebhafte und feinabgetönte Wiedergabe von Brahms' Zweiter Symphonie, der innigen, festlichen. Groß angelegt, bewunderungswürdig virtuos durchgeführt. Dieser Dirigent, der anfangs seiner Eigenart nach diesem Orchester zu widerstreben schien, hat sich mit seinen Mannen ganz eingespielt. Man kennt sich gegenseitig und versteht sich. Die früher etwas gewaltsame Zeichensprache des Dirigenten ist ruhiger geworden, ohne an plastischer Eindringlichkeit zu verlieren. Dazu hat er — das erwies er ganz besonders in der Schlußnummer, Strauß' „Till Eulenspiegel" — eine Feinnervigkeit erlangt, stellenweise eine Wärme, die wir an ihm früher nicht beobachtet hatten.

Die sonnige Heiterkeit des ersten Satzes, die tiefsinnige Märchenstimmung des zweiten, die anmuthsvolle Herzlichkeit und Grazie des dritten (welch' herrlicher Gesang der Oboe!) und die Feststimmung des Finales — diese ganz besonders — kamen zu wirkungsvollstem Ausdruck. Der Schlußjubel klang ganz glorios.

Als Solist stand Herr Gilibert, der beliebte und köstliche Buffo, wohl nicht ganz auf seinem Platz. Wir haben die Verdienste dieses erfreulichen Künstlers stets willig anerkannt, aber seine Kunst ist zu derb, zu offen und deutlich für eine solche Veranstaltung. Dem Publikum war er willkommen, denn seine Darbietungen wurden gewaltig beklatscht. Man kennt ja die Drolligkeit seiner Kunst, den willigen Humor, der sie durchströmt.

H.

[51]

From THE MORNING TELEGRAPH

New York City.

Address

NOV 14 1909

Date

FINAL HEARING OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Orchestra Returns Home This Week After Completing First Group of Concerts.

RUSSIAN PIANIST A MAGNET

Granville Bantock All There With Device and Tricksomeness of the Modernist.

The visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Greater New York terminated yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall with a concert at which the Russian pianist and composer, Serge Rochmaninoff, was an attraction, but by no means the only one.

The chief interest attaching to a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra centers about the orchestra itself and how that instrument of precision will perform any given programme. On Thursday night Max Fiedler and his musicians succeeded in the remarkable feat of "bringing down the house" with their interpretation of so austere a work as Brahm's Second Symphony. Nor is there any particular reason to wonder at this. The execution of the orchestra itself is at all times unimpeachable, and its conductor is gifted with the inspirative qualities of poetic fire and irreducible energy.

The second Schumann Symphony was the chief offering of yesterday afternoon. This work is the creation of a composer whose very name evokes associations of the highest and best kind. The general sentiment of the symphony is lofty and serene, like a poem of William Wordsworth, and it was in this vein that the orchestra, yielding nothing to emotionalism, succeeded in interpreting it.

The novelty of the programme was Granville Bantock's "The Pierrot of the Minute," an essay in that modern musical impressionism which we connect with the name of Debussy. Mr. Bantock was all there with the device, the tricksomeness and the far-sought surprise of the modernists, but it is also to be confessed that he has caught the manner rather than the matter of Strauss and his advanced co-inventors.

The tone poem, "Don Juan" of the last named composer, was well conceived and well given as part of yesterday's programme. M. Rachmaninoff was warmly received, both on his appearance and at the conclusion of his masterly rendering of his own concerto for piano and orchestra, already heard in New York, and not now to be subjected to further analysis.

NEW YORK AMERICAN,

New York City.

RACHMAMNOFF, NEW PIANIST, PLEASES

Young Composer Makes First Appearance at Carnegie Hall Yesterday Afternoon.

The ways of musical directors are past finding out. For the first of the pair of Boston Symphony concerts, on Thursday evening, Max Fiedler gave a programme which began with the doleful, uninteresting Reger Prologue, actually endangering the popularity of his organization. Yesterday afternoon's concert at Carnegie Hall was of such refreshing character as to earn the everlasting gratitude of the many who were privileged to hear it.

Apart from the interest naturally felt in a programme that included such examples of the melodious as Schumann's Second Symphony, Bantock's "The Pierrot of the Minute" and Strauss's "Don Juan," the chief event of the afternoon was the first New York appearance of Serge Rachmaninoff, the young Russian composer, who played the piano part in his Second Concerto, accompanied by the orchestra.

One naturally associates foreign musicians, especially pianists, with quantities of hair. When M. Rachmaninoff appeared one saw a tall, slender man with closely cropped, fair hair and absolutely smooth shorn.

From the moment he struck the first chord of his piano concerto one realized that a master was at the instrument. His technique is admirable, his theme delineation unclouded and his digital dexterity all that the piece dem[illegible]

The orchestral part of the concerto was at times somewhat involved, but on the whole it was brilliant and interesting. The composer was recalled after his splendid performance full half a dozen times.

The orchestra excelled itself in its magnificent reading of the Schumann Symphony. It might almost be called Schumann's "Pathetic Symphony."

All the dignity and poetry and melancholy of its four movements were given with rare skill, every shade and tone value interpreted with characteristic precision and feeling. Mr. Feidler scored a triumph in this.

Strauss's version of "Don Juan," set to music, closed the concert. The house was packed, standees being three deep.

New York City.

NOV 1[illegible] 1909

BRILLIANT CONCERT BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Granville Bantock's "The Pierrot of the Minute" Heard Here for the First Time.

RACHMANINOFF AS SOLOIST

Russian Pianist Has Highly Developed Technique and Deeply Impressed His Audience.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has rarely played better, with more brilliancy, delicacy, richness and variety of color, more transparent clarity, more perfect suppleness under the hand of its conductor, than it did yesterday afternoon at its second concert in Carnegie Hall. To hear such playing was a transporting delight. Mr. Fiedler has earned the gratitude of everybody who appreciates such a performance for demonstrating, at the beginning of his second season with this extraordinary organization, that he has kept it to its highest level of efficiency; and there is none higher anywhere in the world—perhaps even none other so high.

The programme yesterday comprised an orchestral overture by Granville Bantock, "The Pierrot of the Minute"; Schumann's second symphony in C, Rachmaninoff's second piano concerto, played by the composer, and Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan." Mr. Bantock's piece was heard here for the first time, and it is the first important composition of this English composer that has been heard in New York, though he has written music that has attracted attention in his native land and that departs widely from the traditions of what English music is expected to be.

The overture is intended for a "dramatic fantasy," by Ernest Dowson, a talented young English poet, untimely dead. It is, and is meant to be, full of fantasy, light and whimsical in idea, but with a strain also of something more tenderly emotional, to suggest in music the encounter of Pierrot with Love in the guise of the Moon Maiden. The music has the fragile fancifulness of the tale, but tennous as it is, it has distinction and originality that make it something of real pith. The orchestra is treated with much wit and delicacy and pictuesque suggestiveness. It was played with exquisite perfection of finish, and it gave much pleasure.

And when Schumann's symphony is played as it was on this occasion the accusation of unskilful, ill-balanced, and ineffective orchestration that is brought against the composer seems to lose much of its force. Perhaps the letter of the score has to be read liberally and freely to make it sound, but Mr. Fiedler did succeed in finding the tonal balance and the effective sonority that made the symphony glow and throb with life and color. With what passion and warmth was the wonderful song of the adagio sung—music that is drenched with Schumannesque romantic fervor and "Schwaermerei"! With what breathless speed and delicacy was the scherzo played! With what fire the final allegro! It was a remarkably fine performance.

Mr. Rachmaninoff, who is perhaps the tallest known pianist, is one of the younger of the modern Russian school of composers, though he lives now in Dresden. Some of his orchestral pieces are known here, besides the prelude for piano that all pianists played a few years ago; and his second concerto has been given in New York in the last few years a number of times, somewhat out of proportion with its intrinsic merits. But with the assistance of the orchestra, which counts for a great deal in this composition, he made it sound more interesting than it ever has before here.

He is a pianist of highly developed technique, as who must be that plays this concerto, and he has ample resources of expression upon the instrument, though a beautiful and varied tone is not conspicuous among them. He played his own music with intense conviction and he deeply impressed the audience, with it, who recalled him again and again.

It was not too much for Mr. Fiedler to put Strauss's "Don Juan" on his second programme after having had "Till Eulenspiegel" on his first, for it is one of the composer's finest works, one that comes nearest to being a genuine inspiration, besides showing the technical expertness in orchestral effect that has come so near to being his undoing in later years. "Don Juan" is one of his earliest mature works, and bears the stamp of youthful ardor and eagerness almost beyond all the rest. It has, too, an essentially musical quality which it shares with others of the earlier tone poems, but which seems now to have been almost extinguished in the extravagant lengths to which Strauss has pushed his endeavors to make music, though purely orchestral technique, speak a boldly literal and definite language. The composition was played with magnificent energy, sonority, and beauty of tone, and with the freedom and finish of one virtuoso perfectly master of his instrument.

m NEW YORK PRESS,

ress New York City.

e NOV 14 1909

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

Rachmaninoff Makes Debut Here.

In their first matinee concert of the season, yesterday in Carnegie Hall, Max Fiedler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, besides presenting another novelty, offered as a special attraction the first appearance in New York of Sergei Rachmaninoff, Russia's famous composer and pianist. Many of the Boston Orchestra's conductors have feared to risk producing new music at afternoon concerts, arguing that the ears of feminine listeners, who usually make up the bulk of the crowd at matinees, are not hungry for untried delights. If, however, the novelty announced caused any alarm the promise of Rachmaninoff must have soothed faint hearts, for the huge auditorium was crowded to the doors.

As a fact, any misgivings about "The Pierrot of the Minute," a comedy overture to a dramatic phantasy of Ernest Dowson, by Granville Bancock, were quickly dispelled once the programme began. The music is pretty enough to please the most fastidious ear and obvious enough to be intelligible to an infant on first hearing. That is nothing to be ashamed of. Such music has its place, although perhaps it would be more appropriate to a theatre than in a symphony concert. The trouble is, however, that Bantock's composition has little individuality and is superficial. The composer has depicted charmingly, by use of familiar orchestral idioms, the idea of the phantasy. Pierrot's entrance into the park and his elfine dream, as he lies asleep in the moonlight, are set forth daintily and effectively, although there is not the climax one might have expected. This is music which would win praise without reservation in light opera. Considered as part of a symphony concert programme, it is flimsy. That it was played exquisitely by the orchestra need hardly be said.

Schumann's Symphony No. 2, in C major, which in parts has grown somewhat pallid with age, came second on the programme. The first movement—and the last movement, too, though not as much—was somewhat wearisome. The scherzo, however, with the prettily contrasting orchestration Mendelssohn had suggested, is still a delightful piece of music, and the adagio can hold its own.

As a man and a pianist, Rachmaninoff made a decidedly favorable impression. Tall and broad, his face streng and serious, his whole bearing that of a thorough gentleman, this artist had his audience with him from the beginning. His skill as a pianist, as far as he revealed it yesterday, is fully equal to the demands of to-day. His playing, while rhythmically incisive and free, was absolutely devoid of ostentation. At times it seemed almost too placid, for not once did he strike a real fortissimo. All was forte, piano or pianissimo. Within that range Rachmaninoff showed much dynamical variety, modulating his tone constantly.

The work Rachmaninoff chose to play was his own Second Concerto, opus 18, which Gabrilowitsch performed last season with the same orchestra. The composer's interpretation differed radically from those given here by other pianists. It may be remembered that Pugno, who first presented the work in New York, when he appeared with the Russian Symphony Orchestra in 1905, gave a performance that was full of nervous intensity and feverish passion. His tone in forte was harsh, and in fortissimo passages he belabored the piano with exceeding vigor. The composer himself yesterday played with the utmost reserve. He resisted every temptation to be exuberant, avoided every trace of sentimentality, of dramatic emphasis or bombast.

If there is anything stressful in Rachmaninoff's concerto, any passionate sweep of melody, it was uttered only by the orchestra, which sometimes, in contrast to the pianist, sounded too loud. At the close the composer was recalled many times.

The concert came to an end with a fervent, although not perfectly lucid performance of Strauss's tone-poem "Don Juan," in which music, if we are not mistaken, Fiedler first introduced himself to New Yorkers a few years ago, when he appeared as one of the Philharmonic Society's "star" conductors.

WORLD

New York City.

NOV 14 1909

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS FIRST MATINEE.

First New York Appearance of Rachmaninoff the Feature of Rather Long Programme.

WARM WELCOME GIVEN TO COMPOSER-PIANIST.

Playing His Own Concerto, Great Russian Wins Double Success with Large Audience.

By Reginald de Koven.

The first matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon was made notable by the first appearance in New York of the well known Russian musician Sergei Vassilievich Rachmaninoff, who before a manificent audience in the double capacity of composer and pianist, playing his own second piano concerto, won instant recognition. And rightly; for he is a great artist.

Born in 1873, Rachmaninoff is still a young man to have achieved the world-wide distinction which is now his. As a composer he first dawned on the American musical public in a group of "Five pieces for two hands," op. 3, for piano, which contained the now famous prelude in C sharp minor first played in this country by Siloti, his cousin and teacher—who in personal appearance he recalls not a little—over ten years ago.

The concerto played yesterday, No. 2 in C minor, op. 18, is already familiar, having been performed twice only last season by Tina Serner and Gabrilovitch. I can say with truth that I never realized its value and interest as a composition, or its effect as a vehicle for pianistic display, until after the brilliant and masterly performance by the composer yesterday.

Rather Yankee than Slav in type, very tall and rather lanky in stature, with smooth shaven face and clean cut features and without artistic affectation of any kind, sincere and natural, Rachmaninoff conveys the impression of a personality both sweet and strong, and of an artistic spirituality self-contained even to asceticism.

He possesses in a marked degre just what Mr. Fiedler lacks—that inner or spiritual vision and insight of music as a means of the highest emotional expression, which is temperament—and something more.

His advent seemed to awake and arouse Mr. Tiedler aid the orchestra from a mood of somewhat dry technical perfection—I never heard Schumann sound so dry, stereotyped and unromantic as in the second symphony played at this concert—to something fuller, warmer and more vital, which resulted in a simply gorgeously temperamental and spectacular performance of Strauss's "Don Juan," which closed the programme.

I do not know which surprised me most—that being a composer Rachmaninoff should also be so admirable a pianist, or that being a really great pianist he should be a great composer as well.

As a pianist he ranks with the best. His great technical facility, force and command over dynamic and emotional contrast are allied to a sympathetic touch and mellow liquid singing tone. But he is artist rather than mere virtuoso, and he certainly brought out yesterday the dignity, pathos, melodic beauty and rhythmic grace and power of his own composition in a way that was a distinct revelation of its many beauties. The piano was used more as an integral factor of the orchestration, which is rich, varied and full of color, than as a solo instrument.

As a composer Rachmaninoff has plenty to say, and he says it always melodically, with true artistic sentiment, in well balanced, contained and grammatical expression which is ever spontaneous and never labored.

His music, while modern in harmonic structure, is not extravagantly so, and though tinged with characteristic Slavic thought and rhythm, does not cry its origin on the housetops. And it is real music; neither the labored eccentricity, the spurious originality which hides a lack of ideas, nor blatant cacophonic noise.

Altogether one of the most attractive and winning musical personalities that has appeared in New York for many years, and the undoubted success he achieved with the audience, who applauded to the echo, was immediate and well deserved.

I can see no use, purpose or interest in a work like the comedy overture by Grenville Bantock, an English composer, which opened the programme and played for the first time in New York. It is simply a pasticcio of eccentric modern orchestral effects without a particle of real melodic inspiration, and remarkable only for a considerable degree of orchestral technique and facility rather than felicity of expression.

The love of orchestral effect is truly the root of the many musical evils of the day.

EVENING POST,

New York City.

NOV 15 19

Rachmaninoff and Bantock.

At the Saturday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall the second pianoforte concerto of Sergei Vassilievich Rachmaninoff was played by the composer himself, who therewith made his first appearance before an American audience. The name of this Russian composer was made known to the whole musical world some years ago by means of a prelude, in which musical inspiration and popular traits are effectively combined. That prelude remains his best composition to this day, so far as one can speak from an insufficient knowledge of his works. A high rank must also be assigned to his concerto, which, under his hands, disclosed qualities that had escaped previous players of it. It has interesting themes, and they are developed skilfully, while the treatment of both orchestra and piano is idiomatic. The Boston Orchestra under Mr. Fiedler, seconded the player well, and he had a decided success with the audience. His recital, next Saturday, at which he will play four of his preludes and a sonata, is looked forward to with interest.

Another stranger to our concert halls, Mr. Granville Bantock, was introduced on this occasion—not personally, but by means of one of his compositions, "The Pierrot of a Minute," an overture to a dramatic phantasy of Ernest Dawson. That Mr. Bantock is a man high up in the musical world of England may be inferred from the fact that the new Grove gives him over two columns. Judging by his overture, he is superior to Elgar in the matter of thematic invention, and not inferior as a colorist. The piece illustrates a visit Pierrot receives from a Moon Maiden, which turns out to have been but a blissful dream. The mood of this phantasy is admirably reflected in the music.

Schumann's Second Symphony and Strauss's "Don Juan" completed the programme. It is hardly necessary to say that all this music was excellently played and loudly applauded by a large audience.

SUN

New York City.

NOV 14 1909

BOSTON'S GREAT ORCHESTRA

RACHMANINOV PLAYS AT ITS MATINEE.

First Appearance Here of the Eminent Russian Composer—Granville Bantock's "Pierrot of a Minute" Produced —Some Superb Orchestral Playing

The first matinée concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon served to introduce to local music lovers a distinguished Russian composer and a composition by an English writer favorably known in his own land but not possessed yet of a wide acquaintance here. The distinguished composer from Russia was Sergei Rachmaninov, who elected to appear not only as a writer of music but also as a pianist. The medium of his disclosure was his own second piano concerto.

The composition is not wholly strange to this city. It was first performed here at a concert of the Russian Symphony Society on November 18, 1905, when Raoul Pugno put forth his large energies in its behalf. It rested after that till November 12, 1908, when Tina Lerner, a young Russian pianist, made her début.

She treated the composition with most delicate consideration and tone. Ossip Gabrilowitsch played it with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on December 3 of the same year and imparted to it a dignity which Miss Lerner successfully evaded.

Yesterday afternoon's performance served to show how much can be done by the cooperation of two fine musical intelligences. The concerto did not at any previous performance sound so well as it did yesterday. Mr. Rachmaninov, Mr. Fiedler and the Boston orchestra accomplished much for it.

The composer cannot be said to have played like a virtuoso, for his tone was brittle and his cantilena generally dry, while his passage work lacked brilliancy and clarity. But he played like a musician with understanding and a fine feeling for the perspectives of his own work.

The accompaniment furnished by Mr. Fiedler and his men was a real support, lovely in tints and sympathetic in spirit. But the concerto itself makes again the same impression that it has made at previous hearings. It is built upon slight thematic matter and its developments are color rather than structure.

Granville Bantock was the English composer whose music was heard. The composition was "The Pierrot of a Minute," a comedy overture to a dramatic phantasy by Ernest Dowson. It seems that Pierrot in answer to mysterious summons went into the forest near the Little Trianon. There he slept and a Moon Maiden descended unto him. He was warned that kisses from such creatures were fatal, but he took all he could get. At dawn the Moon Maiden vanished and then—Pierrot woke up. It was just a dream.

Mr. Bantock's composition justified its sub-title well. The composer made no attempt to be psychological, but essayed to write a playful, dainty and picturesque scherzando for orchestra, and he made something very much like a success. His music, while not over strong in thematic material, has sufficient to give it directness of purpose and clearness of form and the orchestration is well designed and prettily put together. The composition certainly lost nothing at the hands of the Bostonians.

The two other numbers which made up the programme were the C major symphony of Schumann and Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan." The manner in which these two works was played called for the warmest terms of praise in the critical vocabulary. Marion Crawford in "The Prima Dona" complains that music critics employ too many adjectives. The answer is that for such orchestral playing as this there are not enough in Roget's "Thesaurus."

Mr. Fiedler is not robbing this orchestra of any jot of its wonderful precision and unanimity, nor has he by his liberation of the brasses in any way endangered the nobility of the tone produced by the strings, the luscious beauty of the woods or the inspiring splendors of the ensemble. The playing of the Schumann symphony was perfect in its singing, while the performance of the Strauss composition was like the stupendous achievement of some Briarean virtuoso, warmed and uplifted by the most glowing musical enthusiasm.

EVENING MAIL

New York City.

NOV 15 1

Rachmaninoff's first appearance in New York was one of the most important events that this season has brought to musical circles. The Russian composer-pianist was soloist for the afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra on Saturday and played under direction of Mr. Fiedler his own piano concerto, which had been heard here before. In the hands of the composer, who is also a pianist of the highest and most dignified attainments, it gained new beauties, and furthered the opinion of those who believe that it is one of the most important contributions to this class of literature since the advent of the concerto of Tschaikowsky, Rachmaninoff's teacher.

It requires an extraordinary technic, which Rachmaninoff has, in addition to poise, breadth and superb interpretative powers. He is to be classed among the greatest artists of the day, considered with or without his compositions.

A novelty provided by Mr. Fiedler was a "Comedy Overture" entitled "The Pierrot of a Minute," a light but well-written work by Granville Bantock, an English composer who visited New York some years ago as conductor of one of the English musical comedy companies. The Schumann symphony, No. 2, and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," completed the programme.

Again Mr. Fiedler showed that he has gained a better understanding of his orchestra, it is in sympathy with the conductor, he has become better acquainted with his audience and the audience has gained confidence in and admiration for him. The enthusiasm for the entire offering, especially for Rachmaninoff, was very great.

It was Mary Garden day at the Manhattan Saturday afternoon. The house was crowded to suffocation, and with Renaud, who in "Thais" has a role which sets forth to the best advantage Miss Garden's art, the performance was one which gave great delight to all present. There is nothing to be said of either of these two great artists in parts which are well known by the operagoers of New York, except that through them "Thais" retains its hold upon the public. M. de la Fuente gave it a successful reading and handled all parts with discretion.

In the evening the double bill was given, which served to present Mme. Mazarin as Santuzza in "Cavalleria Rusticana" and Mme. Cavalieri as Nedda in the inevitable companion piece, "Pagliacci." Perhaps it is an error in judgment to allow the cast to drop to the level of the "preliminary season," and it put Mme. Mazarin to a decided disadvantage, while it gave her a responsibility which would have been too severe for many even stronger than she.

The first real art of the evening came with the superb singing of the prologue by Sammarco, whose voice is one of the greatest delights the Manhattan has to offer. Mme. Cavalieri strengthened the impression that she has given much time to improving her vocal condition, and made the best Nedda heard on the Manhattan stage for several years. Zenatello again proved his value to the artistic standing of Mr. Hammerstein's house, as he is an artist of the highest qualifications. Anselmi directed both works, the second with better effect than the first, which was taken at a singularly slow tempo.

m WORLD

ress New York City

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Dec. 9, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 11. The soloist at the Thursday evening concert will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, who will play the Schumann Concerto in A minor. The symphony will be Vincent d'Indy's in B flat major No. 2, last heard here four years ago, when it was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of the composer himself. The third number will be Tschaikowsky's charming ballet suite "Nut Cracker." On Saturday afternoon there will be two soloists, Mme. Schumann-Heink and Mr. Georges Longy, the solo oboeist of the orchestra.

[52]

NEW YORK PRESS,
New York City.
NOV 15 1909

SONGS AND SINGERS.

Whatever Max Fiedler's merit as a conducter, he has won praise both in Boston and New York as a maker of interesting programmes. When the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its season here last Thursday the list of works performed included a "Symphonic Prelude to a Tragedy," by Max Reger, which was heard for the first time in New York; Brahms's Symphony No. II. and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel." This time, however, Fiedler's choice of pieces incurred the displeasure of critics who detest Germany's latest contributions to music. Consequently verbal shafts were aimed at the enthusiastic director.

Now, we are not informed whether Fiedler himself is an admirer of Reger. That, however, is an unimportant consideration. Dr. Karl Muck, than whom the Boston Symphony Orchestra never had a finer leader, liked to produce whatever works he considered of sufficient importance for public hearing, irrespective of personal taste. Thus he presented Debussy's "La Mere," much to the consternation of some critics, although he himself positively disliked the composition. Dr. Muck's attitude toward new music, it seems to us, ought to be the attitude of every broad-minded purveyor of music, and we believe Max Fiedler holds exactly the same point of view. Surely New Yorkers ought to encourage this open-door policy, throwing aside all prejudice.

For a good many years New York has been considered an unsafe place for producing novelties. Apart of the public and several influential critics have been so hostile toward those persons who dared to point out new ways that it required courage, enthusiasm and persistency to keep up the battle. Emil Paur fought bravely to introduce the music of Richard Strauss and carried off many scars. What support did our critics give him in his unselfish struggle? What writers on daily papers stood for his cause, except that eloquent champion of progress, James Huneker, now, alas! devoting his pen to [illegible] things?

Reger and his symphonic prologue, it seems to us, forms a case in point. There is no quarrel, let it be understood, with those who saw nothing to admire in this music. In music, as in other arts, there will always be differences of opinion, even among experts; but is it right to attack Max Fiedler, who was fulfilling his duty in keeping his audience well posted on what is going on in the world of music? Are we helping the cause in this city if we make those conductors suffer who offer for hearing works of men who are important figures in music?

We must keep in mind that Reger, whatever his ultimate position may be, is now considered in Europe one of the big men in music. That in itself is sufficient reason for presenting his principal works to cultured musical audiences in America, among which number surely the patrons of the Boston Symphony concerts ought to be reckoned. In his programme notes Phillip Hale says "Reger is still a much discussed man," and tells us that "some regard him as the greatest living composer," although others, while admitting his "facility," find "no other qualities in his voluminous works." A few quotations from the writings of Rudolf Louis, one of Germany's best musical critics, also will serve to point out in what high esteem Reger is held abroad. "Max Reger," writes Louis, "is among contemporary composers of importance the most interesting figure, if only for the reason that he presents the greatest number of riddles to persons who are not prejudiced for or against his work." Still more emphatically the same writer remarks: "Among composers of the present day one may have grave doubts whether Strauss or Reger has the stronger creative power; but there can be no question that these two men, in the generally accepted judgment of this time, are the two foremost musicians of their day." In another place Louis associates the names of Strauss, Reger and Mahler, explaining their significance in the history of music. "The three currents," he comments, "in which we can observe the development of the symphony since Beethoven, flow toward the three men who are to-day the most talked of instrumental composers. The one that points in the direction of programme music, passing over Berlioz and Liszt, flows toward Strauss; the one that turns in the opposite direction, covering Schumann and Brahms, goes toward Reger, and the current that represents a medium, as it were, between the two others passes over Bruckner toward Brahms." Again, referring to Reger's songs, Louis has this to say: "As a musician Reger is so potential a figure that it would be surprising if his songs did not show it. And, in fact, it must be acknowledged—if one may only overlook the demands of harmony and unity between poetry and music—that much can be found in Reger's books of songs, which, from a purely musical point of view, is interesting and fascinating in the highest degree. More than this, in rare moments, as if by chance, the music actually is fused into a close-knit entity with words that are worthy of it, and then we have creations (as, for instance, the really wonderful 'Aeolsharp' of Lingg) which are among the most important contributions to modern lyric art."

It would seem, then, that Reger's music is sufficiently important to be set before New York audiences. Let us see, however, how some of our critics treated Fiedler's recent attempt. Here is what Krehbiel wrote in the Tribune: "The Boston Orchestra (or its conductor) has never offended so deeply and made such abject amends as last night at the first concerts for the season in Carnegie Hall. It is hard to conceive such a thing, but possibly to perform the 'Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy' (unnamed, for which the author of the work ought to be grateful), by Max Reger, is a matter of conscience with Mr. Fiedler. Perhaps he feels that he is performing a missionary labor; if so, he went about it last night like the fabled New England missionaries, who carried with them large cargoes of rum. * * * 'Le Tambour Major,' from Ambrois Thomas's 'Caid,' never sounded half so welcome in as [illegible] threescore or more of times that it has delivered the Sunday night concerts at the Metropolitan Opera House as it did last night, when it cleansed the ears and refreshed the minds of the audience that had been compelled to hear Reger's prologue. * * * If this prologue, after having been twice curtailed, had next been beheaded, then dismembered, and all of the fragments put away as things unpleasant to contemplate are generally disposed of, the revision would have been eminently satisfactory."

Even Henry Finck, a champion of so much that is good, turns his guns upon Fiedler: "Mr. Max Fiedler made a bad impression upon those who love the best music by the programme he arranged for the first Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. * * * It would be an affront to Mr. Fiedler's taste and judgment to suppose that he selected this piece because he considered it particularly meritorious. Let us be charitable and further assume that he did not choose it because it would serve to show New Yorkers once more what an admirably drilled band the Boston Symphony Orchestra is. Let us take it for granted that he produced it simply because it is a novelty. But why should our orchestras present a novelty unless it is interesting? No one, surely, could be so devoid of all judgment as to claim any merit for that 'prologue' except that of clever contrapuntal writing and fairly good orchestral coloring."

How much finer is the attitude of Sanborn, the Globe's musical critic. Sanborn, like Krehbiel and Finck, took a dislike to Reger's "Prologue," but this is the way he expressed himself: "Max Reger is one of the men that must be heard, whether one particularly cares to hear him or not. He is much discussed. He is important." Sanborn then launches into strong criticism of the music, but winds up in this way: "And yet indisputably Reger is so important a figure in music to-day that this work of his, even though one earnestly believe it no music, a contradiction of musc, deserves a hearing, and one is glad the hearing is provided by such an orchestra as that from Boston." When every musical person in New York adopts the point of view this critic holds the outlook will be a far more encouraging one.

MAX SMITH.

From TRIBUNE
Address New York City.
Date NOV 14 1909

MUSIC

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Perhaps the chief discourse should be of Mr. Sergei Rachmaninoff, instead of the Boston Orchestra, in a discussion of the concert at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, for we have had the Boston Orchestra with us often, and the Russian pianist and composer disclosed himself in proper person before New Yorkers on this occasion for the first time. But there is a comforting suggestion of excellence combined with permanency in the title of the organization which comes to us once a month to curb the conceit with which provincial towns charge the American metropolis; and it seems like a belittling of it to raise any feature of its offerings to a dignity above its name. Even when it inflicts nineteen minutes of a Reger prelude to a happily nameless tragedy upon its admirers they are willing to forgive, and when it increases their knowledge of contemporary genius they do not permit that fact to overshadow the more enduring one that they have again enjoyed the gracious and uplifting ministrations of an organization of which even a provincial metropolis is proud. And so Mr. Rachmaninoff must take his turn in the record of yesterday's delightful meeting in Carnegie Hall.

Besides, it was the solo performer and not his music which was novel in the programme. That began with a work by an English composer who has occupied considerable attention in his native land during the last few years, but has not heretofore challenged local notice. The programme called it "The Pierrot of a Minute, a Comedy Overture to a Dramatic Phantasy of Ernest Dowson," by Granville Bantock. No reviewer of musical doings who has cut his eye teeth is inclined nowadays to quarrel with the designations chosen by composers to describe their instrumental compositions. This "Pierrot of a Minute" was a "Fantastic Poem for Orchestra in the Form of a Prelude" a short year ago, when it had its first performance at a Worcester festival; it is now a "comedy overture." No doubt it sounded then as it does now—in that respect resembling the potatoes of which the Hon. Bardwell Slote, of amiable memory, remarked, in spite of Mrs. Gilflory, that they tasted the same in all languages. And yet we could wish that it had not been called an overture, for the most obvious thing about it is that it opens nothing, but plainly accompanies the incidents which Mr. Dowson sets forth in his fantastic poem, which tells of how Pierrot fell asleep and dreamed that he enjoyed the embraces of the moon maiden, for one hour of which he was willing to surrender the rest of his existence. It is music which is prettily imaginative and exquisitely scored for orchestral instruments, but it is too fragmentary and illusive to serve as anything else than incidental music to a pantomime in which the eyes might also have their pleasure. It lacks the architectural structure which we are still entitled to expect from a piece of music that seeks to stand by itself, with or without explanatory title. But, if in this sense unsatisfactory, it was yet pleasant to hear.

After this amiable diversion which opened the programme, and before the personal hero of the occasion introduced himself, the orchestra made obeisance to a great shade by playing Schumann's Symphony in C, the work which emerged from the composer's mind in a period of gloom during which he heard trumpets and drums resounding within him. How completely he became himself before the painful creative period was over Mr. Fiedler demonstrated by a positively thrilling performance of the splendid finals. Nor did any portion of the work seem to call for the apologetic tone in which Schumann himself spoke of it.

Mr. Rachmaninoff played the solo part of his second pianoforte concerto. Three artists had tried in vain before him to awaken appreciation of its nobility and beauty. Mr. Gabrilowitsch was fairly successful, but M. Pugno and Miss Lerner labored in vain against the weight which the orchestra laid upon their performances. Mr. Fiedler showed that though the work is heavily scored it is yet translucent and Mr. Rachmanioff proved that a manly, unaffected and rhythmically incisive reading of its solo part can lift it to the place in the general scheme which it ought to have and redeem it from the faults which heretofore seemed inherent in it. The concert presented him in an admirable light, both as composer and performer, and insured him a cordial welcome when he shall return to give a more varied and illuminative exhibition of his powers. As usual, the orchestra ended the concert with a scintillant show piece—this time Richard Strauss's "Don Juan."

H. E. K.

From Daily Times,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 12 1909

SYMPHONY CONCERT LECTURE

To-night's Programme Entertainingly Discussed by Louis C. Elson.

In the Music Hall of the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon, Louis C. Elson, of Boston, with Alfred De Voto at the piano, gave the lecture recital on the programme of the Philharmonic concert to be given this evening in the Opera House of the Academy by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The lecture recital opened the series, one of which is to precede each concert. Only the orchestral numbers were discussed—the Overture to the opera "Oberon" by von Weber; Symphony No. 5, E minor, Op. 64, Tschaikowsky; orchestral suite from the music to "Peer Gynt," Grieg, and "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the Old-fashioned Roguish Manner, in rondo form, Op. 28, Richard Strauss. "There are two vagabonds in this programme," said Mr. Elson, adding that he had persuaded Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to put Peer Gynt and Till Eulenspiegel in juxtaposition, as it is of interest to note the different figure development in each composer's musical setting of the stories. Mr. Elson played the themes of each composition upon one piano, and Mr. De Voto gave the excerpts in delightful fashion upon another, getting quite the effect of the muted violins by his effective use of the soft pedal and a semi-staccato touch in "Asa's Death" from the Grieg Suite. The excerpts from the Tschaikowsky number were the most full and gave much pleasure.

From Daily Citizen,
Address Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date NOV 12 1909

LECTURE-RECITAL ON PHILHARMONIC CONCERT

In the music hall of the Academy of Music, yesterday afternoon, Louis C. Elson, of Boston, with Alfred De Voto at the piano, gave the lecture recital on the programme of the Philharmonic Concert to be given this evening in the Opera House of the Academy by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The lecture recital opened the series, one of which is to precede each concert. Only the orchestral numbers were discussed—the overture to the opera "Oberon," by von Weber; Symphony No. 5, E minor, Op. 64, Tschaikowsky; Orchestral Suite, from the music to "Peer Gynt," Grieg, and "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, After the Old-Fashioned Roguish Manner—in Rondo Form," Op. 28, Richard Strauss.

"There are two vagabonds in this programme," said Mr. Elson, adding that he had persuaded Max Fielder, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to put "Peer Gynt" and "Till Eulenspiegel" in juxtaposition as it is of interest to note the different figure development in each composer's musical setting of the stories. Comment was made on the beautifully melodic nature of Grieg's work, the lecturer saying, "I hold that music best in which intellect and emotion meet as they do here." The bassoon, which sets forth the feeling against Peer "In the Hall of the Mountain Kings," shows Grieg's sense of humor. It was characterized as the most grotesque instrument in the orchestra.

Again, when describing the instrumentation of the Tschaikowsky symphony, Mr. Elson spoke of the lower register of the clarionet as being the most ghostly of orchestral tones. The Strauss number calls for unusually full orchestration. Te D clarionet is seldom used in an orchestra only in a brass band. Even a watchman's rattle is introduced. But this does not go quite so far as another recent composition which calls for the discharge of musketry as an orchestral bit.

Mr. Elson played the themes of each composition on one piano, and Mr. De Voto gave the exerpts in delightful fashion upon another, getting quite the effect of the muted violins by his effective use of the soft pedal and a semi-staccato touch in "Aase's Death," from the Grieg Suite. The exerpts from the Tschaikowsky number were the most full and gave much pleasure.

From TRIBUNE
Address New York City.
Date NOV 28 1909

Dwight L. Elmendorf will make his next appearance on the platform at the Academy of Music under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences on Wednesday, when he will deliver the third in his course of illustrated lectures on travel. His topic will be "The Sudan, the Nile Journey to Khartoum." The two lectures left will be on "Sicily, the Island of Mythology and Art," which will be delivered on December 8, and "Dalmatia, from Fiume to Cattaro," which will be delivered on December 14. Mr. Elmendorf's lectures are delivered in the Opera House.

The New York Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Walter Damrosch, will give its next "Young People's Concert" in the Opera House on Saturday afternoon. Mr. Damrosch will assist at the piano. The next concert in the series will fall on January 29. The assisting artist has not yet been selected. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Max Fiedler, will give its next concert in the Opera House on the evening of Friday, December 10. Mme. Samaroff will assist at the piano. The next concert in the series will occur on January 14. Mischa Elman, the violinist, will assist.

The Kneisel String Quartet will give its next chamber music concert in the Hall of Music on December 16. Its following concert will occur on January 20.

From SUN
Address New York City.
Date NOV 28 1909

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 9, and Saturday afternoon, December 11. The soloist at the Thursday evening concert will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, who will play the Schumann concerto in A minor. The symphony will be Vincent d'Indy's in B flat [illegible] No. 2, last heard here four years ago when it was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of the composer himself. The third number will be Tschaikowsky's charming ballet suite "Nut Cracker." On Saturday afternoon there will be two soloists, Mme. Schumann-Heink and Georges Longy, the justly famous solo oboe of the orchestra. Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing the "Sextus" recitative and aria from "Titus" and Gounod's "Stances de Sapho," while Mr. Longy will play Handel's concerto for oboe and string orchestra. The purely orchestral works will be Smetana's overture, "The Sold Bride" and Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony in F minor, opus 36.

From NEW YORK AMERICAN,
Address New York City.
Date NOV 28 1909

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 9, and Saturday afternoon, December 11. The soloist at the Thursday evening concert will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, who will play the Schumann concerto in A minor. The symphony will be Vincent d'Indy's, in B flat major (No. 2), last heard here four years ago, when it was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of the composer himself. The third number will be Tschaikowsky's charming ballet suite, "Nut Cracker." On Saturday afternoon there will be two soloists, Mme. Schumann-Heink and Mr. Georges Longy, the solo oboe of the orchestra. Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing the "sextus" recitative and aria from "Titus" and Gounod's "Stances de Sapho," while Mr. Longy will play Handl's concerto for oboe and string orchestra. The purely orchestral works will be Smetana's overture, "The Sold Bride," and Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony in F minor, opus 36.

NEW YORK PRESS,

New York City.

NOV 15 1909

SONGS AND SINGERS.

Whatever Max Fiedler's merit as a conductor, he has won praise both in Boston and New York as a maker of interesting programmes. When the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its season here last Thursday the list of works performed included a "Symphonic Prelude to a Tragedy," by Max Reger, which was heard for the first time in New York; Brahms's Symphony No. II. and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel." This time, however, Fiedler's choice of pieces incurred the displeasure of critics who detest Germany's latest contributions to music. Consequently verbal shafts were aimed at the enthusiastic director.

Now, we are not informed whether Fiedler himself is an admirer of Reger. That, however, is an unimportant consideration. Dr. Karl Muck, than whom the Boston Symphony Orchestra never had a finer leader, liked to produce whatever works he considered of sufficient importance for public hearing, irrespective of personal taste. Thus he presented Debussy's "La Mere," much to the consternation of some critics, although he himself positively disliked the composition. Dr. Muck's attitude toward new music, it seems to us, ought to be the attitude of every broad-minded purveyor of music, and we believe Max Fiedler holds exactly the same point of view. Surely New Yorkers ought to encourage this open-door policy, throwing aside all prejudice.

For a good many years New York has been considered an unsafe place for producing novelties. Apart of the public and several influential critics have been so hostile toward those persons who dared to point out new ways that it required courage, enthusiasm and persistency to keep up the battle. Emil Paur fought bravely to introduce the music of Richard Strauss and carried off many scars. What support did our critics give him in his unselfish struggle? What writers on daily papers stood for his cause, except that eloquent champion of progress, James Huneker, now, alas! devoting his pen to other things?

Reger and his symphonic prologue, it seems to us, forms a case in point. There is no quarrel, let it be understood, with those who saw nothing to admire in this music. In music, as in other arts, there will always be differences of opinion, even among experts; but is it right to attack Max Fiedler, who was fulfilling his duty in keeping his audience well posted on what is going on in the world of music? Are we helping the cause in this city if we make those conductors suffer who offer for hearing works of men who are important figures in music?

We must keep in mind that Reger, whatever his ultimate position may be, is now considered in Europe one of the big men in music. That in itself is sufficient reason for presenting his principal works to cultured musical audiences in America, among which number surely the patrons of the Boston Symphony concerts ought to be reckoned. In his programme notes Phillip Hale says "Reger is still a much discussed man," and tells us that "some regard him as the greatest living composer," although others, while admitting his "facility," find "no other qualities in his voluminous works." A few quotations from the writings of Rudolf Louis, one of Germany's best musical critics, also will serve to point out in what high esteem Reger is held abroad. "Max Reger," writes Louis, "is among contemporary composers of importance the most interesting figure, if only for the reason that he presents the greatest number of riddles to persons who are not prejudiced for or against his work." Still more emphatically the same writer remarks: "Among composers of the present day one may have grave doubts whether Strauss or Reger has the stronger creative power; but there can be no question that these two men, in the generally accepted judgment of this time, are the two foremost musicians of their day." In another place Louis associates the names of Strauss, Reger and Mahler, explaining their significance in the history of music. "The three currents," he comments, "in which we can observe the development of the symphony since Beethoven, flow toward the three men who are to-day the most talked of instrumental composers. The one that points in the direction of programme music, passing over Berlioz and Liszt, flows toward Strauss; the one that turns in the opposite direction, covering Schumann and Brahms, goes toward Reger, and the current that represents a medium, as it were, between the two others passes over Bruckner toward Brahms." Again, referring to Reger's songs, Louis has this to say: "As a musician Reger is so potential a figure that it would be surprising if his songs did not show it. And, in fact, it must be acknowledged—if one may only overlook the demands of harmony and unity between poetry and music—that much can be found in Reger's books of songs, which, from a purely musical point of view, is interesting and fascinating in the highest degree. More than this, in rare moments, as if by chance, the music actually is fused into a close-knit entity with words that are worthy of it, and then we have creations (as, for instance, the really wonderful 'Aeolsharp' of Lingg) which are among the most important contributions to modern lyric art."

It would seem, then, that Reger's music is sufficiently important to be set before New York audiences. Let us see, however, how some of our critics treated Fiedler's recent attempt. Here is what Krehbiel wrote in the Tribune: "The Boston Orchestra (or its conductor) has never offended so deeply and made such abject amends as last night at the first concerts for the season in Carnegie Hall. It is hard to conceive such a thing, but possibly to perform the 'Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy' (unnamed, for which the author of the work ought to be grateful), by Max Reger, is a matter of conscience with Mr. Fiedler. Perhaps he feels that he is performing a missionary labor; if so, he went about it last night like the fabled New England missionaries, who carried with them large cargoes of rum. * * * 'Le Tambour Major,' from Ambrois Thomas's 'Cald,' never sounded half so welcome in all the threescore or more of times that it has enlivened the Sunday night concerts at the Metropolitan Opera House as it did last night, when it cleansed the ears and refreshed the minds of the audience that had been compelled to hear Reger's prologue. * * * If this prologue, after having been twice curtailed, had next been beheaded, then dismembered, and all of the fragments put away as things unpleasant to contemplate are generally disposed of, the revision would have been eminently satisfactory."

Even Henry Finck, a champion of so much that is good, turns his guns upon Fiedler: "Mr. Max Fiedler made a bad impression upon those who love the best music by the programme he arranged for the first Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. * * * It would be an affront to Mr. Fiedler's taste and judgment to suppose that he selected this piece because he considered it particularly meritorious. Let us be charitable and further assume that he did not choose it because it would serve to show New Yorkers once more what an admirably drilled band the Boston Symphony Orchestra is. Let us take it for granted that he produced it simply because it is a novelty. But why should our orchestras present a novelty unless it is interesting? No one, surely, could be so devoid of all judgment as to claim any merit for that 'prologue' except that of clever contrapuntal writing and fairly good orchestral coloring."

How much finer is the attitude of Sanborn, the Globe's musical critic. Sanborn, like Krehbiel and Finck, took a dislike to Reger's "Prologue," but this is the way he expressed himself: "Max Reger is one of the men that must be heard, whether one particularly cares to hear him or not. He is much discussed. He is important." Sanborn then launches into strong criticism of the music, but winds up in this way: "And yet indisputably Reger is so important a figure in music to-day that this work of his, even though one earnestly believe it no music, a contradiction of musc, deserves a hearing, and one is glad the hearing is provided by such an orchestra as that from Boston." When every musical person in New York adopts the point of view this critic holds the outlook will be a far more encouraging one.

MAX SMITH.

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date NOV 14 1909

MUSIC

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Perhaps the chief discourse should be of Mr. Sergei Rachmaninoff, instead of the Boston Orchestra, in a discussion of the concert at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, for we have had the Boston Orchestra with us often, and the Russian pianist and composer disclosed himself in proper person before New Yorkers on this occasion for the first time. But there is a comforting suggestion of excellence combined with permanency in the title of the organization which comes to us once a month to curb the conceit with which provincial towns charge the American metropolis; and it seems like a belittling of it to raise any feature of its offerings to a dignity above its name. Even when it inflicts nineteen minutes of a Reger prelude to a happily nameless tragedy upon its admirers they are willing to forgive, and when it increases their knowledge of contemporary genius they do not permit that fact to overshadow the more enduring one that they have again enjoyed the gracious and uplifting ministrations of an organization of which even a provincial metropolis is proud. And so Mr. Rachmaninoff must take his turn in the record of yesterday's delightful meeting in Carnegie Hall.

Besides, it was the solo performer and not his music which was novel in the programme. That began with a work by an English composer who has occupied considerable attention in his native land during the last few years, but has not heretofore challenged local notice. The programme called it "The Pierrot of a Minute, a Comedy Overture to a Dramatic Phantasy of Ernest Dowson," by Granville Bantock. No reviewer of musical doings who has cut his eye teeth is inclined nowadays to quarrel with the designations chosen by composers to describe their instrumental compositions. This "Pierrot of a Minute" was a "Fantastic Poem for Orchestra in the Form of a Prelude" a short year ago, when it had its first performance at a Worcester festival; it is now a "comedy overture." No doubt it sounded then as it does now—in that respect resembling the potatoes of which the Hon. Bardwell Slote, of amiable memory, remarked, in spite of Mrs. Gilfiory, that they tasted the same in all languages. And yet we could wish that it had not been called an overture, for the most obvious thing about it is that it opens nothing, but plainly accompanies the incidents which Mr. Dowson sets forth in his fantastic poem, which tells of how Pierrot fell asleep and dreamed that he enjoyed the embraces of the moon maiden, for one hour of which he was willing to surrender the rest of his existence. It is music which is prettily imaginative and exquisitely scored for orchestral instruments, but it is too fragmentary and illusive to serve as anything else than incidental music to a pantomime in which the eyes might also have their pleasure. It lacks the architectural structure which we are still entitled to expect from a piece of music that seeks to stand by itself, with or without explanatory title. But, if in this sense unsatisfactory, it was yet pleasant to hear.

After this amiable diversion which opened the programme, and before the personal hero of the occasion introduced himself, the orchestra made obeisance to a great shade by playing Schumann's Symphony in C, the work which emerged from the composer's mind in a period of gloom during which he heard trumpets and drums resounding within him. How completely he became himself before the painful creative period was over Mr. Fiedler demonstrated by a positively thrilling performance of the splendid finale. Nor did any portion of the work seem to call for the apologetic tone in which Schumann himself spoke of it.

Mr. Rachmaninoff played the solo part of his second pianoforte concerto. Three artists had tried in vain before him to awaken appreciation of its nobility and beauty. Mr. Gabrilowitsch was fairly successful, but M. Pugno and Miss Lerner labored in vain against the weight which the orchestra laid upon their performances. Mr. Fiedler showed that though the work is heavily scored it is yet translucent and Mr. Rachmanioff proved that a manly, unaffected and rhythmically incisive reading of its solo part can lift it to the place in the general scheme which it ought to have and redeem it from the faults which heretofore seemed inherent in it. The concert presented him in an admirable light, both as composer and performer, and insured him a cordial welcome when he shall return to give a more varied and illuminative exhibition of his powers. As usual, the orchestra ended the concert with a scintillant show piece—this time Richard Strauss's "Don Juan."

H. E. K.

From Daily Times,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date NOV 12 1909

SYMPHONY CONCERT LECTURE

To-night's Programme Entertainingly Discussed by Louis C. Elson.

In the Music Hall of the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon, Louis C. Elson, of Boston, with Alfred De Voto at the piano, gave the lecture recital on the programme of the Philharmonic concert to be given this evening in the Opera House of the Academy by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The lecture recital opened the series, one of which is to precede each concert. Only the orchestral numbers were discussed—the Overture to the opera "Oberon" by von Weber; Symphony No. 5, E minor, Op. 64, Tschaikowsky; orchestral suite from the music to "Peer Gynt," Grieg, and "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the Old-fashioned Roguish Manner, in rondo form, Op. 28, Richard Strauss. "There are two vagabonds in this programme," said Mr. Elson, adding that he had persuaded Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to put Peer Gynt and Till Eulenspiegel in juxtaposition, as it is of interest to note the different figure development in each composer's musical setting of the stories. Mr. Elson played the themes of each composition upon one piano, and Mr. De Voto gave the excerpts in delightful fashion upon another, getting quite the effect of the muted violins by his effective use of the soft pedal and a semi-staccato touch in "Asa's Death" from the Grieg Suite. The excerpts from the Tschaikowsky number were the most full and gave much pleasure.

From Daily Citizen,

Address Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date NOV 12 1909

LECTURE-RECITAL ON PHILHARMONIC CONCERT

In the music hall of the Academy of Music, yesterday afternoon, Louis C. Elson, of Boston, with Alfred De Voto at the piano, gave the lecture recital on the programme of the Philharmonic Concert to be given this evening in the Opera House of the Academy by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The lecture recital opened the series, one of which is to precede each concert. Only the orchestral numbers were discussed—the overture to the opera "Oberon," by von Weber; Symphony No. 5, E minor, Op. 64, Tschaikowsky; Orchestral Suite, from the music to "Peer Gynt," Grieg, and "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, After the Old-Fashioned Roguish Manner—in Rondo Form," Op. 28, Richard Strauss.

"There are two vagabonds in this programme," said Mr. Elson, adding that he had persuaded Max Fielder, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to put "Peer Gynt" and "Till Eulenspiegel" in juxtaposition as it is of interest to note the different figure development in each composer's musical setting of the stories. Comment was made on the beautifully melodic nature of Grieg's work, the lecturer saying, "I hold that music best in which intellect and emotion meet as they do here." The bassoon, which sets forth the feeling against Peer "In the Hall of the Mountain Kings," shows Grieg's sense of humor. It was characterized as the most grotesque instrument in the orchestra.

Again, when describing the instrumentation of the Tschaikowsky symphony, Mr. Elson spoke of the lower register of the clarionet as being the most ghostly of orchestral tones. The Strauss number calls for unusually full orchestration. Te D clarionet is seldom used in an orchestra only in a brass band. Even a watchman's rattle is introduced. But this does not go quite so far as another recent composition which calls for the discharge of musketry as an orchestral bit.

Mr. Elson played the themes of each composition on one piano, and Mr. De Voto gave the exerpts in delightful fashion upon another, getting quite the effect of the muted violins by his effective use of the soft pedal and a semi-staccato touch in "Aase's Death," from the Grieg Suite. The exerpts from the Tschaikowsky number were the most full and gave much pleasure.

From TRIBUNE

Address New York City.

Date NOV 28 1909

Dwight L. Elmendorf will make his next appearance on the platform at the Academy of Music under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences on Wednesday, when he will deliver the third in his course of illustrated lectures on travel. His topic will be "The Sudan, the Nile Journey to Khartoum." The two lectures left will be on "Sicily, the Island of Mythology and Art," which will be delivered on December 8, and "Dalmatia, from Fiume to Cattaro," which will be delivered on December 14. Mr. Elmendorf's lectures are delivered in the Opera House.

The New York Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Walter Damrosch, will give its next "Young People's Concert" in the Opera House on Saturday afternoon. Mr. Damrosch will assist at the piano. The next concert in the series will fall on January 29. The assisting artist has not yet been selected. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Max Fiedler, will give its next concert in the Opera House on the evening of Friday, December 10. Mme. Samaroff will assist at the piano. The next concert in the series will occur on January 14. Mischa Elman, the violinist, will assist.

The Kneisel String Quartet will give its next chamber music concert in the Hall of Music on December 16. Its following concert will occur on January 20.

From SUN

Address New York City.

Date NOV 28 1909

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 9, and Saturday afternoon, December 11. The soloist at the Thursday evening concert will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, who will play the Schumann concerto in A minor. The symphony will be Vincent d'Indy's in B flat major, No. 1, last heard here four years ago when it was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of the composer himself. The third number will be Tschaikowsky's charming ballet suite "Nut Cracker." On Saturday afternoon there will be two soloists, Mme. Schumann-Heink and Georges Longy, the justly admired solo oboe of the orchestra. Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing the "Sextus" recitative and aria from "Titus" and Gounod's "Stances de Sapho," while Mr. Longy will play Handel's concerto for oboe and string orchestra. The purely orchestral works will be Smetana's overture "The Bartered Bride" and Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony in F minor, opus 36.

From NEW YORK AMERICAN,

New York City.

NOV 28 1909

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 9, and Saturday afternoon, December 11. The soloist at the Thursday evening concert will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, who will play the Schumann concerto in A minor. The symphony will be Vincent d'Indy's, in B flat major (No. 2), last heard here four years ago, when it was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of the composer himself. The third number will be Tschaikowsky's charming ballet suite, "Nut Cracker." On Saturday afternoon there will be two soloists, Mme. Schumann-Heink and Mr. Georges Longy, the solo oboe of the orchestra. Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing the "sextus" recitative and aria from "Titus" and Gounod's "Stances de Sapho," while Mr. Longy will play Handl's concerto for oboe and string orchestra. The purely orchestral works will be Smetana's overture, "The Sold Bride," and Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony in F minor, opus 36.

[53]

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 13 1909

BOSTON ORCHESTRA STILL PRE-EMINENT IN TONE

Academy of Music Audience Is Highly Appreciative.

GILIBERT AS THE SOLOIST.

Tschaikowsky Symphony and Peer Gynt Suite Played with Fine Tonal Effects.

All the tonal beauty which for years has characterized the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was in evidence at its concert last evening in the Academy of Music. Full, mellow, rich of timber, the tone was a delight to the ear. It satisfied by its almost perfect balance, its fine certainty and solidity. The orchestra's technique, too, is certain, authoritative, and the ensemble playing is well-nigh flawless. But, all things considered, it is its tone that keeps this fine orchestra pre-eminent among American symphony societies.

Tschaikowsky's symphony, No. 5, in E minor, op. 64, the principal work on the programme, was played magnificently. There was warmth and varied color, fine effects in light and shade, vigor and splendid sweep up to the climaxes. The reading was marked by high intelligence, keen appreciation of contrasts. In the andante maestoso movement of the finale, the tonal effects were superb.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has never wrought a more wonderful music poem than in the "Death of Aase" in the Grieg "Peer Gynt" suite. Here was tone marvelous in its sheer beauty, subtlety of expression, insight carried to a high degree. It was done with admirable restraint; what of mournfulness there was was the more poignant in that the strings were never lachrymose. And the end—exquisitively soft as the murmur of a breeze on a night in June—was a triumph in pianissimo. The ensemble work in "The Hall of the Mountain King," with which the suite closes, was perfect. Somehow, it seemed as if Mr. Fiedler had inspired the orchestra, so beautifully did they play this Grieg number.

Weber's overture to his opera, "Oberon," opened the programme. Finely though it was played, it suffered, of course, in comparison with the larger works that followed. Yet it was interpreted excellently well, for all that at times there was too much power in the climaxes; and before a dozen measures had been played the audience settled back in its seats, knowing that the evening would be a sure delight.

An opportunity for comparison of the orchestra with that of the reorganized Philharmonic Society under Gustave Mahler came with the playing of Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel." Mr. Mahler's reading was characterized by an extraordinary brillance and dexterity. Last night's interpretation was equally brilliant and was marked by a sure ease, a crystaline clearness, an emphasis on the sardonic vein that runs throughout the work.

Charles Gilibert, the baritone from the Metropolitan Opera Company, was the soloist, singing the drum major air from Thomas' opera, "The Cadi;" the air of the Devil from Massenet's opera, "Griselodis," and "Danson's le Gigue," by Charles Bordes. He sang with consummate artistry that more than atoned for the fact that he was not in the best voice. His singing of the Drum Major was exquisite in diction and instinct, with the spirit of highest comedy. Into the Devil air he put all the roguery, all the droll satire and humor that Massenet wrote into it. "Danson le Gigue" he sang finely.

The large audience was highly enthusiastic, at times being stirred to a high pitch. It was lavish with its applause.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play four more concerts in Brooklyn during the season and Mr. Fiedler has promised some novelties for each appearance.

...Cit...
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 29 1909

The second Boston Symphony concert which will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 10, will bring as soloist the greatly admired American pianist, Olga Samaroff, who will play Liszt's Concerto in E flat Major. The orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and Goldmark's charming symphony, "The Rustic Wedding," and the Prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde."

Standard Union,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 13 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Occasions are exceedingly rare when the music of the masters may be given with the thoroughness and efficiency by which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the able direction of Max Fiedler, distinguished itself at the Academy of Music last night.

It was only to hear this magnificent body of tone in action through the various stages of Tschaikowski's fifth symphony in E minor to realize how wonderfully appealing are the elements of sound when properly conveyed to the ears. Able musicians as the players are, individually, they were fully sensitive to the requirements of artistic performance en masse, and led by the discretion of their leader, they never failed to exercise the energy of thought and execution upon an effective interpretation of the score. Fiedler kept the voices within reasonable bound of restraint, and yet they were always capable of a tonality of great strength—a web of polyphony that was as substantially solid as the exigencies of the score might demand and withal sufficiently elastic and flexible to permit of constant changing and modulation of tints without disturbing the balance and poise of the harmonic structure.

Fiedler's reading of Tschaikowski's symphony was of character for which he is to be admired by true lovers of the Russian composer. Laboring constantly under a cloud of depressive sorrow, Tschaikowski from the nature of his sombre disposition wrote in a style more or less incomprehensible to those who would judge music from what it appears on the surface. To such he is not a gifted genius but a mere mechanician—a necromancer in the experimentation of musical analogies with no other purpose than the glamour of tinsel and effect. In reading between and under his lines, however, there is gained access to valves which open upon endless drifts of emotional feeling incessantly striving for expression. Fiedler's perception of this complex interior revealed the mould of genius in which the music was cast.

Although not the greatest of Tschaikowski's work, the fifth symphony, however, displays a catholicity of taste almost bordering on severe classicism. The movements are constructed in conformity with the conventions of symphonic form, the subject being announced by clarinets in the first movement and carried through an exposition of masterly proportions by a persistent and interesting treatment of thematic material. The recapitulation occurs entirely in the finale, the third, section, described as a valse but undoubtedly intended for the usual scherzo, being a digression rather characteristic of Tschaikowski. Of course many moments of rare beauty are evolved in the meanwhile, notably in the second movement, andante cantabile, and the last, andante maestoso. The andante maestoso is full of those suggestions of Titanic dignity and power of the master. One who could also touch the fount of human emotion so intimately in the famous lamentoso of the Sixth Symphony.

Attempts have been made by commentators to attach some literal or psychological programme to this masterpiece. Tschaikowski, as is shown in his earlier works, undoubtedly sought to give his music spiritual significance. And so the struggle of man against fate looms forth in the crucial portions of the symphony, while in denouements, where the tone is vague and subdued and the coloring dark, the composer seems lost in a nebulous, impenetrable mist of philosophy and contemplation.

In Weber's overture to "Oberon" the orchestra was less fortunate. Fiedler's inclination to hurry the tempo marred the beauties of the piece in many parts. The same tendency was apparent in the last number of Grieg's Peer Gynt suite, "In the Hall of the Mountain King." The fragmentary phrase rises in a steady crescendo to a legitimate fortissimo, which Fiedler failed to meet because of a far too rapid reading of the score. The other numbers of the suite, "Death of Ase," "Dance of Anitra" and "Morning," were given with pleasing results. "Morning," for some unknown reason, is usually omitted from the suite. Surely it possesses that equable charm of melody and rhythm so often found in the works of Grieg.

Strauss' "Till Eulenspiel" was the concluding feature on the programme.

The presence of Charles Gilibert as soloist of the evening added little to the enjoyment of the concert. Those in the audience who heard this admirable artist in "Louise" were much disappointed by his singing of a number of songs in a manner not by any means above criticism. His selections were: "Air of the Drom," from Thomas' "The Cadi;" "Loin de sa Femme," from Massenet's "Griseldis," and Bordes' "Dansons la Gigue."

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 13 1909

MUSICAL.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Its First Brooklyn Concert of the Season.

There was every indication at the first concert of the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night that these concerts will be upheld in public favor in the high place that has distinguished them in the estimation of those who support the best musical affairs. Whatever may be the public attitude toward other musical undertakings in Brooklyn this season and there will be many more than ever before), there is no sign of any falling off in the support of this series. Of course there is no reason for any falling off other than the possibility that attention might be divided with other attractions. Conservative loyalty to anything that has once been accepted for approval is one of Brooklyn's characteristics. With respect to these concerts it believes apparently in holding fast to that which is good. They have long stood for what is best in their class, and Brooklyn seems disposed to uphold them in maintaining this standing.

The seating capacity of the Academy of Music, including all the boxes, had been disposed of, and Conductor Fiedler and his men were greeted by an audience that found much pleasure in the renewed acquaintance which the concert introduced for the season. The programme was well calculated to meet whatever anticipation of pleasure the audience may have had, offering as it did music of approved excellence, whose varying qualities of orchestral voicing commended themselves definitely to appreciation. The orchestra played the overture to Weber's "Oberon"; Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony; Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite and Richard Strauss' freakish tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

All of these are what may be called more or less familiar to concert goers, and even if they were not, each has the individuality to make a striking appeal to the listener. Having held its own for nearly a century, the Weber overture is still esteemed as a model. The Tschaikowsky symphony is one of the popular revelations of the great Russian composer's creative fancy which so often expressed itself in the sombre mood that pervades this work. Many of the themes are based upon the Russian folk songs, and they are used with an emphasis upon their intrinsic musical worth, with a lucidity of utterance that gives to the musical form a singular vitality as to feeling. The principal theme of the first movement is used again in the last movement, and the symphony is a notable example of the themes of one movement being repeated in the others, giving the work an unusual coherency in this respect. It is all a very poignant disclosure of symphonic writing. It is not often that one can hear the "Peer Gynt" suite played by such an orchestra, this music being left generall yto the consideration of orchestras devoted to a less serious purpose and to piano players. It is good to hear this music played as it was last night, however, so that the public may get a clear idea of what it stands for as a happy expression of originality. The Strauss tone poem is entertaining as a curiosity in musical composition by one with a masterly understanding of what the orchestra could do.

Altogether it was a programme of orchestral music that could have stood very well alone for this first concert without the assistance of a soloist, in accordance with the custom that has prevailed. There was a departure from this custom last night. Just why does not appear, especially as the orchestral list was ample enough to provide sufficient enjoyment for the evening. Charles Gilibert, the French baritone of the Manhattan Opera House, sang the drum major's song from Thomas' "The Cadi"; the devil's air from Massenet's "Griselidis," and Bordes "Danson la Gigue," and sang them very well, although his style of singing is essentially for the operatic stage and not exactly suited to the concert platform. Mr. Gilibert is a competent artist, and his singing was entertaining, even though it did not fit perfectly into last night's concert scheme, if the matter may be considered with regard for the ethics of concert giving and programme making. There are occasions when orchestral music may be allowed to stand alone for what it is worth, and last night's concert was one of them. As a whole, there could be no doubt that the oncert made a very favorable impression.

...ess .....
NOV 27 1909

The second Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, December 10, will bring as soloist the greatly admired American pianist, Olga Samaroff, who will play Liszt's concerto in E-flat major. The orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and Goldmark's charming symphony, "The Rustic Wedding," and the prelude, and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde."

[54]

TRIBUNE
New York City.
NOV 28 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 9, and Saturday afternoon, December 11. The soloist at the Thursday evening concert will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, who will play the Schumann concerto in A minor. The symphony will be Vincent d'Indy's in B flat major, No. 2, last heard here four years ago, when it was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of the composer himself. The third number will be Tschaikowsky's ballet suite, "Nut Cracker." On Saturday afternoon there will be two soloists, Mme. Schumann-Heink and Georges Longy, the solo oboe of the orchestra. Mme. Schumann-Heink will sing the "Sextus" recitative and aria from "Titus" and Gounod's "Stances de Sapho," while Mr. Longy will play Handel's concerto for oboe and string orchestra. The purely orchestral works will be Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride," and Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony in F minor, Op. 36.

Daily ...izen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 24 1909

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has just finished its first regular monthly trip, giving a concert each in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and Hartford, and two concerts in Manhattan. The assisting artists on this trip were Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist, who then made his first appearance in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Hartford; Gilibert, the French baritone, and Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, soprano. It is a gratifying fact to the friends of Boston's orchestra that despite the decided increase in the number of concerts and in the number of operatic performances everywhere, the patronage given to the orchestra not only shows no sign of falling off, but shows an increase over previous years. Mr. Fiedler in his programmes produced two important novelties, one being Max Reger's "Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy" and the other being Granville Bantock's charming overture, "The Pierrot of the Minute." Among the important novelties to be produced by the orchestra in Boston in the next four weeks are Frederick Delius' night piece, "Paris," and Sibelius' symphonic poem, "En Saga."

...om .....
Address .....
NOV 10 1909

CLASSIC MUSIC SEASON OPENS

Boston Symphony Appears In the "New Lyric" This Evening.

The opening of the local classical musical season will take place tonight when the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first public appearance this season. Augmented by several violinists and cellists of note, the orchestra will give a program of ancient compositions.

Max Fielder, who conducts the orchestra this season, said this afternoon that without a doubt the program he has arranged will be a revelation to the Baltimore lovers of instrumental music. The chief interpretations will be from Wagner, while two of Rubenstein's compositions will be given by request.

At this evening's concert Baltimoreans will have the pleasure of hearing for the first time Serge Rachmaninoff, the famous Russian pianist. He will be the soloist.

The interior of the Lyric has been extensively renovated. The decorations are in red, green and purple with an abundance of gold for coloring. The boxes have been arranged in a semi-circle and the stage has been enlarged. That there will be a crowded house was made known today when Albaugh's ticket office, on Fayette st., was besieged with patrons demanding reserved seats.

---

er Cutting Bureau in the World
Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
NOV 27 1909

The second Boston Symphony concert which wil be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Dec. 10 will bring as soloist the pianist, Olga Samaroff, who will play Liszt's "Egmont" overture, Goldmark's charming symphony "The Rustic Wedding" and the prelude and "Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde."

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

New York City.

NOV 15 1904

Boston Symphony Concert.

A BRILLIANT and highly enjoyable concert was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday at its first matinee of the season in Carnegie Hall. Seldom, if ever, has the Boston organization been in finer form and played with greater sonority or purity in the mass or with a nearer approach to absolute perfection in details. But technical excellence was not all there was to arouse admiration. Under the direction of Mr. Fiedler the band discoursed in the terms of Schumann and Strauss with an elo-

(Copyright by A. Dupont.)

FRITZ KREISLER,

soloist with the Symphony Society.

...ce that evoked a thrilling response ... left an impression of plastic beauty ...usly arrayed.

...e programme opened with a novelty, "The Pierrot of the Minute," a comedy overture by Granville Bantock. This was followed by Schumann's symphony No. 2 in C major. Serge Rachmaninoff, the eminent Russian composer and pianist, was the soloist, making on this occasion his début in this city. He played his second concerto in C minor, a work which has been heard here a number of times in recent years. Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan" was the concluding number.

The Bantock overture is a musical illustration of a dramatic fantasy by Ernest Dowson, the English poet, whose early death occurred a decade ago.

The composer has attained a foremost place among living English musicians, but his works are little known here. The overture is successful as the embodiment of a poetic concept that is delicately fantastic and prettily unreal. The musical material of which it is made is slight as gossamer, but although not especially striking, it is appropriate and evinces a power of characterization. The Pierrot is unmistakable in the nimble vivacious motive at the beginning, while the love episode with the Moon Maiden has lyric charm, and affords a pleasing contrast. The scoring is effective. The work was played with delicate finish of execution and captivating grace of style, which were wholly admirable in themselves, and which revealed the essential character of the composition to perfection.

...lectively possess ... entirely the ... method of writing ... orchestra, and if there were opaque spots in the symphony played on Saturday, they must be laid to the composer. The work was finely played; with great breadth and nobility in the first and lase movements, and with melting tenderness in the beautiful adagio. Indeed, the slow movement was altogether lovely in its blending of technical excellence with exquisite expressiveness.

The Rachmanioff concert has attained a very considerable amount of popularity, chiefly, one suspects, because it is one that appeals to the virtuoso on account of the opportunities it affords for making brilliant effects, and its gratefulness to the player. In spite of this it has not made hitherto a profound impression. The interpretation of it on Saturday, being authoritative, may be taken probably as exposing all that there is in this work. Mr. Rachmaninoff played it with conviction and con amore, and made portions of it stand forth as musically significant and beautiful. The first movement, it must be confessed, after a promising beginning, is worked out in a disappointing manner. The second movement, as the composer played it, was charming, however, and the last movement was not without stirring effect.

The applause was enthusiastic and prolonged to the close, and the pianist composer was recalled nearly a dozen times.

As a performer, Mr. Rachmaninoff is worthy of very serious consideration. In his style he resembles Siloti, who made a concert tour of this country some years ago, and of whom Rachmaninoff is ... and a cousin. Tall and of massive frame, with a leanness suggestive of great strength and endurance, he has the physique for any task at the keyboard. Of digital facility he possesses apparently more than a sufficiency, although his passage work on Saturday was not of remarkable brilliance, and he obtains big sonorous effects with ease. His tone is musical, considerably varied, and when he chooses, round and full, and of a beautiful crystalline quality. His style is broad and simple, his phrasing authoritative, artistic, and convincing. Withal, he gives the touch of poetic feeling that vitalizes.

It is not easy to believe that any one who heard the performance of the "Don Juan" tone poem could say that Richard Strauss cannot write music—music in the old sense of beautiful melody. Of course this is an early work—it was first performed in 1889—but it is Strauss, and it is melody from beginning to end. It was magnificently played by Mr. Fiedler and his men with fire, eloquence, and passion and with magnificent sonority and color. The audience was large and enthusiastic.

NEWS

Baltimore, Md.

NOV 10

The Boston Symphony concert will be well attended this evening. The music lovers will be out in force. Many have seats for the season, among them Mr. and Mrs. W. W. Spence, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Marburg, Mrs. David Bartlett, Mr. and Mrs. Douglas H. Gordon, Mrs. G. H. Martin and Mr. and Mrs. Howard Bland.

SUN

Baltimore, Md.

NOV 10 190

SOCIETY IN WASHINGTON

Mrs. Taft Attends The First Boston Symphony Concert.

[Special Dispatch to the Baltimore Sun.]

Washington, Nov. 9.—Mrs. Taft occupied the Presidential box in the National Theatre this afternoon at the Boston Symphony Concert. She was accompanied by Mrs. Rae, widow of Rear-Admiral Rae; Mrs. McClintock, Miss Mabel Boardman and Mrs. Louis More, of Cincinnati, guests at the White House. Other boxes were occupied by the German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff and their daughter, Countess Luise Alexandra; Mrs. Leiter, who had with her Mrs. Norman Williams, Mrs. John R. McLean, Mrs. Wallingford, of Cincinnati, sister of Representative Longworth; Miss Kellogg, of Utica, guest of Mrs. Leiter, and Miss Dorothy Williams, sister of Mrs. Joseph Leiter; Mr. and Mrs. Archibald Hopkins and Doctor and Mrs. B. M. Randolph, Mrs. Calderon Carlisle and her daughter-in-law, Mrs. Mandeville Carlisle, and Miss Carlisle; Mrs. Carter, wife of Senator Carter; Mrs. C. A. Williams and Mrs. Williams, Mrs. Clover and the Misses

Daily Eagle,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

NOV 13 1904

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Great Audience and a Programme With Tschaikowsky, Weber, Grieg and Strauss.

Brooklyn was true to its old love last night. The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the winter here and every seat in the Academy was occupied, even those of the third tier boxes, from which a glimpse of the stage is almost or quite impossible.

There were vacant seats for the opening of the opera season, but for the few subscribers who resign from the Boston concerts dozens rush forward to take their places. That devotion is an evidence of the intelligence and taste of Brooklyn, for never was a better orchestra anywhere. Last night it was in the absolute pink of condition. Mr. Fiedler had crowded 75 of his 87 men upon the stage and the quality of tone throughout the evening was such as can be heard from no other band. Coming after a summer's fast, the playing gave unstinted delight to the great audience and the programme was happily balanced.

The footlights were banked in flowers and when the concert opened with the "Oberon" overture of Weber, the soft horn call realized Tennyson's lines:

> And faint and far from cliff and scar,
> The horns of elf land, faintly blowing.

The playing had just the exquisite touch to suggest fairyland and when the crashing chord brought the dreamy prelude to an end the crash ceased with a suddenness and unity which is one of the manifold perfections of this band. The romantic spirit of Weber attuned the audience to an evening of enjoyment. Then came the one incursion of the programme into the world's great music. The selection was Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony. If that work does not storm the heights of tragedy or reveal the depths of suffering with such poignancy as does his sixth or "Pathetic" symphony, it is yet more intimately interwoven with the life of the most pathetic of the great figures of the closing period of the nineteenth century. This theme of dread, or impending doom, which recurs again and again after its first declaration in the second movement brings up the man's haunting fear that, at 48, he had written himself out and that this work would prove to have nothing but the dry husks of his former powers. To understand his amazing humility about the work—in the face of its reception last evening or the effect it produces upon any contemporary audience—his perfect readiness to believe that "there is something repellant, something superfluous, patchy and insincere which the public instinctively recognizes," one needs the picture of the man himself which some of us got when Tschaikowsky led one of his symphonies at a Damrosch festival in Carnegie Hall in the early nineties. He led not with any such finesse as Fiedler devotes to his music, but with abundant energy and he stood among the musicians a big, simple man of the type of the New England farmer. Between the movements of the symphony he mopped his bald head with a big red bandana as unconcernedly as a farmer might who had dropped his scythe of a hot morning. He looked the last man in the world to have delusions of grandeur or even illusions of greatness about himself, and that he should have been quite ready to believe this noble music worthless when audiences were slow to accept it, adds to one's respect for the man as well as to the admiration for his genius.

The slow acceptance of masterpieces is an old and ever recurrent story, but it seemed strange last night that the two lovely themes of the first movement did not attract audiences from the first. Perhaps it was because the music encountered no Boston orchestra and no Fiedler for its interpretation in tones of velvety softness in the strings and a richness like ripe fruit in the clarinets. And perhaps the strenuous working out drove the melodies out of the ears of the early hearers. The development is full of the clash and strife of great bodies of tone which Tschaikowsky loved because he was Russian, and which his German admirers wished to civilize out of him, as a preliminary to true German greatness.

The second movement of this symphony, played slowly and with great restraint as well as beautiful balance last night, seemed to reach the limits of the musical expression of pathos and foreboding. It is one of those things before which words are feeble.

The waltz, which is used for a scherzo, is as unlike the Viennese ideal of a waltz as anything in waltz time can be, and is as Russian as all the rest of it. Its short-lived gayety has a note of wild suddenness in place of the sensuous beauty which is the aim of most waltzes. The last movement has still more of the strife of tones and less of melody than the preceding, and last night it came to a magnificent climax.

As a contrast to Tschaikowsky, nothing could be better than Grieg, with his gentleness and beauty. The numbers chosen last evening were from one of the "Peer Gynt" suites, and included the "Death of Ase," "Anita's Dance" and "In the Hall of the Mountain King," where Peer sees the gnomes. Nothing needs to be said at this late day about that music. Last night its performance was of a piece with everything the orchestra touched, of most delicate and elusive beauty. The concert closed with Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," which used to sound more waggish, or, perhaps, more crazy, when Theodore Thomas introduced it to us years ago. But we had not had the Strauss symphonic poems then, nor Debussy. The comment suggested last night was that Till must have been an uncommonly graceful rogue, if he always moved as suavely as Mr. Fiedler led his men through the musical record of his doings. It was waggery married to elegance.

The perfect blending of humor with elegance was shown by the soloist of the evening, Charles Gilibert, who sang the famous "Drum Major Song," by Ambroise Thomas, and songs by Massenet and Bordes. Mr. Gilibert, in concert, is as little like an opera singer as one can imagine, and he sings with the distinction and finish of the finest concert artist. His songs were very greatly to the liking of the audience, and their humor and the singer's served to avert strain in a programme which otherwise might have been thought a little long. It is to be noted that the singer's success was made because he knows how to sing. His voice is a little hard and dry, but his singing is so perfect, his humor is so ingratiating, that you hardly stop to realize the quality of the tone itself. It was a triumph of art over natural disadvantages.

PRESS

Pittsburg, Pa.

NOV 7 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON.

Nearly all the subscription sales in the various cities, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives a series of concerts, are closed, and the great organization is assured of the most prosperous season in its history, which also indicates that the musical season in general is to be the best this country has ever enjoyed. Besides the 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts in Boston, the seats to which are sold auction, and this year realized a much greater sum than last, the Boston Symphony gives subscription concerts in Cambridge, Providence, Worcester, Hartford, New Bedford, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. In all of these cities the houses are nearly sold out for the season, and this despite that never in the history of the United States has there been so much musical activity as there is this year. The subscription sale for the 10 concerts in New York is particularly gratifying, because it demonstrates once more how firmly established Boston's orchestra has become in the affections of the musical public of the metropolis.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address ..... BROOKLYN, N. Y.

Date ..... NOV 20 1909

THE initial concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Opera House brought to the Academy of Music on Friday evening of last week the large and fashionable audience which is always a marked feature of these musical events. There was hearty applause for Mr. Fiedler and also for the soloist of the evening, Charles Gilibert. The latter's songs gave intense delight. Few opera singers can render simple songs with the rare art that he displays. Particularly charming was his rendering of the "Drum Major Song" by Ambrose Thomas. He was also heard in songs by Massenet and Bordes. For beauty of tone there is no orchestra in this country which compares in the minds of most music lovers with the Boston Symphony and last Friday evening it gave of its best, particularly in the Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony.

POST, NOVEMBER 28, 1909

Two soloists, Mme. Schumann-Heink and Mr. Georges Longy, first oboe of the orchestra, will appear at the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra this week. No symphonic work presented by Mr. Fiedler during his engagement here seems to have made a more profound impression than the second symphony of D'Indy, played on the 5th and 6th of the month. In accordance with many requests, this symphony will be repeated next Friday and Saturday. Mme. Schumann-Heink's numbers will consist of the "Vitellia" recitative and aria from Mozart's "Titus," and Gounod's "Stances of Sapho." Mr. Longy will play a concerto by Handel for oboe and string orchestra, which has not been heard at the Symphony concerts since Mr. Sautet played it in the early spring of 1888. Wagner's "Huldigung smarsch" will bring the end.

[55]

GLOBE & COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,

New York City.

ss. NOV 1 1909

Boston Symphony Concert.

A BRILLIANT and highly enjoyable concert was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday at its first matinée of the season in Carnegie Hall. Seldom, if ever, has the Boston organization been in finer form and played with greater sonority or purity in the mass or with a nearer approach to absolute perfection in details. But technical excellence was not all there was to arouse admiration. Under the direction of Mr. Fiedler the band discoursed in the terms of Schumann and Strauss with an elo-

(Copyright by A. Dupont.)

FRITZ KREISLER,

Violin soloist with the Symphony Society.

quence that evoked a thrilling response and left an impression of plastic beauty gorgeously arrayed.

The programme opened with a novelty, "The Pierrot of the Minute," a comedy overture by Granville Bantock. This was followed by Schumann's symphony No. 2 in C major. Serge Rachmaninoff, the eminent Russian composer and pianist, was the soloist, making on this occasion his début in this city. He played his second concerto in C minor, a work which has been heard here a number of times in recent years. Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan" was the concluding number.

The Bantock overture is a musical illustration of a dramatic fantasy by Ernest Dowson, the English poet, whose early death occurred a decade ago.

The composer has attained a foremost place among living English musicians, but his works are little known here. The overture is successful as the embodiment of a poetic concept that is delicately fantastic and prettily unreal. The musical material of which it is made is slight as gossamer, but although not especially striking, it is appropriate and evinces a power of characterization. The Pierrot is unmistakable in the nimble vivacious motive at the beginning, while the love episode with the Moon Maiden has lyric charm, and affords a pleasing contrast. The scoring is effective. The work was played with delicate finish of execution and captivating grace of style, which were wholly admirable in themselves, and which revealed the essential character of the composition to perfection.

the Boston orchestra individually and collectively possess cannot eliminate entirely the turgidity of Schumann's method of writing for the orchestra, and if there were opaque spots in the symphony played on Saturday, they must be laid to the composer. The work was finely played; with great breadth and nobility in the first and lase movements, and with melting tenderness in the beautiful adagio. Indeed, the slow movement was altogether lovely in its blending of technical excellence with exquisite expressiveness.

The Rachmanioff concert has attained a very considerable amount of popularity, chiefly, one suspects, because it is one that appeals to the virtuoso on account of the opportunities it affords for making brilliant effects, and its gratefulness to the player. In spite of this it has not made hitherto a profound impression. The interpretation of it on Saturday, being authoritative, may be taken probably as exposing all that there is in this work. Mr. Rachmaninoff played it with conviction and con amore, and made portions of it stand forth as musically significant and beautiful. The first movement, it must be confessed, after a promising beginning, is worked out in a disappointing manner. The second movement, as the composer played it, was charming, however, and the last movement was not without stirring effect.

The applause was enthusiastic and prolonged to the close, and the pianist composer was recalled nearly a dozen times.

As a performer, Mr. Rachmaninoff is worthy of very serious consideration. In his style he resembles Siloti, who made a concert tour of this country some years ago, and of whom Rachmaninoff is a pupil and a cousin. Tall and of massive frame, with a leanness suggestive of great strength and endurance, he has the physique for any task at the keyboard. Of digital facility he possesses apparently more than a sufficiency, although his passage work on Saturday was not of remarkable brilliance, and he obtains big sonorous effects with ease. His tone is musical, considerably varied, and when he chooses, round and full, and of a beautiful crystalline quality. His style is broad and simple, his phrasing authoritative, artistic, and convincing. Withal, he gives the touch of poetic feeling that vitalizes.

It is not easy to believe that any one who heard the performance of the "Don Juan" tone poem could say that Richard Strauss cannot write music—music in the old sense of beautiful melody. Of course this is an early work—it was first performed in 1889—but it is Strauss, and it is melody from beginning to end. It was magnificently played by Mr. Fiedler and his men with fire, eloquence, and passion and with magnificent sonority and color. The audience was large and enthusiastic.

NEWS

ss Baltimore, Md.

The Boston Symphony concert will be well attended this evening. The music lovers will be out in force. Many have seats for the season, among them Mr. and Mrs. W. W. Spence, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Marburg, Mrs. David Bartlett, Mr. and Mrs. Douglas H. Gordon, Mrs. G. H. Martin and Mr. and Mrs. Howard Bland.

SUN

ss Baltimore, Md.

NOV 10 1909

SOCIETY IN WASHINGTON

Mrs. Taft Attends The First Boston Symphony Concert.

[Special Dispatch to the Baltimore Sun.]

Washington, Nov. 9.—Mrs. Taft occupied the Presidential box in the National Theatre this afternoon at the Boston Symphony Concert. She was accompanied by Mrs. Rae, widow of Rear-Admiral Rae; Mrs. McClintock, Miss Mabel Boardman and Mrs. Louis More, of Cincinnati, guests at the White House. Other boxes were occupied by the German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff and their daughter, Countess Luise Alexandra; Mrs. Leiter, who had with her Mrs. Norman Williams, Mrs. John R. McLean, Mrs. Wallingford, of Cincinnati, sister of Representative Longworth; Miss Kellogg, of Utica, guest of Mrs. Leiter, and Miss Dorothy Williams, sister of Mrs. Joseph Leiter; Mr. and Mrs. Archibald Hopkins and Doctor and Mrs. B. M. Randolph, Mrs. Calderon Carlisle and her daughter-in-law, Mrs. Mandeville Carlisle, and Miss Carlisle; Mrs. Carter, wife of Senator Carter; Mrs. C. A. Williams and Miss Williams, Mrs. Clover and the Misses

Daily Eagle,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

NOV 13 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Great Audience and a Programme with Tschaikowsky, Weber, Grieg and Strauss.

Brooklyn was true to its old love last night. The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the winter here and every seat in the Academy was occupied, even those of the third tier boxes, from which a glimpse of the stage is almost or quite impossible.

There were vacant seats for the opening of the opera season, but for the few subscribers who resign from the Boston concerts dozens rush forward to take their places. That devotion is an evidence of the intelligence and taste of Brooklyn, for never was a better orchestra anywhere. Last night it was in the absolute pink of condition. Mr. Fiedler had crowded 75 of his 97 men upon the stage and the quality of tone throughout the evening was such as can be heard from no other band. Coming after a summer's fast, the playing gave unstinted delight to the great audience and the programme was happily balanced.

The footlights were banked in flowers and when the concert opened with the "Oberon" overture of Weber, the soft horn call realized Tennyson's lines:

> And faint and far from cliff and scar,
> The horns of elf land, faintly blowing.

The playing had just the exquisite touch to suggest fairyland and when the crashing chord brought the dreamy prelude to an end the crash ceased with a suddenness and unity which is one of the manifold perfections of this band. The romantic spirit of Weber attuned the audience to an evening of enjoyment. Then came the one incursion of the programme into the world's great music. The selection was Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony. If that work does not storm the heights of tragedy or reveal the depths of suffering with such poignancy as does his sixth or "Pathetic" symphony, it is yet more intimately interwoven with the life of the most pathetic of the great figures of the closing period of the nineteenth century. This theme of dread, or impending doom, which recurs again and again after its first declaration in the second movement brings up the man's haunting fear that, at 48, he had written himself out and that this work would prove to have nothing but the dry husks of his former powers. To understand his amazing humility about the work—in the face of its reception last evening or the effect it produces upon any contemporary audience—his perfect readiness to believe that "there is something repellant, something superfluous, patchy and insincere which the public instinctively recognizes," one needs the picture of the man himself which some of us got when Tschaikowsky led one of his symphonies at a Damrosch festival in Carnegie Hall in the early nineties. He led not with any such finesse as Fiedler devotes to his music, but with abundant energy and he stood among the musicians a big, simple man of the type of the New England farmer. Between the movements of the symphony he mopped his bald head with a big red bandana as unconcernedly as a farmer might who had dropped his scythe of a hot morning. He looked the last man in the world to have delusions of grandeur or even illusions of greatness about himself, and that he should have been quite ready to believe this noble music worthless when audiences were slow to accept it, adds to one's respect for the man as well as to the admiration for his genius.

The slow acceptance of masterpieces is an old and ever recurrent story, but it seemed strange last night that the two lovely themes of the first movement did not attract audiences from the first. Perhaps it was because the music encountered no Boston orchestra and no Fiedler for its interpretation in tones of velvety softness in the strings and a richness like ripe fruit in the clarinets. And perhaps the strenuous working out drove the melodies out of the ears of the early hearers. The development is full of the clash and strife of great bodies of tone which Tschaikowsky loved because he was Russian, and which his German admirers wished to civilize out of him, as a preliminary to true German greatness.

The second movement of this symphony, played slowly and with great restraint as well as beautiful balance last night, seemed to reach the limits of the musical expression of pathos and foreboding. It is one of those things before which words are feeble.

The waltz, which is used for a scherzo, is as unlike the Viennese ideal of a waltz as anything in waltz time can be, and is as Russian as all the rest of it. Its short-lived gayety has a note of wild suddenness in place of the sensuous beauty which is the aim of most waltzes. The last movement has still more of the strife of tones and less of melody than the preceding, and last night it came to a magnificent climax.

As a contrast to Tschaikowsky, nothing could be better than Grieg, with his gentleness and beauty. The numbers chosen last evening were from one of the "Peer Gynt" suites, and included the "Death of Ase," "Anita's Dance" and "In the Hall of the Mountain King," where Peer sees the gnomes. Nothing needs to be said at this late day about that music. Last night its performance was of a piece with everything the orchestra touched, of most delicate and elusive beauty. The concert closed with Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," which used to sound more waggish, or, perhaps, more crazy, when Theodore Thomas introduced it to us years ago. But we had not had the Strauss symphonic poems then, nor Debussy. The comment suggested last night was that Till must have been an uncommonly graceful rogue, if he always moved as suavely as Mr. Fiedler led his men through the musical record of his doings. it was waggery married to elegance.

The perfect blending of humor with elegance was shown by the soloist of the evening, Charles Gilibert, who sang the famous "Drum Major Song," by Ambroise Thomas, and songs by Massenet and Bordes. Mr. Gilibert, in concert, is as little like an opera singer as one can imagine, and he sings with the distinction and finish of the finest concert artist. His songs were very greatly to the liking of the audience, and their humor and the singer's served to avert strain in a programme which otherwise might have been thought a little long. It is to be noted that the singer's success was made because he knows how to sing. His voice is a little hard and dry, but his singing is so perfect, his humor is so ingratiating, that you hardly stop to realize the quality of the tone itself. It was a triumph of art over natural disadvantages.

PRESS

Pittsburg, Pa.

NOV 7 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON.

Nearly all the subscription sales in the various cities, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives a series of concerts, are closed, and the great organization is assured of the most prosperous season in its history, which also indicates that the musical season in general is to be the best this country has ever enjoyed. Besides the 24 public rehearsals and 24 concerts in Boston, the seats to which are sold auction, and this year realized a much greater sum than last, the Boston Symphony gives subscription concerts in Cambridge, Providence, Worcester, Hartford, New Bedford, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. In all of these cities the houses are nearly sold out for the season, and this despite that never in the history of the United States has there been so much musical activity as there is this year. The subscription sale for the 10 concerts in New York is particularly gratifying, because it demonstrates once more how firmly established Boston's orchestra has become in the affections of the musical public of the metropolis.

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address ..... BROOKLYN, N. Y.

Date ..... NOV 20 1909

THE initial concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Opera House brought to the Academy of Music on Friday evening of last week the large and fashionable audience which is always a marked feature of these musical events. There was hearty applause for Mr. Fiedler and also for the soloist of the evening, Charles Gilibert. The latter's songs gave intense delight. Few opera singers can render simple songs with the rare art that he displays. Particularly charming was his rendering of the "Drum Major Song" by Ambrose Thomas. He was also heard in songs by Massenet and Bordes. For beauty of tone there is no orchestra in this country which compares in the minds of most music lovers with the Boston Symphony and last Friday evening it gave of its best, particularly in the Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony.

POST, NOVEMBER 28, 1909

Two soloists, Mme. Schumann-Heink and Mr. Georges Longy, first oboe of the orchestra, will appear at the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra this week. No symphonic work presented by Mr. Fiedler during his engagement here seems to have made a more profound impression than the second symphony of D'Indy, played on the 5th and 6th of the month. In accordance with many requests, this symphony will be repeated next Friday and Saturday. Mme. Schumann-Heink's numbers will consist of the "Vitellia" recitative and aria from Mozart's "Titus," and Gounod's "Stances of Sapho." Mr. Longy will play a concerto by Handel for oboe and string orchestra, which has not been heard at the Symphony concerts since Mr. Sautet played it in the early spring of 1888. Wagner's "Huldigung smarsch" will bring the end.

[55]

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From THE [illegible]

Address [illegible]

Date NOV 28 1909

The Glory Is Partly Brady's.

Few recent theatrical announcements have aroused so much comment as that made on Friday to the effect that Grace George had been picked by the directors of the New Theatre for the role of Lady Teazle; and—something that is not often the case when an uncommon honor falls to the lot of a player—the comment was in the words and tone of hearty commendation. Everybody who is keeping an eye on the doings of what Henry Miller calls the "gilded incubator" in Central Park West, expected that the revival of "The School for Scandal" would be made the opportunity for both Julia Marlowe as Lady Teazle and E. H. Sothern as either Sir Peter Teazle or Charles Surface, to atone for their mishaps in "Antony and Cleopatra."

Instead, Winthrop Ames jumped over the high stone wall which another of the directors spent a year or more in erecting between the New Theatre and the interests of the Theatrical Syndicate, and gave Lady Teazle to Miss George. She thus will be the central figure in the first and most important old comedy revival to be made in the New Theatre.

The writer is in hearty agreement with the views expressed by one theatrical man—that Miss George's special engagement in the New Theatre is a crown of the greenest laurel less for her than for her manager-husband, William A. Brady. "For Miss George," said the man in question, "this is merely logical recognition of the real distinction she has attained as a comedienne, nor she arrived, distinctly and unqualifiedly, when, three years ago, she followed her New York success in 'Divorcons' with an equally great success in the same role in London. But it took years of devoted application on Brady's part to win general indorsement of his own unwavering belief in her. A man of less indomitable will would have quit after the fiasco of plays like 'Countess Chiffon,' her first starring piece, and 'Her Majesty,' which soon followed. Nor did the crowds rally around her in 'Under Southern Skies,' 'Frou-Frou,' and 'Abigail.' It was not until Brady placed her at the head of the all-star cast of 'The Two Orphans' in 1904 that she received her first serious hearing. That she should now be selected for what is, in nearly all respects, the most interesting undertaking of the New Theatre's first season, is only a fitting reward for the years of hard work which Brady has devoted to her interests."

MUSIC NOTES

The second pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, December 9, and Saturday afternoon, December 11. The soloist at the Thursday evening concert will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, who will play the Schumann Concerto in A Minor. The symphony will be Vincent d'Indy's in B Flat Major No. 2, last heard here four years ago, when it was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of the composer himself. The third number will be Tschaikowsky's charming ballet suite, "Nut Cracker."

On Saturday afternoon there will be two soloists, Madame Schumann-Heink and Mr. Georges Longy, the justly admired solo oboe of the orchestra. Madame Schumann-Heink will sing the "Sextus" Recitative and Aria from "Titus" and Gounod's "Stances de Sapho," while Mr. Longy will play Haendel's Concerto for Oboe and String Orchestra. The purely orchestral works will be Smetana's overture, "The Sold Bride," and Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony in F Minor, Opus 36.

AMERICAN STAR

Baltimore, Md.

NOV 11 1909

ORCHESTRA GREETED BY BIG AUDIENCE

Scene at Lyric Last Night Dispelled Idea That Opera Would Absorb All Interest.

PROGRAM OF GREAT CONTRAST IS PRESENTED

Mons. Rochmaninoff Makes His First Appearance Before Baltimoreans.

If the persons who objected to having opera in Baltimore this winter, on the ground that it would paralyze other musical events, attended the concert given at the Lyric last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, their minds were disabused of the impression, for the hall was filled to overflowing by a brilliant and appreciative audience. Mr. Fielder, who is again director of the orchestra, conducted the following program, and Monsignor Serge Rachmaninoff, pianist, was the soloist:

Overture to the opera "Der Freischutz" .....Weber

Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73. Brahms

I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Adagio non troppo.
III. Adagietto grazioso, quasi andantino.
IV. Allegro con spirito.

Second concerto for pianoforte with orchestra, Op. 18.....Rachmaninoff

I. Moderato.
II. Adagio Sostenuto.
III. Allegro Scherzando.

"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the Old-fashioned Roguish Manner—in Rondo Form." Op. 28. Richard Strauss

It would have been difficult to arrange a program with an eye to greater contrast. From the Weber overture to the Strauss tone-poem is a far cry, and the symphony and the concerto were also diverse in every way. The "Der Freischutz" overture has been played here frequently in the last five years, and it is so familiar that there is no occasion to dwell upon it. Mr. Fielder's reading of it was careful and the tone balance always good.

The Brahms cymphony in D major was played here by the same orchestra two or three years ago. It is less philosophical, one might say, than the C minor symphony by the same composer, which was given last winter, and is therefore more interesting. The third movement, in minuet time, which is perhaps the most beautiful of all, was delightfully played.

M. Rachmaninoff and his concerto are equally hard to describe, both being so utterly unlike anything previously met with in either line. In appearance the pianist suggests a boilermaker rather than a musician, as he is tall and well built, with huge hands and hair close cropped. He was a pupil of the late Tschaikowski and is said to idolize the memory of his teacher. Last night was his first appearance in Baltimore, but it is to be hoped that we may hear him again in a program better designed to show off his ability. He played with great vigor, but without any astonishing display of technique and at times his tone sounded forced, but on the whole he gave a finished and well balanced performance, which the audience appreciated to the point of recalling him seven or eight times.

The concerto itself is not a particularly satisfactory piece of work. It has some very beautiful movements, but a large part of the time the piano is altogether too subservient to the orchestra. The form of the first movement is very involved, but the second and third movements contain some exquisite passages, and are, both of them, more easy to follow.

"Till Eulenspiegel" has some of the best of Strauss in it. The instrumentation is unique, though less so perhaps than the "Heldenleben" or "Tod und Verklarung."

J. A. H.

from NEWS

address Baltimore, Md.

date NOV 11 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY ACHIEVES TRIUMPH

Fiedler's Great Orchestra Interprets Masters Of Musical Art.

We have, during the last few weeks, had several musical functions of great interest, which have, however, seemed but preliminaries to the coming season's tour through regions of tonal imagination—some familiar and others unexplored. It requires a great event, like an orchestral performance, to cast us loose from our old moorings, and to direct our gaze and longings out toward the infinite—the source of high musical experiences. The nobility and exhaustless variety of the orchestral tone qualities fill our imaginations with Wanderlust, stirring them from comfortable lethargy to tingling activity. As the audience came out of the Lyric last evening, after the performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there were no unquickened faces to be seen; a great orchestra had successfully exercised its spell.

Mr. Fiedler's program was well chosen and properly arranged. The symphony was presented to untired listeners, having been given the second place on the list. No one can appreciate a long, earnest symphony after having heard an hour or more of orchestral music. The program was:

Weber—Overture to the opera "Der Freischutz."

Brahms—Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73.
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Adagio non troppo.
III. Adagietto grazioso, quasi andantino.
IV. Allegro con spirito.

Rachmaninoff—Second Concerto for Pianoforte with Orchestra. Op. 18.
I. Moderato.
II. Adagio Sostenuto.
III. Allegro Scherzando.

Richard Strauss—"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, After the Old-Fashioned Roguish Manner—in Rondo Form." Op. 28.

The introductory portion of Weber's overture was beautiful in color, but ragged in rhythmic ensemble. The body of the piece was played with great brilliancy. Mr. Fiedler is somewhat prone to laxity of beat when not incited to extreme vigor. The Brahms symphonies become more and more grateful to the ear—balm to our wounded senses—as the bombardment by the new French school proceeds. It was satisfactorily played last evening.

When an artist appears in a double role—as composer and as performer of his own creations—he makes the work of the reviewer a bit involved; but in such cases it would usually be safe to assume that he himself desired his composition (the fruit of his highest faculties) to find appreciation, and that he willingly subordinated his whole being to the attainment of that end. We will therefore first consider Mr. Rachmaninoff's concerto. In the first place, it, as a whole, is a composition for orchestra, with pianoforte obligato, and the obligato becomes assertive only in the last movement. Rachmaninoff's themes are, most of them, natural melodic germs, although not extremely individual. Brahms or Raff would have developed them to a fruition which their creator failed to realize. There is comparatively little of the distinctively Slavic about Rachmaninoff's motives or their treatment, except in the second movement, the main theme of which, in its finical tonal successions and peculiar rhythms, at first repels, then becomes a habit and finally attracts. Rachmaninoff's style is more harmonic than it is contrapuntal, and his color schemes are interesting. He employs the orchestra with skill, securing ample variety of effective combinations, but he often smothers the piano, not, however, involving serious loss to the musical results, for his pianistic invention is not at all pronounced. This concerto contributes no new device to the pianist's resources. Mr. Rachmaninoff seems to possess considerable digital skill, but he is radically a pianist of the old school. He would doubtless play Mozart deliciously, for his tone is always good and his style unaffected; but in this era of stalwartism he is ineffective. The Strauss number was very brilliantly presented.

O. B. B.

from NEWS

address Baltimore, Md.

NOV 10

RUSSIAN PIANIST IS BIG DRAWING CARD

Rachmaninoff To Be Heard By Boston Symphony Patrons.

Evidence of the interest aroused in musical circles by the announcement of the first local appearance of Serge Rachmaninoff, one of the greatest living Russian composers and pianists, as soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert tonight is apparent from the statement from the box office that there has been an unusually large demand for seats.

Not only is the occasion that of the eminent Russian's debut in this city but it is moreover only the second time he has appeared in this country, the first having been in Philadelphia on Monday night.

The interest in his appearance here is doubled from the fact that he will be heard in one of his own compositions, the second concerto. Rachmaninoff, as a composer, has been said by many to have assumed Tschaikowsky's place in Russian music, while as a virtuoso he is classed with the most prominent now before the public. He is best known to the majority of musicians through prelude in C sharp minor for pianoforte. This extremely dramatic piece has been found with such frequency on programs of late that it has assumed almost a precarious degree of popularity, state the purists, and has even been heard lamely issuing from the fingers of amateurs.

For the remainder of the program Mr. Fielder has displayed his usual good judgment. The symphony will be Brahm's big D major No. 2. Other numbers will be Weber's overture to "Freischutz," always a favorite here, and that Staussiest of Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel."

m NEWS

ress Baltimore, Md.

NOV 21

BOSTON ORCHESTRA ENDS CONCERT TOUR

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has just finished its first regular monthly trip, giving a concert each in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and Hartford and two concerts in New York. The assisting artists on this tour were Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist, who then made his first appearance in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Hartford; Gilibert, the French barytone, and Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, soprano.

It is a gratifying fact to the friends of Boston's Orchestra that, despite the decided increase in the number of concerts and in the number of operatic performances everywhere, the patronage given the Orchestra not only shows no sign of falling off but shows an increase over previous years.

Mr. Fiedler in his programe produced two important novelties, one being Max Reger's "Symphonic Prologue to a Tragedy" and the other being Granville Bantock's charmning overture "The Pierrot of the Minute."

Among the important novelties to be produced by the Orchestra in Boston in the next four weeks are Frederick Delius' night piece "Paris" and Sibelius' symphonic poem "En Saga."

EVENING BULLETIN

Philadelphia, Pa.

NOV 29 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY

First Concert of the Season, With Rachmaninoff As Soloist.

Opening its twenty-fifth season in Philadelphia, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a notable concert at the Academy of Music last evening, with Serge Rachmaninoff, the Russian pianist, conductor and composer, as soloist, and Granville Bantock's comedy overture, "The Pierrot of the Minute," as the orchestral novelty.

Rachmaninoff, who was born in 1873, is one of the youngest of the world-famous musicians, standing well at the head among Russian composers of the modern school. Several of his best compositions have been played in Philadelphia, and his appearance last evening, which was his first in America, naturally was the occasion of no little curiosity and interest. Rachmaninoff is a tall, rather slender, young man, with somewhat prominent features, clean shaven, with short hair, and of a serious cast of countenance. He is not particularly graceful or attractive in appearance, but has a natural, matter-of-fact manner that is ingratiating. He was given a cordial reception, which was as nothing, however, to the ovation which he received after he had played his own Second Concerto for Piano, with Orchestra, Opus 18, when he was recalled to the stage about a dozen times. The prolonged and enthusiastic applause came largely as a tribute to the fame and versatile talent of the man, with a generous portion as an expression of admiration for his work at the piano, and, to a not inconsiderable extent, from the persistent handclappers who hoped and clamored—but all in vain—for an encore. As a pianist, Hachmaninoff made a highly favorable impression. His second concerto is a musicianly composition, of broad and somewhat sweeping effects, not without melodious appeal, and displaying both skill the orchestration being rich and colorful. The opening measures, of a rather imposing character, were played with a ready assurance of fine technique, the second movement, adagio sostenuto, showing that the poetic quality was not lacking, while the scherzando third movement brought a brilliantly executed finale which won the ovation already mentioned.

The orchestral part of the concert was of a nature to make every person who listened glad to be present, and to give each one something that was worth treasuring in memory to carry away. The Bantock work, "The Pierrot of the Minute," written as an overture to a dramatic phantasy by Ernest Dowson, is a dainty and tunefully alluring composition of a fantastic nature, a sympathetic and appropriate prelude to the tale of the Pierrot who, reclining on a bed of fern in a leafy glade, sleeps and dreams of a Moon Maiden who comes and tells him of the mystery of love.

The symphony was the fifth of Tschaikowsky in E-minor, which, although it has been pronounced the weakest of his six symphonies, did not lack the strength to impress last night's audience, all of its beauty and worth being brought out and emphasized by the magnificent rendition which it received under Max Fiedler's direction. It seemed, in fact, a glorious composition, from the first sounding of its plaintive theme, through the andante cantabile and the waltz in the third movement, to the great allegro vivace finale, which thrilled the audience and called forth such an outburst of applause, vociferously prolonged, that, after he had returned several times and bowed in his solemn and sedate manner, Mr. Fiedler motioned for the members of the orchestra to rise en masse and accept their share of the enthusiastic tribute. The program concluded with a splendid rendering of Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," in which that usually energetic composer gets almost mildly sympathetic at times, in strains of real melodious beauty, coming out toward the end, however, with one of his big tumultuous orchestral climaxes, in which all the instruments are let loose in unrestrained rivalry. The orchestra will give its next concert on Monday evening, December 6, with Mme. Schumann-Heink as soloist.

[56]

The First Established and most Complete Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

NEWS
BALTIMORE, MD.
NOV 11 1909

BIG HIT FOR SYMPHONY

Noted Russian Composer, However, Carries Off Evening's Honors.

The greatest spontaneous ovation of the evening coming to Serge Rachmaninoff, the Russian composer, with the Boston Symphony, last night, was the beautifully rejuvinated "Lyric," was scarcely a surprise.

He is in no sense a prodigy seeking recognition, but a thorough and acceptable artist with a reputation for both composition and execution well established. His concerto last evening, when formerly composed, must have been certainly evoked from his mind in as spontaneous a manner as it evoked the applause from the audience. The beginning is indefinite, it soon becomes angry, then lost and undecided, and finally discovering itself, gallops, glides and wings its way through a whole season of sunshine, soft shadows and contemplative murmurings.

One might well imagine the composer coming to the instrument in a fretful, pessimistic mood, "dead sore" as they say with everything, and starting to "take it out" on the piano. The first bars only serving to still more irritate him, he begins to pummel the bass unmercifully, meanwhile throwing such work on the orchestra that the piano is scarcely audible.

Not until the closing theme of the [illegible] does he finally seem to discover himself. But from them on he is contented, sure and delightful, lyrical to a high degree and controlled to a minuteness that is hypnotizing. This latter was of so marked a nature in the close of the adagietto grazioso that the audience did not know whether they were hearing or dreaming. The final allegro was a delightful culmination. The short impression of the whole concerto is that of a lost man who had found himself, a life that had battled with ignorance and superstition and had come out victorious and sweetly content.

The number is well worthy of more hearing and of painstaking study in the meantime.

Of course the ever popular Weber opening number served to put the audience at ease and in good mood to accept the Brahms symphony. The last number was a musical crime. The program follows:

Weber—Overture to the Opera "Der Freischutz."
Brahms—Symphony No. 2, in D major, Opus 73.
Rachmaninoff—Second Concerto for Pianoforte, with Orchestra, Opus 18.
Richard Strauss—"Till Eulenspiegel's Pranks, after the Old-fashioned Roguish Manner—in Rondo Form." Opus 28.

Long study and much execution made possible as perfect a rendition of the Richard Strauss number as is possible, but why such an aggregation as the Boston Symphony should devote any time or energy on such a culmination of nothingness it is hard to understand, the nothingness, of course, applying to music not noise.

Because the injection of "The Golden Rule" has caused vertigo criticism to give place to contemplative charity in the present day one is not tempted to go further than to say that this Strauss production as a whole gives a predominant mental picture of a lop-eared sow rooting in a pile of plague stricken rats and giving the audience the full benefit of the diseased odors arising therefrom.

At best the thing is a blasphemy against even the worst of the recent maniacal divergencies in the music line. Strauss is well known as an assassin of all musical sounds as connected with definitely fixed vibration, but in this instance he has fairly exceeded himself. He is like a gorilla in an art gallery, with neither intelligence, precedent or aesthetic appreciation to guide his moments or stay his destructiveness. He leaps from wall to fall, his arms, his legs, his teeth, ungoverned by any brain center, beat wildly in undirected brute force till every painting and statue lies broken and formless on the floor. Then with a transient gleam of collective genius he scoops the debris in a pile, pokes a broken leg of Hercules, through the face of a Madonna, begins to chew up the heads of the disciples in the "Last Supper," lights a match to the whole and dances and chatters insanely while the people look on.

That the people do look on is the great pity. It encourages him to do it again. That the Boston Symphony should stoop to his conglomerations of cow bells, street rattles and frenzied denotations can only be accounted for on the following grounds. Either this furnishes the only opportunity to make the bass drummer earn his salary or else the few stray bars of real melody, which one might think came from the nightingale hovering over the rooting sow's back, are believed to be sufficient to make up for the multi-multitudes of other sins.

It is not improbable, however, that an explanation may be found in the hallucinations of the American Indian. The feeble-minded Indian was looked upon as one "who had been touched by the Great Spirit," which superstition caused his fellows to pay him reverence and spend time trying to find the reasons for his actions which were without reason. The same is probably true with the Strauss compositions. The so-called genius which none claim to understand and few desire is probably merely the result of feeble-mindedness.

Strauss, in regard to the number mentioned, admits that he does not know what he means, which is only another way of saying that it means nothing.

At any rate, it spoiled an otherwise highly artistic and delightful evening, and sent the audience home in a restless, peevish humor. It is to be hoped that the Boston Symphony will sign the "never again" pledge so far as such splashings from the fountain of insanity are concerned.—E. S. G.

TELEGRAPH
Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 12 1909

BOSTON ORCHESTRA STARTS LOCAL SERIES OF CONCERTS

Serge Rachmaninoff, the Russian Composer, is Soloist, Making American Debut.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last night gave its first Philadelphia concert of the season at the Academy of Music, despite the inclemency of the weather, was well filled, and no doubt every seat would have been taken up if outside conditions had been more favorable. Those who stopped away because of the rain missed a rare treat to enjoy which would have been worth a wetting. The enthusiasm of the audience was unflagging throughout the concert, and reached its highest pitch after the Bachmaninoff Concerto, which elicited such expressions of delight, that the inexorable rule of "no encores" was almost broken, and was only adhered to because the piano movers had already trundled the instrument out of the way when M. Rachmaninoff, in response to the unanimous insistence, reappearing for the fourth or fifth time, looked for the piano, and was evidently surprised not to see it still in place. It was a great disappointment to the people that they could not hear a piano solo from M. Rachmaninoff by way of an encore, for he is so well known in America by his pianoforte compositions and not at all as a pianist, as last night's appearance was his first before an American audience.

The opening number, "The Pierrot of the Minute," by Granville Bantock, is a composition of unusual character and shows much freshness of conception; without being really great, it gives ample scope of execution to the performers. It need hardly be said that the orchestra displayed throughout the concert that exquisite finish and absolute responsiveness to the conductor's baton for which it is so justly famed. Mr. Fiedler may well feel proud of his musical family. The Tschaikowsky Symphony was the piece de resistance of the evening. Its wonderful first, second and fourth movements, with their sombre grandeur, were brought out with greater prominence by contrast with the third movement, which falls distinctly below them, perhaps intentionally, in majesty of conception. The Rachmaninoff Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra was marvellously beautiful and entirely normal, lacking any very distinctive national idiosyncrasies which probably some were looking for. M. Rachmaninoff's playing was distinguished by a quiet reserve, bespeaking great latent force, clearness of technique and sonority of tone—characteristics, all of them, that indicate a most accomplished pianist. It was noticeable that at no time during the progress of the concerto was the soloist drowned out—a thing that very often happens with less excellent performers. Strauss' tone-poem, "Don Juan," the final number, was rendered in masterly style, being wrought up to a climax of inspiringly massive harmonies at the close.

AMERICAN
Baltimore, Md.
NOV 11 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY CHARMS AUDIENCE

RACHMANINOFF SCORES GREAT TRIUMPH.

WHOLE PROGRAM A SUCCESS

Manager Ellis Opens the Renovated Lyric, as He Did the Music Hall 15 Years Ago With a Magnificent Company of Artists — Weber's "Der Freischutz" Given a Hearty Reception—Strauss' Tone Poem Beautifully Rendered.

Mr. Charles A. Ellis, the able but modest manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and several other great musical organizations, accompanied the orchestra on its visit to open the renovated Lyric last evening as he did on its visit for the original opening of it as Music Hall 15 years ago. At that time he brought with him a quartet of soloists, including Melba, Scalchi and Ploncon, the house being packed to its capacity. Last evening he brought with him as soloist the young Russian composer and pianist, Serge Rachmaninoff, who played his own piano concerto and received an ovation as great as that accorded to Melba and her unrivaled quartet years ago.

The orchestra, under the direction of Max Fiedler, presented the following program:

Overture to the opera "Der Freischutz" ..... Weber
Symphony No. 2, in D Major, Op. 73, Brahms
1. Allegro non troppo.
2. Adagio non troppo.
3. Adagietto grazioso, quasi andantino.
4. Allegro con spirito.
Second Concerto for Pianoforte with Orchestra, Op. 18..... Rachmaninoff
1. Moderato.
2. Adagio Sostenuto.
3. Allegro Scherzando.
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the Old-fashioned Roguish Manner — in Rondo Form," Op. 28 ..... Richard Strauss

The good old Weber overture to "Der Freischutz" was well played by the large orchestra and highly appreciated by the audience, which always has a large German contingent, nearly all of whom adore Von Weber's work. Being first-class music, it is as fresh today as when Weber wrote it, in his middle age, and when Wagner, as a boy, delighted in it and started out to imitate it.

The Brahms Symphony," in D major, No. 2, was not so well received, although well played, because it is the weakest of Brahms' orchestral works, and can hardly be compared with his first, which is full of melody, breadth and dignity, comparable with Beethoven's.

The Rachinaninoff piano concerto was the principal work of the evening. It begins unostentatiously, but as it goes on creates an intense and irresistible musical mood in spite of some defects in instrumentation, which may yet be easily avoided. Great interest is aroused by the first movement; this is intensified in the second, the beautiful adagio sostenuto, and the feeling of admiration goes to fever heat in the third, the finale. At its close the composer-pianist was recalled over and over again, even after the piano had been pulled away and put out of commission.

The concerto is known to Baltimore pianists and was the first work played by Mme. Tina Lerner on her arrival in America direct from Moscow with the Russian Symphony Orchestra. It is a great work and will be heard again gladly.

The concert closed with the Richard Strauss descriptive tone-poem entitled "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks in Vondo Form," a work which is well known to the Boston Orchestra patrons. The entire program was well received by the usual large audience.

HERALD
Washington, D. C.
NOV 10 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A Large Audience at the National Theater Hears Initial Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, began its Washington season of five matinees at the National Theater yesterday afternoon. The occasion was the seventy-eighth performance of the orchestra in this city. The theater was packed, in proof of the fact that the music-hungry of Washington have waited impatiently during the past six months for the return of the orchestra and a renewal of the splendid concerts which have been their delight for so many seasons.

The programme included five numbers, two of which were allotted to Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, soprano soloist. She sang the scene, "How Tranquilly I Slumbered," and aria, "Softly Sighing," from "Der Freischutz" of von Weber, and the recitative, "E Susanna non vien," and aria, "Dove sono i bei momenti," from "Le Nozze di Figaro," and completely captivated her audience by the beauty of her rendering of these exquisite selections. Mme. Rider-Kelsey's voice is one of great purity, and her expression in these operatic numbers was such as to win for her a most enthusiastic round of applause. Both songs were admirably adapted to exhibiting the quality of her voice, which is sweet and clear and well adapted to concert singing.

The interest of the afternoon was divided between the soloist and the playing by the orchestra of the great Tschaikowsky Symphony, No. 5, in E. minor, with its four movements. The symphony is not a new one to Washington concert audiences, but it is an always welcome addition to a programme. Its study will result in almost boundless discoveries of delight. The third movement, a waltz, was like an exquisite jewel in a setting of somber beauty. The principal theme suggests foreboding, or the fateful premonition of impending disaster, and the somewhat gloomy beauty of the first and second movement, with their persistent thematic repetitions, is marked. The playing of the orchestra was absolutely above reproach, and the bringing out of the many and varied moods of the symphony was masterfully accomplished.

As if to mark a direct contrast, the playing of Granville Bantock's "The Pierrot of the Minute" was all humor and picturesque brightness. The number is called a comedy overture, and is based on a dramatic phantasy of Ernest Dowson, being first performed in 1908 at the Worcester (England) festival. It could be as appropriately called "The Dream of Pierrot," and is an excellent example of descriptive tone painting. It is debonnair and jaunty at the beginning, melting into a romantic vein, and ending in a short and quiet phrase suggestive of a sudden awakening. It was played as though the orchestra, delighted at its release from the majestic music of the Tschaikowsky symphony, had burst into a frolicsome mood—the figures and motives come pell-mell, chasing one another in fantastic arrangement. It was the only novelty on the programme, but became an instant favorite.

The splendid programme was brought to an end by a fine interpretation of Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont," short, but full of superb harmonies and commanding passages.

Altogether the season for the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened most auspiciously. The entente cordiale between musicians and audience has been long established. The programme makers seem to know exactly how to please local music lovers, and the response is instant, showing appreciation and affection. Herr Fiedler is already a favorite, and his interpretations have given eminent satisfaction.

The concerts are materially enhanced by the programme containing Mr. Philip Hale's close analyses and descriptive notes on all the works performed during the season. This enables the music student to derive the greatest possible benefit and understanding from the performance.

Yesterday afternoon's complete programme:

Tschaikowshy.....Symphony No. 5, in E minor, Op. 64.
I. Andante; Allegro con anima.
II. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.
III. Valse: Allegro moderato.
IV. Finale: Andante maestoso; Allegro vivace.
Weber.....Scene and Aria, "Der Freischutz"
Granville Bantock....."The Pierrot of the Minute"
First time in Washington.
Mozart.....Recitative and Aria, from "The Marriage of Figaro"
Beethoven....Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84
Soloist—Mrs. Corinne Rider-Kelsey.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST,
NOVEMBER 14, 1909

The first of the concerts for the benefit of the pension fund of the Symphony orchestra, which will be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, November 21, provides one of the most attractive general programmes that the orchestra has ever offered on such an occasion. Contrary to the usual custom, there will be two soloists, and both of them are great favorites with the Boston public. Madame Olga Samaroff has volunteered her services to the orchestra for this pension fund concert, and will play Schumann's concerto in A minor.

Professor Willy Hess, the other soloist, will play the Mendelssohn concerto, one of the most beautiful works written for the violin and one which he has never played in Boston. The orchestra will play Goldmark's charming overture, "In the Spring," and two excerpts from "Die Walkure," Wotan's farewell, the magic fire scene and the ride of the Valkyries. Seats are now on sale at Symphony Hall.

[57]

om POST

dress Washington, D. C.

te

MUSIC LOVERS PLEASED

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives First Concert.

FASHION THRONGS THEATER

Max Fiedler Conducts With Rare Precision, Ease, and Authority—Novelty of the Program the Fresh and Fantastic Comedy Overture, "The Pierrot of the Minute," by Granville Bantock.

Before a fashionable audience which exceeded the seating capacity of the New National Theater, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Max Fiedler, gave the first of its five concerts for the season of 1909-1910 yesterday afternoon.

The novelty of the program was the delightfully fresh and somewhat fantastic "The Pierrot of the Minute," which was heard for the first time in Washington. The piece de resistance was Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor, and the vocal numbers were a scene and aria from Weber's "Der Freischutz" and a recitative and aria from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro." The closing number was Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont."

Fiedler's Direction Marvelous.

Max Fiedler conducted with the rare precision, ease, and authority which always distinguishes his work. His control and ability to develop from the orchestra all the weird beauty and somber melody in the Tschaikowsky symphony seemed almost hypnotic, while in the lighter passages there was a delicacy of treatment which was altogether charming. The Fifth Symphony is not by any means the most popular work of the great Russian composer, and is therefore not familiar to the majority of music lovers. A haunting gloom seems to be the dominant theme in each of the four parts, and even the waltz movement does not depart radically from the general prosternation of the whole composition. There is an appealing strain which recurs many times, but it is always wistful and mysterious until the final movement, which opens with a majestic swing that grows in power and decision. The work is not one which will retain a firm hold upon the affections of the public, but it proved an admirable vehicle to demonstrate the versatility of the orchestra in interpreting the most delicate shadings of significant compositions.

Granville Bantock's "The Pierrot of the Minute," which is described on the program as a comedy overture to a dramatic fantasy of Ernest Dowson, is a charmingly imaginative number, which was rendered with much delicacy and feeling. There are occasional eccentricities which heighten the interest as well as pique the curiosity, giving the whole an air of whimsical novelty.

Soloist Well Received.

Mrs. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, who was heard in recital in Washington last season, rendered the selection from "Der Freischutz" with pleasing ease. While her voice is not notable for warmth, there is a roundness in the tone quality of her middle register which is genuinely soothing, and her higher notes are clear and full. Her selection from "The Marriage of Figaro" gave an opportunity for the display of more dramatic spirit than the first number, but both were cordially received.

The program concluded with Mozart's impressive overture to Goethe's "Egmont," which ends with the well-known fanfare figure, and an uplifting climax.

ss TIMES

Washington, D. C.

BOSTON SYMPHONY SCORES SUCCESS

General Excellence and Finish Characterizes Work of Popular Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Max Fiedler, opened the current musical season yesterday afternoon at the National Theater, presenting a program admirably balanced to meet the demands of the ultra moderns and the conservatives among Washington's music lovers.

From the much-discussed "Fifth Symphony" of Tchaikowsky, which opened the program, to Beethoven's tremendously dramatic overture to Goethe's "Egmont," which brought it to a conclusion, the orchestral work was marked with the excellence and finish for which, regardless of its leadership, the organization has been famous throughout its notable career. The "Fifth Symphony," a work which gave the composer himself many misgivings, received a scholarly interpretation,, the musicians responding as one man to the masterful control of its quiet and forceful leader.

Conductor Popular.

With conscientious fidelity Herr Fiedler subordinated himself to the work of interpretation, and not the least of the pleasure of the afternoon, to those who go in for a study of character, was afforded by the conductor whose open-mindedness was amply exemplified by his reading of the several widely varying numbers. Indeed, so sympathetically was the orchestra led through the mazes of the stupendous work of the great Russian's, that Philip Hale's excellent descriptive notes which supplemented the program were necessary only as an emphasis of the listener's conception of the "story" the music essayed to tell.

Midway, on the program was placed the fascinating "Pierrot of the Minuet," a strikingly original and fantastic composition by Granville Bantock, which yesterday received its first presentation in Washington. Charmingly imaginative and teperamental in the extreme, the knowledge that it was the product of an Englishman's fertile imagination, brings one up with a start against the preconceived notions of British stolidity.

Comedy Overture.

The work is described as a comedy overture to a dramatic phantasy of Ernest Dowson. During the afternoon the nearest approach to an ovation followed the satisfying rendition of this colorful piece of orchestration.

Mrs. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, one of the best-known concert and oratorio singers on the platform, gave the vocal numbers, an aria and a scene from Weber's "Der Freischutz." Mrs. Kelsey's beautiful full voice and admirable method lent itself delightfully to the selections chosen, the singer having in addition to her other gifts the charming grace of a perfect diction.

HERALD

New York City.

NOV 14 1909

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

The second concert of the series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler conductor, was given in Sanders theatre, last Thursday evening. Florence Larrabee, pianist, was the soloist and this was the program:

Symphony No. 4.....Tschaikowsky
Concerto for Piano, No. 2..MacDowell "Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Strauss

An excellent program of reasonable length and while none of the works were in any sense novelties, there was doubtless unfamiliarity to many in regard to them that lent more than the usual interest.

Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony in F minor, was a favorite of its composer and while less generally known than the fifth and sixth, is one that grows in interest to the listener with each successive hearing. Who but Tschaikowsky could have conceived such characteristic melodies as are found in the first and second movements, or elaborated them as he did, and the third movement, "pizzicato ostinato" is unique of its kind in orchestral literature.

Richard Strauss' musical burlesque on the folk tale of the queer pranks of "Till Eulenspiegel," sounds less chaotic than formerly, for in the last few seasons Max Reger and a few others have "done things" to keep one guessing, and in comparison, Strauss seems quite sane and rational. It will rank probably as among the best things he has thus far written. Both numbers were given in ideal manner. It was good to hear them under such conditions.

Miss Larrabee appeared as pianist for the first time at these concerts. The writer unfortunately knows nothing of her musical career and can only say that she has the pianistic physique and possesses a well developed technic and necessary repose of manner. As to tonal quality, there was often much to be desired. The MacDowell concerto, dedicated to Mme. Teresa Carreno and frequently played by her, is worthy of attention by pianists everywhere, for there are many pages of great strength and authority as well as exquisite poetic sentiment that cause the work to linger in the memory. Miss Larrabee played with much acceptance and there were many recalls. The third concert will be Thursday evening, Dec. 16.

H. J. Storer.

[illegible] Chronicle

Cambridge - Mass

Nov - 20 - 1909

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1909.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Brilliant Programme Opens Boston Orchestra's Twenty-ninth Season.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 29th season in this city was given last evening in Infantry Hall. A chilly, rainy night with its unavoidable accompaniments of wet sidewalks and muddy streets presented conditions the reverse of ideal for concert going, and accounted, doubtless, for not a few empty seats in the hall. Nevertheless, there was a very fair attendance, and any small discomfort sustained in reaching the concert hall was amply repaid by an unusually full and attractive programme, excellently performed.

The personnel of the orchestra remains practically unchanged from year to year, and this is undoubtedly a not unimportant factor in the sustained and even excellence of the organization. Now and then a new face may be noted at the beginning of a season, but the greater part of the men are veterans in service. Never is there perceptible any falling off in the smoothness and precision with which every unit of this admirably constructed musical machine fits into its proper place. Rather does the passing of the years manifest itself in a closer sympathy, a nearer approach to an ideally perfect ensemble. This impression forced itself irresistibly upon one last night while listening to the superb spirit and finish of the whole performance. The programme was as follows:

Overture to "The Sold Bride".....Smetana
Symphony No. 5, in E-minor, op. 64.....Tschaikowsky
Scena and aria, "Softly Sighing," from "Der Freischutz".....Weber
Orchestral suite, from the music to "Peer Gynt," op. 46.....Grieg
Recitative and aria, "Flown Forever," from "The Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
Overture, "Leonora," No. 3, op. 72....Beethoven

A somewhat longer programme than the average, but full of strong meat and appetizing condiments. Mr. Fiedler is certainly a good programme-maker. As a conductor, too, he improves upon acquaintance. It is not too much to say that none of his eminent predecessors have wielded the baton with more authority or achieved better results in general. His readings are clean cut and bear the stamp of individuality. At the same time, while avoiding the groove of pedantry he is always sane, well-balanced, without taint of the sensational. And—the final test of a conductor—he carries his men with him, royally responsive to his slightest or severest call upon their unquestioned musicianship and proved technical ability.

Four superb numbers made up the orchestral part of the programme. The overture to Smetana's "Sold Bride," a most brilliant and effective composition, drew strong applause. Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, much less familiar to concert-goers than his more famous "Pathetic," is nevertheless a worthy companion piece to that remarkable work. The Grieg suite is always a popular number—and, by the way, who has ever "got more out of it" than Mr. Fiedler did last night with his wonderful shading and genuine sympathy with the spirit of the music? The Beethoven overture, almost equally familiar, made a brilliant close to a splendid programme.

The assisting soloist was Mrs. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, foremost of our concert sopranos, whose beautiful voice and superb vocal art provided fitting interludes to the instrumental numbers. Both her selections were deservedly greeted with enthusiastic applause. The air from "Der Freischutz," in particular, was as fine a bit of singing as we often hear. And so the concert, as a whole, was of an exceptionally pleasing character. The next appearance of the orchestra—there are to be four this season—will be on Tuesday evening, Jan. 4.

W. A. P.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD

NOVEMBER 17, 1909

VIOLIN LARCENY CHARGED

To Hermann Krouse of the Symphony

Herman Krouse, 45, a member of the Symphony orchestra, was in the municipal court charged with the larceny of a violin valued at $300 from Herbert Goodwin. His case was continued until Tuesday. The arrest was made by Inspector Pelton. Goodwin claims that he gave the violin to Krouse to sell for him and that Krouse came around later and said that his home had been broken into and the violin stolen from him.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—NOVEMBER 14, 1909.

Sixth Symphony Program.

This week's program of the Symphony orchestra will bring forward as soloist for the first time since he has been a member of the orchestra Mr Sylvain Noack, the second concert master. A number of things militated against his making his debut last year and at his own request it was postponed until this season. Mr Noack will play the Saint-Saens concerto No. 3 in B minor.

The symphony will be Goldmark's "The Rustic Wedding," which has not been heard here for a number of years. In Mr Gericke's time it appeared quite frequently on the programs, for with him Goldmark had always been a great favorite.

The novelty on the program will be Christian Sinding's "Rondo Infinito." Sinding is one of the foremost Scandinavian composers. The last work of his that was played here was his symphony in D minor which Dr Muck gave in his first year. The "Rondo Infinito" is a musical setting for a strange poem by the Norwegian poet, Holger Drachmann.

Pension Fund Concert.

The first of the concerts for the benefit of the pension fund of the Symphony orchestra will be given in Symphony hall next Sunday evening. Contrary to the usual custom there will be two soloists. Mme Olga Samaroff, who was heard here recently in the concert with Miss Farrar, has volunteered her services and will play Schumann's A minor piano concerto.

Only three weeks ago prof Willy Hess who will be the other soloist, captured the Symphony audience with his performance of the Joachim concerto. Next Sunday he will be heard in Mendelssohn's concerto, one of the most beautiful works ever written for the violin.

The orchestra under Mr Fiedler's direction will perform Goldmark's charming overture, "In the Spring," and two excerpts from "Die Walkure," Wotan's farewell and "Magic Fire Scene" and "Ride of the Valkyries."

Composer-Pianist Wins Audience

Mr. Sergei Rachmaninoff Plays His Second Concerto Here with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Sergei Rachmaninoff, a Russian composer, pianist and conductor, made his first bow to any audience in New York at a concert of the Boston Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The distinguished musician's success was most pronounced. An audience that packed the auditorium applauded him until he was tired of returning to the platform to bow his thanks.

The cause of this enthusiasm, an unusual demonstration at these ultra-classical concerts, where something of the reputed chill of New England's metropolis is supposed to pervade the audience, was Mr. Rachmaninoff's playing of his own second piano concerto. The work has been made fairly familiar here by various pianists, among them Messrs, Raoul Pugno and Ossip Gabrilowitsch. Miss Tina Lerner also played it with the Russian Orchestra last season.

It has been recognized as one of the most interesting concertos of recent years, a composition valuable not only from the virtuoso's viewpoint, but as a musical whole, for its orchestral part is full of significance and beauty. It remained, however, for the composer and the Boston Orchestra to show its full value.

That Mr. Rachmaninoff is a pianist of rare quality was made very clear before he had played five minutes. He showed at once that he could do what he wished with the piano. Under his hands it sang or stormed at his will. In the adagio he and the orchestra seemed to vie with one another as to which should produce the most perfect pianissimo, and the soloist had rather the better of it. In the pompous, majestic last movement he held his own against the hundred men of the orchestra. Through it all the playing was thoroughly musical, without a suggestion of straining for effect.

The tall, serious man, with the air of a scholar and the eyes of a dreamer, who came back a dozen times or more in answer to applause and cheers, seemed to be the least excited person in the house. He took his honors most quietly.

MR. SERGEI RACHMANINOFF
AIME DUPONT PHOTO

So brilliantly was the orchestral part of the concerto played that the composer was enthusiastic over it. After the performance he said:—

"I have played with every big orchestra in Europe—with those of Vienna, Dresden and Munich—but never have I been more impressed than by this Br[illegible] ganization. It was worth coming to America to hear it play my music."

Under Mr. Fiedler's direction the orchestra gave a splendid account of itself in a new comedy overture by Mr. Granville Bantock, in Schumann's second symphony and in Mr. Richard Strauss' "Don Juan." Mr. Bantock's overture is bright and effective and well worth playing.

[58]

...and most complete
...r Cutting Bureau in the World
HARTFORD, CONN.
DEC 16 1909

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

PROGRAM OF UNUSUAL INTEREST PRESENTED.

Splendid Interpretation of Tschaikowsky's Symphony.

FINE PLAYING BY RACHMANINOFF, PIANIST.

The Parsons Theater never saw a larger, finer or more enthusiastic audience assembled to enjoy an orchestral concert within its walls than was seen there last evening, the occasion being the first of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The playing was superb, the program was brilliant, the soloist scored a double triumph as composer and pianist. Mr. Fiedler was welcomed as an old friend and his men played for him at their very best; the concert was a success in every way.

The beautiful overture to "Der Freischutz" was first on the program and from the lovely and broad melody that begins it to the splendid climax the playing was fine in spirit, exquisite in tone; every bit of melody shone in its fullest brightness and to the whole work was given a wonderfully sympathetic rendition. The Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 5, in E minor followed and made a deep impression. The composer's "Pathetic" Symphony is familiar here but last evening's work was new to the great majority of the listeners. The opening is sombre in its deep tones and there is an odd but most attractive melody that follows immediately. The working out of the first movement is fine in its forcefulness and power and the playing was splendid in every phrase and bit of shading. There was great power of tone but sweetness of tone was never sacrificed, and the deep, dark ending of the movement was wonderfully effective.

The andante cantabile offered the 'cellos splendid opportunity to shine and the tone given out was beautiful. There is a building up of tone in this movement that rises to a tremendous effect and then a silence that thrills precedes the gracious, appealing melody that, in its turn, serves to make way for another tone-structure of wonderful size and construction. And then, when the applause that followed a great rendition of a great symphonic movement had died away, there came the strangest, oddest waltz movement, rhythmic of course but far from gay; and the playing made every bit of its melody and every strange phrase of its greyness of tone come home to the audience.

The final movement rounded out a splendid symphony in brilliant effectiveness. The andante maestoso was particularly broad and fine and the finale was tremendously big in tonal effect with particularly fine work to the credit of the brasses. The symphony was heard with delight, and Mr. Fiedler was obliged to bow his thanks for the applause again and again, passing the approbation on to his players.

The Russian composer, Serge Rachmaninoff, was the soloist of the evening and he played with the orchestra his own "Second Concerto." His playing is strong and virile, his command of tone is excellent, his artistic sense in playing as a part of a great, harmonious whole with the orchestra is never for an instant at fault. The singing tone of the piano was clearly heard whenever the piano part belonged in the foreground, but there was no striving for prominence at the expense of the beauties of the orchestral parts of the work and the composer was content to be, most of the time, one of the players in the great band of artists whose efforts were all directed by the man who read the composer's complete score, Max Fiedler.

The composition is strongly effective, admirably balanced. The opening is finely ryhthmic and sounds the depths of the piano's as well as the orchestra's tone. The development of the first movement is fine and the muted strings are beautifully used in quiet harmony with the piano. The strings, still under the mute, and the flutes sing richly in the adagio sostenuto (second movement) and here the singing tone of the piano is especially noticed; the playing was superb in every part and was applauded to the echo. The allegro scherzando is strong and fine and there is a finale that is peculiarly effective. The composer and player was recalled to the stage over and over again the players in the orchestra were as appreciative of his work as was the audience. Mr. Rachaninoff would have been forgiven by the audience if he had broken the orchestra rule and played again, but he was content to bow his thanks and took his place in one of the boxes to enjoy the orchestra's playing of the final number on the program.

Beethoven's "Leonora" overture, No. 3, was given after the two Russian numbers had been played and the lovely spirit of the work, the grace of the melodies and the effectiveness of the trumpet calls that sound so sweetly off-stage were fully appreciated by the audience. The playing was splendid and scintillated most brilliantly. The whole evening was a triumph for orchestra and leader.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's series here will be given January 17, and Mischa Elman is announced as soloist.

TRANSCRIPT,
NOVEMBER 13, 1909

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Six Crowded Days—A Revival of Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" at the Symphony Concerts—The Coming of Rachmaninoff—A Second Recital by Kreisler—New Pieces for the Hess-Schroeder Quartet—Felix Fox's Concert

At the Symphony concert next Friday afternoon, Nov. 19, and Saturday evening, Nov. 20, Mr. Sylvain Noack, the second concert master of the orchestra, will make his début playing Saint-Saëns's brilliant and melodious concerto No. 3 in B minor. Saint-Saëns of the concertos imposes labors for the virtuoso as well as tests for the musician, and the piece is seemingly well chosen for a review of Mr. Noack's qualities as a soloist. Goldmark's intimate and songful symphony "A Rustic Wedding," will stand on the programme for the first time since Mr. Gericke's conductorship. It will be, after the interval, almost as great a novelty as Christian Sinding's "Rondo Infinito" which is to be performed for the first time at these concerts. Sinding's Scandinavian fancy has played about a poem by the Norwegian, Holger Drachmann, which certainly, in a literal translation, runs more to weirdness of theme than intelligibility. In free English the verses are:

Yes, often with dread have I been seized—
In strength I am not a dwarf—
When in lonely hours I have been thinking:
Now like oakum they pluck me asunder,
They lacerate the fearless Berserker,
In quick haste cruelly thrusting
Their probes into all his wounds.

Upon dissecting-table they place him—
In strength I am not lacking—
But I fear even their knives.
In combat I am a valiant Berserker,
But the work of the surgeon follows;
Alas! leave his body in peace
As long as in life he rejoices!

My hand you clasp. It causes a shudder—
I am not deficient in strength—
And we sit by the hearth together,
Reading the legend of a priest-mark!
Of a dissolute, tonsured Berserker,
Who died, and Satan led him away,
And the monks crossed themselves: Amen.

Five hundred years—then they unearthed him,
And thereupon a work was written
Of what once he had done and accomplished.
Before us he suddenly appears—mark!
As the faithful and proud Berserker of the Lord,
Satan and his sins have disappeared,
His great deeds alone remaining.

My hand you clasp, but without a shudder,
Thanks be to you that I have pride and strength!
Filled with happiness we remain together.
Five hundred years—and they will unearth me, mark!
Like the priest and write a work
And efface all unworthy actions,
And then "the Brothers" sing their Amen!

The second Symphony Concert in Cambridge will be given next Thursday evening, Nov. 18, in Sanders Theatre at eight o'clock. It will be the occasion of Miss Florence Larrabee's début as a professional performer, and she has chosen MacDowell's Second Concerto for the pianoforte. The orchestral numbers will be Tschaikowski's Fourth Symphony in F minor and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

MONITOR,
NOVEMBER 13, 1909.

The Symphony concerts of Friday afternoon, Nov. 19, and Saturday evening, Nov. 20, will bring forward a new soloist, Sylvain Noack, the second concert master of the orchestra. He will play the Saint-Saens concerto No. 3 in D-minor. The symphony will be Goldmark's charming "Rustic Wedding," a work which has not been heard at the concerts since the days of Mr. Gericke's conductorship. The novelty on the program will be Christian Sinding's "Rondo Infinito." None of this Scandinavian composer's works have been performed by the orchestra since Dr. Muck conducted his symphony in B minor. The "Rondo Infinito" is a musical setting for a poem by the Norwegian poet, Holger Drachmann.

The second Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders theater on next Thursday evening, Nov. 18, at 8 o'clock. The soloist will be Miss Florence Larrabee, a young pianist who will make her first appearance as a professional performer. She will play MacDowell's Second Concerto for piano, the one which Carreno played in Boston two years ago. The orchestral numbers will be Tschaikowsky's Fourth Symphony in F minor and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

The first of the concerts for the benefit of the pension fund of the Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony hall on Sunday evening, Nov. 21. There will be two soloists, Madame Olga Samaroff, who was heard here only recently in a concert with Miss Farrar, and Prof. Willy Hess, who lately at a Symphony concert played the Joachim concerto.

Miss Samaroff will play Schumann's concerto in A minor, which has not been on a Symphony program since Harold Bauer played it four years ago. Professor Hess will play Mendelssohn's violin concerto, which he has not hitherto played in Boston. The orchestra will be heard in three numbers under Mr. Fiedler: Goldmark's overture "In the Spring," Wotan's "Farewell" and the magic fire scene and the "Ride of the Valkyries," from Wagner's "Valkyrie."

* * *

BOSTON TRAVELER,
NOVEMBER 17, 1909.

MME. OLGA SAMAROFF, who will be one of the assisting artists at the Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra next Sunday night, will play the concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in A-minor by Schumann. This work, which is one of the most beautiful in the whole literature of music, is seldom played nowadays simply because it does not give an artist full opportunity for display of his pianistic fireworks, but by the same token it is one of the most difficult works in a pianist's reportory, and Mme. Samaroff has won great praise in Europe by her playing of it. The other soloist will be Prof. Willy Hess, who will play the Mendelssohn concerto for violin.

MME. OLGA SAMAROFF.

BOSTON GLOBE—
NOVEMBER 20, 1909.

NOACK THE SOLOIST.

Symphony Orchestra in Boston Again.

Sinding's "Rondo Infinito" Given First Production Here.

After their fortnight's southern jaunt Mr Fiedler and his Symphony men returned with a rehearsal program yesterday afternoon of altogether agreeable music for those who prick up their ears to music not unmindful of euphony.

First came Goldmark's so-called "Rustic Wedding" symphony, although its form makes flagrant deviation from the established pattern of the sonata or of the symphony. Followed Sylvan Noack, the soloist of the week, who regularly shares the first desk with Prof Hess, in Saint-Saens' concerto in B minor No. 3. Sinding's "Rondo Infinito" of plongent sonority was then heard for the first time in Boston and closed the program.

Goldmark's symphony, or more properly "suite," is festive music of heroic, martial spirit, bubbling humor, sprightly gayety and tender sentiment. Its workmanship betokens simplicity and directness of method and elegance of taste. The work abounds in that wide variety of contrast in mood, color, tempo, rhythm and dynamics out of which the versatility of Mr Fiedler and the orchestra can shape a reading richly picturesque.

The piquant theme of the wedding march was given out by the 'cellos and double basses with a precision, a delicacy and an adept finesse which quite belied their ponderousness. The 12 variations which redress and recolor this theme went with refreshing spontaneity and contrast.

The satisfying beauty which was to be had from simple means was to be remarked. "The Bridal Song" and the "Serenade" dealt with modest and untortured melody and possessed much charm.

That Goldmark should have named the fourth movement "In the Garden" is an argument against the peasant and his bride figuring as the imaginary centerpiece of the story. The garden is scarcely within the peasant's estate. It is more indicative of the rustic pleasures of the well-to-do. There is noticeably wanting in the work any touch either in kindly verity or piquant burlesque of countryfied mannerism, or of bucolic unsophistication. There is no coarse clowning or rude merrymaking. The unfailing impression is one of noble, picturesque or tender beauty, and of those within whom gladness, good fellowship and the charm of sightly environment would inspire it.

Mr Noack cultivates the fineness, the elegance, the nicety, almost to fastidiousness, of violin playing. His tone is of exquisite purity and inherent sweetness. It appears to be spun of silk and not produced by a bow. This fragility of texture in his style, however, leaves something to be desired upon the bravura side. Comparisons are reprehensible, yet for the sake of the case in point, recall the heroic abandon with which Mr Elman, at his last recital here, played the imperious notes upon the G string with which the violin plunges impetuously into the surge of tone immediately upon the heels of the orchestra. Here at the outset, one might have wished that Mr Noack's bowing were more authoritative.

In shaping the contour of his phrases, however, particularly in the andantino of the beautiful Sicilian theme, this artist evidenced a graceful and finished style. The fleet figures of the final movement had clear intonation, incisiveness and no little spirit. Harmonics are granted to mortal violinists only by the gift of the gods. The treacherous passage in arpeggios yesterday afternoon evidently lacked the special dispensation.

Sinding's work reveals a sturdy, at times a thrilling, vigor which has not been achieved by any of his countrymen. The composer was born at Kongberg, Norway, and studied at Leipsig, Munich, and Berlin. He is a talented pianist. This is his most pretentious orchestral work.

The Rondo is laid out on a large scale. It abounds with movement, color and life. The voices of the orchestra surge through periods of excessive striking rhythms, bulwarked and reenforced at climatic points by brasses and percussion generously but eloquently used. The fugue at the close is developed in masterly fashion.

The work is redolent with the invigorating tang of northern forests, and is often as superbly picturesque as the glorious colors of the northern skies to be seen from the mountain tops which bear them.

It is, forsooth, an admirable fact that music which rings with the joy of life is now and then good to hear.

BOSTON JOURNAL—
NOVEMBER 18, 1909.

OLGA SAMAROFF GETS HIGH HONOR IN LONDON

OLGA SAMAROFF,
Who will play at Pension Fund concert Sunday night.

Brilliant American Pianist Has Been Invited to Be Soloist With the Philharmonic Society There When Arthur Nikisch Will Conduct.

Olga Samaroff, the brilliant American pianist, who is to be one of the soloist at the Pension Fund concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall Sunday night, has received the unique honor of being invited to be soloist with the London Philharmonic Society in London on May 19 next.

To be a soloist with this venerable society is one of the great honors that can come to an artist, and the honor means so much the more since at this particular concert Arthur Nikisch is to be the conductor.

In fact, Madame Samaroff's great successes in London last spring and the previous spring have given her an assured position in the musical world of England and she will be called upon to make an extensive tour of the British provinces in the winter of 1910-1911.

POST,
NOVEMBER 20, 1909

Sinding's "Rondo Infinito"

By Olin Downes

Sylvain Noack, second concertmeister of the Symphony Orchestra, was soloist at the public rehearsal yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, when he made his first appearance in this city as a virtuoso. He played Saint-Saens' B-minor violin concerto with a tone that was rich on the lower strings if not especially brilliant in higher registers, and he was much applauded.

Goldmark's symphony, so called, "A Rustic Wedding," opened the programme. This "symphony" is, of course, a suite—a rather gaudy, greasy suite. The allegretto, bedecked and bedizened, minces and simpers. No sincere swain, more especially a simple soul from the pastures, would sing such a "serenade." The section, "In a Garden," is most characteristic of the lush and Oriental Goldmark. For the most part this music is hollow and ornate. The instrumentation that we applaud in the "Sakuntala" overture, for instance, seems in particularly bad taste here. There are passages almost as meaningless as some of the thin pages of Rubinstein. The symphony as a whole will not long escape the same fate. If we must have such stuff, why not give the slow movement by itself, and to the ash barrel with the remainder?

Christian Sinding's "Rondo Infinito"? was played for the first time in Boston. Sinding is a rabid modern, inevitably and strongly influenced by Wagner, but at the bottom of his highly organized personality, a Norseman, a Berserker, a splendidly militant personality, who stands nearer the epical Wagner than any other modern composer. His "Rondo Infinito" is mightily characteristic of him and his gloomy, tremendous, volcanic region. Between the treading measures, ever pressing forward, there are fitful pauses, and the voice of inexorable fate is heard. But on, and on. Under the lowering cliffs, the ice, the gray skies of the North, eternal, unvanquished fires burn fiercely and forever. One day, when the world shall have come to an end, these fires will flame up, triumphant, all-devouring. Sinding is very conscious of the downfall of the gods. Meanwhile, the ice and the cliffs, the wind and the sky. To me, these are superb pages.

TRANSCRIPT,
NOVEMBER 20, 1909

THE MUSIC OF YESTERDAY

NUPTIAL GOLDMARK AND A NEW VIOLINIST

"The Rustic Wedding" Revived After Many Years at the Symphony Concerts —Mr. Noack Appears as a Poised and Polished Violinist—A New Piece by Sinding and with Familiar Traits—Mischance Gives "Aida" Two Tenors at the Opera—The Conservatory Orchestra Begins a New Series of Concerts—Rabaud for Another New French Composer

There is no need to hold a brief for Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" Symphony, its hold on the symphonic form may be the feeblest, but if its melodious reveries did not instantly commend it to popularity, its mere subject matter would. As it came back to awaken the resonance of Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, after a silence of several seasons, it had its welcome in prompt and prolonged applause. It had, indeed, after the nuptial ecstacies of the fourth movement, that most flattering of all welcomes—the instant's hush that precedes the rattle of hands. For more solid fare came Saint-Saëns's violin concerto No. 3, in B-minor, played by Mr. Sylvain Noack, the second concert-master of the orchestra, for his début as soloist, with an elegance and grace of style which suited well to Saint-Saëns's polished phrases. For a conclusion, the North had a season of tempestuous chant in Sinding's "Rondo infinito" coming to its first performance in Boston.

Long as Goldmark's epithalamium is, and various as are its episodes, when heard complete it is not hard to understand why the fourth movement, "In the Garden," is so often isolated on orchestral programmes. In it and particularly in its middle section, the composer has uttered most of what he had to say. The variations of the first movement are full of feature; they may half be conceived as flying sketches of many of the shy beauties and rough, humble folk who walk in the wedding procession of its theme. The quirks and changes of rhythm and harmonic treatment of the subject could be something even more intimately pictorial, perhaps a dozen little miniature family portraits, all showing, like the theme, some distinguishing trait of kindred physiognomy. Yet the stuff of the symphony is not in this. The "Bridal Song," again is full of galety and tenderness; it is brightly attuned to the nuptials, yet the kernel of the matter is not here, nor yet is it in the Serenade, though that section boasts a theme with an odd turn which, for its hint of the union of sacred and secular, almost outdoes the ritual itself for a definition of the marriage tie, with its dual relation of the flesh and the spirit. Both are in the music-religion and pathology, Christian awe of the marriage sacrament, and pagan joy in its rite. Thus the third movement; but the great discourse is reserved for the fourth. The rest of the work may lack structure; but here it has been achieved. So deft and so definite is it that it might plainly be represented by diagram. Here also, is a finer discrimination in the apportioning of the melodies. The structure builds itself from hush to intensity, and drops again to the whisper of the opening. There is measureless romance and tenderness in the opening measures, and their repetition at the close of the movement. There is plentiful passion in its discourse midway. From first to last, therefore, there is every opportunity for the least imaginative, the least ruminative auditor to read into its measures every private mood of which he is capable. Is it any wonder that the "Rustic Symphony" is popular?

There was genial warmth, and withal a kindly humanism in Mr. Fiedler's reading of its score. Conductors have been known who held themselves aloof from "this sort of thing." Mr. Fiedler enunciated its ardors as a sympathetic but rather scholarly rural priest might have united a well-favored pair, genially tolerant of a state which personally he may not covet. It may be said, in passing, however, that Goldmark's pair are endowed with much finer feeling than we are wont to suppose of rustics. Presumably they are rustics with a dash of academic flavor, or a couple who have fled the town to celebrate their union in the country.

Mr. Noack played Saint-Saëns's concerto in a manner to call down upon him the benedictions of a Parisian audience; it called down the energetic applause of an assemblage of Americans. His playing was supple, elegant and sure of poise; it apprehended and rendered the composer's dominating sense of form; it rounded his periods, and polished his phrases to that grace of diction so prized by the French in any of their arts. If Mr. Noack's tone is never heavy, it is rarely otherwise than clear, and it articulates the passages of technical difficulty with as smooth a tongue as its oily legato. There was a certain reticence in the playing, even in Saint-Saëns's rapturous flourishes of the finale. It was the reserve of the artist who has noticed how raptures destroy the proportions. In a performance of such perfect finish and high polish it was the more surprising that the flageolet tones at the conclusion of the slow movement sounded a bit husky. The rest of Mr. Noack's playing left an impression of refined and subtle, if somewhat conscious, artistry. Saint-Saëns's B-minor concerto was a judicious choice. It was one stylist playing another.

Sinding's music to Holger Drachmann's ballad of the Norse fighter is quite as enigmatic as the verses. But it is vigorously expressive of the wildness and ferocity of the legend and the times. From first to last, its quality is uneven, its beginning is vividly dramatic—clashes steel, hammers surf, rocks the Scandinavian forest pines in the shock of tempest, blares, rages, guffaws and broils like the wild breed of the North. Again, the counterpoint of its monkish episode lapses into tedium. The recurring subject matter of the first part restores its glamor of legend and romance, causing it to stride in even wilder and more grotesque heroics. At its close, too, the score is adroit in coloring. Sinding has taught his orchestra to shout in strangely contrasted voices: has pitched his instruments to a thrilling pagan tumult. The rhythm of its opening moves to a ballad measure, and the same metre recurs at the close. One may not with certainty pretend to full comprehension of Drachmann's weird verses. Sinding's fiercely exultant orchestra is hardly more lucid as a narrative; but pictorially it opens rugged vistas upon mountain and fiord. And its crashes sound the shock of Vikings in joyous battle.

L. P.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Mr. Hess and Mme. Samaroff to Play for the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra—Delius for the First Time at the Symphony Concerts—Mme. Carreno's Return

Tomorrow evening, in Symphony Hall, comes the first of the season's concerts in aid of the Pension Fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The programme for the occasion shows several happy choices. Mr. Hess is to play Mendelssohn's violin concerto, which should display his artistry in its most pleasing vein; Mme. Olga Samaroff has elected Schumann's epic Concerto for pianoforte in A-minor, which is, in its own kind, similarly suited to her style and range of expression. Two excerpts from "Die Walküre," both old favorites of the concert hall, the "Ride" and Wotan's Farewell and the Magic Fire Scene, conclude the programme, and for opening number comes Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring."

Quite apart from the attractiveness of the programme the concert merits interest for the excellent purpose of the series. The pension fund of the orchestra recognizes one of the dilemmas that beset the lives of artists. "Art is long," sighs Goethe, "and generally underpaid," adds an honest manager. At present, no less than fourteen former members of the orchestra, who have, in their day, added to the enjoyment of thousands their share of the symphonies, are drawing pensions, and in most of these cases this item of support is most necessary to their maintenance. The pension fund must depend chiefly for its resources on the receipts of its yearly concerts, for, while each member of the orchestra pays annual dues to the fund, the proceeds from the concerts must be ample if they are to maintain the principal in a healthy state of growth. Within the organization of the Symphony Orchestra is provided a means for caring for its superannuated players—and thus for answering the reproach against the public for its neglect of the artists who have served them in days gone by. To perform its share in this admirable scheme the public has only to respond to one of the most attractive programmes of the season. Its work is done for it; and what certainly is a duty has been converted into a pleasure. Sunday night's concert should be played to a large audience.

On the programme of the seventh Symphony concert for Friday afternoon, Nov. 26, and Saturday evening, Nov. 27, stands one of the important novelties of the season —Frederick Delius's "Paris." Mr. Fiedler's baton will conduct its first performance in America. Delius is in a sense claimed by two countries. By parentage he is German. By nativity he is English. It was not until he was well into his twenties that he went into music seriously. His first important public recognition followed a concert of his works given in London, at which Alfred Hertz, at present the leader of the German operas at the Metropolitan, conducted. Since then his works have been quite generally played, especially at festivals of new music. "Paris" bears the subtitle of a "Nachtstück," and, in further parenthesis, "The Song of a Great City." The composer would render, in his ample score, the cries, echoes, songs and sounds of Paris streets in a free, fantasia form. Incidentally the work abounds in technical difficulties.

The soloist, Mme. Olga Samaroff, has chosen, to the general satisfaction, that old war horse of piano concertos, Rubinstein's No. 4 in D minor. In detail the programme is:

Mozart: Symphony in E-flat Major, No. 3.
Rubinstein: Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in D-Minor, No. 4.
Frederick Delius: Night Piece, "Paris."
Wagner: Overture to the opera "Rienzi."

[60]

THE BOSTON JOURNAL
NOVEMBER 20, 1909.

NOACK IN DEBUT AT THE SYMPHONY

Orchestra, Back From Tour, Draws Season's Biggest Audience.

Back from the most successful tour in its history, the Symphony Orchestra drew to the matinee yesterday one of the biggest audiences of the season.

The principal attractions were a new soloist--though not a new acquaintance--in the person of Sylvain Noack, second concert-master of the banner band, and a new orchestral piece, Christian Sinding's "Rondo Infinito."

Small and Agreeable.

Mr. Noack is small and agreeable. So is his tone. In fact, his tone is so soft, so shrinking soft, that it could not be caught in all parts of the hall. His style has surety, suppleness, smoothness. The modest, fastidious appearance of the soloist himself gave the right cue for the entire performance. There were caressing tones; tones that cooed like doves; dreamy tones, feathery tones falling like snow. In a miniature form, the effect was charming. But of dramatic instinct there was barely a suggestion.

Mr. Noack chose for his debut the second Saint-Saens concerto, in B minor. In the first movement there was no particular impression. The melody in the second movement was played exquisitely, delicately. Here the soloist was most effective, and after the movement there was warm applause. The "spring-sun smiles" conjured up were never in any danger of bursting into hearty laughs. After the performance the audience applauded vigorously, recalling Mr. Noack several times.

Samaroff Next Week.

The contrast to this linked sweetness long drawn out came in the crashing climaxes of the orchestral novelty, the "Rondo Infinito," with suggestions that might be traced to the Stadium when the Yale Greeks meet the Harvard Greeks. The same "berserker rage" pictured so vividly by the Norwegian composer will be transferred today to the gridiron to make a holiday for 40,000 athletic enthusiasts. It requires some mental gymnastic enthusiasm to appreciate the strenuous strains of the Sinding music. The contrast between the sugar-coated Saint-Saens concerto and the Sinding rondo was almost startling in its extremity.

The concerto began with a delightful performance of Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony. It was, for an exception, a program of the works of living composers.

Next week Olga Samaroff will be the soloist, playing the Rubinstein piano concerto in D minor, and the orchestral novelty will be Frederick Delius' "Paris; the Song of a Great City," the third Mozart symphony and the overture to Wagner's "Rienzi" will complete the program.

FIRST PENSION FUND CONCERT

Tomorrow night brings the first of the season's concerts in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and it is expected that not only the good cause for which this concert is given, but the attractiveness of the program itself will draw an audience which will completely fill Symphony Hall.

The pension fund of the orchestra depends chiefly for its existence on the receipts of the two concerts which are given each year, for while each member of the orchestra pays yearly dues to the fund, the several thousand dollars from the concerts are necessary to keep the principal in its proper state of growth. At present no less than fourteen members of the orchestra are drawing pensions, and in the majority of these cases these pensions are most necessary to the comfort of their lives.

It is the effort of the orchestra always to give concerts which will be most attractive to the public, and for this time they seem to have succeeded most notably. Mme. Olga Samaroff, than whom there are few more popular pianists in this country, has volunteered her services, as also has Professor Willy Hess, the much-admired concert master and virtuoso of the orchestra. Mr. Fiedler has arranged the following program:

Overture, "In the Spring" .....Goldmark
Concerto for violin in E-Minor ...Mendelssohn
Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra in A-Minor .....Schumann
Wotan's Farewell and the Magic Fire Scene from "Die Walkure" .....Wagner Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure" .....Wagner

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
NOVEMBER 20, 1909

TONAL RELAXATION AT THE SYMPHONY

GOLDMARK'S "RUSTIC WEDDING" SINGS ITSELF

Programme, However, Ends With Sinding's "Rondo Infinito"; So All Tastes Are Satisfied.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Goldmark. "Rustic Wedding" Symphony.
St. Saens. Violin Concerto, No. 3.
Soloist, Mr. Sylvain Noack.
Christian Sinding. "Rondo Infinito."

One cannot tell by the trunk of an elephant what his tail will be like. One cannot tell by the beginning of a concert just how matters are going to end. At first this concert roared as gently as a sucking dove, but it ended in the most modern vein of vehemence.

Theorists have disputed as to whether Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" is a Suite or a Symphony. We suggest a compromise by calling it a Sweet Symphony, which it certainly is. It was just as well, in the midst of an operatic season, to come to a symphony whose themes sing themselves. Goldmark hasn't a new theory, or a puzzle-proposition, or an unresolved dissonance, in this entire symphony. The "programme" or story of this instrumental work does not leave one in doubt as to its purport as Strauss's "Monsieur, Madame et Bebe" sometimes do in his domesticated symphony. The gentleman loved the lady, they married, and they lived happily ever after, is a succinct statement of the meaning of the music.

Good melodies never grow stale, whether they be Bach's "Around Thy Tomb" or Bizet's "Habanera," and in the gentle tunes of this innocent prattler we forgot Richard Strauss and Reger and all the gigantic ones of the present. The symphony was tonal relaxation pure and simple.

One must remember that this symphony does not deal with Peasants, it is not a "Bauern-Hochzeit," but a Wedding in the Country. Its beginning with a simple march theme, and variations which are not so simple, was made very effective in a certain way. Such Variations always form a good dress parade of the individual excellences of the orchestra, and one could hear the horns, violins, contrabasses, trombones, bassoons, flutes, clarinettes, trumpets, and oboes, file by, each exhibiting its specialty in its own variation. All gave a good account of themselves, and the auditor had a good lesson in instrumentation. Especially excellent was the rapid pizzicato work on the contra-basses, and the grand climax near the close, when the whole orchestra with the battery (bass-drums, cymbals and triangle) gave a bombastic summing-up of matters.

The Serenade movement was very dainty, like a playful conversation of a couple of the guests, while the rusticity of the duet above a drone bass made a delicate contrast to it, which Mr. Fiedler brought out well.

"In the Garden" also contains a dialogue, but of a much more sentimental character. In this we gather that the violoncellos are deeply in love with the violins. Mr. Fiedler chaperoned the two very discreetly.

The Finale is musically the best movement. Possibly this pictures the wedding feast. If it was not frugal it was at least fugal—in its beginning. Its opening counterpoint was excellently balanced and the strings deserve much credit for their work. A fine climax was made and the audience testified its delight at the work and its performance by very spontaneous applause.

Rubinstein, in his "Conversation in Music," says that he considers Symphony a much higher form than opera. While not wholly agreeing with this dictum in all cases, we must admit that there is a deeper pleasure in even such a simple symphony as this, than in many a more ambitious operatic display of vocal fireworks. In this the personal element is obliterated, in the other it reigns supreme.

Sylvain Noack is second concert-meister of our orchestra, a place filled for a time by that excellent performer, Mr. Czerwonky. He is almost as broad-toned as his predecessor, he is a musician of good rank, and his surety is delightful to listen to. After the wonderful bowing which Mr. Kreisler has recently exhibited in Boston, one comes to demand exorbitant things of our violinists. Almost all violin playing is thrown somewhat in the shade for the present. But setting aside all comparisons, Mr. Noack's work in the St. Saens' Concerto was most effective and artistic.

The work itself is not of the very first rank. St. Saens has, as Raff once had, the fatal gift of facility, and writes concertos by the bunch. He does not have to wait (as Tschaikowsky or Hugo Wolf did) until the spirit moves him. This kind of musical manufacture has its drawbacks.

The first movement, for example, said nothing more novel than "How do you do?" "Glad to see you!" "Fine weather, isn't it?" "Goodbye," "Very fine weather," "Goodbye," "Oh, Goodbye." It said goodbye more often than this, but the above will give our idea.

The second movement was but diluted Mendelssohn, but Mr. Noack played this so beautifully that it won great applause, and his performance deserved it. Especially fine were his harmonics at the end of this movement. But this part was, after all, badly placed, for we had had sweetness enough in Goldmark's work. Why pour molasses upon honey?

The finale was the best part of it all. for it was charming in its melodies and well worked-up. Again Mr. Noack played brilliantly and his high position work and harmonics were most praiseworthy. He was recalled three times with much enthusiasm.

Our Scandinavian composers are tuneful even in the midst of their intensity. The Rondo which closed the concert would have startled the old masters, who always made this form suave and pleasing. From the very first this was military and triumphant, a Tale of a Viking. Military effects and military scoring were prominent, and a March theme entered almost at once. Piccolo yells and screams, and drum rolls, were copious. Yet amid all the tumult there was a distinct and intelligible melody. A couple of sweet themes gave contrast to this "Berserker rage," and in these the horn had some delicate work to do and did it finely.

Perhaps the name "Rondo" came from the constant reiteration of a single figure, which represented the Berserker. It was of four notes—b-flat, F, g, E-flat—the capitals representing the accents. This figure was omnipresent. We are afraid that Sinding's work (which we much enjoyed) will be found too tuneful to win the suffrages of the modern misery-hunters.

A strange event took place at this recital, which ought not to go unrecorded. When Mr. Fiedler came upon the stage a lady deliberately and unabashed—took off her hat!!!! That no men fainted at this unexpected action is due to the fact that few males were sitting near her.

MONITOR,
NOVEMBER 20, 1909.

* * *

At the Symphony concerts Friday afternoon, Nov. 25, and Saturday evening, Nov. 27, Mr. Fiedler will give the first American performance of "Paris," a work by the English composer, Frederick Delius. Mr. Delius describes his composition as a night piece, or a song of a great city. The work is in free fantasia form, is scored for a large orchestra and presents numerous difficulties for the performers. The soloist of these concerts will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, who will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, No. 4. The program in its entirety is as follows:

Mozart, Symphony in E flat major, No. 3; Rubinstein, Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in D minor, No. 4; Frederick Delius, night piece "Paris" (first time in America); Wagner, overture to the opera "Rienzi."

* * *

THE SUNDAY HERALD,
NOVEMBER 21, 1909.

SYMPHONY PLAYS IN SIXTH CONCERT

Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" and Violin Concerto by Mr. Noack Are the Features of the Entertaining Program.

The Symphony orchestra gave the sixth event of the season last evening in Symphony Hall. Mr. Fiedler conducted. The program was as follows:

Goldmark.....Rustic Wedding symphony
Saint-Saens.....Violin concerto in B minor
Sinding.....Rondo Infinito

For those who enjoy charming melodies, varied instrumentation and the occasional pompousness of Goldmark's style, this symphony, or suite, as it might better be called, is ever fresh and pleasing. The variations of the first movement are scored for the various sections of the orchestra in turn and it would be difficult to know which is the most interesting. Had Mr. Fiedler paused a moment longer after the allegro pesante (seventh variation) the audience would have applauded.

The "Bridal Song" and "Serenade" were given with great delicacy and sweetness. The "Garden" scene and the last movement were, as usual, the most interesting to the audience, and at the close of the numbers Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra were stormily applauded.

Mr. Noack played Saint-Saens' concerto in a masterly fashion. His tone is not so large as some who have been heard in this concerto, but it is remarkably pure, sweet and true, and the technique he showed last evening was perfect, both as regards the positions and the bowing. The tones are as round and clear at the top of the E string as lower down, and in staccato as in legato.

The first movement showed the vigor and crispness of his style, and this was further illustrated in the last movement, which was played with great dash and brilliance. It was a pleasure to watch Mr. Noack. He has no mannerisms, and his modest, unaffected, business like performance was most satisfactory. The Siciliano was, perhaps, a shade too matter-of-fact, but it is far better so than over-sentimental.

The "Rondo Infinito" of Sinding was the only work on the program new to Boston. It is a stormy, noisy composition, with march-like rhythms and dash. There is but little melody. A short episode for strings is the only breathing space given to audience or orchestra. As a showy end to a program it has its function, but anywhere else on a program it would prove hard and bare.

POST, NOVEMBER 21, 1909

OLGA SAMAROFF,
Pianist, to play this evening in Symphony Hall.

The first of the pension fund concerts will be given this evening in Symphony Hall. The pension fund of the orchestra depends chiefly for its existence upon these concerts, two of which are given each season. At present no less than 14 members of the orchestra are drawing such pensions. It is the effort of the orchestra to give upon these occasions programmes which will be particularly attractive to the large public. This evening Mme. Samaroff, the popular pianist, will play the Schumann piano concerto. Professor Willy Hess, the concertmeister, will play the Mendelssohn concerto. The remainder of the programme will offer Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring"; Wotan's Farewell and the Magic Fire Scene, and the Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure."

The programme of the sixth rehearsal and concert of the Symphony orchestra will present a novelty, Sinding's "Rondo Infinito," also Goldmark's symphony, "The Rustic Wedding," and Mr. Sylvain Noack, the second concertmaster of the orchestra, who will play Saint-Saens' violin concerto in B minor. The "Rondo Infinito" is a musical rhapsody on a strange poem by the Norwegian, Holger Drachmann. Here is a free translation of the verses:

Yes, often with dread have I been seized
—In strength I am not a dwarf—
When in lonely hours I have been thinking;
Now like oakum they pluck me asunder;
They lacerate the fearless Berserker,
In quick haste cruelly thrusting
Their probes into all his wounds.

Upon dissecting table they place him
—In strength I am not lacking—
But I fear even their knives.
In combat I am a valiant Berserker,
But the work of the surgeon follows;
Alas! Leave his body in peace
As long as in life he rejoices.

My hand you clasp. It causes a shudder
—I am not deficient in strength—
And we sit by the hearth together,
Reading the legend of a priest-mark,
Of a dissolute, tonsured Berserker
Who died, and Satan led him away
And the monks crossed themselves. Amen!

Five hundred years—then they unearthed him,
And thereupon a work was written
Of what once he had done and accomplished.
Before us he suddenly appears—mark!
As the faithful and proud Berserker of the Lord,
Satan and his sins have disappeared!
His great deeds alone remaining.

My hand you clasp, but without a shudder.
Thanks be to you that I have pride and strength!
Filled with happiness we remain together;
Five hundred years—and they will unearth me—mark!—
Like the priest, and write a work
And efface all unworthy actions,
And then "the brothers" sing their Amen!

Richard Strauss will not finish his new opera, "Sylvia and the Star," until 1912.

[61]

TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1909

TWO SYMPHONY CONCERTS

IS BOSTON TOO USED TO THE ORCHESTRA?

The Moral of the Regular Concert on Saturday and of the Pension Fund Concert on Sunday—The Remarkable and the Distinctive Qualities of the Orchestra That Shone in the Two Performances—Mr. Hess as the Virtuoso of Mendelssohn—Mme. Samaroff's Ripening Talents—New York Hears an Orchestral Piece by Ravel

Our neighbors in New York, who hear the Symphony Orchestra only once a month and who in the intervals are exposed to other bands, say that we in Boston have become so familiar with its virtues that we take them too much for granted. We need, they say in their large metropolitan way, a short but tonic course in orchestral comparisons. For a week, if only we had the opportunity—and also the endurance—we might listen to one orchestra after another, then hear our own, and finally rise in new, spontaneous and just admiration of it. Unfortunately, from this comparative point of view, other orchestras do not come often to Boston, and when they do this musically crowded town usually slights them. Now and then, however, a regular Symphony Concert, like that of Saturday night, or an occasional one, like that for the Pension Fund of the orchestra on Sunday, provides in itself this very point of reawakening and newly stimulating comparisons. After many years of neglect, Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" was revived on Saturday night—triumphantly revived, indeed, to such reiterated and general applause as few purely orchestral pieces have gained at the concerts. The easy intelligibility of the music, its clear moods, varied picturing, frank, melodic charm, warmth of color and warmth of fancy plainly captivated the audience, relaxed for once in a way from the usual gravities and intensities of the concerts.

Now, Goldmark's music in the symphony—or the suite as the purists prefer to call it—happens to be very transparent and diversified music, that depends much for its insinuating charm upon the technical felicity with which it is performed. The march, the twelve variations and the finale that make the first movement are as so many mirrors of the different instrumental choirs; while Mozart's or Haydn's symphonies are not more luminous and exacting of the woodwinds than are Goldmark's "Bridal Song" and "Serenade." Each group of the strings has its turn in the ensuing love-scene, and in it Goldmark is as solicitous and imaginative with his horns as Brahms himself. Very eminent singers say that few tasks are so arduous as to sing into phonographs, because they record with minute and relentless exactitude what they receive. Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," light though it be, as symphonic music goes, is as relentless in its insistence upon technical felicity and its revelation of technical shortcoming. It sets the players no mere difficulties in skill, executant as Strauss's "Zarathustra" or d'Indy's symphony is difficult. Anybody, so to say, can play his part in "The Rustic Wedding" as so many notes. The real difficulty is to gain the varied loveliness or the clear incisiveness of tone, the unfailing euphony of the different choirs and of different instruments particularized for the moment, the delicate suffusions and the delicate contrasts of the instrumental coloring, the rhythmic variety and aptness, the pleasant mood of quickly coming fancies that animate the whole. The orchestra on Saturday night missed not one of these qualities, summoning and enhancing them all. Mere technical skill had its perfect work; Mr. Fiedler's conducting, especially in its choice of pace and nicety of accent, served the music well; but to both the men of the orchestra added the discriminating felicity in quality and euphony of tone, the sensitiveness not merely to general mood and design but to particular melody or phrase or figure that are their distinctions in their kind. They played equally as imagining composers and executing virtuosi.

The concert proceeded with Saint-Saëns's concerto for violin and orchestra in B minor, and the omniscient programme book cited Dr. Neitzel on the "sombre determination" and the "stormy passion" of the music. The good doctor, who at the Symphony Concerts two or three years ago reduced one of Beethoven's piano concertos to dry bones disposed in mathematical patterns, believes that all music is, or ought to be, heavily, thoughtfully, resolutely German. He will have none of a concerto written as an adroit, elegant and fanciful exercise for violin and orchestra. He has Ysaye on his side with this concerto of Saint-Saëns, and the violinist used to inflate it to his big and strenuous tones. Elman, in his turn, cannot help setting the hot fire of his youth darting through Saint-Saëns's polished middle-aged manners. Mr. Noack of the orchestra, who played the solo part on Saturday, took the other view. His tone is exquisite in its fineness, a delicate arabesque of sound, all half-tints in its shadings, all little curves and figures in its suppleness. He had indeed a truly Sarasatean finesse of execution and sensitiveness to the lightest subtleties of tone. He was bound, therefore, to take the concerto on its graceful, adroit and lyric side. The conductor and the orchestra dutifully accepted his view, and the delicate lightness and elegance of tone with which they wove the background, the symmetry which they gave to the whole, and the fashion in which they answered Mr. Noack's subtleties of shading with equal subtleties of their own, was a feat of finesse that scarcely a band, the world over, could match. And then, in a moment, they were off in the bold orchestral clamors, the broad, high instrumental colors, the slashing rhythms, the empty sturm und drang of Sinding's "Rondo Infinito." They filled it at least with sonorous and vitalizing sound.

Thought of all this came readily and regretfully at the concert for the Pension Fund of the orchestra last night, when the audience, fine as it was in quality, no more than half filled Symphony Hall. The orchestra gives so much and asks so little. It is so preëminently a body of concrete and present achievements of the very first order in their kind. It is so plain that its men make it, as well as its conductor and founder and manager. It is the chief artistic attribute of Boston, the one artistic glory in which we can match the world, prove that we cherish the best, bid the world applaud us and find it responding gladly. If we have become too accustomed to the Symphony Orchestra, the outside world knows at least that it is rare and precious and splendid—a possession to stir whatever artistic and musical blood may run in us. Twice a year its men ask a very little time and a very little money of us, and give as much pleasure in return as though the Pension Fund were not in question at all. They have asked a little more urgently of late, because the fund is beginning to fulfil its purpose and the demands upon it increase. The response, last night, did us small honor, but there was no abating of the pleasure that immediately requited us. The men scanned the house with a touch of chagrin, but in their playing was no hint of their disappointment.

Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," began the programme—a piece of sheer lyric exultation in the long breaths, the heady odors, the kindling sights and sounds of the spring. The rebirth of the world set Schumann's blood a-humming, and he sang spontaneously through a whole symphony of the spring. It kindled Goldmark, and as spontaneously he unleashed his imagination in the pulsing, mounting melodies, the glow of instrumental color, the exuberant dots and dashes of adorning sound that fill the overture. It is instrumental bravura, but rapturous and songful, as all bravura ought to be, and it came stirringly so from Mr. Fiedler and his men. They passed to Dukas's scherzo of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice"—brilliant music, narrative and pictorial music and in all three aspects exacting music. Virtuosi must play the introduction of the weaving of the magic spell and virtuosi with a sense of mystery and magic as well as technical skill. On goes the music with the tonal and rhythmical picture of the broom turned water carrier and bringing a deluge upon the house. The mood and the expression of it are of brilliant and exuberant orchestral fantasy. The scherzo turns psychological, graphic of the fear that overwhelms the sorcerer's presumptuous servitor that dared the spell. The mood rises to that of Gargantuan fantasy. In stalks the mighty sorcerer, breaks the charm, jerks the broom back to its corner, and in the jerk the music and its brilliant magic ends. The piece must go like vivid improvisation on an orchestral scale, and it had players last night who could seemingly improvise it equally out of their technique and their imagination. It would be easy to quarrel with the music of Wotan's farewell to Brünnhilde, of the decking of her on her rocky bed, of the call to the fire god and the spitting and the gliding of the flame, of the solemn imprecation of the departing deity, and of the solitude of the sleeping Valkyr, when it is shifted from "Die Walküre" in the theatre to make a "Wagnerian excerpt" in the concert-room. From beginning to end, it is music that accompanies visible and specific action, and that makes as well the climax of a tragedy in which for three hours the listeners have shared. It would be easy also to quarrel with the pace at which Mr. Fiedler took it to the slurring of its breadths and intensities and culminations of tone. Yet the impression was less of them than of the gorgeous and the thrilling tonal splendor with which the orchestra clothed the whole, of the passion and the power of its eloquence. The din of the Valkyrs' ride followed, and it was a heroic and hurtling tumult. If only the curtain could have risen to such an introduction; but it never does—or does so seldom—here in Boston.

Mr. Hess, the concert master of the orchestra, and Mme. Samaroff, who has often appeared at its regular and its occasional concerts, had proffered their services for the Pension Fund—he to play Mendelssohn's Concerto for violin and she Schumann's for piano. Once more, in Mr. Hess's playing was proof that with a discerning executant Mendelssohn's better music can give almost as much pleasure today as it did fifty years ago. Nowadays style is all things in the playing of Mendelssohn, and Mr. Hess is a discriminating master of style. The concerto is a little model of clarity; melodies, structure, development and ornament are limpid; the violin part is like a fine tonal strand laid upon the orchestral background or interwoven with it; the music runs with a subdued brilliance and a poised and quiet elegance that for once betray hardly a trace of the reflection that has wrought them. The concerto asks an equal poise, lucidity, grace and fineness in the virtuoso that plays it. He has no occasion for his big and poignant tones. He must summon the pure and fine, the edgeless and flowing voice of the violin. He must lead that voice through the graceful melodies, the fanciful development and the light ornament of the first movement—it is "molto appassionato" only in Mendelssohn's affectionate imagination—through the gentle reverie of the Andante and the bright bravura of the finale. And in all this the tone must keep its fine brightness, its quality of a shimmering and shaded strand in the tonal web, its perfect elasticity. The technical mastery must have its unobtrusive but exquisite aptitude. There must be nothing too much and nothing too little in expression, while a poised elegance must glamor the whole. A slip, a blur, an overemphasis or an under, and the music is like an accusing mirror. Old as the concerto is, it remains a criterion of some of the subtle and delicate perfections of violin playing. Mr. Hess lacked not one of them. Concert master and quartet leader though he may only seem in the crowded routine of our musical days, a rare virtuoso of the violin lives and works in Boston and now, seemingly, in the varied richness of his powers.

Mme. Samaroff is clearly ripening, and upon the side on which she most needed quickening. She has passed the stage in her progress when technical problems of execution need to preoccupy her, and she has won a tone that is her own in its crystalline quality of clear and rounded sound. Often heretofore it has been too cool, too detached from the more imaginative and emotional quality of the music it was bearing, too little susceptible to the reflections of mood, to the play of tonal color that its very clearness fitted it unusually to impart. Mme. Samaroff has always chosen her pace understandingly, and she has been alert to rhythm, but she has held to both, once they were chosen, too rigidly. She has needed a finer sensitiveness, and through it a more supple freedom. Her playing has been too much of the cooly comprehending and the securely poised Olga Samaroff, and too little of the dreaming or the impassioned composer who had written her music. Now it was quite impossible to Schumann to write a piano concerto in the ordinary sense of the word as a formal and a displaying piece. He might nurse the purpose in the abstract, but once set to work he was bound to become Schumann, the romantic visionary, all a-tremble with moods and fancies, all aglow with images of melancholy or passionate imagining, that strove in him for songful expression. And in the Concerto he had the voice of the piano, with which he had often worked his will, to aid him with the orchestra that usually balked him. With the piano he could sing above and with the orchestra, such a song of mounting and thrilling intensity as the slow movement. He could keep its voice singing with the changing accent of his changing moods through the finale. He could forget the business of a concerto as a vehicle and make its first movement richly lyrical and impassioned song. His is the songful concerto, because Schumann, no matter what the form, cannot help being the romantic singer. Last night, Mme. Samaroff, as never before here, was the dreaming and feeling singer too. Her tone was as crystalline as ever; but instead of its cool and steady glitter, came varied coloring and diverse reflection of the endlessly sensitive Schumann. Even in the Concerto he is not quite articulate and the orchestra does cumber him, as it does in his symphonies. He needs all the aid that the pianist can give him in gradations of pace, in variety of accent. Again as never before here, Mme. Samaroff clarified, diversified and moulded the music diviningly and by every token the responsive imagination, the illuminating feeling, the sensitiveness to design that have been lacking in her playing are beginning to quicken it. The more the pity, then, that she whose absorbed simplicity used to commend her to the eye now cultivates tricks of manner with hands and head. Before long, unless she subdues them, the mocking cynics will call them her affectations.

H. T. P.

BOSTON JOURNAL—NOVEMBER 22, 1909.

MME. SAMAROFF AND WILLY HESS PLEASE

Are Soloists at Symphony's Pension Fund Concert, a Brilliant Affair.

Mme. Olga Samaroff, the pianist, and Professor Willy Hess, concert master of the orchestra, were the soloists at the Symphony Pension Fund concert at Symphony Hall last night. There was a large audience, though the hall was not filled. The concert was one of the most brilliant the orchestra has ever given on a pension fund night.

Professor Hess played for the first time in Boston the Mendelssohn-Bartholdy concerto in E minor, a brilliant, melodious work that gave both soloist and orchestra ample room in which to exhibit their highly polished power. The popular concert master performed in his most captivating style. Few of the violinists with whom Bostonians are acquainted show the fullblown art —the grace and the energy, the delicacy and the brilliancy—that distinguishes the playing of Professor Hess. Last night the orchestra rivaled him in virtuosity. Great applause rewarded them, and a big wreath of laurel was sent up to the soloist.

Mme. Samaroff also played a piece that she had never attempted here before, the Schumann concerto in A minor. It proved a very suitable selection, at any rate Mme. Samaroff has never given a better all-around exhibition in Boston. Besides the characteristic elegance, there was a dashing force that supplied the necessary contrasts and that made the performance as a whole a work of the finest art. Again great applause, and again a floral tribute to the soloist, this time a huge bunch of yellow chrysanthemums.

The orchestral program included the Goldmark overture, "In the Spring," the Dukas scherzo, "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," which brought out the full dazzling brilliancy of the orchestra and the extraordinary sympathy exercised by Conductor Fiedler; and Wotan's farewell, the magic fire scene and the Valkyries' ride from Wagner's "Die Walkuere."

HERALD

NOVEMBER 22, 1909.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

Enthusiastic Audience Hears Symphony Orchestra at Its Best.

A concert in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given last evening in Symphony Hall, with the following program:

Goldmark, overture, "In the Spring"; Mendelssohn, violin concerto, in E minor; Dukas "L'Apprenti Sorcier"; Schumann piano concerto in A-minor; Wagner, "Wotan's Farewell," "Magic Fire Scene," "Ride of the Walykries."

Mr. Fiedler conducted and Mme. Olga Samaroff and Willy Hess were the soloists.

The orchestra was at its best last evening. Goldmark's exulting, joyous overture proved a happy choice so far as the audience was concerned. It started the enthusiasm which lasted throughout the evening.

The soloists are so well known in Boston that comment on their playing is not necessary. It is sufficient to say that Mme. Samaroff gave Schumann's concerto in her usual excellent style, with clear technique and rhythmic swing. She also contributed to the pleasure of the occasion by being most beautifully and artistically gowned. Mr. Hess' playing of Mendelssohn's concerto was also pleasing. This dainty composition is always a favorite and Mr. Hess gave it very well.

Dukas' impish symphonic poem, suggested to the composer by Goethe's ballad, was a most effective contrast to the last movement of the Mendelssohn concerto. Both might be called fairy music, but Mendelssohn's sprites are sunny and cheerful, while Dukas' are little black hobgoblins, such as play tricks on Hallowe'en. One is almost tempted to look behind to see if there is a grinning little object on the back of one's chair.

The Wagner music was superbly played.

BOSTON GLOBE—NOVEMBER 22, 1909.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

First of Season in Aid of Pension Fund.

Mme Samaroff and Prof Hess Share Honors With Fiedler's Men.

An audience, which made up in cordial demonstration what it may have lacked in size, heard Mr Fiedler and his men, in a delightful program with Prof Hess and Mme Samaroff as soloists, in the season's first pension fund concert at Symphony hall last night.

Goldmark's joyous, ebullient overture, "In the Spring," at once enkindled the audience into a responding glow, and set a spirited pace for all that was to follow.

Dukas' whimsical tone-picture, heard last April. "The Socerer's Apprentice," "after" Goethe's ballad of mingled impudence and humor, divided the two concertos—Mendelssohn's enjoyably familiar one in E minor for Prof Hess, and Schumann's in A minor for Mme Samaroff.

Superb renditions of Wotan's "Farewell" and the "Magic Fire Scene" and of the "Ride of the Valkyries", from "Die Walkure" completed the program.

Last evening the orchestra played with perhaps an even more apparent sovereignty of expression than usual. Their playing was the surest, most cogent and most eloquent confirmation of the very appeal which constituted the purpose of the concert.

Any means to perpetuate and increase a fund whose function it is to insure the necessities and comforts of life to the members of the orchestra after encroaching age or illness shall have incapacitated them for further active membership, is most laudable and is deeply worthy of the sincere interest of every Bostonian, who realizes the indisputable supremacy of the orchestra among kindred organizations, and who appreciates the work of the men who have made it, and of those to come who shall maintain it.

The average length of service in this orchestra is said to be but 15 years.

The program last night carried an exceptional appeal to every lover of music, in the artistry of the soloists which it offered in the added opportunity to enjoy, on a night perhaps more agreeable to many than is Saturday, the puissant musicianship of Mr Fiedler and the band, and particularly in this chance to hear Wagner once again in Symphony hall read and played as Mr Fiedler and his men can read and play him.

It was a strong program, with assurance of admirable and convincing presentation, yet there were empty seats in the hall.

Of the performance itself last evening, the unusually eager and spontaneous applause of the audience spoke sincere and just commendation.

Prof Hess played the always welcome concerto by Mendelssohn with a fine animation which enhanced his accustomed breadth and dignity of style.

Mme Samaroff made her piano pleasurably vocal, with a regard for tonal purity and an unfailing beauty of melody.

As has been said, in the Dukas Mr Fiedler and the orchestra fairly outdid themselves in depicting the brilliance, and withal, the excruciating drollery of this odd musical concert.

The splendidly dignified, thrillingly sonorous performances of Wagner were the gladly welcomed return of this master. Notwithstanding his sphere is properly the lyric theatre and not the concert room, it seems a regretable distinction to silence his voice when our conductor and orchestra can impart to it such eloquence.

[62]

ADVERTISER,
NOVEMBER 22, 1

MUSIC SYMPHONIC AND OPERATIC

PENSION FUND CONCERT FULL OF ENJOYMENT

Saturday's Two Operas Brilliant—Miss Davenport's Great Success as Lakme.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Goldmark. "In the Spring." Overture.
Mendelssohn. Violin Concerto.
Soloist, Prof. Willy Hess.
Dukas. "The Sorcerer's Apprentice."
Schumann. Concerto for Piano.
Soloist, Mme. Olga Samaroff.
Wagner. "Feuersauber."
Wagner. "Walkyrenitt."

Naturally a concert where everyone, from the cymbal player to the soloists and conductor, volunteers his services for a good cause, is not a case for criticism. But were this ban lifted one could only sing praises of one of the most enjoyable concerts of the season—that given in Symphony hall, last night. The deep and soulfelt enjoyment of great symphonic music ought not to be eclipsed by the glitter of operatic performance. The two schools are often opposite and they are in no sense rivals.

The good purpose of these Pension Fund concerts ought never to be lost sight of by Bostonians. In a recent number of "The Boston Weekly Review" the symphonic conductor, Mr. Max Fiedler, speaks of "Boston and the Orchestra." He pays a generous tribute to Boston life and manners in this article, and ends with the following earnest appeal for his men:—

"And I want Boston to realize that we of the Symphony Orchestra are all men together and could do nothing without each other. I think that Boston fully understands and appreciates its great orchestra as a whole—but I sometimes wonder if it does not forget the individual musician. Among so many it is hard to realize that each is essential to the whole, and that each is a living man as well as a single instrument in a great harmony. I wish to see a time when the thought of advancing years shall have no terror for any man who gives his life and his soul to making that orchestra one of the very finest musical organizations in the world. I want to feel that no financial panic, no adverse conditions whatever can keep every seat in Symphony hall from being filled on the night of a Pension Fund concert—and that, sooner or later, the beneficence that Boston so generously displays in other directions will provide for the old age of its splendid body of musicians."

The above shows that Mr. Fiedler is not only a great conductor, but a great-hearted man as well.

The programme was admirably contrasted. Goldmark's "In the Spring" has flutings and pipings and warblings of birds, and has not a suggestion of flannel chestpads, and mustard poultices, and hot footbaths, such as the New Englander associates with Spring. It was a vivid contrast with the two last numbers of the concert, which were as fiery as the first was soothing. The Dukas number was most brilliantly played.

There are many horse races in orchestral music. Raff has a runaway in the finale of his "Lenore" symphony; Berlioz whips up a lively span in his "Ride to Hades," more fearful than a ride in a New York horse-car; Frau Holle drives a lively team in "Im Walde;" but nowhere else can we find such a musical horse show as in the "Ride of the Walkyries." The wild fervor of the piece, the whinneyings, the fierce delight of the war-maidens, were points that were finely brought out in the performance.

The two soloists and their respective concertos were in charming contrast. The suave Mendelssohn and the earnest and much deeper Schumann made good foils to each other. The Mendelssohn concerto is one of the very few violin concertos that stands the test of age. We have our doubts if the infinitely more complex Brahms concerto will wear as well.

Mendelssohn's work is a neutral ground where classicist and amateur may meet. It is tuneful, yet it is developed; it satisfies all the demands of the formalist, yet it is not at all dry or rigid. It displays the virtuoso finely. In one point, however, the jealous composer shows himself. Usually the personal display of the cadenza comes in the coda of a concerto, but in this work Mendelssohn placed this display in the middle of the development section, the centre of the movement, that the soloist should not win a success at the composer's expense. It is needless to say that Prof. Hess gave the brilliancy and the sentiment of the concerto in a perfect fashion. Boston may be proud to possess such a violinist.

We have a profound admiration for the artistic work of Mme. Samaroff. Yet when she recently gave a concert in Symphony Hall with Miss Farrar, with solos of ambitious character, without orchestra, we felt that the picture was not in the right frame, that we preferred her in Jordan or Chickering Hall in that kind of work. Last night she was at her best, in her true surroundings, in a work that had depth and earnestness, rather than display, and where the piano was interwoven with an orchestra. She revealed here the poetic as well as the technical side and the Schumann concerto was one of the glories of the concert. Both soloists were recalled many times and in addition received floral tributes and laurel wreaths.

With these two concertos side by side one could not but sense how infinitely broader Schumann was than Mendelssohn, and wonder why the world should ever have allowed an over-estimate of Mendelssohn to stand as a barrier in Schumann's path. It will be perceived that, while all the performance was powerful, the last half of the programme was intrinsically greater than the first half.

BOSTON POST,
NOVEMBER 22, 1909

SAMAROFF AND HESS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY OLIN DOWNES

Professor Willy Hess, violinist, and Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist, were soloists at the first Pension Fund concert of the season, last night in Symphony Hall. The programme consisted of Goldmark's Spring overture; the Mendelssohn violin concerto and the Schumann piano concerto; Dukas' Scherzo, the Sorcerer's Apprentice; Wotan's Farewell and the Magic Fire Scene, and the Ride of the Valkyries, from Die Walkure.

The concert went off very brilliantly. The overture is one of the most glowing creations of Goldmark. For once in musical literature it is deserving of its name. The Scherzo of Dukas is the wittiest idea in modern music and the workmanship, the crackling instrumentation, are quite beyond praise.

Professor Hess was happy in his choice of the Mendelssohn concerto. He is past master of its technics and content. He played it with both spirit and refinement, without attempting to give it more significance than it has. He did not hurry the finale until it became an indistinguishable bundle of notes. Mme. Samaroff, who appeared the personification of youth, played the Schumann concerto with a degree of poetry and sympathy such as has rarely been equalled in Symphony Hall.

Like Mr. Hess, she kept the concerto within its compass. How lovely were the fresh, if short-breathed melodies under her singing fingers, and how simple, winning, was the charming allegretto as she interpreted it without the customary sentimentality and at a tempo that allowed its flowers to bloom, but never pass their first freshness.

Yet the excerpts from Wagner towered high above everything. They were played magnificently, and a delighted audience, not as large as it should have been, dispersed homeward.

MONITOR,
NOVEMBER 22, 1909.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

TWO brilliant concerts on successive nights in Symphony hall, the regular Symphony concert on Saturday evening and the pension fund concert on Sunday evening, were given by "Mr. Fiedler and his incomparable men," as a New York critic last week styled the Boston orchestra.

The Saturday concert brought into notice the member of the orchestra who shares with Concertmaster Willy Hess the first desk of the first violins, Sylvain Noack. He disclosed for the first time to the Boston public his power of solo tone and execution in a performance of the Saint-Saens Violin Concerto in B minor. The second concert brought forward the concert master of the orchestra himself, who played the Mendelssohn violin concerto; and Mme. Olga Samaroff, the American pianist who a few weeks ago appeared in this city in joint concert with Geraldine Farrar and who will appear again Friday afternoon of this week in the seventh Symphony rehearsal and Saturday evening in the seventh concert.

The program of the concert in which Mr. Noack was soloist was as follows: Goldmark, Symphony, E flat major, No. 1, "Rustic Wedding," op. 26; Saint-Saens, concerto for violin and orchestra in B minor, No. 3, op. 61; Sinding, "Rondo Infinito," op. 42 (first time in Boston).

The program of the first pension fund concert, in which Professor Hess and Mme. Samaroff were soloists, was as follows: Goldmark, overture, "In the Spring"; Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, concerto in E minor for violin, op. 64; Dukas, "Sorcerer's Apprentice"; Schumann, concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in A minor; Wagner, Wotan's Farewell, the Magic Fire Scene and the Ride of the Valkyries from "Die Walkure."

Madame Samaroff is having a brilliant season in America under the direction of Mr. Ellis. Recently she appeared with the Philadelphia orchestra and next month she is to appear with the orchestras of Pittsburg and Chicago. In the Schumann concerto Sunday evening she made a more definite disclosure of her powers than she made at the Farrar concert. When she played Widor's fantasia she showed skill in bringing out the meaning of the composer as he expressed himself through his musical structure, though she showed no more skill in this direction than should be expected of a well-trained concert pianist. In her performance of the Schumann concerto Sunday evening she was irrisistible in those conversational passages between piano and orchestra wherein light touch and sprightly phrasing best give the composer's idea. Indeed she far outdid the leader of the orchestra in delicacy of sentiment and in vivacity of mood.

Mr. Noack's playing of the Saint-Saens concerto Saturday night showed the second concertmaster to have a tone of wonderfully pure quality and with it a severe, almost cold style of phrasing. Tone seems to be the thing Mr. Noack has spent his life in acquiring and apparently he has been willing to let other things which enter into great violin playing remain second to it. He has a pure tone, a rich tone, as near a uniform tone from highest to lowest register as is ever heard to sound from the strings of a violin. He has no wish, virtuoso-like, to make the expression of the solo instrument tower above that of the orchestra. He does not wish to dominate the music through the intellectual energy of his phrasing. He is willing to let his part in the concerto become subordinate if circumstances make it necessary. He will conquer only by his tone. His success with the audience of Saturday night was unquestionable. That tone was something they never heard before, something they would be glad to hear again.

TRANSCRIPT,
NOVEMBER 27, 1909

The Symphony Concert.

Last winter, Mr. Fiedler almost forgot Mozart, and found room for one of his symphonies only at the final pair of concerts as a strange yoke-fellow to Beethoven's choral symphony. Now, he is more wary, and the symphony in E-flat major, of the climacteric three, began the concert yesterday afternoon. For the most part, Mr. Fiedler, like a wise conductor, was content to let the music flow and concentrate himself upon the quality of tone with which the band might sing it. Mr. Gericke used to make Mozart brittle, seeking a needless incisiveness of accent. Mr. Fiedler avoided that pitfall, but he could not resist the temptation to drain the Andante to the dregs. By this time the scholars are fairly sure that the slow movements of eighteenth-century music went less slowly than do the similar episoles in the symphonies of our time. Mr. Fiedler, however, is not of their mind. His pace in the Andante would have been slow, even in latter-day music; it turned Mozart's into "linked sweetness long-drawn out," so drawn, indeed, that the flowing song almost dropped, phrase by phrase upon the ear. For the rest, Mr. Fiedler was adroit and comprehending enough. He did not try to turn Mozart emotional in the modern sense; he kept the grace of the minuet, and he made the final movement run brightly. Of course, Mozart must be played in a symphony concert nowadays, with twice or thrice the number of instruments for which he wrote. Such numbers in themselves do thicken the tones that Mozart heard as he wrote, and do make the shimmering filaments of figure and ornament too much akin to gold lace and brocade. There is no escaping in the modern concert-room this magnifying of Mozart. The point is to keep that body of tone as light as possible, and there Mr. Fiedler oftenest succeeded, even if he did not make it quite so transparent and edgeless as Mozart's music sounds to the fancy when it forgets that a symphony orchestra—huge machine—is playing it. It is easy to believe that Mozart would have been afraid of what our youngsters cheerfully call their forces.

The orchestral Mme. Samaroff who played Rubinstein's concerto yesterday has advanced equally with the romantic and sensitive Mme. Samaroff of Schumann's concerto at the concert of Sunday. Give her such a concerto as Tschaikowsky's or as Rubinstein's and her playing is instinct with an alert, finely strung and coolly concentrated power. Then Mme. Samaroff is like a pianist with wrists and fingers and mind and spirit behind of finely tempered steel. Whatever may be her own trepidations, the impression to her hearers is a fine—not a heavy—power that is all alertness, elasticity and quick concentration. She matches the orchestra with a voice as clear and authoritative as its own. Early in the concerto declaims the melody whence much of the first movement is to spring. Mme. Samaroff made it so eloquent, so masterful that it seemed to still the interrupting orchestral voices and then subdue them to its bidding. This power gained in elasticity, began even to have a kind of white fire of its own as the long movement advanced. There were momentary fusions with the other voices of the music, but always they were subsidiary or accessory voices. Never was a piano concerto more a piano concerto, not in display of the instrument, but in its dominance of the whole. Throughout Mme. Samaroff held to this largeness. The slow movement was songful but with an ample eloquence, as though the music and the piano were not things to be sentimentalized. Came the final rondo and the piano seemed to shepherd and drive the orchestra before it. Mme. Samaroff's long sweeps of tone were like long lashes playing over its heads. Her masterful fire drove the orchestra before it. Her power mounted with the climax, but her hand was as firm and alert upon it as it had been from the beginning. Those who dislike piano concertos like to call them futile contests between piano and orchestra. Mme. Samaroff, for once, left no doubt which was the master. H. T. P.

JOURNAL,
NOVEMBER 27, 1909.

DELIUS INTRODUCED AT THE SYMPHONY

Orchestra Plays "Paris, a Night Piece," With Great Artistry.

MME. SAMAROFF IS THE SOLOIST

Plays Rubenstein's Concerto in D Minor, No. 4, and Is Much Enjoyed.

Frederick Delius, composer, was introduced to American music lovers at yesterday's Symphony matinee. A Boston introduction was especially appropriate in view of the circumstance that Mr. Delius has been described by a distinguished foreign authority as "a half-brother of Charles Martin Loeffler of Boston." And Boston, too, is the headquarters of the far-famed Appalachians, whose favorite mountains Delius has honored with a tone-pome; but that is another story.

Delius was born in Yorkshire, England, in 1863. At about the age of 20 he went to Florida to look after some orange groves. What he chiefly cultivated down South was music. He studied in Leipsic for a couple of years and then he settled down in France, studying by himself and writing.

Mistaken for German.

Ten years ago he presented himself in London as Fritz Delius and was mistaken for a German and generally misunderstood. The piece played here yesterday for the first time in this country is known as "Paris: A Night Piece." It was written ten years ago and first played in Elberfeld, Germany, in 1905, by the city orchestra under Dr. Hans Haym, to whom the extraordinarily interesting nocturne is dedicated.

There is a greater resemblance to Debussy than to Strauss in this Delius of the Parisian night piece. There is no turbulence, no frenetic climax. The kaleidoscopic picture has a subdued tone, varied now and then by shrill notes, as of some pedler crying his wares or some brazen urchin or grisette flaunting authority in the face; and there are even melodious suggestions of merry celebrations. The piece is modern in the most extreme sense of that term, but yet clear enough in its expressiveness to create a mood and arouse the imagination. The work was played as probably only the Symphony Orchestra could play it, with great artistry and sympathy; and the audience applauded in a manner that plainly indicated a desire to hear the piece again.

Rubinstein Concerto.

Mme. Olga Samaroff, the soloist of the afternoon, played the Rubinstein concerto in D minor, No. 4, which was presented at a Symphony concert three years ago by one of her teachers, Ernest Hutcheson, and two years ago by Paderewski. Mme. Samaroff's performance was very much enjoyed by the audience. The orchestra gave a charming interpretation of the Mozart symphony in E flat major. It had the true Mozartian grace and elegance. The final number was the overture to Wagner's "Rienzi."

D'Indy's second symphony will be repeated next week by request. Mme. Schumann-Heink and Mr. Longy, the leading oboe player, will be the soloists.

SYMPHONY IN CAMBRIDGE

The third Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given on Thursday evening, Dec. 16. The soloist will be Mme. Olga Samaroff, who will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor. The orchestral numbers will be Bantock's "The Pierrot of the Minute," Schumann's symphony in G major and Tschaikowsky's "Nut-Cracker" suite.

HERALD
Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second Boston symphony concert, Max Fiedler, conductor, will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, December 7, and will present as soloist that justly admired pianist, Mme. Olga Samaroff, who will play Liszt's Concerto, No. 1, in E flat major. Mr. Fiedler announces as the symphony, Goldmark's fascinating "The Rustic Wedding." The other number will be Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

[63]

BOSTON GLOBE-
NOVEMBER 27, 1909.

DELIUS' "PARIS" FOR FIRST TIME

Wild Night of Org. is Set to Music.

Symphony Enthusiasts Hear a Remarkable Production.

Mme Samaroff's Art on the Piano Wins Applause.

For every euphonious platitude of orthodox musical creed which Mr Fiedler and the orchestra expounded in Mozart's "E Flat" major symphony yesterday afternoon they added doubly distilled heresy in the cacophonous profanities of a new musical pagan, Hone Frederick Delius.

Surely this latest rebel from the faith will cause the guardians of appreciable form and intelligible melody much grief. He is a bold and wanton offender. Because of a conductor abreast of the times, and an orchestra which can work up complex scores quickly, Boston is down to the minute in the ways of orchestral literature.

The performance yesterday of Delius' "Paris: A Night Piece (The Song of a Great City)"—its first in America—could only give the general contour of the work, with its eagerly following train of quick-lived, sharply-varied episodes, kaleidoscopic swiftness and vividity of outline, surging chaos of myriad voices, high-sounding splendors of their beat and din, plangent dissonances, the lull of receding tumults and a passing melody overheard to fill it, the swift-pacing stride in the wake of the crowd, its feverish unrest, its fickleness, its caprices, its sordidness, its superb animalism, its picturesque abandon.

In Philip Hale's entr'acte in the program book of the week he quotes August Spanuth as calling Delius "a new musical dramatist." Whatever character the composer presupposes his work to have, the subject suggests material and treatment never declining to jaded repose, and mounting, on the contrary, to quite the apotheosis of bohemian hilarity.

When Paris Wakes Up.

One hearing shows the piece to be impressionism of a highly differentiated type. Delius begins, presumably, with drowsy twilight, that mopy, waking hour when properest Paris arouses itself to the sober duties of another night. On the hazy, gray line of a rumbling pedal point in the basses, the bass clarinet announces the first melodic sign of life. The oboe follows, and then the horn with themes of more decisive and eager expectation. Follows then a crescendo of pulsing, throbbing tone and the night is on.

Save for a moment's pause within doors now and then, to watch the ingratiating danseuse pirouette to piquant music or to hear a ballad to pig-sung in some cafe, the work is gorged with the clamor of humanity and its complexity of warring moods. Once initiated into Parisian night-time mysteries, the pace runs on unflagging, until in gigantic dissonant chords—the first evidence of simultaneous polyphony—the revelers shudder, perhaps only yawn, at their orgy, and conclude to go home.

To those who hold that night was made for less mutinous infringement of the law, musical and otherwise, this new piece of impressionism will doubtless seem monstrous and deplorable. However, to others who occasionally fancy the sweetness of rebellion and the clangor and stress of life, it will be fascinating, absorbing and thrilling.

Mme Samaroff's Pure Technic.

Rubinstein's D minor concerto for piano is strangely uneven. The first two movements are distinctive and vital. The closing allegro is often prolix and tedious. Notwithstanding, Mme Samaroff played the work with fine effect. Beginning the massive opening chords with verve and the degree of abandon essential to the spirit of the work, the pianiste continued the movement with much animation, which was attributable in no small degree to the sureness, precision and clarity of her technic.

Mme Samaroff played the second movement with unfailing beauty of tone. Her phrasing showed the utmost nicety in balance and proportion. She carried the last movement through its waste places and finished triumphantly with repeated recalls to the stage.

The Mozart symphony had the clearness, tonal beauty and fine fleetness which may have been expected from this orchestra. Wagner's Rienzi overture was clangorous and militant.

ADVERTISER.
NOVEMBER 27, 1909

NEW WORK PRODUCED AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

"A NIGHT PIECE," BY DELIUS, A "STUNNER"

Mme. Samaroff Plays Rubinstein's Concerto in D Minor—Wagner's "Rienzi" Overture the Finale.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Mozart. Symphony in E-flat major.
Rubinstein. Piano Concerto in D minor, No. 4.
Soloist, Mme. Olga Samaroff.
Delius. "Paris." A Night Piece, for Orchestra.
Wagner. "Rienzi" overture.

As a rule, Haydn wears better in his symphonies than Mozart does. Haydn always remains frankly simple and naive, while Mozart sometimes becomes dramatic, which places him in competition with a more modern style, to his detriment. But three of his symphonies are imperishable, the three that he composed in 1788, the G minor, the "Jupiter" and this "clarinette" symphony. Mozart was the father of the clarinette, so far as symphonic work was concerned, and this is the first symphony that uses the instrument.

For all that, he understood the instrument so little that he turned out the oboes from his score, to make room for it. The ghostly character of the lower register of the instrument he did not understand at all, and it remained for Weber to bring in this "chalumeau" in his Incantation scene in "Freischuetz," and for Mendelssohn to use it in his "Scotch" symphony.

But, apart from the interesting experiment here made with clarinette, the work itself is intrinsically fine. Its first movement is always interesting,—a good example of a clear "sonata-allegro," and its slow movement is also charming. Its Minuet is conventional, but the jig-like swing of its finale is quite attractive and was given in a rollicking fashion by the orchestra. But generally Mozart's symphonies excite the modern musician about as much as Richardson's "Clarissa Harlowe" would thrill the modern novel-reader.

Rubinstein's concertos are all "Clavier-maessig," well-suited to the piano, but not really great works. The composer was given to padding when his ideas ran out. Besides this he had the pianist's fault when composing such a concerto; he placed his favorite instrument in the lime-light all the time. Now a true concerto should be, like Beethoven's G and E-flat major concertos, a symphony with a thread of solo, or "obbligato," running through it. This Rubinstein and Liszt failed to allow because they loved the piano best, and Chopin also failed because he knew very little about the orchestra.

Mme. Samaroff played the work with a power that was truly masculine. Yet she did not force the instrument or ever produce an ugly or metallic tone. Her playing was full of good taste and careful attention to ensemble. In the slow movement she was deliciously clear and phrased and shaded beautifully. And it was such keen enjoyment to listen to a clear and poetic melody! In the finale her wrist-action in octave and chord work was most powerful and effective. Altogether she made the most of the concerto; but we wished her the Tschaikowsky B-flat or the Grieg concerto instead; she would have done still better.

The work by Delius stunned us. We have been in Paris several times, but we never knew that it was as bad as that. We tried to catch some of the meanings. Possibly the scales suggested the excellent fish suppers "chez Marguery's" in the Boulevard Poissoniere.

The fierce skips may have alluded to the Bal Bullier. The strange dissonances may have pictured the indignation at the amount of the bill presented at the Cafe de Paris after a frugal repast "a deux." Most of the work was simply a noise, very skilfully scored. Save for the fact that some typical Paris street cries are utilized, the picture might as well represent New York or any other metropolis. The work ran in alternate layers of racket and calm. There were catchy refrains probably sung by nocturnal roysterers (after the absinthe had got in its work) that were repeated over and over again, and sometimes suddenly hushed, as if a Gendarme had commanded "Circulez, Messieurs"! It was a hubbub made with malice aforethought.

We do not deny that the work might improve on repeated hearing, but we do not long to hear it again, in spite of its undeniable skill. Even here we think that the composer missed an opportunity, for it would have been more poetic to have ended with calmest dignity, intimating that the stars were still shining, above the petty turbulence of men.

After the English-French circus came a German-Italian one. Yet there are impressive points in the "Rienzi" overture. The Prayer was especially well-treated in the performance, both in its broad and massive style and in its diminution. Wagner has here beaten Meyerbeer on his own ground. There is a strong kinship between this work and some part of "The Huguenots." Altogether, then, after the Mozart calmness had passed, the concert was an exciting one even if not dealing in music that could be called absolutely great.

BOSTON POST.
NOVEMBER 27, 1909

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY OLIN DOWNES

The programme of the seventh public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall: Symphony in E-flat, Mozart; piano concerto in D minor, Rubenstein; "Paris, a Night Piece" (The Song of a Great City), Fritz Delius (first time); Overture to "Rienzi," Wagner.

Mme. Olga Samaroff, soloist, gave a praiseworthy performance of a concerto that is now old. The pianist who plays the composition abounds with which the battering-ram passages with which ing must be an unusually tactful individual. In certain places Mme. Samaroff's tone was unpleasant. Saving this, and such lapses were the exception, her performance was scholarly, poetic, and beautifully pianistic. The work is essentially for the virtuoso, but the piano became a component part of a whole. The performance was not a series of answering phrases between instrument and orchestra, strung together by a thunderous tutti here and there. The first movement again stood out an enduring structure. The playing of the cadenza was notable for imagination and the manner in which it bound the coda with what had gone before. The sentimentality of the andante was not disguised, but neither, thank heaven, was it syruped. Mme. Samaroff has strength and virtuosity ample to cope with the exorbitant demands of the wind-up.

After a first hearing of a composer heard for the first time it is difficult to arrive at any conclusive opinion of Delius' "tone poem." Though the workmanship is sure, the scoring ultra-modern, but very clear, it is plain that we have to do with an arch-impressionist, and one cannot become acclimated to his style in 20 minutes or less. New men, who have not acceded to the customs of the multitude, are difficult to reckon with on preliminary acquaintance.

The short phrases that go to make this poem are, it is said, for the most part fairly literal transcriptions of street cries of Paris. They are employed with great skill, but it now seems that the music as a whole lacks any decided, characteristic physiognomy. One could trace Wagner and the modern Frenchman, but to tag a passage with a brand-new "Delius" was more difficult. Most of the phrase could be found in other textbooks.

There are those who accuse Delius of following in the footsteps of Charpentier, but it appears that "Paris" was written a year before "Louise," that Delius was not acquainted with the music of Charpentier at the time. Undoubtedly there is imagination, distinction, in this remarkable score; but where is the individual note the more evident, in the remarkable combining of timbres, or the material, itself? Hugo Wolf had more imagination than most, but he fell far short when he wrote his "Penthesilea." Delius' partition looked very appetizing on paper, but made only a partial impression when performed.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—NOVEMBER 28, 1909.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

No symphonic work that Mr Fiedler has presented during his engagement here seems to have made a more profound impression than d'Indy's second symphony, which was played Nov 5 and 6. A large number of requests have been made for a repetition, and in response to these Mr Fiedler put it on the eighth program, which will be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

There will be two soloists — Mme Schumann-Heink, who sings with the orchestra for the first time in two years, and Mr Longy, the justly admired solo oboe of the orchestra.

Mme Schumann-Heink will sing the "Vitellia," recitative and aria from Mozart's "Titus," and Gounod's "Stances de Sapho." Mr Longy will play Handel's concerto for oboe and string orchestra, which has not been heard at a symphony concert since Mr Sautet played it in the early spring of 1888. The final number will be Wagner's "Huldigungs" march.

Cambridge Symphony Concert.

The third Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given on Thursday evening, Dec 16. The soloist will be Olga Samaroff, who will play the Rubinstein concerto in D minor. The orchestral numbers will be Bantock's overture, "The Pierrot of the Minute"; Schumann's symphony in C minor and Tschaikowsky's "Nut-Cracker" suite.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second Boston Symphony concert will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, December 7, and will present as soloist Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist, who will play Liszt's concerto No. 1 in E flat major. Mr. Fiedler announces as the symphony Goldmark's fascinating "The Rustic Wedding." The other number will be Richard Strauss' tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

TIMES
Washington, D. C.

MADAME SAMAROFF WILL BE SOLOIST

The second Boston Symphony concert will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, December 7, with Madame Olga Samaroff, who will play Liszt's Concerto No. 1, in E flat major, as soloist.

Mr. Fiedler announces as the symphony, Goldmark's fascinating "The Rustic Wedding." The other number will be Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
From Globe
Address Bos.
Date Nov 25-09

Not All Our Fault

WHEN the stranger comes to this town and sees the "Musical Comedy" of The Girl from Pinkydora—or whatever the name may be—he wonders at the size and enthusiasm of the audience. But as he looks at some of the faces he decides that, being New Yorkers, we are getting just about what suits us—that we like it thin and "easy."

If a fellow prefers stale beer to good wine let him have it. But if this visitor while here should attend a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra he would see overflowing audiences equally appreciative and of a very different quality.

Our diet of stale beer is compulsory, not from preference. We can distinguish the abysmal gulf between the Boston Symphony and The Girl from Pinkydora.

Our Spartan endurance of the worst does not prevent our enjoyment of the best.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
m PHILA. LEDGER
ress PHILADELPHIA PA.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 6. There will be two soloists, Madam Schumann-Heink and Mr. Georges Longy, the justly admired oboe soloist of the orchestra. Madam Schumann-Heink will sing the "Vitellia" recitative and aria from Mozart's "Titus" and Gounod's "Stances de Sapho." Mr. Longy will play Handel's concerto for oboe and string orchestra. The orchestral numbers will be Weber's overture to the opera "Der Freischutz," Brahms' Second Symphony in D Major and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture.

In the afternoon, at 3 o'clock, at Witherspoon Hall, Mr. Hess, the concertmeister, will appear in string quartet with the Hess-Schroeder Quartet and Paul Krummeloh, the Philadelphia pianist.

m RECORD
ress PHILADELPHIA, PA.
NOV 28

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 6. There will be two soloists, Madame Schumann-Heink and Mr. Georges Longy, the oboe soloist of the orchestra. Madame Schumann-Heink will sing the "Vitellia" recitative and aria from Mozart's "Titus" and Gounod's "Stances de Sapho." Mr. Longy will play Handel's Concerto for oboe and string orchestra. The orchestral numbers will be Weber's overture to the opera "Der Freischuetz," Brahms' Second Symphony in D Major and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture.

m PRESS
ress Philadelphia, Pa.
NOV 28 1909

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 6. There will be two soloists, Madame Schumann-Heink and Mr. Georges Longy, the justly admired oboe soloist of the Orchestra. Madame Schumann-Heink will sing the "Vitellia" recitative and aria from Mozart's "Titus" and Gounod's "Stances de Sapho." Mr. Longy will play Handel's concerto for oboe and string orchestra. The orchestral numbers will be Weber's overture to the opera "Der Freischutz," Brahm's Second Symphony in D-Major and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture.

[64]

BOSTON GLOBE-
NOVEMBER 27, 1909.

DELIUS' "PARIS" FOR FIRST TIME

Wild Night of Orgy is Set to Music.

Symphony Enthusiasts Hear a Remarkable Production.

Mme Samaroff's Art on the Piano Wins Applause.

For every euphonious platitude of orthodox musical creed which Mr Fiedler and the orchestra expounded in Mozart's "E Flat" major symphony yesterday afternoon they added doubly distilled heresy in the cacophonous profanities of a new musical pagan, Hone Frederick Delius.

Surely this latest rebel from the faith will cause the guardians of appreciable form and intelligible melody much grief. He is a bold and wanton offender. Because of a conductor abreast of the times, and an orchestra which can work up complex scores quickly, Boston is down to the minute in the ways of orchestral literature.

The performance yesterday of Delius' "Paris: A Night Piece (The Song of a Great City)"—its first in America—could only give the general contour of the work, with its eagerly following train of quick-ived, sharply-varied episodes, kaleidoscopic swiftness and vividity of outline, surging chaos of myriad voices, high-sounding splendors of their beat and din, plangent dissonances, the lull of receding tumults and a passing melody overheard to fill it, the swift-pacing stride in the wake of the crowd, its feverish unrest, its fickleness, its caprices, its sordidness, its superb animalism, its picturesque abandon.

In Philip Hale's entr'acte in the program book of the week he quotes August Spanuth as calling Delius "a new musical dramatist." Whatever character the composer presupposes his work to have, the subject suggests material and treatment never declining to jaded repose, and mounting, on the contrary, to quite the apotheosis of bohemian hilarity.

When Paris Wakes Up.

One hearing shows the piece to be impressionism of a highly differentiated type. Delius begins, presumably, with drowsy twilight, that mopy, waking hour when properest Paris arouses itself to the sober duties of another night. On the hazy, gray line of a rumbling pedal point in the basses, the bass clarinet announces the first melodic sign of life. The oboe follows, and then the horn with themes of more decisive and eager expectation. Follows then a crescendo of pulsing, throbbing tone and the night is on.

Save for a moment's pause within doors now and then, to watch the ingratiating danseuse pirouette to piquant music or to hear a ballad prettily sung in some cafe, the work is gorged with the clamor of humanity and its complexity of warring moods. Once initiated into Parisian night-time mysteries, the pace runs on unflagging, until in gigantic dissonant chords—the first evidence of simultaneous polyphony—the revelers shudder, perhaps only yawn, at their orgy, and conclude to go home.

To those who hold that night was made for less mutinous infringement of the law, musical and otherwise, this new piece of impressionism will doubtless seem monstrous and deplorable. However, to others who occasionally fancy the sweetness of rebellion and the clangor and stress of life, it will be fascinating, absorbing and thrilling.

Mme Samaroff's Pure Technic.

Rubinstein's D minor concerto for piano is strangely uneven. The first two movements are distinctive and vital. The closing allegro is often prolix and tedious. Notwithstanding, Mme Samaroff played the work with fine effect. Beginning the massive opening chords with verve and the degree of abandon essential to the spirit of the work, the pianiste continued the movement with much animation, which was attributable in no small degree to the sureness, precision and clarity of her technic.

Mme Samaroff played the second movement with unfailing beauty of tone. Her phrasing showed the utmost nicety in balance and proportion. She carried the last movement through its waste places and finished triumphantly with repeated recalls to the stage.

The Mozart symphony had the clearness, tonal beauty and fine fleetness which may have been expected from this orchestra. Wagner's Rienzi overture was clangorous and militant.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

n .....

ress .....

.....

• • •

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 6. There will be two soloists, Madam Schumann-Heink and Mr. Georges Longy, the justly admired oboe soloist of the orchestra. Madam Schumann-Heink will sing the "Vitellia" recitative and aria from Mozart's "Titus" and Gounod's "Stances de Sapho." Mr. Longy will play Handel's concerto for oboe and string orchestra. The orchestral numbers will be Weber's overture to the opera "Der Freischutz," Brahms' Second Symphony in D Major and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture.

In the afternoon, at 3 o'clock, at Witherspoon Hall, Mr. Hess, the concertmeister, will appear in string quartet with the Hess-Schroeder Quartet and Paul Krummeich, the Philadelphia pianist.

• • •

ADVERTISER.
NOVEMBER 27, 1909

NEW WORK PRODUCED AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

"A NIGHT PIECE," BY DELIUS, A "STUNNER"

Mme. Samaroff Plays Rubinstein's Concerto in D Minor—Wagner's "Rienzi" Overture the Finale.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Mozart. Symphony in E-flat major.
Rubinstein. Piano Concerto in D minor, No. 4.
Soloist, Mme. Olga Samaroff.
Delius. "Paris." A Night Piece, for Orchestra.
Wagner. "Rienzi" overture.

As a rule, Haydn wears better in his symphonies than Mozart does. Haydn always remains frankly simple and naive, while Mozart sometimes becomes dramatic, which places him in competition with a more modern style, to his detriment. But three of his symphonies are imperishable, the three that he composed in 1788, the G minor, the "Jupiter" and this "clarinette" symphony. Mozart was the father of the clarinette, so far as symphonic work was concerned, and this is the first symphony that uses the instrument.

For all that, he understood the instrument so little that he turned out the oboes from his score, to make room for it. The ghostly character of the lower register of the instrument he did not understand at all, and it remained for Weber to bring in this "chalumeau" in his Incantation scene in "Freischuetz," and for Mendelssohn to use it in his "Scotch" symphony.

But, apart from the interesting experiment here made with clarinette, the work itself is intrinsically fine. Its first movement is always interesting,—a good example of a clear "sonata-allegro," and its slow movement is also charming. Its Minuet is conventional, but the jig-like swing of its finale is quite attractive and was given in a rollicking fashion by the orchestra. But generally Mozart's symphonies excite the modern musician about as much as Richardson's "Clarissa Harlowe" would thrill the modern novel-reader.

Rubinstein's concertos are all "Clavier-maessig," well-suited to the piano, but not really great works. The composer was given to padding when his ideas ran out. Besides this he had the pianist's fault when composing such a concerto; he placed his favorite instrument in the lime-light all the time. Now a true concerto should be, like Beethoven's G and E-flat major concertos, a symphony with a thread of solo, or "obbligato," running through it. This Rubinstein and Liszt failed to allow because they loved the piano best, and Chopin also failed because he knew very little about the orchestra.

Mme. Samaroff played the work with a power that was truly masculine. Yet she did not force the instrument or ever produce an ugly or metallic tone. Her playing was full of good taste and careful attention to ensemble. In the slow movement she was deliciously clear and phrased and shaded beautifully. And it was such keen enjoyment to listen to a clear and poetic melody! In the finale her wrist-action in octave and chord work was most powerful and effective. Altogether she made the most of the concerto, but we wished her the Tschaikowsky B-flat or the Grieg concerto instead; she would have done still better.

The work by Delius stunned us. We have been in Paris several times, but we never knew that it was as bad as that. We tried to catch some of the meanings. Possibly the scales suggested the excellent fish suppers "chez Marguery's" in the Boulevard Poissoniere.

The fierce skips may have alluded to the Bal Bullier. The strange dissonances may have pictured the indignation at the amount of the bill presented at the Cafe de Paris after a frugal repast "a deux." Most of the work was simply a noise, very skilfully scored. Save for the fact that some typical Paris street cries are utilized, the picture might as well represent New York or any other metropolis. The work ran in alternate layers of racket and calm. There were catchy refrains probably sung by nocturnal roysterers (after the absinthe had got in its work) that were repeated over and over again, and sometimes suddenly hushed, as if a Gendarme had commanded "Circulez, Messieurs"! It was a hubbub made with malice aforethought.

We do not deny that the work might improve on repeated hearing, but we do not long to hear it again, in spite of its undeniable skill. Even here we think that the composer missed an opportunity, for it would have been more poetic to have ended with calmest dignity, intimating that the stars were still shining, above the petty turbulence of men.

After the English-French circus came a German-Italian one. Yet there are impressive points in the "Rienzi" overture. The Prayer was especially well-treated in the performance, both in its broad and massive style and in its diminution. Wagner has here beaten Meyerbeer on his own ground. There is a strong kinship between this work and some part of "The Huguenots." Altogether, then, after the Mozart calmness had passed, the concert was an exciting one even if not dealing in music that could be called absolutely great.

BOSTON POST.
NOVEMBER 27, 1909

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY OLIN DOWNES

The programme of the seventh public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall: Symphony in E-flat, Mozart; piano concerto in D minor, Rubenstein; "Paris, a Night Piece" (The Song of a Great City), Fritz Delius (first time); Overture to "Rienzi," Wagner.

Mme. Olga Samaroff, soloist, gave a praiseworthy performance of a concerto that is now old. The pianist who plays the battering-ram passages with which the composition abounds without thumping must be an unusually tactful individual. In certain places Mme. Samaroff's tone was unpleasant. Saving this, and such lapses were the exception, her performance was scholarly, poetic, and beautifully pianistic. The work is essentially for the virtuoso, but the piano became a component part of a whole. The performance was not a series of answering phrases between instrument and orchestra, strung together by a thunderous tutti here and there. The first movement again stood out an enduring structure. The playing of the cadenza was notable for imagination and the manner in which it bound the coda with what had gone before. The sentimentality of the andante was not disguised, but neither, thank heaven, was it syruped. Mme. Samaroff has strength and virtuosity ample to cope with the exorbitant demands of the wind-up.

After a first hearing of a composer heard for the first time it is difficult to arrive at any conclusive opinion of Delius' "tone poem." Though the workmanship is sure, the scoring ultra-modern, but very clear, it is plain that we have to do with an arch-impressionist, and one cannot become acclimated to his style in 20 minutes or less. New men, who have not acceded to the customs of the multitude, are difficult to reckon with on preliminary acquaintance.

The short phrases that go to make this poem are, it is said, for the most part fairly literal transcriptions of street cries of Paris. They are employed with great skill, but it now seems that the music as a whole lacks any decided, characteristic physiognomy. One could trace Wagner and the modern Frenchman, but to tag a passage with a brand-new "Delius" was more difficult. Most of the phrase could be found in other textbooks.

There are those who accuse Delius of following in the footsteps of Charpentier, but it appears that "Paris" was written a year before "Louise," that Delius was not acquainted with the music of Charpentier at the time. Unquestionably there is imagination, distinction, in this remarkable score; but where is the individual note the more evident, in the remarkable combining of timbres, or the material, itself? Hugo Wolf had more imagination than most, but he fell far short when he wrote his "Penthesilea." Delius' partition looked very appetizing on paper, but made only a partial impression when performed.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—
NOVEMBER 28, 1909.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

No symphonic work that Mr Fiedler has presented during his engagement here seems to have made a more profound impression than d'Indy's second symphony, which was played Nov 5 and 6. A large number of requests have been made for a repetition, and in response to these Mr Fiedler put it on the eighth program, which will be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

There will be two soloists — Mme Schumann-Heink, who sings with the orchestra for the first time in two years, and Mr Longy, the justly admired solo oboe of the orchestra.

Mme Schumann-Heink will sing the "Vitellia" recitative and aria from Mozart's "Titus," and Gounod's "Stances de Sapho." Mr Longy will play Handel's concerto for oboe and string orchestra, which has not been heard at a symphony concert since Mr Sautet played it in the early spring of 1888. The final number will be Wagner's "Huldigungs" march.

Cambridge Symphony Concert.

The third Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given on Thursday evening, Dec 16. The soloist will be Olga Samaroff, who will play the Rubinstein concerto in D minor. The orchestral numbers will be Bantock's overture, "The Pierrot of the Minute"; Schumann's symphony in C minor and Tschaikowsky's "Nut-Cracker" suite.

TIMES

Washington, D. C.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second Boston Symphony concert will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, December 7, and will present as soloist Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianist, who will play Liszt's concerto No. 1 in E flat major. Mr. Fiedler announces as the symphony Goldmark's fascinating "The Rustic Wedding." The other number will be Richard Strauss' tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

MADAME SAMAROFF WILL BE SOLOIST

The second Boston Symphony concert will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, December 7, with Madame Olga Samaroff, who will play Liszt's Concerto No. 1, in E flat major, as soloist.

Mr. Fiedler announces as the symphony, Goldmark's fascinating "The Rustic Wedding." The other number will be Richard Strauss' tone poen, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

Not All Our Fault

WHEN the stranger comes to this town and sees the "Musical Comedy" of The Girl from Pinkydora—or whatever the name may be—he wonders at the size and enthusiasm of the audience. But as he looks at some of the faces he decides that, being New Yorkers, we are getting just about what suits us—that we like it thin and "easy."

If a fellow prefers stale beer to good wine let him have it. But if this visitor while here should attend a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra he would see overflowing audiences equally appreciative and of a very different quality.

Our diet of stale beer is compulsory, not from preference. We can distinguish the abysmal gulf between the Boston Symphony and The Girl from Pinkydora.

Our Spartan endurance of the worst does not prevent our enjoyment of the best.

m .....

ress .....

e .....

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 6. There will be two soloists. Madame Schumann-Heink and Mr. Georges Longy, the oboe soloist of the orchestra. Madame Schumann-Heink will sing the "Vitellia" recitati... aria from Mozart's "Titus" and... nod's "Stances de Sapho." Long... play Handel's Concerto for obo... string orchestra. The orchestral... bers will be Weber's overture... opera "Der Freischuetz," Brahms... ond Symphony in D Major and... ner's "Rienzi" overture.

• • •

m PRESS

ress Philadelphia, Pa.

e

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, December 6. There will be two soloists, Madame Schumann-Heink and Mr. Georges Longy, the justly admired oboe soloist of the Orchestra. Madame Schumann-Heink will sing the "Vitellia" recitative and aria from Mozart's "Titus" and Gounod's "Stances de Sapho." Mr. Longy will play Handel's concerto for oboe and string orchestra. The orchestral numbers will be Weber's overture to the opera "Der Freischutz," Brahm's Second Symphony in D-Major and Wagner's "Rienzi" overture.

[64]

TRANSCRIPT,
DECEMBER 6, 1909

News of the Day

Mr. Fiedler is beginning his preparations for the performance of Liszt's "Faust" symphony "in its entirety," for the first time in years at the Symphony Concerts. The first three movements—the character-pictures, as Liszt called them, of Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles—are purely orchestral, and Mr. Gericke played them in the final year of his conductorship. To them, Liszt added an epilogue, for orchestra, men's chorus and solo tenor voice, with a text from Goethe's "chorus mysticus" in which the "woman-soul" of Gretchen triumphs. It is this epilogue which Mr. Fiedler intends to perform, with a choir from the Apollo Club to assist the orchestra.

The concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in Christmas week are to take their usual course this year. Thus the afternoon concert will fall on the day before Christmas, Friday, Dec. 24, while the evening concert will fall on Christmas Day, Saturday, Dec. 25. At both, Mme. Carreño, the pianist, will appear with the orchestra.

MONITOR,
DECEMBER 6, 1909.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

In Symphony hall Saturday evening the Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, gave their seventh concert with the following program: "D'Indy," symphony in B flat, No. 2, op. 57; Mozart, "Recitative" and "Rondo" from the opera "Titus"; Handel, concerto for oboe and string orchestra; Gounod, stanzas of Sappho from the opera "Sappho"; Wagner, "Huldigung's March." The soloists were Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink and Georges Longy.

The two performances of the d'Indy symphony separated by an interval of but a month were easy to compare both in general spirit and in detail. Mr. Fiedler was evidently glad to be requested to repeat the work because he conducted in his most thoroughgoing manner. In some ways the December performance was better than that of November, for there was a precision in the second reading of the B flat symphony that was wanting in the first. Mr. Fiedler can be a precise conductor, can direct his musicians in the real Gericke martinet manner if he chooses to; and he can do it with modern music, too; he does not need to go back to century-old composers for types of classic severity. So the playing of d'Indy's work on Saturday evening was precise almost to stiffness, whereas the playing of it a month ago was flowing, jubilant.

The November performance made the third movement a scherzo, or at least made it decidedly good humored music; but the December performance made the third movement as sober as all the rest of the work; it even left out the little final quip which in November stirred the symphony audiences to a moment of laughter. M. Fiedler at this request performance put himself to the immense task of making a new interpretation. It was a more studied interpretation than the first; the contrasts were toned down, there was apparent endeavor to blend the symphony into a unity of mood.

Mme. Schumann-Heink in the Mozart aria controled the resources of her mezzo-soprano and of her contralto to the best results of self-expression. She has solved the problem of making a detached aria from a forgotten opera serve her concert purposes. The aria as she sang it portrayed certain easily recognized emotions; there was no attempt made to impersonate the character in the Mozart drama.

Mr. Longy's performance was not the kind to suit the taste of Arnold Dolmetsch, because it was done with a modern oboe and with the Handelian group of four-stringed instruments increased to the dimensions of a modern string orchestra; and in place of a tinkling harpsichord there was a grand piano. Mr. Longy could play the Handel concerto with Mr. Dolmetsch in a small hall before a small audience and feel some historic satisfaction in the performance; he could play it in its modern arranged form and be heard before his own Symphony audience and the imaginations of his listeners might reconstruct the Handelian tone picture if they wished from the modern enlargement of it. Mr. Longy was applauded, not like Mme. Schumann-Heink, who was recalled more times than any other soloist who has appeared on the Symphony platform this year, but he was applauded with the enthusiasm which the Symphony audiences show whenever one of the leading instrumentalists of the orchestra comes to the front.

TRANSCRIPT,
DECEMBER 4, 1909

THE MUSIC OF YESTERDAY

"FAUST" AND A SYMPHONY CONCERT

D'Indy's Second Symphony and Gounod's Opera for Extremes of French Music—Mr. Goodrich's New Talents as an Operatic Conductor—The Opera Orchestra in a New Light—Mr. Nivette's Mephistopheles for the Other Saving Grace of a Rather Tame Performance of "Faust"—Mme. Schumann-Heink and Mr. Longy at the Symphony Concert

With d'Indy's second symphony for the chief piece at the Symphony Concert of Friday afternoon, and with Gounod's "Faust" for the first time at the opera house in the evening, two extremes of French music met in Boston yesterday. By common consent the symphony is the highest achievement, thus far, of the newer French composers, and little by little it is making its way to the understanding and the appreciation of those that hear it. Twice under Mr. Gericke, twice under Mr. d'Indy himself, and now three times under Mr. Fiedler, it has been performed in Boston, and the repetition of yesterday, like that of tonight, was due to genuine and, as such things go, widespread request. "Faust," on the other hand, is one of the most familiar of operas. For fifty years it has held the stage, gone up and down the world, and been performed by all sorts and conditions of singers from "ideal casts" to pupils and amateurs. Yet, well done, it still keeps its vitality, because, like d'Indy's symphony, it is a masterpiece in its kind. In none of the new French music has Mr. Fiedler shown such keenness of sympathetic understanding as in this symphony; his men seconded him to the utmost, and the performance yesterday was notable for the clothing of the music with the mingled reflection and passion that stir in it. It is possible to conceive of "Faust" in more animating and illuminating performance than it received at the opera house lats night. The orchestra, indeed, has not been heard to such advantage since the season began, and Mr. Goodrich conducted with an ability and security that surprised even those who expected most of him. Mr. Nivette's Mephistopheles, too, had its distinctions; and the chorus once more proved its unusual mettle; but otherwise the performance had a tameness that "Faust" nowadays can ill endure. It ran conscientiously, but unkindlingly forward. For the rest, at the Symphony Concert of the afternoon, Mme. Schumann-Heink sang with the ordered power, the beauty of tone, the security and the discrimination of style that of late have distinguished her, while for the first time in twenty-one years, the audience heard a concerto for oboe. Naturally, it seized the rare occasion to applaud Mr. Longy, who played it, as one of the exceptional virtuosi of the orchestra.

MONITOR,
DECEMBER 11, 1909.

Next week's program for the rehearsal and concert of the Symphony orchestra will give the place of honor to Serge Rachmaninoff. He will play his own concerto in C minor for piano which he has already played with the orchestra in Philadelphia, Baltimore, New York and Hartford. He will also conduct his new symphonic poem after Bocklin's picture "Todes-Insel," which hangs in the museum at Leipsic.

Bocklin's romantic paintings have more than once furnished inspiration to musicians, notably to Hans Huber, the Swiss composer, who has written a "Bocklin Symphony," and to Felix Weingartner, whose symphonic poem "The Isles of the Blessed" after Bocklin's picture of the same name, was performed here under Mr. Gericke.

Mr. Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem had its first hearing in this country last week in Chicago, when it was played by the Theodore Thomas Orchestra, with Mr. Rachmaninoff as leader.

The other members on the program of the ninth rehearsal and concert, are Brahms' Tragic Overture and Wagner's prelude to the "Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

The third concert in Cambridge of the Symphony orchestra will be given in Sanders theater next Thursday evening, Dec. 16. Mme. Olga Samaroff will be the soloist, playing with the orchestra, Rubenstein's fourth concerto in D minor. The symphony will be Schumann's in C minor, and the two pieces in lighter vein will be Bantock's overture to "The Pierrot of the Minute" and Tschaikowsky's "Nut-Cracker" suite.

TRANSCRIPT,
DECEMBER 11,

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Mr. Rachmaninoff, as Composer, Conductor and Pianist at the Symphony Concerts—Pepito Arriola for a New Prodigy—Mr. and Mrs. Mannes to Begin Their Recitals—Mr. Platt and Mr. Perabo for Pianists

